(II)

To the moſt Noble and Twin-like paire, of truely Honourable and compleat perfection, Sir PHILLIP HERBERT, Knight of the Bath to our dread Soueraigne King IAMES, at his Royall Coronation; Lord Baron of Sherland, Earle of Mountgomery, and Companion in the vnparaleld and famous Fellowſhip, of the Order of the Garter.

As alſo, To the truly vertuous and Noble Counteſſe his Wife, the Lady Suſan, Daughter to the right Honourable Edward Vere, Earle of Oxenford, Viſcount Bulbec, Lord Sandford and of Badeleſmere: and Lord High Chamberlaine of England, &c.

The firſt Volume of this Treaſurie, publiſhed about 5. yeares ſince.

WOrthily might I bee condemned of arrogancie, (moſt Noble Lord & Lady) becauſe, hauing paſt the Pikes in a peece of the ſelfe-ſame ſeruice (followed with fauour and kinde acceptation) I ſhould therefore preſume vppon the like ſucceſſe: knowing the inconſtant nature of Times, that as they alter, ſo do mens humours & diſpoſitions with them. For, that which carrieth liking and allowance to day, falles into loathing and contempt to morrow; Opinions being more various in the caſe of Bookes, then are the Arguments whereon they diſcourſe, becauſe carping curioſity will haue his cenſure. But, as the Laſt for Hercules, was not faſhioned to fit euerie foote, nor his Lyons skinne to be worne by any baſe Lout; euen ſo the ſublimitie of true iudgement (in matters of ſuch induſtrious and painfull labor) ſhould be left to the Learned; not to euery courſe and mechanicke conceite, capeable of nothing, but of ſuch occaſions as are ſuteable to his owne condition.

Ignorance wil alwayes bee bold vpon the learneſt labours.

I haue read of the great Riuer * Euripus, which ebbeth and floweth ſeuen times a day, and with ſuch violence; that it carrieth Ships vpon it with full ſayle, directly againſt the winde. Seuen times in an houre ebbeth and floweth raſh Opinion, in the torrent of indiſcreet and troubleſome apprehenſion: carrying Criticke calumnie, and ſquint-eyed detraction, mainly againſt the winde of Wiſedome and Iudgement; becauſe their braines are no better ballaſt, nor their capacity of further reach or extendure.

Heſiod. in Lib. 3. Cap. 7.

And yet, if the ſaying of Heſiode be true; That nothing can bee more pleaſing, then variety, which is the ſoules cheefeſt ſolace: Then (not fearing folly, but ſpeaking to peereleſſe Noble nature) giue mee leaue to tell you, that there can hardly bee any eſpeciall ſubiect imagined, but one Argument or other heere meeteth with it. From Sacred Diuinity (the moſt ſolide and ſupreame of all other) through all other Artes and Sciences whatſoeuer, euen to any lowly, and the meaneſt (worthy) profeſſion; here is ſome notable marke or Monument thereof (if it be either Ancient or Moderne) ſtored vp in this Treaſurie, for future Ages to delight in, and to receiue no meane benefite thereby.

Comparing al the Volumes together.

Then (Honourable Lord and Ladie) all theſe bleſſings beeing Yours (as alſo my ſelfe, in endleſſe dutie and ſeruice) when any ſubiect of great, graue, and ſerious conſideration (as of Nations, Monarchies, Kingdomes, and People, in their Originall, Riſing or Declining, by Warres, Diſſentions, Combuſtions, or otherwiſe in the like occurrences) ſhall ſeeme troubleſome or tedious to you: walke on but a little further, & then you may enter into a ſpacious Forreſt, affording all choiſe of pleaſing Game, either for Hawking, Hunting, Fiſhing, Fowling, or any other Noble exerciſe beſide.

When thoſe Forreſt pleaſures ſhall faint you (as all delights dull, by too much continuance) an Orchard ſtandes wide open to welcome you, richly abounding in the faireſt Frutages: not to feed the Eie onely, but likewiſe to refreſh the Heart, inuiting you to plucke where, and while you pleaſe, and to beſtow how, and when you liſt: becauſe they are all yours, and whoſoeuer elſe ſhall taſte of them, do enioy ſuch freedome but by your fauor.

There is one eſpeciall recreation more (Gracious Madam) which remaineth ſoly to your ſelfe, and ſuch as may enter by your admittance; in a goodly large Garden, abounding with all kind of the faireſt Flowers, that open with the cheerfull mornings Sun, and ſhut againe at his ſad departure, all ſweet, and all ſoueraigne. And, becauſe Ladies of elder times (as many haue had the like delight in our more Moderne daies) were ſingularly skilfull in Phyſick and Chirurgery: there is not a vacant place in the whole Garden, but it is fitly furniſhed ſhed euerie where; the verie common walkes (euen as if they were Bride-like ſtrewed by hand) are couered with the choiſeſt Simples, pureſt diſtillatorie Plants, and wholeſome Herbes of euerie Vertue: for which, the Garden was purpoſely founded, and not for fruitleſſe idle vanity.

And were you all alone, without companie, and by your ſelfe, yet can you not ſo continue there: For, you may meete with a faire Beuey of Queenes and Ladies, at diuers turnings as you walke, and euerie one will tell you the Hiſtorie of her life and fortune (rare examples of Vertue and Honor) as themſelues can beſt, truly & plainly diſcourſe vnto you. Some other alſo you ſhall ſee, ſadly ſitting vnder Eughe & Cipreſſe trees, with Garlands of thoſe leaues wreathed about their heads, ſighing out their diuers diſaſters: whom your Noble nature cannot chooſe but commiſerate; as greeuing to ſee a ſcratch in a cleare skin, and a bodie beautified by Nature, to be blemiſhed by vnkinde Deſtiny.

From manie remote Kingdomes and Countries (where naturally they ſpake thoſe ſeuerall Languages) are all theſe variable pleaſures come hither, onely to kiſſe your Noble hands. It was no mean infelicitie for them, to find no fitter a Tutor, that might haue taught them to ſpeake more eloquent Engliſh; which (indeede) alſo was my fault, ſeeing none elſe would tie themſelues to ſo hard a Taske. But howſoeuer it may prooue, your rich iudgements, and all-ſufficient ability in the Languages, as alſo my weakeneſſe; will (I hope) bury all defects in your fauor, & beare out from ſcandall my willing endeuour, that I may finiſh the other (yet remaining) eleuen Bookes behinde, to perfect ſo rich and rare a Treaſurie.

The Printer to the Reader.

SOme few yeares paſt, I intended the whol Worke of Pedro Mexia, with ſome other Authours on the like Arguments of variety. I then publiſhed nine Bookes, with intention to haue made them vp fifteen, for the firſt Volume: but being preuented by ſickneſſe, I finiſhed but the firſt nine Bookes; and finding the good acceptance of them, I haue aduentured now on ten Bookes more, of the like Ancient and Moderne Times: ſauing only, ſome particular Heads but lightly touched, are now (by the ſame Authors) more at large illuſtrated. And may this finde equall fauour vnto the former (without any harſh cenſure, or vnkinde diſcouragement:) the other eleuen Bookes ſhall follow with all conuenient ſpeede, to finiſh vp ſo faire a Treaſury.

Farewell.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

Of the ancient Countrey of Gaule, now called France; what Lawes, Customes, Ceremonies, and other manners were vsed among the people of that Nation in their first Originall: and how (since then) they haue continued.

An Introduction to the whole Discourse.

IN ancient times, the Countrey of Gaule was enclosed within the limits of the Rhein, of the Alpes, of the Mediterranean sea, of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Ocean sea. But after that the Gaules had passed the Alpes; all the Countrey which was from the Mountains, so farre as the riuer * Rubicon, along by the coast of the Apennines, and so vp into the high Sea (which at this day is called the Gulfe of Venice) took the name of Gaule: as Galatia did the like, after that wee had subdued some people of Asia. That Gaule then which is in Europe, being halfe parted by the Alpes, is diuided into two parts; the one on the hither side of the Mountaines, and the other beyond. That which is on the further side, yet concerning vs, was called by the Romanes Togata*: as Romane, in regard of the habit of the Romanes, being commonly called a Gowne, and which they then did vsually weare. That on the hither side, was (by themselues) named properly Braccata (by a certain fashion of garment then worne by them, termed Breeches) and partly * Comata, in regard that the haire on their heads was verie bushy. Braccata in the time of Iulius Cæsar, had his extendure from the Alpes, so farre as Rosne or Rhodanus* bending towardes the Pyrenean Mountaines, where were comprized the Volcæ, Armoricanes, Rhutheni or Rhynteni, and Heluetians, as it is to be seen in the seuenth Book of Cæsars Commentaries. This country was one while called Prouence, and then againe Narbone, after the name of Narbona, then the chiefe and capitall Citie of the country. In Comata dwelt the Aquitans, which are they of Guienne, euen from the Pyrenean Mountaines, so farre as the riuer Garona*: on the hitherside whereof are the Celts, inhabiting so farre as the Riuers of Sena and Marna. All the rest of the country extending toward the North, is possessed by the Belgians.

Now the search would bee very great, and hard to be performed by any mã, that would would (with a certaine history of all the times) set downe the fashions, manners, and customes which the ancient Gaules had held and obserued, vntill the daies of Iulius Cæsar, and their nouell qualities from those dayes to ours. But such as can content themselues with that diligence, which generally may be deliuered by the proofes of good and sufficient Authours, worthy of faith and sound credit; perhaps shall finde their expectation well fitted, both with honest pleasure and profite in their reading. And with this intention am I determined to make (summarily) a collection out of many writers, that haue carefully imployed their paines, concerning the manners and behauiour of the Gaules, according as matters might be remembred, in such diuersity of distant places. And first, we will select out the most Ancient: afterward (if wee can bring our purpose to full effect, and as our endeuor shall nothing be wanting) we will as diligently seeke for the nouell customes.

Iul. Cæs. in com. lib. 6.

Cæsar hath comprehended a certaine forme and semblance of Gaul in her ancient dayes; especially in the sixt booke of his Commentaries, of the warre in Gaul: albeit he hath sowen many other things throughout his Bookes: which I hauing collected heere and there, and from infinite places in other Authors, so that the whole may serue to encrease and fully illustrate the course of our purpose; wee may the more reasonably accomplish that which shall serue to make knowne our full aime and scope. Neuertheless, I am not to learne, that the Greekes which haue followed Cæsar, wer it that they vnderstood not the latine tongue, or were it through carelesnesse and negligence; haue declared in many places, that they scarsely vnderstoode the matters contained in his Commentaries. Wherefore we will first of all imitate Cæsar, as the most great and singular Author and master of our history: and then pursue others, according as they haue borrowed any thing of him, or as they serue to make the whole subiect vnderstood.

The cheefest places in Great Britain and Germany possessed by the Gaules.

But in regard that the principall parts of Great Britaine, as also of Germany, haue bene seized by the Gaules, as shal appear in due time and place; and forasmuch as there hath bene great resemblance of the Britaines and Germanes with the Gauls, as will bee declared by that which Cæsar hath written; I imagined with my selfe, that it would very conueniently sute with our purpose, to compare such fashions as carried any coherence in these Nations. Considering that Cæsar thought it fit, to compare the customes of Gaule, with them of Germany. And Strabo, perceyuing the Germanes to be called so by the Romanes, as true brethren to the Gauls, by resemblance of their manner of liuing, when he wrote the fashions and customs of the ancient Gaules, he reproued them, and began with the Germanes. But although that Tacitus hath sayd, That they were named Germanes, by an appellation proper to their Nation, and such as they pleased to stile themselues; yet notwithstanding, howsoeuer at first they receiued that name, there may be discerned in thē a great Germanity, or (for our better vnderstanding) a Fraternity, both in behauiour and customes, answerable one vnto another.

Resemblance in customes and manners, betweene the Gaules and Germans.

For our better beginning then, we will conclude on certaine kindes of manners, to the end, that each thing may be carried as may be most conuenient. Plato sayeth, There are three principal parts in the body of Man, wherein are lodged the three principall powers of the soule; Concupiscence in the Liuer, Anger in the Heart, and Reason in the Head, as in a Citadell. In like manner, there are three seuerall kinds of vertues that do command & gouerne them: Sobriety or Temperance, to ouersway Concupiscence in the Liuer; Courage, against Anger in the Heart; and Wisedome, in thinking and judging with Reason. The common consent & agreement of all which, is the faithfull dutie of each one, euen as it were with diuers voices, & worthily may be called Iustice. Cæsar and Diodorus, Titus Liuius, Strabo, and others, who are as interpreters of Cæsar, do declare many things of the Gauls which I would haue set down at large in my Discourse, according as they are written by them: I should rehearse one and the same matter too many times. Wherefore I will rather imitate their intention in each place, then bee constrained to alledge their multiplicity of words.

CHAP. I.

Of the Temperance in eating and drinking vſed among the Gaules: as alſo of theyr Marriages and ſingle condition of life.

The Authour beginneth with Temperance.

IT O enter then on the behalfe of Temperance, wee might ſpeake of their abſtinence in eating and drinking, reſort to women, theyr manner of ſpeech, their modeſty in Garments and lodging; their ſportes, delights and aſsiſtance, which they affoord to one another in ſuch things as they haue. Concerning the eating and drinking of the ancient Gaules, they liued for the moſt part (according to Diodorus and Strabo) on white meats, and diuers kinds of fleſh, & principally on Porke freſh and ſalted. They vſed to haue ſtanding by their fires, pottes full of boyled fleſh, and ſpits well loaden with roaſted fleſh; the better part whereof they would giue to men of worth, to doe them honor: as Homer writes, That the Grecian Captains did to Aiax, when he had won the victory againſt Hector body to body. Cæſar granteth the ſelfe-ſame manner of life to the Britaines, and to the Germanes. The Britaines (ſaith he) which dwell furtheſt vp into the Countrey, the moſt part of them do not ſowe any corne but liue onely vpon milke and fleſh. Neuertheleſſe, they hold in deteſtation (by what religious opinion I know not) to taſte of an Hare, of an Hen or Chicken, and of a Gooſe. Hee ſaith alſo the very ſame in his ſeuenth book, ſpeaking of the Germanes; That they do not addict themſelues to any kinde of labour, and that their very greateſt nouriſhment is vppon white meats, cheeſe and fleſh. But Tacitus hath written much more amply concerning the manner of life amongſt the Germans. Each mother (ſaith hee) doth nurſe her childe with her owne breſt, and neuer truſteth it in the hands of their ſeruants, or other Nurſes. Thou canſt not know the Maſter from the Varlet, by any kinde of more delicate feeding. They liue nakedly and ſlouenly, euen amongſt their Heards or droues of Cattle; & lying vpon the ground, vntill ſuch time as age doth ſet apart ſuch as are Maſters, & vertue doeth auouch and make them to bee knowne. Their viands are ſimply dreſſed or prepared, being of wilde fruits; ſometimes of freſh Veniſon, or curded milke, without any dainty cooking or dreſſing. So much for their manner of eating.

As for their drinke, that amongſt the Gaules, and termed Zythum: This (ſayth Diodorus) was made of barley and water, hauing paſſed thorowdiuers honicombs. Tacitus writeth almoſt the very ſame of the Germanes. They make a drinke (ſaith he) of water, mingled both with barley & wheate, diſguiſed into ſome reſemblance of wine. They which dwell on the Sea-coaſts, do buy wine. The moſt part of the Gaules (as Diodorus & Strabo doe both write) vſed to ſitte on the ground and to eate their food, ſitting on the skinnes of Dogges or of wolues: being ſerued with earthen veſſelles, which were ſtrong and maſſiue, and wrought about with branches of flowers; and they were alwayes attended and ſerued by their young children. In like manner Tacitus recordeth, That the Germans ſo ſoone as they were awake and riſen (which they vſed not to do till it was day:) they laued and waſhed themſelues, with warme water, becauſe winter continued in their region for the moſt part of the yeare; and at comming foorth of the bathe, they went vnto theyr foode, each one hauing his table and ſeat alone by himſelfe. Thus then was their ancient and rude ſimplicity, which cauſed the Germanes to be ſo big membred and corpulent, whereat Tacitus ſeemeth to maruell greatly. And thence likewiſe enſued the ſelfe-ſame greatneſſe of bodye which was among the Gaules, vvho for their huge corpulency, and regarding only their owne bigneſſe of ſtature, held the ſmaller conſtitution of the Romanes in contempt, as may be ſeene in the 2. book of the wars in Gaul.

But Plato reprehendeth the Gaules for their intemperance and drunkennes with wine; and Diodorus writeth the very ſame. They affected Wine ſo exceſsiuely, that when the Merchants brought it to them, they dranke it wholly new as it was; and then becomming drunk, by hauing taken ouermuch, they lay downe to ſleepe, or behaued themſelues like mad men. And this was the reaſon that many of the Italian Merchants for the gaine which they got both by ſea and land; brought wine in great plenty thither, and for a ſmal veſſell of wine, receyued (in exchange) foure times the value. And the ſame Authour not onely blameth their drunkennes, but alſo the quarrels which accompanied this exceſſe. They obſerued (ſaith he) as a cuſtome, at their feeding, for the leaſt debate of words, to riſe preſently from the Table, and defie one another to the combate, hazarding their liues without any diſcretion. Thus you ſee how the Greeks haue reproued the ancient Gaules; and Tacitus calleth the Germanes theyr Brethren in the ſame vice, accuſing them equally to bee drunkards and quarrellers. They vſed not (ſaith he) any ſuch temperance againſt thirſt. For they held it no diſhonor, to ſpend the whole day and night in drinking, ſo they might bee ſuffered to drinke their fill, furniſhing them with ſo much as they would haue: you ſhold find them no leſſe eaſie to bee conquered by their vices, then by armes. The quarrels which roſe very often among them, as among people ſubiect to Wine, was no ſooner mingled with iniuries of the mouth; but (for the moſt part) did end with blowes by the ſword, to the expence of their blood, yea of their liues. Such was the blame which the Germanes receiued by making no more account of ſo bad a cuſtome; euen as if this vice had bene no vice among them, or did any way ſhame them.

But the Gaules vſed themſelues in better manner: for by a publicke ordinance this vile behauiour (in particular perſons) was verie grecuouſly and rigorouſly puniſhed. Let vs heare then from Cæſar the cauſe of the magnanimity of the Gaules; which was, by knowing how to keep thẽſelues from this diſorderly kinde of life. The moſt magnanimous of all (ſaith he in his firſt Booke, ſpeaking of the Belgians, Celts, and Aquitanes) are the Belgians, becauſe they are furtheſt off in the countrey, which is carefully husbanded, and ſtrangers doe but ſildome trafficke with them, to bring them that which ſerueth to no other end but to effeminate their courages.

An Order amongeſt the Gauls againſt this badde cuſtome.

Cæſar in comment lib. 1

In the ſame book ſpeaking of the Neruians, as of the moſt couragious of al the Belgians, he ſaith; Cæſar making enquiry of them, what might be their naturall diſpoſition and manners, hee found, That Merchants did not trafficke with them, & that they would not ſuffer (by any means) that wine ſhould be brought among thẽ, or any thing that ſerued for delicacy. For they held (as an infallible opinion) that ſuch things wer the cauſe of abaſing their courage, & that their natiue vertue would thereby be much weakned. Whereby we may perceiue, that the intemperance of ſome particular men, was condemned by a generall and publicke decree; and that ſobriety & temperate carriage was greatly reſpected and honored in thoſe parts. Strabo ſayeth, That by the perſwaſion of Cenus, a graue and wiſe man, the Getes rent and pluckt vp all the Vines in theyr country, yet vſed ſome wine in the time of their childrens nurſing. But our Anceſtors did much better, becauſe they would neuer permit or ſuffer, that any Vine ſhould be planted among them, or wine to be brought them from any other place. Wherefore Diodorus had good reaſon to ſay, that in his time there came no vvine at all into Gaule Comata.

Wine & wanton meats the hinderers of manly corage

Strabo in lib. 3 Of the Getes

No vines plãted amongſt the Gaules.

Diodor. in lib. 4

Cæſar in his fourth Booke, maketh the Sueues, a people of Germany, equall in temperance to the Neruians that were in Gaule. For they would not ſuffer that any wine ſhould bee brought into their countrey, becauſe they were perſwaded, that it made men lazie, effeminate, and vnapt to endure any labor. Thus we may obſerue then, what was their ſobrietie in eating and drinking, wherein their greater part of vertue is commended; for abſtinence from lewd and wanton women. And albeit that Diodorus, Strabo, * Bardeſanes, according as Euſebius reporteth; being all of them Grecian Authors, haue reproued this vice as frequent and common among the Gaules, and which is as innated (if credite may bee giuen to Ariſtotle) in warlike actions; whereby the fable was fained, of conioyning Venus with God Mars: yet notwithſtanding, Cæſar ſpeaketh nothing therof, but giueth great commendation to the Germans for their temperance, contrary to them that haue written otherwiſe of them.

ſpect and praiſe. For they held it as a moſt villanous thing to haue knowledge of a woman, before the age of twenty yeeres. In all which time they did not hide themſelues, but bathed daily together in the riuers. And this is the reaſon rendered by Herodotus, ſpeaking of the nature of children, wherefore haire commeth much ſooner to ſome then it doth to others: becauſe the vſe of Venus maketh the fleſh more looſe and flaggy, and openeth the skinne, which affordeth the eaſier paſſage to the haire; contrarywiſe, ſuch Children as are gelded, haue neuer any haire at all. Tacitus hath not omitted the ſelfeſame attribution of praiſe to the Germans. Yong men are long time before they haue any knowledge of women: and that is an eſpeciall reaſon why they loſe no part of their yourhfull ſtrength, and therefore make no haſt at all of parting with their virgin condition. Young Laddes, and ſuch (of like ſtature) as are gelded, do make triall of their agility together, and their children do (commonly) partake of their Parents ſtrength.

Marriages do appertaine to the rule of the ſame vertue: but Cæſar hath not written carefully how the Gauls obſerued it. The husband (ſaith hee) laide downe the valew of ſo much goodes, as his wife brought with her, and a iuſt account being taken thereof, the whole ſtocke was put together. The party that ſuruiued, enioyed the others portion, with the reuennewes of all that had paſt. The husbands are maſters and commaunders of their wiues liues, and alſo of their Childrens. When any Father of a Family (of note) dyeth, the nereſt of the kindred do aſſemble together, and if any ſuſpition be conceyued concerning his death: the Wife is committed to tortures, as they doe theyr ſlaues, and if ſhe prooue to be conuinced; after they haue tormented her with fire, and all other kinds of paines, they put her to death. This law may ſeeme hard, that giueth the husband ſuch like power ouer the wife and children, as he hath ouer his ſlaues. For, according as the Philoſophers haue taught vs: the father of the family giueth command to his wife & children, as vnto free perſons. Yet this is not all as one kinde of command: for hee giueth command to his wife as to one of the ſame Commonwealth, & to his children as a King. The Law truly may appeare to be hard, and yet it is Roman, euen the like as Romulus made, Ordayning; That the ſonne ſhould bee in his fathers power all his life; and that the father may chaſtiſe, beate, put him to any buſines in the field, ſell, or kill him. The ſame King alſo appointed, That a man might punniſh his wife, if ſhe had drunke any wine. Cæſar ſpeaketh all this in his ſixt booke: and in his fift hee declareth diuers other faſhions of behauiour in marriages, ſpeaking of the Britaines.

Orders obſerued in marriages amongeſt the Gaules.

Ten or twelue together (ſaith he) do hold their wiues in common, and principally brethren with their brethren, and fathers with their daughters. And ſuch as are born of them, are auouched for children of them that haue eſpouſed their mothers, being yet maids. So much alſo he relateth of the Engliſh. But Tacitus writing of the Germaines, giueth them moſt noble commendation in this point. The wife (ſaith hee) neuer offereth anie dowry to the husband, but the husband to the wife. The parents, couſins, & kindred are preſent thereat, and allow of all preſents paſsing between them. And they are no preſents deuiſed for delicacie or delight of women, nor to repaire a new intended marriage: but they are a gift of Oxen yoaked, a horſe brideled and furniſhed, & a Buckler or Target, with a ſword and Iaueline. For theſe preſents the husband taketh his wife; who likewiſe (on hir owne behalfe) preſenteth him with ſome weapons of warre. This is the great marriage bond, theſe are accounted ſacred myſteries, & theſe are the coniugall gods that they hold in reuerence.

Women puniſhed by theyr husbands for adultery

There are very few adulteries committed in ſo great a Nation; for the puniſhment thereof is very ſpeedy, and the huſband may lawfully do it. After hee hath ſhauen and ſtript her naked, the husband bringeth her forth of his houſe, in the preſence of all his and her neereſt Kindred, and beateth her with a baſtinado thorow all the ſtreetes; for there is no allowance of any pardon after that a wife hath blemiſhed her honor; and neither her beauty, youth, or riches can afterward winne her another husband.

Thoſe Commonweales are the beſt ordered, wherein is ſuch permiſsion, that the Maides onely finde themſelues husbands, and mariage conſiſteth in mutuall accord (for a long while) in good hope, and that the Bride may haue her hearts deſire. For in this caſe ſhe taketh her husband as one & the ſelfeſame body, and one life is allowed by them both: becauſe they can haue no contrary thoughts, neither theyr deſires any way wandering, but their affections doe ſo ſimpathize, as not in either to husband or wife, but to the ſanctity of marriage. It is helde as a very great offence, to procure the death of any of their children, or of their kindred: And there good cuſtomes do beare more ſway, then good Lawes and Ordinances doe elſewhere. Hitherto haue wee continued the writing of Tacitus, concerning the Germanes marriages.

Diodorus reprehendeth the Gaules for a certaine kinde of diſordered behauiour in their ſpeaking, ſaying; They vſe a ſhort kinde of ſpeech, ſomewhat hard to be vnderſtood, and without any deliberation; ſpeaking great ſtore of doubtfull things, yet deliuering many bragging and vaunting words; much to commend thēſelues and in the contempt of others. And Cæſar ſpeaketh thereof in his ſeauenth Booke, and is alſo to be proued by diuers examples in his other books. Such is that whereof hee ſpeaketh in his firſt booke, of Diuiconus the Heluetian, who highly extolled and vaunted the vertue of the Heluetians, and reproached the diſcomfiture of the Romanes, admoniſhing Cæſar by menaces to beware of any further attempting; for feare, leaſt the place where the Romanes miſcarried, by a further loſſe of their people, after the foiling of their whole Army, ſhould take name thereby, and ſo remaine as a memorie of their diſgrace.

thicke and hard, that little difference appeareth betweene theirs and the haire of a horſe. Tacitus ſpeaketh (wel-neere) the ſame of the Sueues, a people of Germany. But the eſpeciall note of that Nation is, that they turne their haire croſſe or ouerthwart, and then binde or truſſe it vp in a knot. In this manner are the Sueues knowen among all the other Germaines, and free-men of the Countrey from ſlaues. Some of the Sueues do weare their hayre long, and briſtling backward with a bending downe, and ſo they go till they bee hoary or white; and then (oftentimes) they binde it together on the crowne of the head. The Lords are no more reſpectiue of their own perſons, and yet without any proud or bad intention: For it is not done in regard that they affect or couet to be affected; but they doe onely ſo decke themſelues, to appeare the more fierce and terrible vnto theyr enemies, when occaſion calleth them foorth to warre.

Diodorus proceedeth on in this maner, concerning the behauiour of the Gaules. Some of them (ſaith he) doe vſe to ſhaue their beards, but others do weare them of ſome length. The Gentlemen do cutte ſhort the haire on their cheekes, & ſuffer their beards to grow to ſuch length, as it will couer all their bodie. They weare alſo a kinde of garment, which is all hairie, to ſeeme the more dreadfull and terrible, conſiſting of diuers colours, and tearmed by them Braccates. They haue long skirted ſackets or Caſſockes, rewed or ſtreaked, beeing of the very courſeſt Cloath, which they vſe for winter, and the moſt ſimple or ſlendereſt for ſummer. Diodorus ſpeaketh thus of the Braccates, as the reaſon whereby the Romans called that part of Gaule Braccata, and by which garment the ſame Authour affirmeth, That the Gaules were more terrible to beholde. Strabo likewiſe writeth in his fourth book concerning their haire, their Caſſockes, their rude and hairy garments, their long high breeches, & their ſhort open cloaks which hardly couered halfe theyr Buttockes. All theſe Authors do agree together, as touching the haire of the Gaules and Germaines, and to be of a redde colour, according as Titus Liuius, and Diodorus haue written. Cæſar ſpeaking of the of ancient Britany, writeth thus. They do all paint themſelues with an hearb, called by them Glaſtum*, which cauſeth a blewiſh or azure colour: and this made them very dreadfull to looke on, when they went to any fight. Moreouer, they wore their lockes of haire very long; ſhauing off all their other haire except that on the head, and on the vpper lip.

Diodorus purſuing his purpoſe concerning the Gaules, figureth them forth (as it were with golde) in this manner. The whole Countrey of Gaule is without the mettall called Siluer: but nature hath giuen it gold, without any labor or cunning endeauour. For, in regard that the moſt part of the riuers haue their courſes verie troubleſome, vneaſie in paſsing, & wheeling or circkling in wide compaſſe: the waters which deſcend from the hilles and mountaines, by diſperſing themſelues abroad in the valleyes, do ſcatter a ſand on the fields, which is mingled with golde. Afterwardes, kneading or tweaking the clods together, wherein they diſcerne the golde to ſhine, and permitting them to become hard: they then breake them in peeces, and when they haue waſhed it in water, and the earth is quite taken away, they hurle the reſt into a furnace, and ſo melt it in that manner. When they haue thus moulten and drawne out the golde pure and cleane, the women and men do adorne themſelues therewith: for they weare it in rings on their fingers, and in bracelets about their armes, and in Carcanets on their breſts, & in chaines about their neckes, and about their middles as golden girdles. Polybius alſo maketh mention in his ſecond booke, of their Chaines and Bracelets. And Strabo in his 4. booke ſpeaketh of their Mines of gold, whereof the cheefeſt are in the Country of Tarbellos*: and hee attributeth this Ornament only vnto ſuch as were in honor and dignitie.

But Cæſar and Tacitus do ſpeake of another manner of want or pouerty (of this magnificence) amongſt the Germaines. They vſe (ſaieth Cæſar) skinnes in their garments, and ſhort cloakes made of furred skins, hauing the greater part of their body naked. But Tacitus ſpeaketh more amply, concerning the whole manner of the Germains, writing thus. I doubt whether the gods were fauourable to them or quite contrary; becauſe they denied them the the mettals of gold and ſiluer. Notwithſtanding, I will not ſet it downe aſſuredly, but that there may bee ſome veine of gold or ſiluer in Germany: yet who (at any time) hath made ſearch for it? They haue no ſuch affection thereto, as to apply it to any ſeruice. Som veſſels of ſiluer haue beene found amongſt them (which haue bene giuen to their Ambaſſadors, or to their Princes) and yet to be held in no more eſteeme or reckoning, then thoſe that are made of earth. Neuertheles, they that dwell much neerer to vs, in regard that they haue trafficked with our people: do make more eſteeme of gold and ſiluer, allowing and commending ſome peeces of our monies. They that liue further off in the Countrey, doe deale more ſimply, and (according to the moſt ancient manner) make their trafficke by exchange. They receiue the old mony, and ſuch as they haue had longeſt knowledge of, as the Serrati and Bigati. They loue the coin of ſiluer better then that of gold; not that they beare therto any particular affection, but becauſe the ſiluer money is eaſieſt for them in buying things common, and of ſmalleſt price. The vſuall habit or garment to them all, is a long skirted Iacket or Caſſocke which they faſten together with a buckle, but (for want thereof) with a great pin. The reſt of the body is not couered with any thing, and they ſit the moſt part of the day vpon the hearth, ſomewhat neere to the fire. Such as are of greateſt wealth, doe differ from the other in their garments, which are not ſo ample or large as thoſe of the Sarmates, or of the Parthians: but iuſtly fitted to the body, and ſuch as maketh apparant ſhew of euery mẽber. They wear the skins of wild beaſts, and ſuch as dwell neereſt to the riuers, are moſt curious of their habit: but they of more remote abiding, vſe no great curioſity, as being leaſt carefull what they weare, becauſe they liue ſo far from ſtrangers. When they haue made choiſe of their beaſts skinnes, they do the like of fiſhes, taking ſuch as are the greateſt, or as the Ocean and moſt vnknowne Seas do yeeld, and fulleſt of ſpots, and ſo they ſowe them together. The Women are no otherwiſe habited then the men: but that the women are oftner couered with a garment of linnen, inter-wouen with a ſcarlet colour. They care for no ſleeues on the height of their armes, but are naked downe from the very ſhoulders and part of the breaſt (neereſt adioyning) is as nakedly diſcouered. Thus you ſee the gayeſt brauery of the Gaules, & how ſimple the Germans are in their garments: it remaineth now that we ſay ſomewhat of their houſes and dwellings.

CHAP. III.

Of the houſes and dwellings of the Gaules; their Townes and villages, and of what manner they were.

THe habitations of the Gauls (according as Strabo ſayth) are wide and ſpacious, made of earth and planchers of wood, & couered with ſtrong reeds arched on the top together in form of a vault: for ſo Cæſar in the fift booke of the Gaules warres ſaith, That the Lodgings of Q. Cicero in the fields, were couered with ſtraw and reeds, according to the manner of the Gaules. And in his ſixt booke he ſheweth, that the more part of the Mannor-houſes appertaining to the gentlemen Gaules, were in the woods, or on the riuers. Speaking of the houſe of Ambiorix, which was altogether engirt with woods; As were wel-nere al (ſayth he) the houſes of the Gauls are, who to ſhun the heate, do dwel in woods, and neere to riuers. Cæſar deliuereth plainly, that the Aquitaines, Celts and firſt Belgians, had their Cities and Townes encloſed both with walles and ditches: but it may be doubted whether the like prouiſion was vſed among the Gaules further off, and ſuch as were neereſt to the North; as the [a] Morini, [b] Aduatiques, [c] Menapians, and [d] Ebnrones.

Cæſar declareth, That the moſt part of theſe Belgians, are deſcended of the Germaines, and ſaith, that the Germains had not their Townes and Villages made after our manner: as may bee obſerued by that which Tacitus hath written according to the cuſtome which they had in his time. Townes, neither that they could endure to haue their houſes neere vnto one another. They dwell diſtant or apart, ſcatteringly, where either riuers, fieldes, or woods do beſt content them. Their Villages are not after our faſhion: for their houſes do not touch or ioyne neere each other. Euery one leaueth a great wide diſtance or compaſſe about his dwelling; either to auoid the diſaſtrous fortunes of fire, or elſe becauſe they know not how to build better. They vſe neither Morter nor Tiles: but the matter which doeth them ſeruice, is very rude, and is not prepared either for beauty or pleaſure. They plaiſter ſome places much more reſpectiuely, with a kinde of earth ſo cleane & ſhining, as it ſeemeth to contend with painting & portraitures of colours. They were wont to make caues vnder the ground, and couered them with thicke clods of dung, to withdraw themſelues thither in the winter time, and therein alſo to hide their Corne; becauſe in ſuch places, the colde weather had not ſo great power, & when the enemy came, hee could make pillage of nothing, but what hee found readily diſcouered. As for that which was thus hidden or buried, Theeues not knowing thereof, would beſtow the leſſe paines & ſearch, in further enquiry after it. Cæſar ſpeaketh (almoſt) as much of the Britains. They tearmed it a Towne (ſaith he) when they had encloſed ſome tuffy wood with ditches and pales; whereinto they were wont to retire themſelues, to ſhunne the courſes of their enemies. And whereas Cæſar ſpeaketh ſometimes of certaine Townes of the Sueues: in mine opinion, hee is ſo to be vnderſtood.

Their Caues and ſtorehouſes of Corne vnder ground

Iul. Cæſar in Com. Lib. 6.

Returne we now to the townes of the Belgians, which are vp higher in the coũtry, and heere my queſtion is: Whether they had any ſuch Townes as the Britains or no? We will firſt of all ſpeake of the Morini, who (according as Cæſar writeth) beganne to make war, but in a quite contrary manner then the other Gaules. For they hauing heard, that the very greateſt Nations which had hazarded battel, were quite defeated and conquered: withdrew themſelues & their goods into the ſtrongeſt places, which were great and long forreſts, encompaſſed with fenny or marſhy grounds. Cæſar being come vnto the entrance of ſome ſuch forreſt, and hauing concluded there to fortifie his campe: as the Romanes were ſeriouſly imployed about their buſines; the enemy (of whom they had no doubt at all) ſallied forth vpon them vnprouided, at moſt places of the wood, and charged the Romanes very ſharply. Heereupon, they betooke them to their Armes, and repulſed them backe into the wood, and hauing ſlaine a great number of them, purſued them thorough many vneaſie places, yet with very little loſſe of their people. The next day following, Cæſar determined to fell down the Forreſt, and ſuſpecting leaſt ſome harme might be done by the Flankers to Soldiers vnarmed: he cauſed al the trees which were hewne downe, to bee made as rampiers againſt the enemy, and to ſerue as defences on either ſide.

The Morini ſet vpon the Romanes, and were repulſed

Hauing made a great ſpacious countrey (in few dayes) by incredible diligence, after that the Romaines had made themſelues Maiſters of the cattle & baggage which was in the rereward; they withdrew themſelues into the thickeſt of the Forreſt. Cæſar ſpeaketh this of the wood of the Morini, which ſerued them as a Towne or Village. And the yeare after, in regard of the drought which had dried vp all the Mariſhes (as is to be ſeene in his fourth booke) they hauing no more refuges to flye vnto as they had the yeare before, were (almoſt all of them) ſubdued by Labienus. In theſe two warres, hee maketh no mention of any other Townes, then of woods and mariſhes.

Cæſar & his men purſue the Morini into the Forreſt

Iul. Cæſar in Com. lib. 4.

The like is affirmed of the Menapians, in thoſe Countries where the Romaine Legions were broght, vnder the conduct of Fabius and Cotta, as it is ſet downe alſo in his fourth booke. They made ſpoyle in the fields, deſtroyed the Corne, ſet the houſes on fire; and all this happened, becauſe the Menapians had hid themſelues in the thickeſt Forreſts. Afterward Cæſar himſelfe came to them with fiue legions. But they (as Cæſar ſaith) not hauing gathered any forces together, truſting only in the ſecurity of the place, withdrew themſelues into the woods and mariſhes, and carried thither their goods alſo. Cæſar hauing diuided his powers with C. Fabius, who was his Lieutenant, and M. Craſſus Treaſorer of his wars, and hauing alſo ſodainely prouided bridges for paſſage, gaue them aſſault three ſeuerall wayes; wayes, and burning their houſes and villages, made himſelfe Maſter of a great number of men and cattle. The Menapians ſeeing themſelues in this diſtreſſe; were conſtrained to ſend Ambaſſadours, humbly to entreate peace. In this place alſo there is no name of any village, or pregnant appearance that there were any, but ſuch as wee haue alreadie ſpoken of.

Of the Neruians. Iul. Cæſar in Com. Lib. 2.

By due obſeruation of this diſcourſe, perhaps the villages of the Neruians will appear to be euen the like. The Neruians (this ſpeaketh Cæſar in his ſecond booke) from all antiquity, not hauing any power of horſemen (for euen to this day they do not addict their mindes thereto, but all the ſtrength which they haue, conſiſteth onely in footemen) to the end they may impeach and withſtand the horſemen of their neighbours, if they make any inrode vpon them, to rob and ſpoile them, cutting downe yong trees that had ſhot forth ſtrong branches, they twined them together, and interweauing briars and thorns among them, they wrought them ſo artificially, that theſe hedges or fences ſerued them as a wall; wherein not onely a man could not enter, but alſo he was vnable to ſee or diſcerne any thing.

The politicke defence of the Neruians againſt horſemen of their neighbours or other enimies

The Neruians had no walled townes or villages of defence.

In the ſame warre of the Neruians, the women, & ſuch as (in regard of their age) were not ſeruiceable for bearing armes, had neuer any Village or Town for their ſafety, which was engirt with wals; but in ſuch a place where there was no coming or entrance for an Army, becauſe of the mariſh grounds, which were the onely hinderance.

Iul. Cæſ. in com. Lib. 6.

The 2. war of Cæſar againſt the Neruians.

Now, in this firſt warre agaynſt the Neruians, wee may plainly perceiue that they had not any Towne encloſed with wals: and we may well credit it by that which is in the ſixt booke. For Cæſar hauing aſſembled foure Legions with all poſsible diligence, entred (vnawares) into the Country of the Neruians, and before they could either draw their ſtrength together, or tell how to ſaue themſelues: after hee had ſurprized a great number of men, and heards of Cattle, and diſperſed the booty to his Soldiers; he layde waſte their fields, and compelled them to yeeld and deliuer him hoſtages. This paſſage likewiſe of the Neruians, yeeldeth great coniecture, that they had no other towns or villages in thoſe times, but like them of the Britaines.

Of the Aduatiques. Iul. Cæſar in Com. lib. 2

It may appeare alſo, that the Aduaticates (by that which Cæſar writeth in his ſecond booke) haue had the like townes. Hauing forſaken (ſaith he) al their townes and Caſtles, they brought all their goods into a village, which was wonderfully ſtrong by naturall ſituation. For, hauing (on al ſides about it) huge rocks & downfalles of exceeding height, it had but one onely comming to it, which was hanging or deſcending downward, yet in a ſweete and gentle manner, being in breadth no more then two hundred foote. This way or paſſage they had fortified with a double wall, of very great height, & the ſame was ſtrengthened in many places with mighty huge ſtones, and ſharpe-pointed beames or pyles. Heere Cæſar deſcribeth nothing but a wall onely, and on one ſide of the Towne. And the like may be eaſily prooued in the Nation of the Eburones: who are alſo called Germaines by Cæſar in his ſecond booke. Theſe men, vnder the conduct of King Ambiorix, had ouercom Sabinus and Cotta, with fifteene Companies, neere to Vatuqua, as it is ſet downe in the fift booke. Cæſar who had neuer receiued a greater iniurie, determined to be reuenged for this loſſe, and vtterly to aboliſh and ruinate the nation of the Eburones, as we may reade in the 6. booke. Therefore he ſent Baſilus on before with the whole band of horſe, and leauing a legion for guard of the baggage; he diuided the other nine into three Regiments, to ouerrunne and make ſpoile of the whole Countrey. He cauſed Labienus to march with three Legions along by the Ocean, toward that part which ioyneth vnto the Menapians. Hee ſent Trebonius with the ſame number of Legions, to ſacke that Countrey which was neereſt to the Aduatiques. Himſelfe, accompanied with the three other Legions, ſtayed to go toward the riuer Sabis, and the vtmoſt parts of the Forteſt of * Ardene.

accesse to them; these pretented them with some imaginary hope, that thus they might defend and saue themselues. Cæsar in this fiery heate of reuenge, perceyuing the great danger which might ensue, by hauing thus separated his Legionaries; called all the neere-neighbouring Citties (in hope of booty) to come and make pillage of the Eburones, to the end, that the race and name of them might bee vtterly confounded. And becausse he could not (as yet) appease his thirsting soule by such spoile as he had made, which indeed was very great, he put himselfe once more on his way, to giue further vexation to his enemies, assembling infinite troopes of people from all the Townes & neere adioyning parts, and so sent them outward by sundry wayes. They burned all the villages, and euery house that they could finde standing. The selfesame desire of vengeance (as is to bee seene in his eight booke) enflamed him the third time, and the like waste he made: neuertheless, he speaketh not of any rampier, or of any ditch belonging vnto Towne or Village. Whereby may iustly bee obserued, that the Belgians as they were descended of the Germaines, so in like manner they had the same order of dwelling.

This may seeme to be spoken sufficiently enough, concerning the habitations of the Belgians.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Humanity, Liberality, Hospitality, & Courtesie of the Gaules to strangers, and care for benefiting each other equally.

Of sports and recreations amongst the Germaines.

IFinde nothing written in Cæsar, of the playes, sports, & pastimes of the youth among the Gauls. As for the Germans, Tacitus writeth thus. They had but one onely kind of spectacle in euery assembly yong boies that conceiued delight in this sport, would run or leape forth violently (and starke naked) before swords & Iauelines directed against them. This exercise grew to be an Art, and Art made it verie gracefull in them: yet what they did, was not for any lucre, gaine, or wages; but the onely recompence of this their audacious gallantry, was, to bee pleasing in their eyes that beheld them. They would play (being in very stayed and setled iudgment) at such desperate games of hazard and dangerous aduenture, as would make a man blush to stand and looke on, and they performed their intentions in such earnest manner, as if they were at strife for some matter of great moment: yea, such was their affection to the gaine or losse, as after they had nothing els to contend for: they would striue about the very last hazard, laying downe their own liberty and persons in pawne. Whosoeuer lost himselfe, would yeelde to the others seruitude, with his owne kinde consent: And albeit hee were neuer so young and strong, yet (in regard of his losse) he wold suffer himselfe to be bound and sold. For such was their wilfull obstinacy, that they would lay down faith vpon the very least occasion.

Desperate & dangerous games among the younger sort yet pursued in the very earnestest manner.

Humanity, liberality, and courtesy both in the Gaules and Germans

But whosoeuer would take note of the great humanity, liberality, and courtesy, as well in the Gaules as in the Germains, let him read what followeth. They would inuite strangers (this speaketh Diodorus of the Gaules) to feast with them. And after nature was sufficed; they would enquire what people they were, and what occasion drew them thither. But Cæsar and Tacitus giueth this commendation vnto the Germaines, by writing much more amply. They make it a matter of great Conscience (saith Cæsar) to offer any outrage to strangers, who, be it for what cause soeuer they come amongst them, yet they will defend them from all iniuries, and thinke them to be sacred people, each one allowing them part of his house, & whatsoeuer he had to liue on. Tacitus writeth in this manner. There is not any Nation more addicted to make good chear together, and feast strangers. They doe make great conscience in denying house-room to any commer; for each man will Feast him him according to his power: And when he hath no further meanes, he that is the Hoſte, enſtructeth him to another mans dwelling; and thereinto (without any further bidding) they enter both togither, euen the neereſt houſe they come vnto; where their entertainment is voyde of all difficulty, and vſed with extraordinarie courteſie. As concerning the rites of hoſpitality, they make no difference between him that is knowne, and another that is vnknown. At his departure, if he deſireth any thing, it is their order and cuſtom to grant it: as they will doe the like when it falleth to their turne. They take great delight in giuing gifts: but will receyue no recompence for whatſoeuer they giue, or think themſelues indebted or beholding for any thing that they receiue. This is a teſtimony of their worthy hoſpitality, & I am of the minde, that ſo great an honor deſerueth not to be forgotten, as Germany iuſtly deſerueth in regard of this Vertue.

No difference between a known friend & a ſtranger.

Phaleas the Chalcedonian, did firſt publiſh in the Commonwealth (as Ariſtotle affirmeth) that goods might bee equally diuided; to the end, that the two principall plagues to mankinde (which are riches and pouerty) might be baniſht from the Citty. And this is that which Plato (moſt of all other) wiſhed for the grounded eſtate of a happy Commonwealth. But the Germains neuer fixed their imaginations on ſuch a moſt fortunate Commonwealth, by diſputes and diſcourſes onely; but accompliſhed and brought it to effect by their owne good cuſtoms and honeſt examples. For ſome of them (as Cæſar auoucheth in his ſixt booke, ſpeaking of the Germaines) had not any certain meaſure of land, or any particular limitation: but the Princes and Magiſtrates aſſigned euery yeare (both to kindreds and parentages, who were acknowledged and placed together) ſomuch ground or land, and ſuch a ſite or ſituation, as vnto them ſeemed beſt and conuenient; & the yeare following, they were conſtrained to ſeeke elſewhere. In his fourth booke, hee ſayth as much of the Sueues, another people of Germany. They had no land which they held in particular, or diuided among thē: neither were they permitted to tarry longer then a yeare in a place, to Til or make it husbandable. This is the equality of goods, which then was among the Germaines.

Equality of goods among the Germans.

And they rendered great ſtore of reaſons for this equality, as the ſame Author witneſſeth in his ſixt booke, viz. Fearing leaſt beeing retained by an accuſtomed continuance in one quarter, they ſhould forſake the profeſſion of warre, & follow the other more beneficial kind of life. Fearing, leaſt they ſhould withdraw their minds from the enlarging and extendure of their bounds or limits: and growing to be too potent in ſtrength, they ſhould oueraweand expell the weaker from their goods. Fearing alſo, leaſt they ſhould be ouer curious in building, to defend themſelues againſt cold and heat, and ſo proue to be ſtarke Cowards. Fearing beſide, leſt a wicked couetous deſire ſhould ariſe among them, of ſcraping and gathering goods together: wheron (cuſtommarily) inſueth threatnings, diſſentions, & blood. Alſo, to the end that the popular ſort might bee contained within a reaſonable contentment of mind, when the meaneſt perceiued his goods to be equal with the moſt powerfull. This is (in effect) the words of Cæſar, touching the qualitie of goods vſed then among the Germaines: and when the Greekes come to compare with him, in commending this manner of behauiour either in the Cretanes or Laconians; all that they could auouch or ſay, was; to terme this worthy and extraordinary vertue, to be no more then meer barbarouſneſſe.

The laſt and laſt

Compariſon of the Greeks with Cæſars words.

Seruitude or bondage was in vſe aſwel among the Germaines and Gaules, as in other Nations. Many men (ſo ſpeaketh Cæſar in his ſixt booke, diſcourſing on the Gauls (finding themſelues to be charged either with debts, or taxations, or iniuries of the mightier ſort) did yeild themſelues into ſeruitude or ſlauery of Gentlemen, who had the ſelfeſame right ouer them, as Maſters had ouer their ſlaues. It ſhould ſeeme, that this Maſterie or command was cruell, as well as that whereof Titus Liuius recounteth in his 2. booke, to be vſed in Rome, after that the Kings were expelled thence, when the commotion of the bondmen was on foote. For they were then controlled and handled by their Maſters, as the bodies of debters were by their creditors, who were parted (as Quintillian writeth in the ſixt chapter of of his third booke) or diuided betweene the creditors, according to the law of the twelue Tables. And that Law (as himselfe saith) which naturally was not to bee allowed, and yet (notwithstanding) permitted as in right, was reprehended by publicke custome, and oftentimes (to remedy the same in meere pitty) the Commonwealth granted Letters of respite, abolishing extorting interests, and making a new obligation for the principall.

The Romane Law of the 12. Tables.

But the Gaules vsed much greater humanity and liberality then the Romaines did; because the Masters kept in honourable place, and about their persons, such as thus stoode obliged to them, and they vsed their seruice also in their warres. Wherefore it appeareth, that that which Diodorus wrote, differed not from this purpose, where he saith; They employed as guards and defenders of their bodyes, such as (among freemen) were poore and needy, and they serued them as Esquires and Armor-bearers in the warre. Tacitus reporteth almost the very same custome as was vsed by the Gaules, when he speaketh of the slaues among the Germaines. They do not vse their slaues (saith hee) as we do ours, appointing them certain offices in our houses: for euery one serueth himselfe, and gouerneth his household affaires. The Master chargeth his slaue with certaine measures of Corn, or with some Cattle, or with some kinde of cloth: euen as we do our Farmers or Husbandmen, and the seruant obeyeth him not but in such businesse. If he would haue any matter done in his house, his wife and Children performeth it. It sildome or neuer hapneth, that a master doth beat his slaue or bindeth him, or enforceth and constraineth him to any businesse. They had a custome to kil them, yet not by any maner of rigorous or seuere chastisement; but in choller, as an enemy, and done in the case of some reuenge. Freemen had no more aduantages then seruants. Seldom or rarely were they aduanced in the house, and neuer vnto the managing of Commonwealth affaires: except among such Nations, as were in obedience to a king, and there they mounted higher then Freemen, or then Gentlemen. Among other Nations, libertines, being not receiued into the like dignities as the free, made distinction of their liberty.

How the Gaules vsed to educate (and bring vp their children. Of their corage, manhood, and valour in Armes and martial exercises.

THese then were the maners and temperance of the ancient Gaules, which serued very sufficiently to maintain their disposition & strength of body, and (doubtlesse) was the cause of their admirable stature: whereat Cæsar was much amazed, when hee beheld the Gaules which were slaine in the warres of Affrica: you haue also heard some part of their liberality, in the administration of their goods, for the releefe of others necessities. But there remaineth much more to say, if wee would enter into discourse, concerning all the parts of their mãhood and valiancy: were it in considering the exercise of their youth, or their earnest & violent desire in following armes, and the Nations which haue beene conquered by them, and the Colonies established thoroughout the world, onely in the name of the Gaules. The Gaules (thus saith Cæsar in his sixt booke) helde this as a difference from others, in their manner of behauiour, to wit; That they would neuer permit their children to come openly before them, vntill they were of able yeares to beare Armes. And they held him to be a villaine, whose sonne (being vnder limited yeares) should be found in publike before his fathers face. Cæsar speaketh this neuertheless hee giueth not sufficiently to be vnderstood, at what time or season they were to bear Armes, neither in what exercise their infancy was imployed, vntill this date of expectation, therefore we must make search into other Authors.

Tacitus, speaking of the Germaines, would haue vs to know, at what time they came vnto the seruice of the Commonwealth. They obserued as a custom (saith he) that no one should vndertake the profession of Armes, vntill the Commonwealth had approued and allowed his sufficiency

Corn. Tacit. in lib. 5. c. 7.

At what time they came to serue the Cõmonwealth in martiall manner.

ficiency. Then, in the martiall Consistorie, either some one of the Princes, or his Father, or els his neereſt Kinſman, armed the yong man with a ſhield and a Iauelin. This was the * Toga or Gown which they tooke, and this was the firſt degree of honor, wherunto their yong men mounted. Before, and till this dignity was done to them, they were but as a member of the houſe onely: but afterward, they appertained to the Commonwealth. Ariſtotle, who wrote long time before Cæſar, declareth vnto vs this manner of education of children (for it ſeemeth in the 8. Booke of his Politicks) that hee learned this inſtruction of vs. It is neceſſary (ſaith he) to accuſtome and vſe the very yongeſt children to indure cold weather: for it profiteth maruellouſly, as well for the diſpoſition of the body, as for manly cariage in war. And this was the reaſon, why ſome barbarous people (as the Celts) obſerued it as a cuſtome, to plunge their young Infants (ſo ſoone as they were borne) in the coldeſt water of the riuer, or els to cloath them in light garments. For, to whatſoeuer thing youth ought to apply it ſelf, this is the beſt courſe; to accuſtom them therto (by little and little) from their yongeſt houre, and when they are tender; becauſe of the heate which is naturally in them, & therefore the firſt thing to be done, is to be carefull in this one point.

Ariſtotle in this place calleth the Celts barbarous, and yet hee accounteth not their cuſtomes barbarous; in regard that hee appointeth the Greekes to faſhion themſelues after their manner. I know that Galen ſharply reproueth this behauiour, when in the firſt booke of his Gouernment of health, and inſtructing how to order health, he ſaith. I am not of the minde, that Children ſhould onely bee nurſed among the Germaines. Alſo, that which we write of, is neither for the Germaines, or for any other ſuch ſauage and barbarous men; no more then for Beares, wilde Boares, Lions, or ſuch other beaſts. I knowe (I ſay) that Galen reprehendeth this cuſtome ſeuerely; but I know likewiſe, that the yong nice delicates of the Greekes, whom Galen ſtriueth to pleaſe, in preſcribing them an order for theyr health: haue beene quite deuoured by theſe Lyons (as he tearmeth them) and that the Gaules and Germanes, if they be compared with the Greeks, may in good right be called Lyons.

And truly, Lacedemon, which was the moſt noble of all the Grecian Cities, was principally renowned for being ſtudious in hardning it ſelfe to trauaile, after the true manner of the Celts. For the youths of Sparta, did dayly imbolden themſelues againſt al manner of paines and exerciſes: neuer entering into the eſpecial aſſembly, before the age of twenty yeares, as Plutarch recordeth in the life of Lycurgus. Wherefore, not onely the power of this vertue, which was in the Gauls and Germaines, but (ouer and beſide) the authority of Ariſtotle, as alſo of Lacedemon (if any man be regardfull thereof) may well ſerue to anſwer the reaſons of Galen. We may alſo inferre (to this purpoſe) that which Strabo hath written, when he ſaith; The Gaules held this as proper and peculiar to them, to refuſe no taking of pains, as fearing to becom fat and ſwoln bellied by eaſe: therfore they puniſhed and condemned vnto ſome pecuniary fine, ſuch yong men as grew groſſe through ſloath and exceſſe. Whereunto that ordinance of the Romaines was conformeable; that depriued any fat or corpulent Knight, of the Horſe graunted him by publique allowance.

Now it is further to be conſidered, that this exerciſe was not onely proper or peculiar vnto the Gaules: but it was in like common vſe with the Germaines theyr brethren, as Galen himſelfe hath elſwhere declared. Let vs liſten then to Cæſar, who heerein giueth them ſufficient commendation. From their infancy (this hee writeth in his ſixt book) they addicted them ſelues to paines taking, and imployed (almoſt) their whole life time, either in hunting, or feats of warre. They had diuers kinds of wilde beaſts, in the Forreſt called * Hercynia: as wilde Bulles, * Alces, but eſpecially Buffles, which they tooke with great labour in their dens or ditches, and there ſlew them. The yong men hardned themſelues to this trauell, and euermore exerciſed this manner of hunting: & they which had ſlaine moſt of them, bringing their hornes to publicke view, as a teſtimony of their diligence, receiued both reward and great praiſe. This yeeldeth ſufficient demonſtration, how the young men prepared their ſpirits, to endure all paine

The Gauls wer alwayes in actions of arms. Iul. Cæsar in Com. lib. 6.

Let vs now obserue what they were in actions of warre, and as the Poet sayeth; The braue workemanshippe of Mars. because the Gauls were perpetually in war. For, before Cæsar came thither (as hee hath written in his sixt booke) it hapned euery yeare, that either they assailed others, or else were glad to defend themselues; and it was easily knowne, that by a custome among the Gaules, age was no excuse to any man, as appeareth by diuers passages in the eight booke. Vertiscus, a chiefe Commander of the * Nhemi, albeit he could very hardly keepe himselfe on horsebacke, because he was so farre gone in yeares: yet notwithstanding, according to the manner of the Gaules, hee would pleade no excuse by his age, in vndergoing such charges as were imposed on him; and he was very vnwilling, that any fight should bee performed without him. Likewise, in the warre of the Parisians, the whole charge (as is to be seene in the seuenth Booke) was giuen vnto Camulogenus, an especiall man of the * Aulerci, who was well-neere wholly spent with age: and yet for all that, the great experience which he had in martiall affaires, aduanced him to the highest degree of Honor. Answerable to this, Strabo saith, The Gaules were rather men of warre, then any way addicted vnto Tillage or husbandry.

Aristotle writeth, that the Celts helde the vertue of warlike actions in most singular respect and commendation. And it was well noted, as Cæsar affirmeth, that the cause of valour (both in the Belgians and Heluetians) grew through their continuall exercise of armes, for he saith: The most valiant people of al the Gaules, were the Belgians.

Arist in Polit lib. 8 cap. 6.

Iulius Cæsar in comment. lib. 8

Now, as Temperance was the first and formost in ranke, as being the Mother, or the Nurse (at least) of true valiancy: so the second cause which Cæsar rendreth, was; That they were neighbours to the Germanes, which dwelt on the further side of the Rheine, with whom they were continually at warre. This (I say) was another cause of their valor, that continually they exercised armes. and by the same reason, the Heluetians surpassed (in this vertue) all the other Celtes: As it might daily be discerned, in regard, that ordinarily they fought with the Germanes, eyther in repulsing them from their frontiers, or making war on them in their owne country. In this place also might be alledged, their often and frequent skirmishes, to deliuer true faithfulnesse of their valour. Moreouer, the Gaules for want of warre, to the end that they might still be in exercise of armes: gaue themselues to thefts and robberies, as Diodorus saith, purloyning the goods of others, without any prouision of their owne. What were the Germanes? saith he. What participation had they in this vertue? All their life, as hath beene already declared, was no way imployed, but in deeds of armes. And as he hath further written in his sixt Booke, the very greatest honour that any Citty could haue, was, to haue a great Desert & spacious Country round about it. They esteemed it to bee proper and naturall to vertue, to compell their expulsed neighbours, to forsake their Lands and Territories, so that few or none durst dwel nere vnto them. And by this meanes, they imagined themselues to be in the greatest security, in being deliuered from al dread of courses, which suddenly might bee made into their Country.

Temperance the Mother or Nurse of valiancy.

The Heluetians exceled al the other Celtes in Armes.

The Gauls wer addicted to thefts & robberies. Diodor in lib. 6

The greatest honour of a Citty among the Germans.

Few or no neighbours durst dwell neere to the Gaules.

Tacitus speaketh of the same exercise of armes. You could not so readily put into their heads, any order for husbandry in their grounds, or carefulnes for gathering their fruites, and corne, as to go assaile the enemy, and to returne back with wounds and maimes. Moreouer, it appeared to them, that it was meere sloth and carlesnesse, to winne that by sweate and labour, which a man might purchase with the price of his blood. Cæsar saith likewise of the Germanes, the same that Diodorus doth of the Gaules, that they were addicted to rapine and thefts. Robberies (thus speaketh Cæsar in his sixt booke) did not make men any iot the worse esteemed: so that they were done out of those limits, which appertained to each Citty. And it is said that they vsed these courses: onely to exercise their youthes, and for the auoyding of ydlenesse. And when some one of the Lords would deliuer his minde in an open assembly, that he wold be their guide, and that such as would follow him, should shew instantly themselues. Such as gaue consent to his opinion, and (allowing him for their Leader) presently arose, and promised him their vttermost assistance; the people present would both commend them and their enterprize. As for such among them, as neither followed, nor gaue allowance to the attempt: they were reputed as traitours, and neuer afterward durst any man repose any credite in them.

Corn. Tacit. in li. 6. cap. 2 The Germane warred with strange nations.

Tacitus addeth yet moreouer, that the Germanes made war among strange people. If the City (saith he) wherein they were borne, grew slothfull and ydle, thorough long peace and repose; the most part of the yongest Gentlemen went (vpon their owne motion and good will) to finde out such Nations as had any warre. For rest and ease was no way pleasing to this people; and the dangers which they essayed and made proofe of, made them also the more famous: and they could not maintaine any great matter of worth, but by power and warre, for thus they compassed meanes to be bountifull and liberall, onely by warre, thefts and pillages.

The meanes for maintaining their bounty and liberality.

Thus we may perceiue, how the auncient Gaules made continual exercise of armes, and well deserued those commendations, wherewith the first and cheefest of all the Romaine Poets shewed himselfe willing to honour Italy.

We are hardly bred, Babes are no sooner borne,
But we to Riuers beare them, hurle them in;

And haunt the Forrests. The pastimes they affect,

But to besiedge strong holdes. Each age we passe,
Managing sturdy yron, turning our Staues
To pierce the hides of Bulles. Slowe, tardy age, Cannot abate our vertue, daunt our hearts.
With snow-white heads we enter Armes, and still Seeke for fresh pillage, liuing on the booty.

Concerning the birth, breeding, and education of the Gaules of greatest antiquity.

Oh, would it had pleased God, that Cæsar, discoursing on the fashions and customes of the Gaules, had bene as willing in describing much more amply, what vse they made of Armes; what reasons they followed in their preparation for warre; what diligence they vsed, beeing in the fielde; what their strength and valor was in fights & combates: it would haue caused an extraordinary pleasure, to remember continually, the ancient custome of our aunceStour in their warlike actions. But Cæsar (principally) sheweth nothing of all this: neuertheleSSe, we will pursue each matter, insomuch as posSibly wee may, and diligently collect somewhat out of diuers passages of his, (as wee can follow any traces, though greatly obscured) in such things as are agreeable to our purpose, not forgetting (in meane while) the iudgement of other Authors.

Especiall obseruations concerning the auncient Gaules, omitted by Cæsar in his writing of their warres.

publiſhed an aſſembly in armes againſt the Romanes; as is to bee ſeene in the fift booke of the warres in Gaule. The Gaules began their warre in this manner, & followed one common Law among them. All their younger men vſed to meete together in armes: but he that came lateſt, in the preſence of the whole aſſembly (after hee had beene tormented with all the tortures could be deuiſed) hee was afterward put to death. The ſelfe ſame cuſtom is declared in the ſeuenth booke, when Vercingetorix, being elected Generall for the warre of the Gaules; was beſiedged in * Alixia. For he tooke counſell, to diſcharge all the troupes of horſe which he had with him, and at parting, he gaue thē charge, to returne each man to the City, whereof he was a member, and there to aſſemble or muſter for the warre, all ſuch as were of age to carry armes. Neuertheleſſe, the Gaules hauing publiſhed the aſſembly of their Princes, did not thinke it meete to draw al thē together, that were of age to beare armes, according as Vercingetorix had ordained: but rather apointed, that each City ſhould be furniſhed with a certaine number of men; it could not otherwiſe chuſe but breed confuſion by beeing vnable to command them, or knowing one from another, or any poſsible meanes of prouiſion for them. By this manner of ordering men for their warres, we may well perceiue, that the Gaules were ſtudious in military affayres, conſidering, that all ſuch as were aboue fourteene yeares of age did carry armes.

Many of the Gaules were wont to fight naked, ſo farre as the nauil: as Titus Liuius ſaieth, in the battaile at Cannas, and Polybius ſpeketh as much of the ſame fight in this manner. It was a verye dreadfull ſight, to obſerue the behauior of naked men, who marched on ſtoutly, ſhewing an excellent beauty, and vndauntable ſtrength. In like manner, Titus Liuius ſaieth, that in * Gallogræcia, the Gaules fought naked, and that was the reaſon, why they were ouercome by the Romanes, who ſmote them afarre off with their Piles, which were a kinde of ſmall Iauelins, and darted at them very ſtrongly. The Gaules likewiſe vſed Bowes and Slings, according as Strabo ſaieth; for he writeth, that they hadde a kinde of Staffe, which being throwne by the hand onely, without any ſtring or other holde, would ſmite further off then an Arrow, and with this they did (moſt commonly) ſhoote at Birds. It is alſo very certaine (as the ſame Author affirmeth) that they hadde a Tree in Gaule, ſomewhat reſembling the Figge-Tree, which carried a fruite, that had ſome likeneſſe to the chapter of a Corinthian piller. This Tree being cutte, did yeeld a deadly iuyce or liquor, wherewith they vſed to impoyſon the heads of theyr Arrowes. That it was ſo, and that the Gaules were great Archers, Cæſar prooueth verie pregnantly in his ſeauenth Booke, where hee ſpeaketh of Vercingetorix. Hee commaunded (ſaieth he) that all the Archers (which were a very great number throughout Gaule) ſhould be leuyed, and ſent vnto him, as it will

The Armes & defensiue weapons of the Germaines.

This was the Armor and Munition of the Gaules, whereunto that of the Germaines, which Tacitus describeth, was not altogether agreeable. They seldome defended themselues with swords or long staues: for they carried Iauelines, or (to vse their owne proper word) Framées; the blades whereof were straite and short, but yet so keene, and so apt for their seruice, that they could vse them with or against a staffe, according as they had occasion to fight, either before they came neere to one another, or when they were at handy gripes. The Horseman contented himselfe with his shield and Iaueline: but foot soldiers had many darts each man, which they hurled or darted infinitely, being naked, or lightly cloathed with a simple Cassocke or Mandillion. They had no brauery on their accoutrements: onely, they would decke their shields with some curious choise colours. Very few of them did weare any shirts of Maile, or scaled coats: some one or two might haue (perhaps) a Caske or Morrion. These are the Armes which the ancient Gauls are credibly said to weare.

A short Glaue or two-edged sword.

Of the horse and foote Soldiers habites.

No brauerie on their garments.

What vse they made of their men of warre.

It remaineth now to speake, how they employed their men of warre, as well on foote as horsebacke. The horsemen were in most estimation among the Gauls, and had the principall managing of all affairs for warre, as Cæsar hath saide in his sixte Booke. And in the League which all the Gaules made against Cæsar, one while hee speaketh of the number of eight thousand horse, then againe of fifteene thousand, which was that part of the army, whereby the Gaules made themselues strongest, as plainly appeareth in the seauenth Booke. Neuertheless, no assurance can bee collected heereby, concerning all the cities in their seuerall forces. The people of Treues, or the [a] Treuiri, were the very strongest of all the Gaules in horsemen, as is to be seene in the fist book. The [b] Santones, according as wee reade in the third booke, had likewise very great store of horsemen: but the Nernians (in the verie same place) are said to haue the most foot souldiers. Notwithstanding, if you regard them generally, you shall finde, that the Canallery had the cheefest honour of all the warres among the Gaules. And these were the horsemen, wherewith Cæsar vvas most assisted in his ciuill wars. For so him selfe testifieth in the first booke of his Ciuill Warre, that when Affranius came with great forces to assaile the Cæsarians who were but a few in number: so dainely the horsemen of the Gaules were diligent in making head against them; and (so long as they could) they maintained fight, albeit they consisted of so few, and endured against a great multitude of the enemie. But so soone as the Ensignes of the Legions began to approach; with verie little losse of their men they retired vnto the neighbouring Mountaines. The time of the fights continuance serued sufficiently for the Cæsarians safety: for, in that while, they had leysure to gaine thēselues the highest parts of the hils, & there sheltred themselues securely.

Likewise, in the warre of Affrica, when the enemy (with powerfull forces) came to deale vvith the hoast of Cæsar, and to attache them in the rere; suddenly the Legionaries stayed them, and the horsemen (although they were but few in number) made very stout resistance, yea, and vvith vnconquerable hardiment, against that great troope of the enemy. And a matter almost incredible happened, That lesse then thirty horse of the Gaules, repulsed two thousand horse of the Moores, and put them into rout. Such was the strēgth of the Gaulish horse. Hence ensued that exclamation of Cicero, in his 5. Philippick. Opinion was conceiued (saith he) that some appointed, that there should be giuē to Mark Anthony, the gouernment of that latter part of Gaule, which Plancus *holdeth at this instant: Is there any other wisedome in so dooing, but to lend our owne weapons to an enemy, to make a ciuill warre vpon vs? Sometimes it was thought conuenient, to entermingle amongst the horse some of the foote souldiers, which vvere worst armed, and the Archers. And this was (as appeareth in the seauenth booke) when Vercingetorix went with the Horse, and certaine foote (least charged vvith Armes)

At another time, (in the ſame booke) ſpeaking of himſelfe, when they were neere to *Gergouia, Cæſar ſaith: It was not fully breake of day, when in the skirmiſhes, the footemen beeing mingled among the horſe, we were forced to approoue how hardy and vertuous our owne men were. Sometimes, the Footemen, being lightly armed, accompanyed with the Archers, fought amongeſt the Horſmen, as was obſerued in the encounter neere to Alexia. The Gaules (among ſome few of their horſe) flanked their Archers and lighteſt armed foote, to the end that they ſhould ſuccour the horſemen, and ſuſtaine the violent aſſault of the Romaine Cauallery.

Ancient Gaule had * Eſſedaries, who were warriours that rode in Waines or Waggons, called Eſſedaes: and Diodorus giueth vs aſſurance hereof in theſe words. Paſsing thorow the Countrey in time of warre, they vſed Carres or Waggons, which two Horſes drew by a fit prepared furniture; the Waggoner, or he that had the charge thereof, being the only guide. If they met with the enemy in warre; firſt of all, and while they were vpon the waggon, they would let fly their darts at him. Afterward, alighting from the waggon, and being on foote, then they fought together with their ſwords. Theſe two maners of fighting, are much more at large deſcribed by Cæſar, when hee ſpeaketh of the Germaines and the Britaines. Of the Germaines in the firſt booke, where hee reckoneth vp the forces which Arioviſtus had. They were (ſaith hee) ſixe thouſand Horſemen, and as many foot, of the very ſtrongeſt and beſt diſpoſed, which each man had made choiſe of particularly, as for his owne ſuccour and ſafety. If they were to ſet on to the warre, they mingled one among another, and the Horſemen alſo retired when they did. If any great occaſion happened, the foote ſouldiours fought with the horſemen. And if any one being wounded, hapned to fall from his horſe, the other gaue preſent ſuccour. If they were to march on further, or to retreate vpon expedition; exerciſe had enſtructed them in ſuch celerity, that onely by faſtning hold on their horſes Maines, they would mount vp, and run as ſwiftly as they did. In another paſſage of the 4. Booke, ſpeaking of the Sueues, hee ſayth. In thoſe skirmiſhes which they made on horſebacke, they would oftentimes diſmount and fight on foote: hauing taught and invred their horſes in ſuch manner, that they neuer ſtirred from the place where they left them, returning to their horſes againe, when occaſion required. According to their cuſtome, they eſteemed nothing more baſe and idle, then to ride on Saddles. And this was the reaſon, that although they were but few in number, yet they durſt boldly aſſaile any troopes whatſoeuer, if they were Horſemen, and rode on ſaddles.

This is that which Cæſar hath written; whereby we may gather, that heerein the Gaules were contrary to the Germaines order: conſidering, that the Germaines placed their ſtrēgth in their men on foot; which Tacitus relateth more apparantly. Whoſoeuer (ſaith he) wil conſider them in generall, ſhall finde, that their cheefeſt power conſiſteth in their footemen: and therefore (in fighting) they ranke them among the troopes of horſe. For the footmen which they chooſe among all their youth, to put to the point of any danger; are men of wonderfull ſwiftneſſe, apt and fit to fight among the horſe. They are an hundred, choſen out of euerie Towne or Village, and thereon were tearmed Centeniers, or Centurions: for that vvhich ſerued (before) but to ſignifie the number, was now giuen as an eſpeciall name, and was honourable to them. Thus ſerued the Horſemen of the Germaines, and were mingled in this manner among the foote ſoldiers.

Now, as concerning the behauiour of the Britaines, Cæſar in his fourth booke, deſcribeth it in this manner. They haue a manner of fighting on Chariots or waggons, which is thus. Firſt, they skirmiſh on all ſides, and hurle their Darts, and oftentimes it happeneth, that by the terror of their horſes trampling, & by the noiſe of their Waggon wheeles, they trouble the rankes extraordinarily. But after that they are mingled amongſt the troopes of horſemen, they deſcend from their waggons, and fight on foote. During which while, the Waggoners withdraw themſelues ſomewhat out of the fight, and arrange their waggons in ſuch ſort, that if their their maſters bee preſſed with any great number of enemies, they can make an eaſie and ſpeedy returne to them. The adreſſe and direction of their horſes, the order obſerued among their footmen for fight, and their aptneſſe thereto, by dayly vſe and exerciſe was ſuch: that when they liſted, they could ſodainly ſtay their horſes, euen in the middeſt of his ſwifteſt courſe, although it were in deſcending downe a high hill. There could they readily mannage and turne them, running mainly by the bridle among the horſe; & thence againe returne lightly vnto theyr Chariots. This manner then of fighting, whereof the Eſſedaries made vſe, was ſomewhat alſo mingled among the horſe and foote.

Waggons in vſe among the Gaules. Iul. Cæſar in comment. Lib. 7

Moreouer (as is to be ſeene in the ſeauenth booke) a great number of VVaggons attended on the Gaules, eſpecially ſuch as were vnarmed. Next, of the Archers of the Rutheni, and the horſemen of Gaule, which had followed Cæſar; there came into Spaine, with a great number of waggons, all filled with baggage, according to the cuſtome among the Gaules. Beſide, there were of men and women, about ſix thouſand, with their ſeruants and children: and becauſe they took delight, in hauing beaſts for portage and cariage, they were glad to pay deerly for them, as Cæſar hath recorded in his ſeuenth book.

The whole families of the Gaules went to the warres.

Heereby wee vnderſtand, that not onely the men, but their children alſo, yea, the whole Families in Gaule, went to the war when occaſion required. Tacitus writeth alſo, That the women followed the Germaines, and accompanied them to theyr warres. But this is ſufficient, concerning ſuch leuies and preparations for warre, as was vſed among the Gaules.

Their enduring ſcarſitie of food.

Now it would be knowne, with vvhat eaſe they could endure the ſcarſity of victuals, by the temperature of their nouriture, hauing formerly auoided the delicacy of wine: and Cæſar giueth vs to vnderſtand (in many places) how they wer prouided of victuals. The Heluetians departing from their houſes, caried meale (that was formerly ground with them) to ſerue for 3. months. And Vercingetorix, to take away from the Romains all meanes of recouering foode, perſwaded the Gauls to burne the Towns and Villages on all parts where the Romans might make any inuaſion. Whereupon more then 20. Townes (belonging to the * Bituriges) were burnt in one day: and the like they did vnto the Cities in the neighboring countries. But, at the inſtant intreaty of the Biturigeans, who required, that* Auaricum (which was the very goodlieſt City in all Gaul) might not be burned: it was granted by Vercingetorix, who firſt had debated for the contrary, yet after yeelded, as well in regard of their earneſt motion, as alſo in meere pitty and commiſeration. But the pitty afforded to this one Towne, cauſed moſt cruel ruine of all the other cities and Townes in Gaule. For Cæſars armie, that had bin very mightily tormented with famine, and had endured diuers daies without power of recouering any thing to make bread of: after the ſurprizing of Auaricum, was now not onely ſtored with plenty of food, but being fleſhed as it wer with hope of like following ſucceſſe, it made them to deuoure vp all Gaule.

At another time, Vercingetorix (by vertue of the ſame counſell and aduice) conſtrained Cæſar to forſake Gergouia, and hauing taken all the victuals which the Romans had then in* Noniodunum, brought him into ſuch diſtreſſe, that had it not bin for ſhame, tediouſnes of the way, and abſence of the 4. Legions, Cæſar was ſetting forward to go into Prouence. Vercingetorix, being elected captaine Generall thoroughout Gaul, vſed (at a third time) the ſelfſame aduice; when in a publike aſſembly of the Gauls he ſaid, that he wold not tempt his fortune, & giue his enemy battel, becauſe he was ſtrongly defenced with horſemen, wherby he could eaſily hinder the Romans from food and forraging. And it behooued euery man (of his own good will) to deſtroy his Corne, and burne his houſe; conſidering, that by this litle loſſe, which each man might well endure in his own particular, he ſhould perceiue, that their empire and liberty, would (for euer) be the ſurer maintained. And vndoubtedly, Cæſar being moued by theſe occaſions, purpoſed to withdraw himſelfe into Prouence, thorow the country of the Sequani*, when Vercingetorix (too inconſiderately) condemned the good counſell giuen him, & would not tempt fortune, by hazarding the battel, & turned all his intentions ſtil to the worſt: wherby may be obſerued, what care the ancient Gauls had for prouiſion of food. Their order of martial discipline in the field.

Now if we desire to know, what order was vsed among them in the field, either for marching, lodging their armies, or obseruation of military discipline; it seemeth that they were not therein any iote curious. The Heluetians essaying to passe a riuer, some tied diuers boates together; others would leape into such places, wher the Rhone was most easie for passage, oftentimes in the day, and more often in the night, but Cæsar euermore gaue them the repulse. The Gaules not hauing (as yet) learned the manner of making bridges, could not (in the space of twenty dayes) passe the third part of their army, by such boates as they had fastened together: and this was their want of knowledge, in the arte of making Bridges. If we look vpon the seating of their armies, and their fortifications in the fielde, they were as slenderly skilfull therein. They would make choise of a valley, that had no other Rampier or Ditch, but Heauen and Earth to succour and defend it. For the custome among the Gaules, was (as we may reade in the eight booke) to refuse and forsake high places, and to order their Campe neere vnto Riuers. So it appeareth in the first booke, that the Heluetians encamped at the foote of some hill, euen as the Germans did the like: but the Romanes euermore elected the highest places. The seating then of the Gaules Campe was in this manner, without any kinde of fortification. The Campe of the Belgians (as is to be seene in the second booke) according as might be iudged by their fires and smoake, consisted of more then eight miles in largenesse. And when they declared most care & warinesse; they would onely plant their Chariots and Waggons formost, which serued them as their cheefest Rampier. In like manner, the Germans would engirt their whole army, with their Waggons and Chariots. At length the Gaules began to imitate the Romanes, in such matters as they perceiued to be best behoouing for thē, or whatsoeuer they did for the best aduantage.

The Romans planted theyr campe in the highest places

The Campe of the Belgians, and theyr best rampiers of Chariots & Waggons.

The Neruians (as wee reade in the fift booke) enclosed that place, where Cicero bestowed his winter abiding, with a rampier of eleuen foote in height, and a ditch of fifteene foote deepe. They had learned this, by their practise of warre against the Romenes, and by the helpe of such prisoners as they had taken. But wanting such tooles and instruments, as were necessarily required in this businesse: they were constrained to cut the greene turffs or sods with their Swords, and to carry both them & the earth, in the long skirts of their Iackets. Afterward, they began to raise Towers on the tops of their rampiers, and to make mounted roofes and Tarrases, according as their prisoners had enstructed them: insomuch, that Cæsar (at length) wondred, to see what Towers, Tarrasses, and Fortifications they enterprised and performed. These passages of Cæsar, do sufficiently declare, that the Gaules were not wanting, eyther in naturall disposition, or in care, to performe what was necessary, but only came short of orderly discipline.

Iul. Cæsar in Com. Lib. 5. Of the Neruians.

The Neruians learned theyr fortifying of the Romanes Mounting of Towers and Tarrasses.

Cæsar admired to behold the Gauls fortifications.

In the seuenth yeare of the Gauls wars, after great store of losses had happened; Vercingetorix comforting the Gaules, declared vnto them, that it was reasonable & expedient (for common safety of each one) to begin to fortifie their campe: to the ende that they might the more easily endure the sudden assaults of their enemies. For in those times (saith Cæsar) was it, that the Gaules began first of all to fortifie their Camp. And therefore Cæsar did especially marke and nominate it in that place. And the first fortification which they vsed, was at Gergouia, when they made a wal about their camp, which was sixe foote high, of great thick stones. Afterward, neere to Alexia, where they made a ditch and a wall, containing sixe foote in height. The Latine word [z] Materia, which signifieth a wall of stones, heaped together without mortar or lime, & whereof Cæsar maketh vse in the second place: declareth what manner of walles they had, which were rudely constructed, and without any cunning. The Gaules then (aunciently) had so little knowledge or discipline.

The comfort giuen by Vercingetorix, to the Gaules.

[z] Made insted of a Mound.

But what valour or manhood did they vse in fight? Was there any such matter of worth in them? Vndoubtedly they reposed a very great assurance in theyr owne strength. The Gaules, as was noted in the warres of Affrica, were naked or vncouered, and vsing no kinde of surprizing: had a custome to fight onely by valiancy, and not by any sleight or cunning.

And

And this was the reaſon, why Diuiconius the Heluetian, ſpake ſo to Cæſar, who had ſurprized the * Tigurines at vnawares, ſaying. That they had learned of their Fathers and Auncеſtors, to fight more for manhood then arte, but he made himſelfe ſtrong, onely by ſurprizes. And for proofe of this military vertue, there are very ſingular examples in many places of Cæſar. In the battaile of the Heluetians, albeit that from the ſeuenth houre (as is to bee ſeene in the firſt booke) they had fought till darke night; yet no man could euer ſee the enemy to turne his backe. The Belgians in like manner (as it is written in the ſixt booke) neuer being daunted or terrified with the ſlaughter of ſo many of their owne fellowes, cruelly ſlaine before their faces: in reſolute aſſurance, eſſayed boldly to march ouer their dead bodies. The Neruians likewiſe (as appeareth in the ſame place) euē in the lateſt hope of their ſafety, declared an extraordinary ſigne of their vertue. For, albeit ſuch as were the very cheefeſt among thē, lay butchered on the earth before them: yet they kept neere ſtill to them, and fought ſtanding vpon their bodies. Yea, and that in ſuch manner, as they which remained aliue, making hilles of dead mens coarſſes; threw their Darts againſt the Romanes, as from the top of a Butte, and caſt alſo their leſſer Iauelins at them, ſo long as they were able to reach them. This agreeth with that which he ſpeaketh of the Gaules, who were in Cæſars ſeruice, when * Munda in Spaine, was round about engirt with the bodies of enemies, that had beene ſlaine, and lay there in their armes. In ſtead of turffes of earth (ſaith Hirtius) they piled and layed dead bodies one vpon another, and for the ſeruice of a Paliſadoe, they couered them with theyr Shields and Iauelins, and their ſwords, with the heads of men, were all placed & turned towards the Towne of their enemie: To the ende, that they ſhould apparently behold the true Enſignes of their valiancy, only to affright them, while thus they were circled in, as in a rampier. Thus the Gaules hauing made a round wall of their enemies bodies, and mounted theron; they began to aſſaile the Towne with violent deliuery of their Arrowes and Darts.

They had learned this manner of making a rampier of dead mens bodies, frō a cuſtome vſed in their owne Countrey, and heerehence (in mine opinion) grew the coniecture made of the Gaules, wherof Ariſtotle writeth in his Ethicks to Nicomachus: That they feared not any thing in the world, neither ſcorchings, burnings or any torments whatſoeuer. And to this effect, was that which Strabo writeth of the Gaules, concerning their anſwer to Alexander, who demaunded of them, what it was that they feared moſt? Nothing (ſaide they) if the Heauens tumble not downe vpon vs. I perceiue alſo, that they were euen as neglect and careles, in chuſing the aduantage of place for fight, as they were in the ſeating of their Campe, which may euidently bee diſcerned in all the Commentaries of the Gaules warres. When the Heluetians and Neruians aſſailed Cæſar, it was in a place very diſaduantagious: but if they lighted on any other, that might declare them to bee any way better aduiſed; it vvas by ſome former patterne of the Romanes, and obſeruation of their diſcipline. And the firſt time that they entred into any good order, vvas, vvhen the army vvhich they had vvas rallyed out of diuers Countries, and the Souldiors then vvere generally diſtributed, according to the Countries wherof they vvere, and ſo placed (ſeparately) the forces of each City in his due rancke or degree. So in the battaile of the Neruians, the * Atrebatians vvere ordered on the left ſide, the Neruians on the right, & the * Veromanduans in the middeſt of the battaile. Like vviſe in the ſeuenth book, vvhere hee maketh mention of the forces of Vercingetorix. The Gaules after they had broken the bridges, kept themſelues firmely on a little Hill, confiding in the ſcituation of the place, and beeing generally diuided, according vnto the Cittics vvhereof they vvere, and placing Guards at euery Foord & Thicket of the Mariſh; they impeached them to their no meane diſaduantage. In the ſame place againe, Vercingetorix hauing planted his Campe on a Hill neere to the Towne, lodged ſeparately alſo the forces of each Citty; yet leauing ſome vvide and ſpacious roome about all their lodgings, and being poſſeſſed of all the ſmaller hilles that neighboured the greater, vvhence any aduantage might be had for looking dovvnvvard; he made made a ſhew verye dreadfull to behold. And euery day, euen from the point or breake of day, he cauſed the chiefe Commanders of ſuch Cities (as he had choſen to be of his counſel) to come before him, whether it were to conferre about ſome matters to be done, or execute any thing that depended on their charge: ſo that no one day might eſcape him, but ſome eſſay or other was made of his courage, & of the vertue that liued in his followers; making out many ſallies of horſe, mingled with the beſt and choyſeſt of his Archers.

A notable care & prouidence in a General.

In the firſt booke likewiſe, the people called Tigurines, which were vnder the city of the Heluetians, all the other three companies hauing paſſed the Riuer * Araris; were ſurprized and enuironed aſide by themſelues. And they of the Borrough Verbigena, becauſe they fled away with the other; being afterward brought before Cæſar, they were receiued as open enemies. The Germanes obſerued the ſame order, to diuide themſelues generally by nations: as Tacitus deliuereth more plainly, where he ſaith. And that which principally did encourage them, was; that not hazard, or an aſſembly made at aduēture, or a troope, or a ſquadron; but the families and alliances laboured together. One example heereof in the Germanes, is noted by thē that followed Arioui ſtus, who in the end (as we reade in the firſt booke) were compelled to ſend their forces out of the field: and made a generall ordination (by equall interualles) of the [a] Marcomani, [b] Triboci, [c] Vangiones, [d] Nomentani, [e] Seguſians and Sueues. Wherefore I conclude, by the words of this paſſage, that in regard the Army of the Gaules conſiſted of many Cities; the Souldiers (generally) did diuide themſelues, according to the number of the Cities.

The Phalanx, ſubtilly explicated by Aelianus, both in parts and parcels, to bee of an equall number, eight times diuided into equall parts; the ſummary whereof, I thus comprehend. The Phalanx, armed with weighty armours, conſiſted of foure thouſand, ninety ſixe men, each ranke whereof, contained in length ſixteene Phalangearies, and was tearmed [f] Decuria: in which bands, the formoſt man was named [g] Decurion, and the laſt [h] Tergiductor, that is to ſay, hee which conducteth the Rereguard or hinderpart. Theſe formoſt mē wer alſo cald Præſtites of the ſeconds, by reaſon of their marching before, and ſo the third men of the fourth. Contrariwiſe, the ſecond men were tearmed [i] Subſtites to the former: as being vnder them, like as the fourth vnder the third. Thus the Decuria was compoſed of Præſtites & Subſtites, the one following the other. The ſecond Decuria, was called [k] Condecuria, that is to ſay, conioyned to the Decuria, in ſuch manner, that they all anſwered both in place and number: Decurion to Decurion, Præſtites to Præſtites, Subſtites to Subſtites, and they which accoaſted, or went along by, were tearmed [l] Aſtites. The ordinary ſpace or diſtāce of the Phalangearies, was foure cubites, but whē they cloſed, two, & when they went in crowd, one onely. This was the manner of the Phalanx, obſerued by the ancient Gaules.

The battaile of the Heluetians (as is to be ſeene in the firſt booke) kept it ſelfe ſtrongly lockt againſt Cæſars horſemen, and when the horſemen were repulſed, the Phalanx, which was prepared vnder the firſt battailion, aduanced it ſelfe, and ſet forward. But the Romanes (by the power of their Iauelins) brake the Phalanx of the Heluetians, by reaſon that they wer too ſtrongly lockt together: And then, to defend themſelues againſt their Iauelins, they began to diſioynt their vniting, & to combine their Targets and Shields, the one with the other, which were in the forme and ſhape of the ſhelles of Tortuiſſes, to receiue and reſiſt the Iauelins darted at them. In the ſame booke alſo, the Germanes hauing ſuddenly (according to their cuſtome) prepared a Phalanx; withſtood the ſtrength of all theyr Swords. Thus wee haue heere ſet downe ſome forme of that faſhion, which the Gaules obſerued in preparing their battaile, and that which Hirtius hath ſpoken thereof, is not much diffring from the purpoſe. That the Gaules, being in battaile, had a cuſtom to ſit downe vpon Faggots of Vine branches and ſmall twigs, which they placed in the ground. Now, albeit he reporteth, that Cæſar hath declared the ſame in the firſt book of his Commentaries, yet notwithſtanding, I finde no ſuch matter. But foraſmuch, as the Gauls (in their battails) are ſaid to ſit downe on Faggots: it was a kinde of diſcipline obſerued among thē, like to that of the Romane * Triarij, who being ranked in the third battalion, which was the rereward, vſed to kneele down on their knees, which was termed by the Latines, Subſidere, whence enſued the word Subſide as they named it. This commeth ſomewhat ſhort of the order obſerued among the Gaules: but many matters more might be related, concerning the encouragement they gaue to one another for war-ſeruice, which principally imployed their mindes, and boldly animated them on to vertue.

A vſuall matter obſerued in Military diſcipline, & how it was among the Gaules.

IT hath bin a vſuall obſeruation in all Military diſcipline, when they prepared to the fight, and ſo ſoone as they began to draw their weapons; to make a cry in the loudeſt manner that they could, & to enflame the Souldiers mindes with the ſounde of Trumpets. But the cuſtome of the Gauls, was, not onely with cry of the voyce, and ſound of Trumpets: but with a Song, a Dance, loud yelling, clattering of their armour, and brandiſhing their darts, to make a noiſe ſo terrible, as nothing could appeare to be more horrible. The Gaules (ſaith Diodorus) had loud, big, and rude voyces, & their Trumpets (according to cuſtom) were barbarous, & made a rude harſh ſound. But Polybius (in his ſecond booke) ſayeth moreouer. The brauadoes & noiſes of the Celts, were dreadfull to the Romanes: for they had an infinite number of Trumpets and Hobois, with the ſound whereof, the whole Army cryed out aloud, making ſo great a claſhing and noyſe; that not only the Clarions & army ecchoed the ſound, but all the places likewiſe that did round engirt them. And indeed, the noyſe which cuſtomarily was made by the Gauls, hath oftentimes beene noted by Titus Liuius: but yet hatefully and iniuriouſly, as (for the moſt part) he was wont to ſpeake of the Gaules. The Gaules (ſaith he, in his fift booke) by ſinging ſauagely, and crying out confuſedly; filled the ayre with an horrible ſound. And in the ſame place: Immediately there were heard ſongs and noyſes diſagreeing, as when the Gaules walked (by troopes) about their walles. And afterward in the foure and thirtieth Booke, he ſaith. The Gaules went marching forward, howling or yelling ſtrangely, and ſinging according to their confuſed faſhion, ſhaking their Targets ouer their heads, and brandiſhing their Dartes in their hands. Then againe in the foure and fortieth Booke, ſpeaking of the Gauls which were in Aſia, he ſaith. Beyond all the reſt, their ſinging, when they began the battaile, and their howling, yelling, and dances, couering themſelues with their Shields, after the manner of theyr Country, with the horrible clattering of their armour: all theſe things were done on deliberate purpoſe, onely to procure affrightment and terror.

ſelues to be the ſtronger part, and perceiuing the Romanes, that they were preſſed with great numbers on all ſides: they that were within the Fort, and they that came in their aſsiſtance, with a loude cry and yelling, aſſured the courage of their people. Moreouer, that which gaue greateſt terror to the Romanes, was, the loud cry that they made at their backs, in the time of their fighting. It was likewiſe a cuſtome among the Gaules, to require parlie or conference, by making a loud cry, as by a Trumpet: according as Cæſar in his fift Booke, ſpeaking of the Eburons, ſaieth. Then after their vſuall manner, they made a loud cry together; to the end, that ſome one of the Romanes might come foorth, to admit them parlie or conference.

It may appeare now as conuenient, to ſpeake ſomewhat of thoſe ſignes which the Gaules vſed, to ſignifie, when theyr hearts were appeaſed and quieted; when they deſired peace; and when they were willing to yeelde themſelues. The ſigne which they vſed to make, when theyr hearts were contented and quieted; was, to ſhew their right ſhoulders naked. Cæſar, ſpeaking of the Heduans, in his ſeauenth Booke, ſaith thus. Whenſoeuer their right ſhoulders were ſeene to bee naked: it was their accuſtomed ſigne, thereby to declare, that they were contented. The ſigne of deſiring peace, was, to extend or ſtretch out their hands: as hee ſpeaketh in the ſecond Booke, diſcourſing on the Bellouaſians. The women and children (beeing on the walles) according to their wonted behauiour; would ſtretch foorth their hands, thereby deſiring peace of the Romanes. Which he farther relateth in the ſeuenth Booke, ſpeaking of the women of Gorgouia: who baring their breaſts, and ſtretching out their hands vpon the walles, required mercy of the Romanes. In the ſame place alſo, hee declareth what ſigne they vſed, when they were willing to ſubmit themſelues. The Heduans holding vp their hands; gaue notice thereby, that they would yeelde themſelues. But perhaps theſe thinges may ſeeme to bee of ſlender account: therefore I will conclude the noyſes made by the Gaules, and ſearch into the behauiour of the Germanes, whether they were of like condition, or no. It ſhould ſeeme, that it was the Barrit of the Germanes, whereof Tacitus maketh ſuch mention. They had certain pleaſant Songs and Rithmes; at the ſound whereof; that which they tearmed Barrit, enflamed their courages; and by the Song, they preſaged the ends and fortune of the future battaile. For they were cheered or diſmayed, according as the Army made the noyſe; and this accord in ſinging, ſeemed not to conſiſt ſo much in the voyce, as in vertue. They did principally reſpect the rudenes of ſound, and confuſednes of the noiſe; by holding their Targets before their mouthes, to the ende that the voyce (being made thereby the greater and fuller) might reſound the louder and ſtronger. Such then was the noyſe of the Gaules cheefely when they came to the ſho[illegible] or brunt, and when they would [illegible]ne their Souldiers courages: for the [illegible]hen Gaules (alwaies) had ſome par[illegible] this encouragement. You wil hard[illegible] credit, that mens harts would bee more enflamed by the exhortations and teares of their deareſt wiues; thē they could be by the ſound of Trumpets and Cornets. The proofe hereof, is to be ſeene in the 7. Book, when at Gorgouia, the mothers of the Families began to pray with earneſt affection, and to ſhew their haire diſheueled, after the Gauliſh manner, and to make preſents of their young infants. Such was the exhortation at the ſiedge of * Maſſylia, after that all the Ships on the Sea were readily prepared; at the inſtant entreaties & teares of the old men, of the mothers of the families and their daughters, who deſired thē to ſuccour the Citty in extreme neceſſity: they had no leſſe heart and reſolution, to mount into thoſe Ships, then they had before in fighting the battaile. Then might eaſily be diſcerned, both from the Camp of * C. Trebonius, and all the places of higheſt proſpect in the City; how all the youth that remained within it, and all the oldeſt men, with their wiues and young children, ſtood as publike guardes, and (vpon the walles) helde vp their hands to heauen, or ran to the Temples of the immortal Gods, where proſtrating thēſelues before their Images, they entreated victory of the Gods.

which is written of the Germanes, in the firſt booke. And the women, holding vp their hands to the Souldiers, which were going to the warre with teares entreated them, that they would not ſuffer them to fall into the ſeruitude of the Romanes. Therfore, when the Germanes were ready to fight, ſuch things as were in theyr deereſt eſteeme (as Tacitus reporteth) they would haue in ſome place neere vnto them: where the out-cryes of theyr wiues, and lamentings of their children, might eafieſt be heard; theſe ſerued them as moſt ſacred witneſſes, and theſe were their cheefeſt commendations. They wold bring the wounded perſons to their mothers and wiues, and they feared not to number and ſucke their hurts; carrying food to them, and any thing that might harten them againe to the fight. Some ſay that diuers battels, which began ſudden to quaile and breake off: were as ſuddenly re-enforced and purſued by the women, euen through the conſtancy of their praiers, beating their hands on their naked breaſts, & ſetting before their eies, the danger of their neere-enſuing captiuity, which they feared the more impatiently, in regard of their Wiues and Children. Wherefore the wiues of martiall minded men, did declare themſelues alſo no leſſe valiant and reſolute.

But Cæſar, in attributing very great courage to the Gaules, doth yet (I know not how) reproch them, with a quite contrary negligence or cowardiſe. For, like as the hearts of the Gauls (ſaith he in his third Booke) are prompt and deliberate, for the attempting of warre: euen ſo is their courage dull, and weake in reſiſtance, to ſupport any miſchances. In brieſe (as we may reade in the eight Book) a man cannot well iudge, whether the Gaules are more inſolent, when their affayres do go neuer ſo little ſucceſſefully with them; then they are eaſie to be affrighted, when neuer ſo little harme befals them. This is that alſo, which Titus Liuius reprehendeth with ſuch inſolence, as euery where hee ceaſſeth not to taxe them with ſomwhat ſauouring of the ſame nature. As in the fift Booke concerning the gowned Gauls. The Gauliſh nation are accuſtomed to colde and raine; but they cannot any way endure eyther duſt or heate. In the tenth Booke. Their big bones that can ſuffer no labor, will toile with weighty Armour on their backes. In the 40. Booke. If their firſt aſſault be endured, which they ruſh into with boyling courage, and blindfold fury; their lazie members will melt themſelues into ſweate, and the weapons will fall out of their hands. The Sun, duſt, and drought, without imployment of any weapon againſt them, doth dul their foggy bodies, and abate their ſteameſt courage, if theyr hot rage and fury be once ouer-paſſed.

Tacitus giueth the ſelfe ſame dull diſpoſition to the Germanes. Their great bodies (ſaith he) that haue no other ſtrength, then (at the firſt on-ſet) to ſhew themſelues forward: are not accuſtomed to ſupport (with any patience) either paines, buſines, thirſt, heate, colde or hunger. How doth this hold together? According to the iudgement which Cæſar hath giuen of the Gaules? Are they both moſt valiant, and yet foggy fellowes alſo? Vndoubtedly, al the Gaules are reported to bee (euen naturally) martiall and valorous, and being exerciſed in military diſcipline, they are the more hardened againſt any trauel; but wanting exerciſe, they grow the more foggy & ydle. Cuſtome and vſe do teach men to ſupport any toyle, and to hold good defence againſt all danger; for the trauaile of warlike diſcipline, admitteth neyther finerie or ſoftneſſe. If we meete with ſome old Souldier, who, becauſe he is expert in warre, is feareleſſe of blowes: If likewiſe a new freſh Souldier be broght in, that hath his hart as ſtout and reſolute, & as yet vnexperienced; yet his beſt courage will appeare to be but womaniſh; ſo writeth Cicero in his ſecond Tuſculanes.

Tenderneſſe and ſoftneſſe is reprehended in the Gauliſh Souldiers; as namely by Vercingetorix, and Critognates, one of the * Aruerni, in the ſeuenth Booke. For there he ſaith, that the Gaules deſired to fight, in regard of their ſoft and tender diſpoſition, becauſe they cannot long endure any toyle. The ſame man at the councell councell which was holden among them, that were beſiedged in Alexia, and ſtood in great diſtreſſe, through want of victualles: againſt ſuch as were of the minde, to hazard all at one ſally, he ſaid. This is indeed meere cowardiſe, weakneſſe, and no ſigne of courage, or any acte of vertue, to declare your ſelues vnable, to endure dearth & ſcarſity ſo ſhort a while. Proofe may bee produced, of more men that gladly offred themſelues to death, then could patiently ſuſtaine greefe or annoyance. It is not then to be doubted, but prompt & ſtout courage, eſpecially in warlike enterprizes, was hereditary (both by nature and race) to the Gaules nation, and that this ſoft or tender complexion, grew through lacke of exerciſe, in military diſcipline. For, if a Gaule had beene once well inſtructed, by a Maſter, skilfull in the arte of warre: where was any Souldier to bee found, that could more ably endure all labour? If thou doe inferre any doubt in this caſe, proofe thereof was made by Cæſar himſelfe: For Cæſar leuied ſixe Legions of the Gaules, becauſe he could raiſe no more then foure of his owne Common-wealth. Cæſars horſe-men were knowne to be Gaules, and thereupon, after he came to the head of all his enterprizes: hee naturalized all thoſe Legions, which not onely were Gaules by Nation, but they retained (beſide) the name of * Alauda. Wherefore, this ſoftneſſe in the new or young experienced Souldiers, was as common to the Romanes as Gaules; and was no otherwiſe proper, either to the Gaule or Germane Nation.

But Titus Liuius, with I know not how many Greekes, is too iniurious and inſupportable againſt the name of a Gaul, and forgets withall, the kindneſſe which hee ought to his Country, and to the law of hiſtory. For, although hee much better affected, to make the Venetes or Venetians, to deſcend from the traitor Antenor, then from the Nobility of the venetian Gauls, as Strabo hath done, and the Romanes approue the ſame, placing the Venetes or Venetians in Gallia Togata; yet thereby hee maketh himſelfe to be a Gaule. And the law of hiſtory doth command, that in the relating of a hiſtory, he ſhold ſtand cleare from ſuſpition of being touched with fauour or hatred. But whereas he reprocheth the gowned Gaules and Aſians, with the ydle matter of cold, becauſe they dwelt in the hotteſt Countries, and ſuch as were neerer to the Sunne, then the * Patauines or Patauians, among whom Titus Liuius was borne; doth he not mocke himſelfe as fooliſhly as can bee deuiſed? As for the Gaule Souldier which Cæſar had, and who was the very braueſt man of all other whatſoeuer: this man belyeth him manifeſtly. And it appeareth very probably, that Cæſar had to deale with thoſe men onely in that Gaule: but in the other partes of the world, hee fought againſt women, in regard of thoſe men hee found in this Nation.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the difference betweene the Souldiers of Cæſar, and of Pompey, being the valiant Gaules, in comparing them with the Romanes: As alſo of the Spaniards and the Gaules, and what cunning they learned of the Romanes.

NOW, to ſpeake of Cæſars Souldier, againſt the Soldier of Pompey, that is to ſay, the valiant Gaul, what was hee againſt the Romaine? In the third book of the ciuill warres, Cæſar ſaith: The Army of Pompey was not accuſtomed to paines taking. Why then Titus Liuius, by the purity of his eloquence, which Quintilian compared to the whiteneſſe of milke, hath drawne the Spaniards and Gaules fro the corners of the world, onely to make himſelfe liſtened vnto, according as Saint Hierome writeth. Notwithſtanding, if this delicacy or ſoftneſſe of not enduring paine, heate, thirſt, nor duſt, which hee reprehendeth in the Souldiers of Gaule, himſelfe ſheweth the ſoftneſſe and affection of his owne ſpirit, which cannot any way abide equity, the grauity of hiſtory, ſoundneſſe of iudgement, and truth. For, to be ſoft, or hardened againſt toyle, is not any thing that proceedeth either from Nation, or race, but by breeding and diſcipline.

Hirtius in lib.3 cap.1.

Cæsar then did but right, in giuing to the men of Gaule a great courage, & truely warlike: and yet neuertheleſſe, he diſcouereth in this great minde or ſpirit, a certaine want of diſcipline, or much rather he reproueth a kinde of ſimpleneſſe, and an ill aduiſed aſſurance of their ſtrength, which was the fault that was moſt noted in their warres, according as Strabo writeth in his fourth Booke.

The Gaules very eaſily aſſembled together in great number, becauſe they wer ſimple of ſpirit, ſtil followed iuſtice, right and trueth, being moued and affected by the loſſes of their neighbours. Whereupon it happened, that the more eaſily they were chaſed out of theyr Country: becauſe in aſſembling all their forces, or rather their whole families and friends, they were throwne out by them that prooued the ſtronger. The Romanes did much more eaſily ſubdue them, then they could do the Spaniards: for the wars in Spaine were begun long time before theirs, and yet notwithſtanding, they were brought to end after theirs. And betweene both theſe times, they conquered all the Gauls, that were betweene the Rheine and the Pyrenean Mountaines: for in comming to the field ſo many together, they were ouerthrowne by multitudes together. But the Spaniards managed their battailes more ſparingly, and, euen as if they had a deſire to ſome affected kinde of monies: ſo did they preſerue them from one time to another, and from Country to Country, making their warre ſtil cauteouſly, like vnto theeues.

And that which Strabo hath written, may ſufficiently bee perceiued by the examples of Cæſar. The whole City of the Heluetians, there being all the people of twelue Townes, and of forty Villages: did fight all at one inſtant, and in one inſtant alſo were all ouerthrowne. Such was the league of fifteene people of the Belgians. Such was the reuolting of the Armoricans in the warre of the Venetes, or Venetians. Such was the conſpiracy of the Aquitains againſt Craſſus. In briefe, did not all Gaule put it ſelfe in Armes, and was it not wholly conquered in one warre, neere vnto Alexia? The Gaules in the eight yeare of their warre, both well felt and knew this fault, as Hirtius ſaith, and that in regard of ſome great numbers, which ſtill were aſſembled in one place; it exceeded poſsibility to reſiſt the Romanes. But if diuers Cities (at one ſelfe ſame time) had made warre in diuers places: the Romane Army could neither haue had ſufficient ſuccour, leyſure or forces, to vndertake all at once.

A great error of the Gaules in their fighting.

Neuertheleſſe, the Gaules were not alwayes of ſo ſimple and open ſpirit: but at ſome-times they declared more cunning, and holpe themſelues by ſome ſurprizes. Cæſar, (as Suetonius ſaith) neuer ſuffered any one occaſion of warre to bee loſt, were it neuer ſo vnindifferent, ſetting as ſoone on the allied and leagued, as on enemies: and yet notwithſtanding, all the warres which he made, hee ſtill paliated with good & ſufficient colours of reaſon. The Eburone-Gaules payed Cæſar with his owne vnfaithfull dealing. For theſe Gaules aduertiſing the Romaine with the conſpiracy, which all the Gaules had agreed on together: made him beleeue, that if hee would come, and leaue the fielde, they would giue him free paſſage. Through this deceit, a Legion, and fiue Cohorts or Companies (with Cotta and Sabinus, which ledde them) were all vanquiſhed. And albeit, that the Romane was then alike in number and ſtrength to the Gaules (as Cæſar confeſſeth) yet was he foyled by the Gaules ſubtilty, who had learned this craft of Cæſar, and therewith repayed him.

The Gaules were not alwayes ſilly & ſimple in their martial afairs.

The Eburones cunning in ouer-reaching Cæſar.

Cæſar repaied with coyne of his own ſtamp

Hirtius recounteth the like ambuſcadoes of the Bellouaſi, or Bellouacanes, who hauing vnderſtood the lodging of the Romaine horſemen: tooke a number of light and nimble ſpirited footemen, and en-ambuſhed them in a place thickly couered with wood. On the morrow, they ſent certaine horſes thither, which might allure the Romanes out, into the compaſſe of the ambuſhment, and when they were once in it, they preſently charged them. And the fortune of this miſhappe fell on the men of Rheimes, who were appointed as Guards there that day. For they hauing ſeene (too ſuddenly) the enemies horſe-men, and knowing themſelues to exceede them greatly in number, making no account of ſo fewe as they ſeemed to bee: they ruſhed foorth, and ouer-hotly purſued them, euen vntill they were (on all ſides) enuironed by the Foote-men to to their no little astonishment, which caused them to retir much sooner, then skirmishes of horsemen were wont to do; having lost Vertiscus, Prince of the Citie, and cheefe Commander of the horsmen. This shewed no simpleneſſe in the Gauls, but meere quaint cunning, learned of the Romaines.

The Romains harmed by their owne instruction.

In the very same place, Hirtius declareth the like cunning stratagem; as that which Hannibal vsed, to deceyue Fabius. The Bellouasians (saith he) perceiuing that the Romaines were ready to pursue them, and that they could not (without daunger) passe the night, or soiourne longer where they were: they deliuered (by Oath) from hand to hand, the Faggots and small bushes whereon they vsed to sit, and whereof they had great store in the fielde, all which they placed before their Army: and at the ending of day-light (vpon a signe sodainely giuen) they set them all on fire. So the flame, which followed it selfe in great length, immediately hindered, that the enemy could not discouer their Forces: and which being doone, the Gaules very speedily withdrew themselues. Cæsar, albeit he could not perceiue that the enemy was gone, in regard of the fire so made before them: yet notwithstanding, suspecting that they had done this deuice, to the end that they might flye, caused his Legions to march on, and sent out troopes of horsemen to pursue them. And yet, being mistrustful of some surprizall, & doubting lest the enemie might still lurke there, with intent to allure the Romanes to some disaduantage, hee marched on the more aduisedly. The Horsemen, fearing to enter the smoke, and if any one (by ouermuch forwardnes) did enter, he could not see any thing before or behind him: grew all suspitious of some secret ambush, & so gaue leysure to the Bellouasians to retire thence. Thus the enemy, by meanes of a flight (full of feare & craft) hauing marched about ten miles of the country, without sustaining the lest losse, seated their campe in a very strong place.

The night fauoureth many attempts

Cæsar suspected the deceit of the Bellouasians, and therefore would not be too rash.

Suspition is the hinderer of the braueſt actions

Oftentimes thenceforward, & by many ambushes both of horse & foot, they did great damages to the Romaines, in their wandering abroad, stealing and foraging: whereby it should appeare, that these attempts sauoured rather of a Punick spirit then of a Gaulish. And yet neuertheleſſe, when all came to al (as we vse to say:) they were surprized by the hands of their maisters, & by the selfesame deceits & subtilties which they had learned of Cæsar. And to the end it might bee noted, that the Gauls had no more cunning or craft then what they learned of the Romaines: the Heluetians (as Orosius writeth in his sixt booke) surprized the Consull Cassius, with all his army, by an ambuscado. But I haue concluded with my selfe, not to omit one maner of ambushing, which was the most maruellous of al those that euer I read of, or heard reported; whereby the Prætor Posthumius was ouerthrown of the Boian Gaules, as Titus Liuius reporteth in his 33. booke.

While matters went on in these doubts and vncertainties, tidings came of another losse, according as fortune (in that yeare) still re-charged one vpon another. And these were the Newes, that Lucius Posthumius, designed Consull, was ouercome in Gaule, both he and his Armie. There was a verie great Forrest, which the Gauls called Litana, thorough which Forrest, he was to passe his Army. The Gaules, on both sides of the passage, had cut and hewne the Trees of the Forrest in such sort; that (yet notwithstanding) they parted not from the trunke or bodie, but must endure hard thrusting and enforcement, before they could possibly get the to fall.

The manner how Posthumius was ouerthrown by the Boians.

Posthumius had two Romane Legions, and had leuyed so many people, allyed vnto the Romaines, that hee brought into the enemies Countrey, well neere the number of fiue and twenty thousand men of Warre. The Gaules, who vvere ambushed in the Forrest, when the Armie was entered within the VVood; threvv downe the aforesaid hewne vnder-growing braunches, vvhich were apted so for the present purpose; that falling stil thickly one vpon another, without any possible meanes of restrayning them, they ouer-turned (pell-mell) both Men and Horses, in such manner, that (very hardly, and with much paines taking) tenne men of them escaped. For the greater part were slaine, by the falling of the huge braunches and armes of Trees on them; and the Armed Gaules, that held possession of all the VVood, put the rest vnto death, vvho vvere not a little affrighted at this so strange misaduenture. In what manner the Gaules fortified their Cities and Townes; and what Engines they imployed for their owne defence.

After what manner the Gaules fortified their Townes and Cities.

BVT this is enough alreadie ſpoken, concerning the maner of behauiour among the Gaules, as well in ranged battails, as in ambuſcadoes: it remaineth now to ſpeak, how they fortified their Cities and Townes, and contrarywiſe, how they were beſieged. How was it then that the Gaules ſtrengthened and fortified their Townes, and what Engines had they whereby to defend themſelues? There neede no wonderment bee made, at the fortification of the Morini, Neruians, Menapians, Aduaticatæ, and Eburones, becauſe they had no Townes at all. And thence enſued it, that the Aduaticatæ maruelled ſo ſtrangely, to beholde the warlicke Engines of the Romaines; whereof it is thus written in the ſecond Booke. Beeing fortified with a rampier of twelue foote high, which had fifteene thouſand Towers and ſtrong Baſtils nere to each other; the Romaines kept themſelues within that Fort. Afterward, when the trailes and platformes were readie prepared, mounted aloft, and a Tower to be raiſed ſome long diſtance off: at the beginning of theſe vnwonted workes, the Gaules beganne to laugh on their walles, and lowdly to mocke at them, maruelling what they did vndertake ſo farre off, and with ſo huge an Engine, or how it ſhould bee poſsible, that the hands and ſtrength of men (eſpecially of ſo meane ſtature) could promiſe any hope to themſelues, of comming neere to their walles, with a Tower of ſo great a compoſition. But when they (ſoone after) perceyued, that this mighty frame mooued from place to place, and approached neere vnto theyr walles: beeing aſtoniſhed at a matter of ſuch nouelty, and ſight vnaccuſtomed; they ſent their Ambaſſadors vnto Cæſar, to entreate peace; who anſwered them, That they muſt thinke, that the Romaines neuer made any warre, without the ſpeciall fauour of the Goddes: ſeeing they could aduance (and in ſo ſhort a while) an Engine of ſuch height, to fight both farre off, and neere at hand; and therfore they ſhould ſubmit themſelues, and all their goods to his mercy. Thus ſpake Cæſar. It would require ſo much ſpeech (ſaieth Cicero in his ſecond Tuſculanes) concerning the new ſouldier, & the old: that if wee make compariſon of one that hath not beene exerciſed with him which is tried and skilfull; he will appeare no otherwiſe, then meerely as a woman. All which notwithſtanding, the very ſelfſame Gaule, beeing enſtructed in the Diſcipline of Cæſar, ſeemed as a God to another Gaule, that neuer had knowledge in that Art.

Concerning the old & new ſoldier.

But let vs leaue theſe Belgians which dwelt ſo farre off, and come vnto ſuch as were more ciuillized, as the Sweſsiones, and the Bellouaſians. The Sweſsiones (ſaith Cæſar in his ſecond booke) when as the Treiles vvere prepared againſt Nouiodunum, one of their cheefe Townes, and that the platforme was mounted together vvith the Treiles: as men amazed at ſo great an enterpriee, and ſuch ſtraunge workes, which the Gaules had neuer ſeene or heard of, yet ſo ſpeedily performed by the Romaines; they ſent their Ambaſſadors toward Cæſar, to entreate that they might yeeld themſelues. The Bellouaſians alſo, hauing not (as yet) ſeen ſuch Engines, vvherewith Townes vvere battered, but onely hearing report made of them, ſurrendred the Towne of Bratuſpantium. Wherefore, if the Gaules (as Cæſar affirmeth) had neuer either ſeene or heard ſpeech of ſuch inſtruments, vntill that verie time: vvhy then ſhould vve make any maruelling, That the Gaules, vvho had not yet learned ſuch cunning, vvere conquered by other Gaules, that had knowledge in them? Now, vvhether this place in Cæſar, vvhich treateth of the Belgians, vvas purpoſely vvritten, or (at the leaſt) may ſeeme not to bee vvritten according vnto trueth, there the queſtion remaineth. For, the Gaules made their their walles with ſtrong beames of wood, which were not planted vp on one ende: but couched downe, & ioyned together, with ſpaces of earth betweene each two beames, whereof Cæſar ſpeaketh thus in his ſeuenth book. All the walles (ſaith he) of the Gaules, were (well nere) made after this manner. They layd beames of wood ſtraite out along on the ground, and followed after ſtil in the ſame order, making equall diſtance betweene them, about the ſpace of two foote in bredth. Theſe beams or plaits, as ſome terme them, were reueſted and bound within, with ſtrong forced earth; and the equall diſtances (whereof we haue ſpoken) were filled vp with great ſtones, which fronted the wall forward. After that this rowe was all along thus ranged and ordered; another like frame was laid thereon, after the ſame manner; yet ſo, that the beames betweene both, did guard and keepe the maine Timber from touching each other. And being diſtanted alſo by the ſelfe-ſame ſpaces: they were knit and ſhut faſt together, by great ſtones caſt in betweene them. And ſo, conſequently, all the whole worke ſhaped it ſelfe in this manner, euen till the Wall was perfected to a reaſonable height.

Iul. Cæſar in Com. lib. 7.

Theſe walles were the ſtrongeſt defences that the Gauls then had about all their Cities and Townes.

A ſuruay of this their order in building, & what thicknes their walles contained.

Now, concerning this kinde of building, ouer and beſide, that it was no way miſhapen, by the order kept in the leuelling, and fitting both the beames & ſtones aptly to each other: euen ſo it was greatly commodious, in ſeruing for the defence of their Townes. For the ſtones were apt and proper, to impeach the force of fire, and the beames and other matter, brake and reſiſted the blowes of battery. Becauſe, they being bound together inwardly, and knit to the Timber beames running all along, contayning (for the moſt part) in thickneſſe, the meaſure of forty foote; could (by no meanes) be forced to ſinke, or be otherwiſe diſmembred. Hereby then it may appeare, that the Gaules knew ſome-what for the fortification of their Citties and Townes; yea, and how to defend themſelues alſo, by ſuch meanes as were vſed in the warres.

All the Gauls were not ignorant in fortifying their Townes.

Marcus Craſſus beſiedged the Santone Gaules.

In the third yeare of the warre in Gaul, the Santone-Aquitaines were beſiedged by Craſſus and his men, both with Treilles and Towers: but they reſiſted him valiantly, one while, by making ſaillies out vpon them, another while, by vndermining, till they came to the great planted platforme, which formerly had beene prouided, by meanes of the treilles. To which vndermining (ſaith Cæſar) the Aquitains were well inured becauſe they had Mines of Copper and Braſſe in many places. So much Cæſar wrote, approuing, that the Aquitains knew well enough how to defend a Towne or City; becauſe they had Copper Mines, which made them therein very skilfull. It is ſaide alſo, that the Celtes (for the ſame cauſe) knew well how to defend themſelues at the ſiedge of Auaricum: becauſe they had very deep Mines of Iron in their Country. For Auaricum being couragiouſly aſſayled by the Romanes, the Gaules found out all ſorts of inuentions (as Cæſar ſaith in his ſeuenth Booke) wherby to giue impeachment to the moſt ſingular enterprizes of the Romane Soldiers: as hauing (by naturall inclination) a very ingenious and ſubtile ſpirit, apt to follow and counterfeit all things, and whatſoeuer they ſawe done by others.

Iul. Cæſar in Com. lib. 7.

The Celtes skilful in their owne defence

The natural inclination of the Celts.

Firſt, for the Romane Falx, they could ouerthrow it by a ſnare or grinne, and when it was remounted, they would againe hurle it downe with their Engines. They couered all their walles with towers made of skinnes, and equalled the height of thoſe towers made by the Romanes, with maſts made in their owne turrets. In making their ſaillies abroad; eyther they would throw fires into the platforme; or ſuddenly ſurprize the amazed Romanes; or by vndermining, ouerthrow the maine fortification. Whereunto (indeede) they were the more apt and ready; becauſe they had great yron Mines in theyr Country, and knew (beſide) all kindes of deluing into the ground. By leauing their Mines open, they impeached and tardyed the Romanes preparations: mingling fire with pitch and other matter, made apt to burne whereſoeuer it fel, and tumbling downe great ſtones alſo, to keepe them from approching neere to their walles. By theſe cited places it appeareth euidently, that the Gaules had attained vnto ſome indifferent knowledge, how and which way to defend a City: but to ſpeak truely, it was more through their continuall exerciſe in their Mines, then by any cunning they had learned in the arte Military.

And

The words of Vercingetorix at the taking of Auaricum.

And this is that whereof Vercingetorix complained, comforting the Gaules at the taking of Auaricum. That the Romains had not wonne the victory, either by vertue or battaile: but by a kinde of science and cunning, which they had in the battring down of Townes, wherein the Gaules had no knowledge. By which words, that place of Cæsar which concerned all the Gaules in generall, seemeth to be true: That the Gaules had neuer seene, or heard any report, of Platformes, Treilles, nor Towers. But bee it so, that the ancient Gaules neuer knew any such Art, as the Romaines did; yet there was no want of courage in them. For, it is a matter very maruellous, which Cæsar himselfe speaketh of them in his seauenth Booke, in remembering their constancy, for guard and defence of their Cities and Townes.

The Gaules, in the warres of the Cimbrians* and  Teutones*, being wholly constrained to retire themselues into such places as were strongest, and being there also oppressed with great famine & lacke of victuals: they did yet maintaine theyr liues by feeding on the bodies of such, as both appeared, and were not able indeed to do any further seruice in the warre, & would (by no meanes) yeeld to their enemies.

Some others tearme him Critognatus.

Critognates, who was a man of great ranke among the Aruernians, held a verie strong opinion in councell, that it was good to put the same in practise for the defence of Alexia; and although hee had made no vse thereof before, yet hee earnestly maintained the fitnesse and necessity thereof, onely for liberty, and that it was worthy to bee left (as a memorable custome to posterity. This opinion helde such account amongst the other Gaules, that they were of the mind, to assay all other meanes whatsoeuer, then to doe according as Critognates had aduised. And yet notwithstanding, if there wer such vrgent necessity, and ayde tardied too late in comming; that it was most behooue-full to credit his iudgement, rather then to yeeld, or listen to peace-making, vpon enforced or violent composition. Such was the courage of the ancient Gaules.

Other Gaules misliked this counsell, yet yeelded it fit in cases of extremity.

The Gaules were more ful of courage then disciplin.

Now this kinde of defence, which they vsed for safegarding their townes, thogh it proceeded from no meane Vertue in them, yet it did not rellish of any great discipline. In what manner also they assailed Townes, was vvithout any craft or subtle deuice. For they neuer holp themselues, either by Platformes, Rampiers, Treilles, or Towers, as it is described in the second booke. The Gaules and the Belgians, had both one manner of assaulting Cities, so saith Cæsar. For after they had ringed (after the order of crowding together) a great number of men about the Town; they would hurle heaps of stones vp on the wall, vntill they had left it naked of men. Then, winding and turning, according as occasion serued, they approached to the gates, and vndermined the walles. Thus then their whole manner of making war in places fortified with rampiers and ditches, doeth giue vs to vnderstand, that the heart and courage of the Gaules was very great; and yet very little or no discipline at all vsed amongest them. Let this then suffice, to acquaint ye with the order of their land seruice.

Of the seruice on the Sea, or other waters, vsed by the Gaules: And what Ships and Vessels they had among them. Also, into what farre remote countries they extended their name.

CONcerning that vvhich they performed on the Sea, as it is described in the warres against the Britaines and  Venetes*, it appeareth to taste of vertue, although it was simple, and without any great cunning. Cæsar describeth it in all parts, with the matter and maner of such ships or vessels, as the Gauls then vsed, speaking thus. Their Ships were made and armed in this maner. The keeles of them were much larger then those of the Romaines Ships: to the end, that they might the more easily sustaine the ebbing and flowing of the Sea. Their Prowes were highly raysed, and their Poupes also: because they wer the more apt to hinder the power of great Waues and Tempests. All their Shippes were made of Oake, to indure all iniury and violence that could happen. The bankes were made of timber beames, about a foote in thickenesse: and they they were ioyned or fastened together with iron nailes of great bignesse. Their Anchors (in stead of Cables) were made fast with chaines of iron: and for want of other sailes, they made vse of skinnes and hides, which were soft and pliable with currying and paring. And either through the want of hempe, or knowledge how to vse it (which is the more likely) they imagined, that if they vsed other sailes, they could not resist so manie tempests of the Ocean, and such impetuous windes as daily arose, neither so commodiously conuay such great burthens as they caried in their vessels.

Iul. Cæsar in Com. lib. 4. Of Cæsars Gallies against the Britaines.

In another passage of the fourth book he sheweth, that the Gallies, whereof hee himselfe made seruice, both against the Britaines and the Venetes, had not beene vsed on the Ocean, vntill that instãt time. For, the Romanes being somewhat hardly pressed by the Britains, on the shore of the Ocean; Cæsar commanded, that the gallies (which these poor barbarous people were not wont to see, & which could be managed most readily in any busines) should be set apart distant from the other ships, and that they should be moued by the strength of Oares: to the end, that they might be ranged against the flanke of the enemy, which was discouered; and whence they might repulse and recoil the enemy by the dint of their weapons, and Engines of warre, vvhich auailed the Romanes very greatly. For the ignorant people, being amazed at the fashion of those vessels, and the moouing of their Oares, as also the manner of their vnactustomed Engines, stayed their proceedings, and (soone after) retired.

Ignorance is the mother of much errour, especially in warre seruices

Thus farre we haue heard the ancient fashions and behauiour which the Gauls vsed in actions of warre, and vvhich haue bene collected out of many places: declaring them to be much greater in naturall strength, then in the course of Martiall discipline. VVhereby wee may perceiue (in regard that their vvarres were managed by vertue, & not by any slights, cunning, or trumperys) they were the maisters of all or most nations. For they pursued their purpose, euen as Geographers were wont to doe, to make all the Earth habitable, euen from the Suns setting, so farre as his rising. Britaine, Spaine, Italy, Germany, Illyria, Pannonia, Greece, Macedonia, yea, Asia it selfe, can declare the Empire of the Gaules. For Britain, which was along the sea coast (as Cæsar saith in his fift booke) had beene conquered by them that passed from Belgia, going thither for pillage, and to make warre; and they named themselues according to all the Cities titles from whence they issued; and hauing made warre there, there they inhabited, and began to plough and husband the grounds. VVhat shall we say of * Celtiberia? Doth it not deliuer sufficient testimony, that Spaine was subdued by them? For, to what purpose else should Lucane say?

The Gaules made themselues maisters of al other nations.

But it may be, that Italy came not vnder the gouernment of the Gaules: Yes, that it did soundly, and at the same time when Tarquinius Priscus reigned. The Bituriges, Aruernians, Senones, Heduans, Ambarrians, Carnutes, and Aulertes, vnder conduct of the Sollunians, Boians, & * Lingones, preuailed so farre, that that Italy, which reacheth along frõ the Alps, coasting still to the Apennines, and so farre on as the riuer Rubicon, became Gaule. And finally, after that they had ouerthrowne the Romanes neere to Allia, they tooke Rome and burned it; and hauing agreed for a thousand pounds of gold, they solde the Capitoll (which they kept besiedged) to the rest of the Romaines which vvere enclosed therein. And hath not furious Germany borne the yoake of Gaule? In elder times (saith Cæsar in his sixte Booke) the Gaules excelled the Germanes in vertue. For the Volcæ and Tectosages, vnder the conduct of Sigouesus, possessed themselus of the most fertile places in Germanie, euen those which were neerest to the Forrest Hercynia, as Titus Liuius also relateth.

cient Gaules. The * Druides, or Druidæ, made profeſsion in each of thoſe Diſciplines. Firſt of all, Cæſar ſaith, they wold haue men to beleeue, that their ſoules could not dye; but after death they paſſed from one body to another. And they were of opinion, that this beleefe ſerued greatly for an encouragement to vertue; when men held the feare of death in contempt. Moreouer, they diſcouered verie many things which they taught to youth: concerning the Starres, and their motion; of the greatneſſe of the world, & the earth; of the Nature of things; of the might and power of the immortall Gods. Cæſar writeth, of the Learning of the Gaules; but in few words, and ſleightly; therfore we muſt enquire after more ample relation. That the Gaules had a capeable vnderſtanding of all diſciplines, Cæſar hath affirmed in his ſeuenth booke, by that which wee haue already alledged. They are a kinde of people of very great vnderſtanding, and who are moſt apt to follow and counterfet all things which cā be taught them. And Diodorus writeth thus. Although their ſpeech be ſomewhat obſcure and doubtfull, yet are they not any ſuch men, as do eſtrange themſelues from Learning. Alſo Strabo agreeth there-with, ſaying. The Gaules are eaſily guided to learn ſuch things as may do them ſeruice, becauſe they addict themſelues to Arts and Diſciplines.

From the beginning of the world, which Father Noah re-eſtabliſhed; all ſortes of Diſciplines were taught to ſuch ſpirits, as appeared to be deſirous of them. For, according to Beroſus, if that which now adayes is generally read, be true: * Dis, who was the firſt Author of the Gaules Nation, is ſaid to bee moſt famous for knowledge, and thereon was called Semnothes, or Samothes, and (after his name) ſuch as made profeſsion of Learning and knowledge, were termed Semnotheans, or Samotheans. But this place of Cæſar, ſeemeth to confirme the hiſtory of Beroſus. The Gaules (ſaith he) do report themſelues to bee deſcended of their father Dis: and ſay beſide, that the Druides gaue them that inſtructiō. For this cauſe, they marked all the courſes of times by number, not of dayes, but of nights; and that they kept ſuch a cuſtome, by obſeruation of their birth daies, and ſo from the beginning of months and yeares; that ſtill the day followed the night. Now, concerning this point, that day alwayes enſued after night: the Germaines alſo kept the ſame courſe, & made not their account by number of dayes, as we do (ſaith Tacitus) but of nights, giuing an apt tearme therefore, and vſed their aſſignations among themſelues accordingly, as holding, that night was ſtill the guide to day. It may bee, that this was a thing in vſe to other people alſo, to take the beginning of the houres, from the inſtant of midnight.

But let vs come againe to Father Dis, and the Semnotheans, or Samotheans, whereof Beroſus ſpeaketh; with whom the opinion of Ariſtotle conſenteth: for hee writeth in his Magitian (according as Laertius reporteth) That Philoſophy receyued originall from the Semnotheans of the Gauls. The ſame Beroſus writeth, that Sarron the third King of Gaule, to reſtrain the wilde fierceneſſe of the firſt men; eſtabliſhed publicke Schooles of learning: but hereafter we ſhall ſpeake more at large of the Sarronides. The fourth King was Druis, of whom came the Druides, & who were full of all things, as Cæſar affirmeth. The fift King was Bardus, of whom wee celebrate the honour, in ſpeaking of Bardes, Poets, and Orators. Thus then wee perceiue the ancient profeſsions of the Gauls diſciplines, which maketh it ſelfe venerable, euen in the image of antiquity. Marcellinus in his fift Booke, doth very neere agree heerewith; writing the Originall of the Gauls, where he ſaith; Thoſe that haue anciently written, doubting the firſt original of the Gaules, did leaue their knowledge halfe full of trouble. But ſince then, * Timagenes the Greeke, both out of diligence and diuers Languages, collected ſuch things as were vnknown for the ſpace of long time; to whom giuing credit (all doubt & ſcruple taken away) we will deliuer the ſame notes diſtinctly and cleerely.

Some are of opinion, that the * Aborigenes were the firſt that had beene ſeene in theſe Countries; and that they did name themſelues Celts, after the name of a king whom they deerely affected; and Galates (for the Greekes do call the Gaules ſo) after the name of his [b] Mother. Others do affirme, that the Dorians, which followed ancient Hercules, inhabited the borders about the Ocean. The [c] Druſides recount (for a truth) that there was a certain part of [a] Certain lerned Prieſts in Gaule, who were in ſuch eſtimation, that the determining of all controuerſies was committed to them. It is ſuppoſed, that they firſt came out of the Ile of Britaine.

But in what Diſcipline and Learning (perhaps) thou wilt aske me? I anſwer, in Grammar, Rhetoricke, Logicke, Mathematicke, Phyſick, Theology. Grammar inſtructed to reade, and frame Letters; and this Art was ſuch from thoſe times, when as the tongues were in their entire condition: and that the neighbouring ſtrãgers had not (as yet) corrupted them. For ſo Plato in his Philebeus grounded the Greeke Grammar. Heere (me thinkes) I vnderſtand in this place, that which many good and learned ſpirits haue queſtioned, to wit, vvhat were the Letters of the Ancient Gaules? Cæſar, in his ſixt book confirmeth, that they were Greeke Letters. They thought (ſaith he) that it was ill done, to ſet down their diſciplines in writing: howbeit, that almoſt in all their other affayrs, as well common as particular, they vſed the Greeke letters. In this place, Cæſar ſpeaketh not obſcurely, but diſertly and plainly; that the Gaules made vſe of the Grecian Letters, that is to ſay, theſe Charracters α. β. γ. &c. He deliuereth ſom proof heereof in the firſt Book, that in the camp of the Heluetians, there were found little Table bookes, written with Greeke Letters. Moſt true it is, Cæſar calleth thoſe Greeke Letters, which the Gaules then vſed: but I call them Gaul Letters, & will maintaine, that they neuer came out of Greece into Gaule; but on the contrary, that they went out of Gaule into Greece.

As concerning the man, who is ſayde to be the firſt inuenter of Letters, verie great queſtion had beene made thereof: and Plinie hath debated the matter by diuerſity of opinions. So that the inuention of Letters, is not proper or peculiar vnto any one Nation, according as hee thinketh; but (from all antiquity) they had bin vſed. Cadmus (if the booke be true which is allowed to one named Xenophon) as is affirmed by ſom, was the firſt that broght Letters (to the number of ſixteene) from Phœnicia into Greece, the which were very like to the Caracters of the Galates and Mæons. Hereby may be coniectured, that Letters came from the Galates vnto the Greekes. Now, finding not onely a verie likely coniecture, but a certaine proof alſo, by the report and account of Times; maintaining, that the diſcipline of the Semnotheans, or Samotheans, Sarronides, Druides, and Bardes, did flouriſh in Gaul for ſo many yeares before Cadmus vvent into Greece: there neede no doubt to bee made, but that the Gaules caracters vvere in vſe in Gaule, for ſo many yeeres before Cadmus

And this is that, which Varro (in his ſeauenth booke of the Latine tongue) maketh openly knowne. For Crates a Greek, had formerly made a Grammarian queſtion in Greece, demanding what was the reaſon why Alpha might not be called Alphatos? The other grammarian Greekes anſwered: Theſe wordes are none of ours, but are wholly Barbarian. In this place then the Greekes do plainly confeſſe, that theſe Letters were none of theirs. And, conſenting heereto, Ariſtotle confeſſeth to his Magitian (according as I haue alreadie ſayde) That Philoſophy receiued originall from the Semnotheans, or Samotheans of the Celts. And laſt of all, that Gaule had bin the Miſtris of all Greece.

I know very well, that Strabo ſpeaketh of the Gaules, that they affected the Greeks: inſomuch, that whatſoeuer bargaines or conuention was made amongſt them, they wrote thereof into Greece, & that they addicting themſelues to the ſtudy of eloquence, & of Philoſophy, as the Greekes did, kept in pay or wages, profeſſors of the liberall Artes, as alſo they did the like by Phyſitians. But Strabo wrote this of the * Maſſylians, and of their neighbours, at ſuch time as Tiberius held the Empire, and when the great Lords of Rome (as himſelfe writeth) cauſed theyr children to bee ſent no more to Athens, then they did to Marſeilles, there to follow their ſtudious exerciſe. It muſt needs then be very certaine, that we learned the Gaules doctrine of Dis, Samothes, Sarron, Druis, Bardus, and thoſe other ancient maſters, when Greece did not ſo much as onely thinke on Letters.

Of whom the Gauls learned their doctrins

Some may conceit, that we ſpeak of Paradoxes, againſt all reaſon: but I cannot cõprehend, why ſuch men as haue heard ſo many Authours ſpeake, that carry credite and authority (among all) in other things, ſhould reproach theyr praiſes of their owne Countrey, by a peruerſe opinion of iudgement. But it may bee, that al theſe things do ſerue vs to no purpoſe, in regard that (concerning this matter) wee may bee preſſed with nouell Arguments: becauſe the Gaules (as ſome will ſay) did ſpeake Greeke, therefore did they make vſe alſo of Greeke Letters. But let me much rather tel them, that in, & from the time of Cæſar, the Gaules did not ſo vnderſtand the Greeke tongue, that they could ſpeak it in any mean meaſure. Herein I haue Cæſar for my warrant; for thus he writeth in his fift Booke. Wee preuailed ſo farre (ſaith hee) with one of the Gaules horſemen, onely by powerfull promiſes: that he vndertooke to carry a Letter to Cicero, which he had written in Greeke Carracters, to the end, that if it happened into the enemies hand, they might not know our ſecrets. Cæſar ſpeaking this, I conclude thereby, that the enemies of Cæſar and the Gauls, vnderſtood not a letter written in Greek, nor the language thereof.

Authours of found authority ought to be credited

Whether the Gaules ſpake Greeke or no.

Iul. Cæſar in Com. lib. 5.

A Letter caried by a Gaule to Cicero.

And hee that will looke a little neerer, cannot probably proue to himſelf (though ſome others hold it for moſt certain) that the popular Gaules vnderſtoode any thing in that language: but that the cheefe and principall Heads of each Commonweale knew the Greeke tongue, as now adayes they do the Latine. I ſay moreouer, that whoſoeuer maketh heedfull obſeruation, will finde, that this cannot any way bee prooued for truth. Becauſe it is moſt certaine, that in ſo great an army of enemies, there muſt needs be ſome men of marke, of Townes good ſtore. Nay, that which is more, I haue learned of Cæſar himſelfe, that the woorthy Druides, who were the maſters and Doctors of the Gauls youth, did not know the Greeke tongue. For Diuitiacus, one of the Heduans, according to the teſtimony of Cicero, vvas the moſt learned man amongſt the Gaule Druides. The great affection in this Diuitiacus, towards the Romane people, the extraordinarie good will which they bare vnto him, the ſingular fealty, iuſtice, temperance (as appeareth in the firſt booke) in this man, was very well knowne vnto Cæſar. To Cæſar I ſay, who vnderſtood the Greeke tongue ſufficiently, and had a deſire to communicate ſecretly (for feare leſt any thing ſhould be diſcouered) with Diuitiacus, concerning his brother Dumnorix, who was ſuppoſed that hee would betray Cæſar to his enemies.

That the popular Gaules vnderſtoode not Greeke.

The Druides knew not the Greek tongue

Cæſar ſufficiently vnderſtood the Greek tongue

Wel then, if Diuitiacus had vnderſtood the Greeke tongue, as well as Cæſar did: could not the one haue holpen the other with priuate inſtructions, in whatſoeuer they would haue had imparted? But ſcorning to ſerue his turne by ordinary Interpreters (as it appeareth in the verie ſame firſt Booke) Cæſar ſpake with Diuitiacus, by the meanes of Valerius, Prince of a Countrey in Gaule. Then there is no appearance, that Diuitiacus (although hee was one of the principall Druides) did vnderſtand the Greeke tongue, or that it was any way knowne to the Gaules.

What the language of the ancient Gauls was, in regard it was not Greeke.

Heere I may be demanded, what was the ſpeech of the Ancient Gaules, ſeeing it was not Greeke? I may, and muſt anſwer, that it was Gauliſh: but to render a certaine reply, where the Language of the Gaules hath beene preſerued, it requireth the Diuination of a Pythian Apollo. Becauſe it is ſufficiently knowne, that the Gaules haue had time long enough, whereby to vnlearne and looſe their owne Natiue tongue. For not onely Lawes, but the Romane Legions eſtabliſhed in Gaule; conſtrained the Gaules to ſpeake the Romane tongue. And, according as Plato ſayth: Ordinarily all other Citizens do follow the manners of them that command them. Therefore, the Romane Lawier, and the Romane Warriour, did quite aboliſh and extinguiſh the Gaules Language.

The Gaules compell'd to ſpeak the Romane tongue. Plato in Lib. de Legib. 4

Moreouer, the Emperours of Rome, appointed wages vnto ſuch men, as made publique profeſſion of teaching the Latine tongue. So that, to this very day, the bookes written in this corrupted tongue; ſome whereof wee haue yet to ſhew; are vulgarly called Romaine, and not Gauliſh.

Teaching the Latine toong publikely, rewarded.

Some in debating this matter, are of opinion, that the Language of the Suiſſes, that hold (at this day) the dwelling of the Heluetians, are they that ſpeak the ancient Gauliſh tongue. But we know well enough, that theſe Suiſſes were not the true Gaules of the Country, neither are: conſidering, that the ancient Heluetians (ſhut vppe by Cæſar within their owne mountaines) were afterward expelled thence (according to Eutropius) by the * Quades; and finally, the Quades themſelues, thruſt out by the Allemaignes. At length the Vites, a people amongeſt the Saxons, poſſeſſed themſelues of the Heluetians Countrey; whereupon the Suitois (that is to ſay) Suiſſes, were called, according to the opinion of Beatus Rhenanus, by a Name ſomewhat neere vnto the Vitois.

That the Suiſſes yet ſpeake the ancient Language of Gaule.

Others are of the minde, that the language which the Germaines now adayes ſpeake, is that of the ancient Gaules, and take S. Hierom for their Authour, who giueth aſſurance, that in his time the Galates or Galatians of Aſia, ſpake the ſame language which the Treuirians (dwelling on the Rheine) now doe. But Cæſar ſeemeth to auouch the contrary, writing in his firſt Booke, that Arioviſtus King of the Germaines, by long vſe (as ſome haue conjectured by this place) of fourteen yeers, did ſpeake the Gauliſh tongue. And in the time of Saint Hierome, there were other Treuirians in Gaule, that were ſubiects to the Romane Empire: and now in our time alſo, there are other that ſpeake the ſame ſpeech, as the other Germaines doe.

Iul. Cæſar in comment. Lib. 1

That the Germaines Language was the olde Gauliſh tongue.

There remaineth yet another opinion amongſt learned men; who do iudge, that the language of the ancient Gaules, is that which was vſed in Gaule Armorica, that is Britaine at this day. But they do not hold the French Hiſtory to be true, that makes the Britaines to come out of the Iſle of Britaine, into Gaule Armorica: conſidering, that Cæſar (as I haue already ſaide) maketh great Britaine it ſelfe to be a Colonie of the Gaules, and that Strabo maketh mention of a Towne or Cittie, called Britaine, which is in Amorica; and Pliny (though verie confuſedly) numbereth the Britaines in Gaule: and Cornelius Tacitus in the life of Agricola writeth, That the neereſt ſhores of the Ile were impeached by the Gaules, & that their language was but little different. Finally, the learned men of this Iſle, imagined (for this reaſon) that the Welſhmen of England, had ſome conniuence in ſpeech with our Britaines. Therefore this is the only opinion, which (as yet) I know, to holde any good reaſon, or deſeruing to be approoued. And this is the Grammar of the Gaules, both in writing and ſpeech.

Gaule Armorica, now cald Britaine.

But what was that of the Britains, and that of the Germaines? The Diſcipline of the Gaules (ſaith Cæſar) was firſt inuented in great Britaine, as hath bene eſteemed: and from thence tranſported into Gaule. And at this day, ſuch as would know it moſt diligently, they go thither (oftentimes) to learne it. This paſſage ſheweth ſufficiently, that the diſcipline betweene the Britaines and Gaules, was al one. If we vnderſtand alſo, that Cæſar maketh great Britaine as deſcēded of the Gaules, & that they of the Britains were moſt human which were Gauls, it it is verily to be credited, that Discipline parted from Gaule, to come thither. This place may suffice generally, for al the doctrine of the Britaines.

Of the Germains. Cornelius Tacitus, vbi supra.

Concerning the Germaines, there is scarsly any one word. The men and Women (saith Tacitus) were equally ignorant in the secrets of Letters. The Germaines then wholly, had not any Letters or Disciplines. Æneas Syluius giueth assurance, that in the time of Adrian, ciuility and Letters came into Germany. The Germaines themselues do hold, that it is not yet eight hundred yeares, since their language began to be written; and that (with Christian Religion) the Muses came into Germany; where both in publique Schooles, and by learned professors, they haue so prospered, that the nation (which all Nations else had formerly in detestation for sauage barbarousnes:) hath since then, in all ciuility, in all gentlenesse and humanity of all disciplines, conferred with the most learned and best lettered Nations whatsoeuer, and for the priority in this commendation.

Eneas Syluius concerning the Germans, and their former barbarisme.

The studies of the Rhetorick Gaules.

But what were the studies of the Rhetoricke Gaules? Assuredly, they were very highly and honourably esteemed: yet more for a setled speech, consisting of measure, then in prose. The Gaules had (saith Diodorus in his sixt Booke) Poets of melodie, which they called Bards. These men, with a Musicall instrument, as with the Lyre or Harpe, sang some mens praises, and others imperfections. He further affirmeth in the same place, that Poets were in such reuerend respect amongest them, that when Armies were in ranged battaile, hauing their Swordes and Bowes ready drawne, and approaching to smite one another: not onely friends, but meere enemies (if these men once did steppe betweene them) were faine to make an end of all fighting. In like manner, among the most sauage Barbarians, anger was compelled to yeelde to wisedome, and Mars gladly reuerenced the Muses. Likewise, Strabo in his fourth Booke, speaketh of the Bardes, as being Poets, and singers of praises. The Poet Lucane also, in the first of his Pharsalia, speaketh thus in commendation of the Gaulish Poets.

Diodor. in lib. 6.

Strabo in lib. 4.

You Poets, Bards, that of those valiant souls,
Dying in warres, do Caroll their renowne,
Know how t'eternize to perpetuall worlds
Their endlesse praise: Many sweet songs you sing.

Lucane in lib. 1

Moreouer, Marcellinus in his fifte Booke, speaking of the Gaules, hath these words: The Bards sung to the Harp, which they touched very pleasingly: declaring the famous actes of illustrious men, their Songs being composed in heroycall verses. The Romaines followed this example of the Bardes, and they (according as Cato hath written in his Booke of Originals) had a custome to sing at banquets, the vertues of famous and renowned men, euermore conforming their voices with such as did play on Instruments.

Marcel. in lib. 1

The Romains imitated the Bards in singing at bankets

Heereby therefore, we may wel perceyue, how highly Poesie was honoured and authorized by the Ancient Gaules. This argument putteth mee in minde of Greece, and of her Homer and Hesiodus, shee vaunting of them, that they were in as great honour and estimation amongst the Greekes. This then was their Rhetoricke, and (as Pomponius Mela sayeth) This was the eloquence which the auncient Gaules had.

Greece renowned theyr Bards and Poets.

Pomp. Mela, in l. b. 1. cap. 5.

But what was that of the Germaines? Although they were ignorant (as hath bene formerly declared) in the mysteries and secrets of Letters; yet notwithstanding, as Tacitus auoucheth, they celebrated in ancient Canticles and Songes, the memory of their Gods and Kings. And this was the only maner of their Annals, & of the Antiquity which they had: for I finde nothing more, concerning the Discipline of the ancient Germaines.

The Rhetoricke vsed among the Germaines. Corn. Tacit. in lib. 5. c. 9.

Now, what was the Logick of the ancient Gaules? I finde in Cæsar one only question, concerning the meanes & manner which ought to be followed in the instruction of youth. All the noble and liberall Arts, were to be learned in written books; the maisters of those Arts, interpreting thē to their schollers, & the schollers practising to vnderstand them. Many times some great difficulty would arise, about the entertaining of mens authority; whose Bookes were propounded to youth: because those men, although they were more excellent then other men, yet notwithstāding being no more but men, they would ſometimes dreame, and quite forget themſelues. Whereby enſued, that their writings paſſing as vniuerſall, they proued many times vneaſie to be explained. Contrarywiſe, without any writing, but by the voice onely, an infinite number of Arts and Sciences (belonging to Mechanicall men (as Laborers, Maſons, Marriners, and ſuch like) were ſoone apprehended: and there aroſe no repugnancie or doubt of their words, neyther any difficulty of their intention when as they were vnderſtoode. There was no other maxime of theſe Arts, but what vſe and profit had approoued. Then thoſe Doctors and profeſſors were not woont to write of any diſcipline: but al that they deliuered to youth, they taught onely by word of mouth. Yet notwithſtanding, being guided by other reaſons, they made Conſcience (as Iulius Cæſar ſayeth in the ſixt Booke) to ſet downe their diſciplines in writing.

Instructions giuen vnto youth by word of mouth onely. Iul. Cæſar in Com. lib. 6.

Well then, if we vrge a queſtion (in this caſe) to Cæſar, thus will he ſhape vs an anſwer. It appeareth to me, that for two reaſons, they eſtabliſhed this decree amongſt them. Firſt, becauſe they would not haue their diſciplines imparted vnto popularitie. Next, leaſt ſuch as learned them, truſting to writing only; would make the leſſe account of retaining them in their memory. For many times it happened, that the more part, by vſing continuall recourſe to books, became ſlothfull in Learning truely, or kept retention of any thing ſhewn vnto them. And theſe two reaſons were likewiſe alledged by the Druides, for not committing their Diſciplines to writing; & theſe cauſes haue beene approoued by the very cheefeſt Philoſophers of Greece. For, in ancient time, this was the aduice of Pythagoras; and (after him) of Socrates, both which left not one Letter in writing. The opinion of Socrates, to this purpoſe, is amply declared by Plato to Phædrus, in this Conference which Socrates had with Phædrus.

CHAP. XII.

A Dialogue or Communication between Socrates and Phædrus, concerning what great difference there is between the excellent Art of Memory, and matters regiſtred downe by writing.

Socrates. It remaineth now to ſpeake of the fitneſſe or vnfitnes of writing. VVhether the doing thereof bee well or ill, is not that the queſtion?

Of the fitnes or vnfitnes of writing.

Phædrus. Yes, that is our argument.

Socrates. Knoweſt thou, that in dooing or ordaining it, as concerning preſent ſpeech, thou mayeſt thereby be acceptable to the Gods?

Whether writing or ſpeaking be moſt acceptable to the Gods.

Phædrus. Not I, but thou doeſt.

Socrates. I haue heard of our Elders, that they knew the trueth, and if wee our ſelues could finde it; ought we not henceforward, to bee verie carefull of mens opinions?

Phædrus. This is to laugh at thine owne demand: but tel vs that, which thou ſayeſt thou haſt heard.

Socrates. I haue heeretofore heard, that neere vnto * Naucratis which is in Egypt, there was ſometimes one of the ancient Gods, who was named Theuthates, and to him, the Bird tearmed Bis or Ibis, was ſacred. Moreouer, that hee vvas the firſt inuenter of numbers, and of Ieat, as alſo of Dice and Letters, and of Aſtronomy and Geometry. At that time, Thaumas was king of all Egypt, making his abiding in a great City of the higher Countrey, which the Greeks called the Egyptian Thebes, and that Ammon or Hammon was then their God. Theuthates beeing come to this King, he ſhewed and declared to him, that hee muſt inſtruct the Egyptians in diſciplines. VVhereon the King demanded of him, concerning the profite that would enſue thereby to any one; and according as Theuthates ſhould ſeeme to ſpeake ill or vvell, ſo would hee blame, or elſe giue commendation. It is ſayde, that betweene Thaumas and Theuthates

Diſciplines to be taught to the Egyptians

Concerning the enstruction of letters, & what harme or benefit might ensue by them.

thates many things were debated, which wold require too long time to discourse, but when they came to dispute about Letters. Sir (said Theuthates) this discipline will make the Egyptians very wise, and prompt of memory: for this is the onely Medicine found out for memory and knowledge. Whereto the other replyed; O most ingenious and subtle Theuthatec, the one is most apt to performe the workes of Art, and the other knowes best how to iudge, what harme or benefite their vse may bring. But thou, the Father of letters, being carried by thine own affection, maintaineſt the contrary of their effect. For letters causeth forgetfulnes in the mindes of such as learne them, because they make no reckoning of studying by memory; for they trusting to the marks of exterior writing, doe forsake inward recordation, which is the very soule of memory. Thou hast not then found out a medicine for memory, but for forgetfulnesse, and thou canst not teach thy Schollers the truth of knowledge and vnderstanding, but of Opinion. For, they hauing comprehended great store of things, and without a Master, they will perswade themselues to know enough; and yet notwithstanding (commonly) they are exceeding ignorant in the greater part, prooving to bee offensiue and troublesome in mens company and frequentation, as beeing more full of opinion of knowledge, then of true knowledge indeede.

Letters enemy to the memory, & the reason why.

Diffrence between knowledge and opinion therof.

Phædrus. Thou canst easily (O Socrates) imagine the humor of the Egyptians, or of any such nation, as seemeth good to thy selfe.

Socrates. My friend, it is held by some, that in ancient times, Oakes did speake those prophesies which were in the Temple of Iupiter * Dodonæus. For, through the rudenesse and ignorance of old men in those times, who had not then attained to the knowledge which now your yonger dayes haue done: it was sufficient for them, to heare an Oake, or a Stone speak, so long as they spake trueth. It may bee thou conceiuest, that some peculiar interest should bee placed in iudgement, how, or of what country he was, that hath spoken any thing of this nature, without consideration, whether it were so, or no.

*A Citty in Chaonia, nere which was a wood dedicated to Iupiter.

Phædrus. Truely, thou hast very iustly reproued me: but for the order of disciplines, I am of the same minde as Thamas was.

Socrates. Then whosoeuer thinketh, that Arte can so well sette downe it selfe, or comprehend by writing, as if there could bee something certaine, or assured by writing; that man should ill learne, and bee ignorant in the Oracle of Ammon, making more esteeme of reasons sette downe in writing, then of knowing and retayning that which is written.

The memory hath exceeded all matter set downe in writing.

Phædrus. Thou sayest very well.

Socrates. O Phædrus, writing hath a great matter in it, and (in very truth) carrieth some resemblance with painted creatures, for such works seeme as if they had life: but if thou demand any question of them, they hold their peace with great modesty. Thou imaginest also, that a discourse set downe in writing, should speake of it selfe. But, if hauing a desire to learne, thou come and demand something of it, concerning that which it should say; it continueth silent, yet signifying one and the same thing. For, after that a discourse is set downe in writing, it carrieth it selfe alike equally to all men: both for the learned which vnderstand it, and for such as vnderstand it not; and no one can say, to whom it is most conuenient; and to whom not. And if it happen to be iniuriously dealt withall, it will alwayes stand in need of his fathers help: because it is not able to reuenge any wrongs receiued, nor yet to right it selfe.

Writing compared to painted figures or portraitures, that can speak nothing.

Writing is in it selfe equall and alike to all men.

Phædrus. Hitherto thou hast spoken most truely.

Socrates. Doe wee not then perceiue, how another discourse maketh it selfe, which is Brother to this we take of, and much more it excelleth both in power & dignity?

Speaking repted the brother to writing

Phædrus. What is thy meaning? And what is that which (thou saiest) maketh it selfe?

Socrates. It is that, which (with knowledge) writeth in selfe in the spirit of him that apprehendeth: for it can acte reuenge vpon it selfe, knoweth it selfe, and when and how to speake, or to bee silent.

The excellency of speaking aboue writing vnderſtandeth; and (by good right) that which is written, may tearme it ſelfe (in ſome reſpect) to be his image.

Socrates. Tell mee then, in good ſadneſſe, if a wiſe husbandman take delight to beholde his ſeedes, whereof he is carefull, and deſireth to gather fruite; will he ſowe them at Spring time, in the Gardens of Adonis, where hee ſhall ſee them budde foorth at eight dayes following; or, when hee goeth about ſuch buſineſſe, ſhall he ſcatter them ieſtingly, as after the manner of a holy day ſport? When hee hath taken paines to ſowe his ſeede, according as hee ought to do, and anſwerable to the Art of Husbandry: he ſuppoſeth it ſufficient for him, if in the ſpace of eight moneths after the ſeed time is paſt, they doe thriue, and come to their maturity.

A pleaſant witty queſtion, and to very good purpoſe.

Phædrus. The wiſe Husbandman, (O Socrates) will doe as thou haſt ſayde; but the idle and negligent foole hath no ſuch care.

Socrates. Shall we then ſay, that a man who hath knowledge and experience in that which is iuſt, honeſt, and good, will be leſſe carefull of his ſeede ſeaſons, then an Husbandman?

The ſeedes of wiſedom haue their due ſeaſons.

Phædrus. No.

Socrates. He will not then write down the ſeedes of his penne with Inke, ſowing them there amongſt his Diſcourſes, as if he did a matter of great importance: becauſe hee cannot then helpe them with his wordes, neither can hee demonſtrate the truth ſo exquiſitely as it ſhould bee.

Matters ſet downe in writing, cannot afterward be holpen with words.

Phædrus. Nor can they make any proof of themſelues.

Socrates. No truely: but he ſhall ſowe and write (as it is in reaſon) in meere ſportfull manner, and whole Gardens of Letters. But, when he maketh memories, as certaine Treaſures, to the end that they may not fall into Obliuion, as well for himſelfe, as alſo for the firſt that will followe the ſame example: hee taketh delight in beholding their tender byrthes; and, while others doe addicte themſelues vnto other Recreations, as to Feaſts, ſports, and the like pleaſures, leauing all theſe heedefull matters behinde them; hee ſhall paſſe on all his leyſures, taking great delight in his owne diſcourſing.

Memories are ſaid to be the rich treaſures of mans life, and the beſt to be learned.

Phædrus. O Socrates, thou ſpeakeſt of a moſt true paſtime indeede, in ſteade of that which is of ſmall valew, and woorth nothing: when a man delighteth in ſerious Diſcourſe, he ſhall ruminate on Iuſtice, and all thoſe other eſpeciall matters by thee remembred.

Serious Diſcourſe the miniſter of iuſtice.

This was the opinion of Socrates, vvhich vvas much more ſweete and humaine, then that of our Druides. Socrates alwayes preferred knowledge, conſiſting in memorie and liuing wordes, before that of the dead Letter: neuertheleſſe, hee allowed vvriting to bee but as ỳ help to forgetfulneſſe. I could wiſh that this Opinion had beene as pleaſing vnto the Druides; for then, wee ſhould haue had no neede of ſtraungers goodes, as to borrow any thing of the Greekes, but continued ſatisfied with our owne countryes aboundance. Neyther by meanes of the Latines and Greek, ſhould we haue learned diſciplines by paine and ſtudye, after the nature of other ſtraunge Languages: but with great pleaſure and contentment of minde, wee ſhould haue ſuckt them as milk from our nurſes breſts. All the youth of a man, albeit ſtudy were ſharpe thereto, ſhould not ſo hardly haue ſpent it ſelfe in learning Greeke and Latine Letters; yet ſeeming but as an enterance into the common rode way of liberal ſtudies, whē we rather ſhould haue runne out our full courſe to the end. A long and laborious time of ſtudye vvas required in apprehending the Greeke and Latine tongues, to vnderſtand Homer, Demoſthenes, Virgil, Cicero and others: whereas contrary-wiſe, without trauaile, and with exceeding delight, we might haue ſung the Hymnes & Poems of our Bardes, hauing (naturally) the true vnderſtāding both of their words and ſenſe.

Memory and ſpeech preferred before the dead Letter.

The Gaules had ſufficient ſtudies of their owne, without need of borrowing elſewhere.

Study of ſtrange Languages, irkeſome to the Gaules

The loue which they bare vnto theyr countrey, and to vertue it ſelfe, was ouerabounding in ſeuerity. For, our Druides ſought all meanes, vvhereby to make Gaule ſurpaſſe all other Nations, not only in actions of Armes; but in the honor of Diſciples; and in coueting to baniſh idleneſſe from the Gaules mindes; they diſinherited their poſterity, of their moſt rich and vnualewable patrimony of ancient diſciplines. In the doing vvherof, they buried in perpetuall obliuion, the Gaules rare Arts and Doctrines, vvhich they had a hope, should haue liued and flourished for euer, only by the meanes of hindring writing. But in vaine do we now make our complaints: neuertheleſſe, ſorrow remaineth ſtill with vs, to wiſh (how vainely ſoeuer) that it had beene ſo. And vndoubtedly (in this caſe) they might iuſtly accuſe the vileneſſe of the Romane ambition, which vtterly ruined the Schooles of the Druides. Wee may therefore ſay with the Poet.

We ought to mourne, & all theſe mortall things
May touch their hearts.

A further addition to the Artes and Sciences, taught among the Gauls, by their Druides, Bardes, and learned men, according to the iuſtification of diuers good Authors: and what religious Ceremonious orders they obſerued.

Iul. Cæſ. in commen. lib 7.

BVT let vs come to the Mathematicall Artes, whereof Cæſar ſpeaketh, when he ſaieth. They made very many diſputes of the Starres, and of their motion; of the greatneſſe of the world, and of the earth, and concerning the nature of things. Queſtionleſſe, theſe were their ancient diſciplines, left from the father to the ſonne, by Dis, Sarron, and Druis: which they themſelues preſerued carefully, hauing receiued them (from hand to hand) of their graue Auncestors. For Ioſephus, in the firſt booke of the Iewes Antiquities, teſtifieth, concerning the ancient Fathers before the flood, that they had obſerued thoſe Mathematicall conſiderations. And becauſe they would hinder the loſſe of ſo noble inuentions, or periſhing by the inundations of the waters: they engraued them vpon two Collombes or Pillars, the one whereof was of moulded earth, and the other of ſtone. And this was thus done, that if that of earth ſhould chance to be defaced by the flood: yet the other of ſtone might remaine intire, and yeeld men means to apprehend what was engrauen thereon. The ſame Author witneſſeth, that the ſame Pillar of ſtone was to bee ſeene in Syria, in the time of Veſpaſian. Euſebius likewiſe reporteth, how the Egiptians learned them of Abraham; and that the Greekes afterward, did ſet downe thoſe Artes in writing, & then publiſhed them. But our Druides (as I haue formerly ſaide) gaue them to poſterity, according as they had receiued them from the hands of their fathers; diſputing many matters, touching the Starres, and their continuall motions.

Euſeb. in Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. c. 5

Mela alſo writeth, that the Druides made profeſsion, concerning the motion of Heauen, and of the Starres. Aſtrology was ſuch a thing, as it could not any way be taught or learned, except (before hand) a man had ſtudied Arithmeticke & Geometry. For the calculation of the motions, they ſtood in neede of the accounts of Arithmatick; and the diſtances and interualles of the Starres, muſt needs paſſe themſelues by the figures of Geometry. Therefore the Druides, making profeſsion of enſtructing Aſtrology; taught (firſt of all) Arithmetick and Geometry, which are Arts that make Aſtrologie to be vnderſtood.

Beroſus ſheweth, that there was ſome muſicke in the Hymnes and Poems of the Bardes. Among the Celts (ſaith he) a Barde was much renowned, for the inuention of Songs and Muſique. The Druides diſputed many things, concerning the greatnes of the world and the earth: This was the greatneſſe and forme of the world and earth, which Mela ſayeth, the Druides taught: This was their Coſmography & Geography, and the Druides diſputed diuers things of that nature. As, what was the length of the world, from the Sunnes ſetting in the Weſt, to his riſing in the Eaſt: what was his largeneſſe, from the Equator or Equinoctiall circle, to both the one and other Pole: how great were the diſtances of the fiue Zones, from the Pole, ſo farre as the ſmalleſt circle thereof, euen to the Tropick, and then from the Tropicke, ſo farre as the Equator, which is in the midſt: what were the Zones of the earth, which are aſsigned and ſubiected to the Celeſtiall Zones: which of the were inhabited, and deſert, by reaſon of cold or heate, and which were temperate: And how Europe, Aſia, and Affrica were diuided, and ſeparate one from another.

Two famous Philosophers among the Gaules, made immortall by Cicero himselfe, Heere we may not omit, to remember two most excellent Philosophers among them: that were commended, yea, and consecrated to immortality, by the words of Cicero. The one was Diuitiacus, (of whō wee haue spoken already) Prince of the Heduans: the other was Deiotarus, King of the Gaules in Asia. Speake then noble Cicero, and remember vs of our famous Druides. *In Gaule there were of the Druides, among whom, I my selfe knew Diuitiacus the Heduan a the man that receiued me into his house, and made account of mee. This man made his vaunt, that hee knew the reason of Nature, which the Greekes named * Physiologia; and could speake of things to come, partly by Augurie, and partly by coniectures.* This Diuitiacus (as it is very likely) was the Hoste to Cicero, by reason of the Druides knowledge which was in him. But what doth he say of * Deiotarus? How is it that this Oratour commendeth him? But wherein (saith he) shall I make mention of king Deiotarus, that most famous & right worthy personage our Hoste, that neuer did any thing, but with presage? For, when hee was returned from a voiage, which hee had formerly purposed and resolued to make: the Chamber wherein hee should haue lodged (if he had continued his iourney) fell downe the night ensuing. And therfore, as I haue oftentimes heard from himselfe, hee made many pauses and returnes from that one voiage; albeit he proceeded in many other beside. Cicero speaking further of the same man, saieth. Hee performed one very notable action, when he came backe from the kingdome of the Tetrarches, whereof he was dispossessed by Cæsar, and condemned to pay a great summe of money. He saide, hee did not repent himselfe, for not crediting such Auguries, as happened to him when hee went towards Pompey, hauing maintained with his forces, the authority of the Senate, and liberty of the Romane people, with the dignity of the Empire. And that the Birds (to whose augurie hee gaue faith) had well councelled and aduised him: yet notwithstanding, hee made much more precious and deere esteeme of his honour, then he did of all his goods and possessions.

Gaule & Galatia indebted to Cicero.

These are the words of learned Cicero, to whom both Gaule and Galatia are for euer beholding: because, by so worthy a testimony, he preserued the memory of 2. such famous Philosophers of theirs.

But what shall I most preferre in this place, if not our sighes and teares, as true witnesses of our misery? Heeretofore, Gaule commanded ouer the Italians and Grecians, and, insted of the goods of Fortune, which are but of small worth, and giuē to men as stipendary wages she gaue them the goods of the minde in recompence, which were (indeede) much more precious. Greece and Italy vaunted very proudly, because they had Mathematitians and Philosophers: but that glory was (formerly) ours; those praises distilled from our Fountaines: which did meerely dry vp themselues, because they would not rampier and defend their owne power, by writing. For Gaule might haue had Gaulish Euclides, Ptolomies, Platoes, Aristotles, and others beside, farre more excellent men then all they were. But let vs ceasse our bootlesse complaints, & come now to the Theology or Diuinity of the Gaules.

Gaule commanded ouer the Greeks & Italians.

The pride of Greece and Italy, yet proceeding from the Gaules.

The Druides (aboue all things else) would haue men to beleeue, that their soules could not die: but that (after death) they departed out of one body, & entred into another. The reason of this their opinion was: that it was the only encouragement to vertue, because feare of death was thereby held in high contempt. I set downe this their perswasion of immortality, as the principall foundation of the Gaules Religion and Theologie, which the Greekes and Latines did enuiously celebrate. The Gaules (sayeth Diodorus) after their repastes and feeding, had a custome, to defie one another vnto the Combate, bate, without making any reckoning of their liues, for the opinion of Pythagoras preuailed with them: That the ſoules of men were immortall, and that after the death of the body, within a certaine while, they came againe into other bodies. And for this cauſe, ſome would caſt written Letters into heapes of wood, prepared as bon-fires to burne mens bodies in, as if the dead were there to reade them. Strabo affirmeth as much. They were perſwaded (ſaith he) that mens ſoules were not ſubiect to corruption or mortality.

Written Letters caſt into fires that burned dead bodies. Strabo in Lib. 2 cap. 7.

Pomponius Mela writeth thus. There was one thing which the Druides helde and maintained, to encite men (thereby) with the better will to warre: That mens ſoules were eternall, and that the dead liued another life. Whereupon, when they burned dead bodies, or buried them, the whole account of their former liues negotiations was interred with the, eſpecially, if any thing had beene borrowed, it was to be redemanded of them. Some were found, that voluntarily, and with their owne good will, would throw themſelues into flaming fires, and burned ſuch things as neereſt and deereſt appertained to them, euen as if they were to liue with them. Mela reporteth thus of them, wherein we may note the ſame reaſon of this perſwaſion, which Pomponius Mela in lib. 4 cap. 2.

Death freely and voluntarily imbraced by the Druides.

Cæſar alſo held, to wit: that by the contempt of death, the Gaules might make themſelues the more couragious, and valiantly diſpoſed to warre: and it is very likely, that the contempt of death, whereof we haue formerly ſpoken, proceeded from hence.

Valerius Maximus, in his ſecond booke, maketh this relation. I bethinke me (ſaith he) of the ancient manner of the Gaules, who are ſaide to haue a cuſtome, to lend out monies, to be repaied them againe when they wer in the lower regions. For they held it as a matter moſt infallible, that the ſoules of men were immortall: and I ſhould haue reputed theſe men fooliſh, but that the Bracchates likewiſe held the ſame opinion, which Pythagoras * Pallium did. Such a number of Authors then, doe conſent with Cæſar, concerning the opinion which the Gaules had, of immortality. And heere I may not negligently let paſſe, that theſe Authors (aboue all things elſe) do refuſe to confeſſe, that the Gaules were the firſt fathers of Philoſophy. Pythagoras maintained, that the ſoules of men were immortall, and Plato (following him) ſaieth the ſame. It is alſo the opinion of the Philoſopher, which Ouid remembreth.

The error of the Greekes and Latines, concerning the Gaules, which were of more antiquity then Pythagoras.

This (I ſay) was the iudgement of Pythagoras, from whence enſued, that the Gauls (by report of the Greekes and Latines) were made Pythagorians, and ſo meerely borrowed this opinion of immortality. But to ſhew of what great ambition this error is, the ſillieſt iudgement may eaſilie apprehend: in that, for a long time before Pythagoras was borne, this opinion of the Druides liued among the Gaules. Wherefore, I may very well aſſure that which hath formerly beene propoſed: that Greece was not Schoole-miſtreſſe to Gaule, but rather her ſcholler. Neuertheleſſe, the Gaules did not allow of that * Metempſychoſis, that is to ſay, the changing of ſoules, which Pythagoras maintained, as paſsing out of humane bodies, into other of brute beaſts: For they did not beleeue, that of men they became beaſts, but that they were made men again, in other bodies. The Poet Lucane affirmeth the ſame.

Other points of the Gauls religion.

Proceede we now to other points of the Gaules religion. They diſputed very much, concerning the power and might of the immortall Gods, and made profeſsion (as Mela saith) to know what the Gods would haue them to do. They adored the Gods, Mercury, Apollo, Minerua, Iupiter and Mars, holding almost the very same opinion, which other nations did, to wit: That Mercury was the inuenter of Artes, and a guide to men on their wayes and voyages: That he could helpe much in the gayning of monie, and in the affaires of Merchandize, being such as the Poet feigneth him.

Mela

Pomponius Mela in lib. 3, cap. 3

He spake the word, and the God Messenger,
Immediately was ready to be gone.
He fastened to his feete his light wingd plumes,
Which at his heeles do beare him through the windes,
Mounting and falling with their nimble flight:
One while on Land, and then vpon the waues.
He tooke his Rod, and with that powerfull Rod,
He summond vp aloft pale meager Ghosts,
From the sad shades, or else doth send them thither.
And therewithall he doth controle our sports.
Waking or sleeping, he commandeth all:
And some into eternall sleepe to fall.

Mercury reputed to bee the God of Messages, and the inuenter of Artes, as also a guide to trauellers in their iournies.

For this Rod of his, was taken to be the power of Artes, the guide to trauellers on the way, and the rich gaine of Merchants. Iulius Cæsar made his prayers to Mercurie, (and as Marcellinus saith) he was reputed to bee the most sudden sense in this worlde, that moueth our thoughts, according to the doctrine of those Diuines. This was the power which the Druides gaue to Mercurie. As for that of Apollo, he was said to cure & helpe diseases and sickenesse; as the God testifieth of himselfe in Ouid.

Minerua the Goddesse of all ingenious deuises.

The might of Minerua, they held to be thus: That shee gaue the determination of all workes and cunning deuises. Whervpon the Poets feigned, that she was bred and borne in the braine of her father Iupiter.

The power of Iupiter and Mars in their seuerall conditions.

They were perswaded also, that Iupiter had command ouer all the other Gods, and that Mars gouerned in warres: to whom oftentimes they made vowes (when they had determined to giue the enemy battaile) of all such things as they should take in fight. And if they won the day, they would sacrifice all such Beasts as were taken, and bring away all the rest as booty. Diodorus relating almost the very same, saith farther; that they sacrificed their prisoners and captiues to the Gods. But you wil say, that this example was too cruell. I confesse as much, but must answer ye withall: that it was borrowed from the ancient Romanes, who wold put to death in their prisons, the very brauest & most valiant Captaines of their enemies. And many times for a publike spectacle, and before the common people, they were giuen as a prey to wilde Beasts, to be deuoured by them in cruell manner. Some of the Gauls did burne in their sacrifices, such Beasts as were taken for booty, and (with them) did put the enemy to death, or else torment him with other paines.

An especiall obseruation of the Celts in their Temples.

The Celts had an admirable and particular obseruation in their Temples, to cast or spred abroad a great deale of their gold and siluer. Now albeit this was a nation very greedy and couetous: yet notwithstanding, there was neuer found any man, among the rudest inhabitants of the country, that durst so much as touch one peece thereof, such was their respect and reuerence to Religion. Neuertheless, such offrings may (perhaps) seeme more proper and conuenient for Mars: beeing called (in ancient times) by the Greeke Poets, The plague of men, or the Murderer. And yet such ceremonies also were common, and vsed in the sacrifices of other Gods. The whole nation of the Gaules, (as Cæsar affirmeth) were greatly addicted to Religion, and by this occasion, such as were vexed with any greeuous diseases, or they that were in warre, or in any other other perill of life: did sacrifice men as their oblations & offerings, or else made vowes of such sacrifices. For they held a seuere opinion, that if for the life of one man, the life of another was not iustly rendred: it was impossible to appease the anger, or satisfie the will of the immortall Gods. And such manner of sacrifices wer publikely instituted, as truely declaring admirable Religion, and meruailous perswasion of the Gods might and power; whereof the Greeke Authors made not a iote lesse account and estimation.

Of the Diuination vsed by the Sarronides, who were a kinde of Philosophers among the ancient Gaules, their manner of oblations and sacrifices: As also of their spels, charmes, and incantations.

Diodor. in lib. 5

Philosophers and Diuines called Sarronides.

Diodorus further sayeth, that some other Philosophers & Diuines, were held in great honour & reuerence among them, whom they tearmed Sarronides, that vsed diuination: and because they fore-tolde things that were to come, as well by auguries, as sacrifices; they were highly esteemed of them, but especially of the common people, who performed great reuerence to them. And when they held any councell, concerning matters of import and consequence: they obserued a very admirable custome, and almost incredible. For they would cut the throte of a man, and when he fell downe; eyther by the manner of his fall, or separation of his members, or fluction of his blood (by a long and ancient obseruation) they attained to the knowledge of future things. Their custome also was, neuer to make any sacrifice, without the presence of some Philosophers: as holding opinion, that sacrifices ought to bee performed by such men, as participated in the diuine nature, and came neerest to the Gods. For by the prayers of such men, they were perswaded, that good fortune and successe should be desired of the Gods, and their councell also to be especially vsed, both in the times of peace and warre. Heereto may be referred, that which Cæsar saith, in the fift Book of his warres in Gaule. Whosoeuer came lateſt to the assembly made in Armes; beeing first afflicted with diuers torments, was afterward put to death before the whole multitude. Moreouer, Strabo saith, that they would fasten a man vnto a Crosse in their Temple, and there shoote him to death with Arrowes.

The same Author, agreeing with Possidonius and Artemidorus, saith, there were certaine Bacchanalles, which dwelt in an Island, neighbouring to the Riuer of Loyre, and of certaine Auguries done by them, according as two white Crowes mooued their right wings, which neuertheleſſe is reputed to be fabulous. Therefore that which Artemidorus saith, I hold more agreeable to reason, that in an Iland neere to Brittaine, such and the like sacrifices were performed, as the* Samothracians obserued, in the honour of Ceres and Proserpina. Cæsar pursuing the selfe-same occasion, saieth; that there were others, who had Idols of immeasurable height, the members of whose bodies were framed of Twigs and Osiers, which beeing filled with liuing men, & set on fire; there they dyed most miserably. Beside, they imagined, that the punishments of such as were apprehended for robberies and thefts, or any such like offences; were most pleasing to the immortall Gods, & these they made most vse of in those Idols. Neuertheleſſe, for want of such offenders, they made no difficulty, in putting honest and innocent persons to the same affliction, whensoeuer neede and occasion required.

Strabo writeth the same of their Statues, saying. They builded a Colossus of wood, many parts whereof, were enterlaced with Straw: and therein they burned all kindes of Beasts, and men also among them. But Diodorus saith, that in making their sacrifices to their Gods, they vsed an impiety answerable to their bestiall nature. For, after they had kept (for the space of fiue whole yeares) such as were attainted and conuinced of notorious crimes: they would spit them on stakes, from the fundament to the mouth, and so sacrifice them vnto their Gods: Then placing them vpon high piles of wood, and putting fire to them; this was the manner of their immolation.

molation. Pomponius Mela ſpeaketh thus of the Gaules. They are a proud Nation, ſuperſtitious, and cruell ſometimes: for they verily beleeue, that men are the beſt and moſt acceptable ſacrifices to the Gods.

Pomponius Mela in lib. 3. ca. 7.

Neuertheleſſe, wee ſhall not thinke ſtrangely, that the Statues of the Gaules Gods were of ſuch exceſsiue height: if we but remember only what Pliny ſaith, in 34. Booke, and ſeuenth chapter. We beheld (ſaith hee) huge maſsie Statues of new inuention, which they called Coloſſes, & were no lower then Towers, but of equall height. In the ſame place hee ſpeaketh of a number, among which he nameth Apollo Capitolinus, being of thirty cubites in height: Iupiter Tarentinus, which was forty cubites high: The Rhodian Sunne, ſeuenty; the thumb wherof, few men were able to embrace. Apollo of Tuſcanie, which was in the Lybrary of the Temple of Auguſtus, contained fifty foote in height, from the feet vpward. That of Nero, was an hundred foote high. But ouer and beſide, Zenodorus ſaith, that in his time there was one made in the ſpace of ten yeares, ſurpaſsing all other Statues in height & bigneſſe: beeing the Statue of Mercurie, of ineſtimable value; and made in Auuærgne, a Common-weale belonging vnto the Gaules, and it contained foure hundred foote in height. Thoſe Statues then of the Gaules Gods, were of wonderfull and extraordinary greatneſſe, according as Cæſar ſaith, which they filled full with liuing men, and ſo made offerings and ſacrifices of them.

But you will obiect vnto me, that this manner of religion was cruell and abhominable: whereto I muſt anſwer, that ſuch cruelty was common vnto all other Nations, or rather proper and peculiar to the dæmons, & familiar ſpirits of each country. Titus Liuius writeth, that ſuch ſacrifices were made at Rome, after the ouerthrow at Cannas. He ſaith more ouer, that in the interim while, certaine extraordinary & vnaccuſtomed ſacrifices were performed, by conſultation had with diuers fatall Bookes; wherein a Gaule-man and a Gaule woman, a Grecian man and Grecian woman, in the market appointed for Oxen at Rome, were laide along vpon the ground aliue, in a place round engirt with ſtones, which had neuer before beene ſullied with humane offerings or ſacrifices, and there they were ſacrificed after the Romane ceremoniall manner. This is the affirmation of Titus Liuius, and therfore I ſhall neede to make no further mention eyther of the Arabians, Thracians, Scythians, Egiptians, or Grecians: conſidering, that Dyoniſius Halycarnaſſeus ſheweth in the firſt Booke of Romane Antiquities, that Iupiter and Apollo, (becauſe the tenth borne of euery male childe was not ſacrificed to them) ſent great and greeuous calamities throughout all Italy. Diodorus, in the twentieth Booke of his hiſtory, declareth, that (in his time) there was at Carthage, a Statue of Saturne, and ſuch like ſacrifices. And it was thought (ſaith hee) that Saturne was offended with the people, becauſe that in (former times) they were wont to ſacrifice to him, the moſt worthy and beſt borne of their children. Furthermore, that by the ſucceſſe of times, inſtead of their owne children, they bought and entertained others, ſecretly nouriſhing thē, and afterward ſacrificed them vnto their Gods. This being cloſely and diligently diſcouered, & an infinite number of theſe ſuppoſed found out, which in that manner had beene ſacrificed, they were eaſily perſwaded to beleeue, that for this occaſion onely, the Gods beeing diſpleaſed, ſent enemies to take and ſacke their Cities, becauſe they had not continued thoſe honours, which from all antiquity had bin done to the Gods. Wherfore, the better to appeaſe them again; they ſacrificed publikely 200. yong men, ſuch as were the choyſeſt & beſt borne among all their Nobility, and found out three hundred more, which (with their owne good liking, becauſe they perceiued themſelues to be ſuſpected) gaue their liues freely to be ſacrificed.

If any man be deſirous to haue more ample and certaine teſtimony heereof: Euſebius, in the fourth Booke & ſeuenth Chapter of his Eccleſiaſticall hiſtory, recounteth many examples of this Religion, obſerued then in diuers Nations. Adrian, and when the Euangelicall doctrine began to appeare in some bright splendour: those abhominable cruelties were commonly abolished, albeit they remained still among the Celts. Neuertheless, Mela writeth, that they rooke ending in his time. Moreouer he saith, some markes of this brutish cruelty, formerly abolished, yet notwithstanding, whē they brought their offerings to their Altars, which were consecrated and dedicated to be sacrificed, they would make an essay or proose of them, and with much deliberation. These then were the sinister & wicked sacrifices of the Gaules, whereof Lucane speaketh thus.

Lucan: in lib. 1.

You Druides, after you forsooke your Arms,
You fell to sauage and barbarous customes
Of wicked sacrifices. Only to you was giuen,
To know the Gods, and holinesse of Heauen,
Or not to know them.

This shall suffice, for the manner of sacrifices obserued among the Gauls. What shall we now say, concerning the ceremonies of the Britaines and Germanes? Already we haue related, what was the manner of behauiour, as also the disciplines of the Britaines. The Germanes (saith Cæsar) were farre differing from these customs and orders: For they had not their Druides to command in diuine matters, and to take care of their sacrifices. They held opinion of such as they beheld, and by whose aide they conceiued themselues to be succored manifestly; that they were worthy to be ranked in nũber among the Gods: As the Sunne, Vulcane, and the Moone, of others they neuer heard any speech. These are the words of Cæsar. But Tacitus, ouer and beside these, speaking of the Germanes Gods, nameth Tuiston, or Teuton, a God borne of the earth, and of his Sonne * Mannus, who were the originall and beginners of their Nation. Then of the Sonnes of Mannus, by whose names, the neerest neighbours to the Ocean, called themselues Ingenoues; and they that dwelt neerer to the middle region, Hermiones; and the other Istenoues. Among other Gods, they worshipped Mercury, in the honour of whom, it was permitted them (on certaine dayes) to offer humane sacrifices. They also appeased Hercules and Mars, by the sacrifices of beasts, which likewise was permitted vnto them. A part of certaine number of the Sueues, performed their sacrifices, to * Isis; and yet, the cause and originall of such sacrificing, is not certainly knowne.

Cæsar, in his first Booke, attributeth charmes, spels, & incantations to the Germanes, which were performed by women. For when Cæsar questioned with a prisoner, wherefore Ariouistus would not bid him battaile: he found it to be a custome among the Germanes, that the mothers in their seuerall families, did declare by spels and vaticinations, whether it were profitable to offer battaile, or not, and they would say that it was not possible for the Germanes to be Conquerers, if they gaue the battaile before the new Moone. Tacitus speaketh much more of these diuinations, & among the rest, relateth the presages and incantations which they most obserued. The very simplest and most vulgar manner of their diuining (saith he) was, by taking a branch cut off frou a fruite tree, which they would cut into diuers peeces, with certaine very knowledgable markes made vpon them, and afterward throw or scatter thē (casually, and without any regard at all) vpon some white garment. If the matter were to be consulted publikely, then it was done by the Priest of the City. But if it were in priuate, or particularly; the father of the family, hauing made his praiers to the Gods, and eleuating his eies vp to heauen, taketh the peeces of the branch by three and three, and when he hath lifted them aloft, he maketh his interpretation, according as he findeth the marks that were formerly engrauen. If he finde the case to be prohibited, he maketh no other consultation (concerning that matter) that day: but if he finde it to be permitted, then he seeketh further for the truth thereof, by other kindes of predictions, which giueth perfect knowledge in that place, both by questioned voices, and also by the flight of Birds.

Moreouer, it was proper and particular to this Nation, to make experience of presages and aduertisements by horses, which publikely had beene bred in their Woods and Forrests, and were all wholly white, without any spotte vpon them, and had neuer beene laboured or employed, or vsed in any seruice of man. They had another obſeruation of preſaging, whereby they could foretell the iſſue of their warres,how cruell or dangerous ſoeuer they were, and how they ſhould ſucceed. They would take a priſoner of that Nation,with whō they intended to make warre, and he ſhould combate with one of the braueſt and moſt gallant ſpirits of all their owne people, & with thoſe weapons belonging to the Country. Afterward,the victory of the one or other,turned to the preiudice and diſaduantage of the vanquiſhed,and of his Nation.

CHAP. XV.

What Ceremonies were obſerued among the Gaules,at the times of their Burials,or Funerals,&c.

THE manner and Ceremonies of their Funerals, are ſet downe in Cæſar. Their Funerals (ſaith he) are (after the Gauliſh brauery) magnificent and ſumptuous, with throwing all thoſe things (whatſoeuer) into the fire,which they imagined that the dead perſon (during his life time) moſt eſteemed and affected,eſpecially his Beaſts. And ſome ſhort while before this memory,ſuch ſeruants and domeſticke attendants,as were iudged to be dearely loued of their Maſters (to make the Funerall Ceremony the more intire and compleate) were burned together with the other things. Cæſar hauing affirmed this, methinkes Pauſanias deſerueth to be laughed at, when hee ſaith in the tenth Booke of the warres of Brennus: That the Gaules contemned, and held the buriall of their dead in diſdaine, becauſe, that by the opinion of ſuch cruelty,they might affright their enemies, not hauing any more pitty on the dead, then on other liuing perſons. In this point Cæſar refuteth Pauſanias and Titus Liuius alſo, where he ſpeketh of the Gaules beſiedging Rome, his words, in the fift Booke of his third Decade,are theſe. They heaped and piled men one vpon another, and ſo burned them indifferently together: becauſe they would not bury them each after other, whereby they ennobled the place magnificently,in imitation, and anſwerable to the name of the Gaules Sepulchers.

As for that which Cæſar ſaith, That all that which was pleaſing to the dead perſon, was caſt into the fire with him: At Rome, into the fire made for Iulius Cæſar himſelf, the Trumpetters threw their torne garments; the Legionaries,their Armes; the Matrones their Chaines and Iewels, yea, and the precious purple deckings of their children. Cæſar doth not declare apparantly,whether the ſeruants & domeſticks were throwne into the fire,liuing or dead: but that he meant the liuing, may eaſily be coniectured by that which Mela ſaith. Ther wer ſuch(ſaith he)as voluntarily wold caſt themſelues into the fires made for their parents,kindred,and maſters, holding opinion, that ſo they were ſure to liue with them. We haue ſuch another example,in the 5. of Ciceroes Tuſculanes,wher it is ſaid;That the women of India,when their husbands died, had a cuſtome of combate and iudgment, to make proofe thereby, which of them was beſt beloued of her husband, for one man had many wiues. She that carried the honour of the combate, being followed and attended by her other companions, was (with great ioy) placed in the fire,and there burned with him: the other that had fought,and loſt the day,returned home mourning, and diſconſolate to her houſe. This cruell manner of behauior, may well keepe company with the other ceremony, of immolating or ſacrificing humane oblations.

Tacitus ſpeaketh in this manner, concerning the Funeralles of the Germanes. They bring the bodies of their companions into doubtfull battels, and that there may bee found no ambition of glory among them, for interring of their dead: they onely obſerue, that the bodies of the moſt noble, or of greateſt apparance, may be burned with certaine wood. They do not heape vpō the pile of wood, neither their garments,or any odours: but only allow to each man his proper Armes, & into the fire of ſome,they make addition of their horſes. One only ſod or turffe of earth, is building ſufficient for the Sepulcher, they contemne pompous workmanſhip and honourable labor Plin. in lib. 3. cap. 1. His accusation against the Druides, concerning the Magick-Art.

But Pliny in his thirteenth book & first chapter, speaking of the Sacrifices, & the whol discipline of the ancient Gaules; frets himselfe against the Magick Arts, as fraudulous and deceitfull, seeming to reproue and accuse the discipline of our Druides with the same crime. Let no man meruail (saith he of the Art-Magicke) if great authority be giuen to such discipline. Because it onely will comprehend and redigest the three Sciences all into one, which haue most command ouer our humane will.

The Mathematicks made a colour to their deceiuing.

First of all, no one doubteth, but that it receiueth birth & beginning from Physick, and that vnder pretence of yeelding helpe by little and little: it hath vsurped the place, as feigning it selfe to be more high and healthfull, then Physicke, and with such entising and desirous promises, makes addition of some strength and power of Religion, whereby men (yet to this day) do abuse themselues. And yet to satisfie them better, they haue intermingled the Mathematicks, because there is not any one, but he is very couetous, and desirous to vnderstand future things concerning himselfe, and of his fortune, as beleeuing vndoubtedly, that such knowledge commeth from Heauen. Thus the reason and vnderstanding of men being surprized, and seriously busied in this manner: the discipline is fortified with a triple bond, and growne to such an encreasing greatnes; as euen in these dayes (in most parts of the world) it beares away the reputation from all other, commanding ouer the Kings and Princes of the East. From whence issued the Magicall faction, Persian, Mosaicall, and Ciprian. Finally, the sixe hundred, sixty & seuenth yeere from the building of Rome, Cnens Cornelius Lentulus, and Publius Licinius Crassus being the Consuls, an Edict was made, that no man was to be offred in sacrifice, and assuredly, the celebration of such prodigious sacrifices vanished away. But contrariwise, the Gaules kept them, euen till our memory: For Tyberius Cæsar wholly abolished the Druides, & such kind of Prophets & Physitions. What mention shall I make of this discipline, which hath out-stept the bounds of the Ocean, entring into Britanny, where (at this day) it is celebrated with all reuerence, & such ceremonies, as it seemes that they haue taught it to the Persians? It hath attained to such consent with the whole vniuerse, (although it can grow to no agreement, or can well know it selfe:) as we do little conceiue, how highly we are beholding to the Romans, who vtterly abandoned al such monstrous behauior: being formerly fauoured (as a charitable work) to kill and sacrifice men, yea, and a very wholesome thing to eate them.

Cornelius Lentulus, and Publius Licinius Crassus, Consulles of Rome.

Britaine embraced such sauage behauiour equall with the Gaules.

So far extend the words of Pliny, wherby ouer and beside the Arts formerly remembred, he attributeth Physicke also to the Gaulish Druides. But he greatly blameth the frauds therein concealed, & deseruedly commendeth the Romanes, for excluding such monstrous qualities out of their Empire. But would to God, that they had onely abolished the frauds and deceits in such Arts, and not the true Arts themselues, nor the Schooles and profession of them: For then vndoubtedly, wee should in duty thanke them, and crowne them with honour. But Pliny saith, that Tyberius wholly ouerthrew the Druides. Notwitstanding, the same man discouered Magicke, by some example of the Druides, as in the last Chapter of his seauenth Booke, speaking of Glew, or a certaine Gumme, hee hath these words.

Physicke attributed to the Druides, among the Gaules.

Plin. in li. 17 cap. vlt. Concerning the Glew and Gums esteemed among the Druides.

We may not omit (saith he) in this case, one admirable matter of the Gaules. The Druides (by such name they terme their Magitians) esteeme nothing more precious then Glew and Gum, and that the Tree where it groweth, during the time it hath vigour: they themselues do then make choise in their Woods and Forrests, which haue such power to nouriish those Gummes, that they will not offer any sacrifice, without the leaues of such a Tree. And it may be very likely, that from the Greeke interpretation, vpon this occasion, they were called Druides. In briefe, they hold opinion, that that which taketh birth or originall with those Trees, is sent from heauen, in signe, that such a Tree is chosen of the Gods. Such a Tree is very rare to finde, but being found; they take it with great ceremony and religion, & aboue al other, at the time of the Moons sextile, or sixt Moon, which is the beginning of their Moneths and yeares, and of the world after thirty yeares. Becauſe that then ſhe is in her ſtrength, not being in diminution of her moity, and they terme it by a word in their language, ſignifying; To be helping in all things. They prepare the ſacrifice and a banquet vnder thoſe Trees, bringing thether two Bulles wholly white, the hornes whereof are as yet ſcarſe able to be bound. The Prieſt, cloathed in a white Robe, mounteth vp the Tree, and cutteth the branches with a Sickle of Gold, and ſuch as fall, are receiued in a white cloth. Then they offer their ſacrifices, making their prayers, that God will make their gift proſperous and happy, for them to whom they intend the giuing. They are of opinion, that ſuch things being giuen in drinke to any ſterile or barren body, either of women or beaſts; will make them fruitfull, and beſide, that it is a ſoueraigne remedy againſt all poiſons. Thus ſometimes a Religion is made among men, in matters meerely friuilous, and not of any importance.

The ceremonies in the ſacrifice of the Druides.

A preſent remedy againſt barrenneſſe and poyſon.

Thus you ſee what Pliny ſaith, concerning the myſteries of the Gaules Magick, wherein he findes the greeke etymology of the name of the Druides (although that it is a Gauliſh name, to wit, of Druyon, as already hath beene ſaid) as in all languages you may finde infinite words, which (by ſome conniuency) ſeeme to be deriued from another tongue: as in like manner the Mathematicians, in their moneths and yeares, and the Chronology of their ages, do declare ſufficiently, that the Mathematicall diſciplines, albeit after the Greekes deſcriptions, do not alwaies fall out to be one and the ſame. But let vs purſue ſome other examples of Pliny.

Plin. in lib. 21. cap. 11. * A hearb vſed much of the Druides, for all eye-ſores, hedge-hyſope

In his one and twentieth Booke, and the eleuenth Chapter, hee ſpeaketh thus. There is a certaine hearbe, like vnto Sabine, called * Selago, which is gathered without any yron weapon, by the right hand, thruſt into ſome left-handed gloue or ſleeue, in manner of a theefe. And the party muſt be cloathed with a white garment, hauing his feete naked and cleanly waſhed: and ſacrifice muſt bee performed with Bread and Wine, before any offer of gathering, and modeſtly brought thether in a new Napkin. The Druides of the Gaules haue written, that this hearbe is very ſoueraigne againſt any perill or dreaded danger, and alſo that the ſmoke thereof is profitable for the diſeaſes in the eies. They haue alſo another hearbe, which they call Samola, which groweth in moiſt and wateriſh places, and they vſe to gather it alwaies with the left hand: it ſerueth againſt al diſeaſes in Swine and Kine, and whoſoeuer gathereth it, muſt not (by any meanes) be ſeene, neither muſt he bring it into any other place, then a gutter or brooke, and there breake or bruiſe it in the water, that the Beaſts may ſwallow it in their drinking.

Another hearb for the help of cattel.

In the ſame place is recited another Magicke of the Gauliſh Druides, whereunto (in the third Chapter of the twentieth Booke, written by the ſaid Author) there is another very like euery way. Moreouer (ſaith hee) there are a certaine kinde of Egges, wherof great account is made in Gaul, and whereof the Greekes haue not made any mention. Summer cauſeth an infinite number of Serpents to heape themſelues together, writhing and embracing in a kinde of artificiall hugging: when either by the moiſture iſſuing from their mouthes, or ſlimy ſcumme of their owne bodies, that which they call the Serpentine Egge is engendered. The Druides ſay, that (by their hiſsing or whiſtling) it is exalted vp into the Ayre, and in the meane while, it muſt be receiued downe in ſome robe or garment, becauſe it may not touch the earth. But he that receiues it, muſt make great ſpeed away vpon an horſe, becauſe the Serpents will purſue him ſwiftly, vntill they find hinderance by ſome Riuer or Water. The proofe and experience thereof, is, vvhen it floateth againſt the vvater, eſpecially vvhen it is enchaſed in gold. But as the cunning of Magitians is vvell contriued, for the more ingenious couering of their fraud: ſo they ſay, that it muſt be taken in a certaine Moone, as if it were lawfull in humane iudgement, to accord ſuch an operation of Serpents. Verily, I haue ſeene this kinde of Egge, of the bigneſſe of an indifferent round Apple, bearing a cruſt or ſhell like a griſtle, ſeamed vvith little mouthes or openings, like to them vvhich are on the armes of the Polypus or Pourcontreil, and the Druides holde it for a moſt notable thing. It is highly eſteemed, as for giuing victory in fights and combates, and to haue acceſſe to Kings & Princes: by ſuch an abuſe, and no other reaſon that I know, a Romane knight of the Vocontians, vvas put to death by the Emperor Glaudius, onely in regard of fighting, for he alwaies carried ſuch an Egge in his boſome. Neuertheleſſe, the embracing and colligation of Serpents, and the alliance of the moſt cruell creatures, ſeemeth to haue beene beene the cauſe, whereby ſtrange Nations (as an argument of peace) made a Caduceus of Serpents writhed round about, and it hath beene a cuſtome alſo, that they ſhould be creaſted on the Caduceus.

Thus hath Pliny noted the Serpentine Egge, to proceede from the Gaules Magicke, and that for this cauſe onely, the Knight was ſlaine by the Emperour, who ſtood in feare of this Magicke. Finally, the Romanes, to aboliſh vtterly the diſcipline of the Druides, tooke occaſion by this Magicall ſuperſtition: but though impiety, ſuperſtition, magicke and vices may be rooted out, yet vertue will continue ſtill found and intire. Would to God that the Romanes had maintained in like place, and in like number, the Gaules as the Greeks. The Empire hath bene ſnacht from the Greeks, but Learning and Artes was left with them ſtill. Greeke hath bene conſtrained to make way for the Latine tongue: but yet continually Grammer, Rhetorick and Philoſophy hath bene, and yet is taught in greeke. What greefe then was it to the Romanes, to expulſe not only the Gauliſh Iudges from their ſeates: but the profeſſors alſo, yea, the very ſciences & diſciplines of the Gaules out of their Schooles?

No force or violence can preuaile againſt vertue, let ſinne and ſhame be rooted vp.

But we conuert our affections too earneſtly, to the glory and honour of our owne particular, which honour we may bemoane, being too greedily carried away with a mighty ſpleene againſt the name of the Gaules. But let vs now proceede to finiſh the reſt.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Iuſtice exerciſed in Ancient Gaule, compared with that of the Romanes, by diuiding the chiefe men into two degrees, of Druides and Knights, and two kindes of Magiſtrates, with the puniſhment of diſobedience to ſuperior Officers.

HItherto wee haue gone thorough three parts of the propoſed labour, to wit; The prudence of diſcipline; The entire knowledge of truth; and likewiſe of prouidence. There yet remaineth the fourth part, namely of Iuſtice, which is Princeſſe and Miſtreſſe of all other manners. It behoooueth vs then, to ſeeke for the principality of ancient Gaule, and what it was; what power the people had, and what policy was maintained among them: that which we terme the Platonicall good and benefit of Temperance, Fortitude, & of Prouidence, whereby each man hath that belonging to him, without vſurping on any thing appertayning to another.

The fourth part of the intended diſcourſe, namely of the Iuſtice of the Gaules.

The Common-wealth, at leaſt that of Gaule, whoſe lockes of hayre beeing long enough in Cæſars time; was meerly Timocraticall, and in many parts very like vnto the Roman liberty, as by that which followeth, hee which will examine things particularly, may eaſily perceiue. Let vs then obſerue what Cæſar hath ſaid, and eſpecially concerning cuſtomes and behauiour. In all Gaule, or Gallia (ſaith he in his ſixt Booke) all men that are of any marke, or made any account of, are diuided into two ſorts; to wit, into Druides, and into Cheualiers: for the common people is of no other reckoning, but as varlets and ſlaues, not daring (of themſelues) to do any thing, neither are they admitted to councell in any matter. Behold what partition Iulius Cæſar hath inſtituted of himſelfe, albeit it is not altogether true which he ſpeaketh of the people, as ſhall at large bee deliuered heereafter, in place more conuenient for the purpoſe.

In this partition of Cæſar, There is one (ſaith he) *that Preſideth, or is as Primate ouer all the other Druides, that hath cheefe command and authority of the reſt. He being dead, if there be any one among the other, that hath the aduantage in worthineſſe or deſert: he is to ſucceed. If there be many of equall parity and condition; he is to be choſen (by voices of the Druides) from among the reſt. teth one, to be as the high or cheef Prieſt, and he defineth his election, to bee eyther by Dignity, or by Suffrages, or by Arms. And there is no great difference, between the inſtitution of the Roman high Prieſt, and this other man: but onely, that at Rome he is annuall or yeerely, & in Gaul it ſeemeth he hath beene perpetuall. That the Druides haue beene ſpread ouer all Gaule, euen in Cities, Townes and Burroughs, their eſtates haue ſhewne ſufficient manifeſtation: for the Druides did euer command ouer the three principall parts of the Common-wealth: as in profeſsion of Artes, in iudgments, pleadings, and ceremonies belonging to their ſacrifices. All the younger ſort (ſaith Cæſar) haue their recourſe to them, to be enſtructed by them, and to learne ſciences, as alſo a great number of verſes; ſo that ſome continue there twenty yeares, only to learne knowledge. And ſurely, an honeſt ſtipend or recompence, can neuer want Maſters to giue enſtruction.

The yong mē reſort to the Druides, to learne of thē.

The Druides exempted from war & taxations.

The Druides (ſaith Cæſar) are not wont to goe to warre, but ſtand exempted from it, and immunity of all other taxations & charges. So that in regard of ſuch faire acknowledgements and freedomes, there are many that come to bee ranked among them, and to follow the ſtudy of their diſciplines, they are ſent thither by their parents & kindred. Let me now entreate yee, and (euen in honeſt charity) but to obſerue well this place alledged by Cæſar. Can there be any thing more excellent, or more magnificent, thē when the Primates of a Country, or the Gouernors and very greateſt Princes in a Common-wealth, do make profeſsion of diſciplines? Perhaps, ſome will conſider ſweatingly on this point, as though wee would haue the cheefeſt men, and thoſe that are the graueſt in our Citties, to keep Schooles, and apply their paines to enſtruct other. Notwithſtanding, let me tell ye, Plato would haue ſuch men (and no other) to take the charge of enſtructing, & deliuering the knowledge of Sciences: becauſe ſuch a place ſhould be as a Seminary or ſeed-plot, of great, iudicious, and learned men, meete to adminiſter and beare authority in a Common-wealth: wherein the grafts and plants muſt needs be the more rare and excellent; by how much the grafters and planters are moſt vertuous and honourable.

Plato, his aduice concerning men of iudgement & learning.

I wonder at the opinion of Pliny, in many paſſages alledged by him, and eſpecially in this, where he writes: That with the ancient manners and faſhions of Rome, the Land abounded, & did daily bring forth double encreaſe. What was the cauſe (ſaieth he) of ſuch aboundance? The earth was then husbanded by the hands euen of the chiefeſt warriers, and, as it is credible, that the earth ioyed and reioyced, to be honoured with a ſhare or culture crowned with Laurell, and by the labour of a victorius triumphing conqueror: euen ſo did it trauaile and endeuour it ſelfe the more induſtriouſly, to produce the ſeed ſowne in that nature, as to proſper their other warlike proceedings. And the like diligence, for well husbanding the ground, as alſo to order and direct a potent Army, or elſe in all other things, which are performed by noble and honeſt hands: do encreaſe the more aboundantly, and become ſo much the more fertile, by how much they are the more carefully executed. But now adaies, this faire and honourable myſtery, is exerciſed by foule, infamous, and condemned hands, by men that are either theeues, or baniſht, or haue loſt their eares, or branded with ſome ſuch other wicked imputation. Notwithſtanding, the good earth is not deaffe, who being called Mother, and bids herſelfe to labour and fructifie, by a Latine word, called Coli, which ſignifieth alſo to do honour, as beeing thence deriued: whereby it plainly appeareth, that whatſoeuer ſhe now doth or produceth, ſhe doth it but in meere diſdaine, and againſt her owne liking. And therefore we muſt needs meruaile, that no ſuch profits ariſe in the times of theſe labourers, as in the famous daies of thoſe floriſhing Captaines. So farre extend the words of Pliny.

Plin. in lib. 22. cap. 4. Of the ancient manners and behauiours of Rome in the earths husbandry.

Good and commendable actions doe euer illuſtrate & manifeſt themſelues.

But by your fauour, do not we conceiue, that it is as conuenable for vs, to ſpeake of the exerciſe of diſciplines, as of thoſe which concerne the earth? Euen ſuch was the fertility and aboundance of the Gaules diſciplines, when in the times of our Druides, the Schooles of the Muſes, became the Pallaces of Kings; the chaires of Maſters, were the ſeates of Princes; the number of Students, was the company & following of honorable Lords. Then Pallas delighted to be in a royall Colledge, vſing one & the ſame Rector & gouernor in the common-wealths affaires, & to declare the Sciences and diſciplines, explicating thoſe enſtructions in one ſelf-ſame manner, manner, for gouerning their Commonweales. And by the ſame diſcretion and prouidence, they inſtituted the rules of Arts, Lawes, and Ordinances: wherein all things increaſed the more proſperouſly, and more aboundantly (by honeſt labours) as they were the more diligently and reſpectiuely followed. There were many in thoſe dayes, who being ſpurred on by ſuch recompences, and the expectation of thoſe propoſed honours; addicted themſelues (gladly) to apprehend thoſe diſciplines, being ſent to the ſame end & purpoſe (from the remoteſt parts) by their parents and kindred.

The voluntary inclination of the Gaules in former times.

Hereupon, and for the ſame occaſion, Lucian was the more willing to haue the Gauliſh and Ogmian Hercules depicted; not onely couered with the deſpoyle of a Lyon, and a maſſy Club: but alſo decrepite, bald, aged, wrinkled, and meager; drawing a great number of Conquered men after him, in chaines of gold faſtned to their eares. Their tongues alſo were pierced thorow, and at them hung little Chaines of gold, in ſuch ſort, that thoſe valiant diſpoſed and conquered gallants, followed the Hercules that drew them, he turning eſtſoons his face and looks to behold them, with very milde & affable behauiour. And what elſe was all this, but the eloquence of the Bardes, as alſo the wiſedome of the Sarronides and Druides? which euen at the firſt ſight (without any more regarding) cauſed ſuch admirable affection to the ſame. The great number of Students, which ſubmitted themſelues vnder their charge, onely to learn their diſciplines and goodly knowledge in ſo many noble things: figured thoſe Chaines of golde. And euen ſo the Schollers, hung by the ears at the mouths of their Maſter, as being taken & bound by his rich words, and the ſweet doctrine flowing thence. Then did al diſciplines flouriſh, in regard that the profeſſors of them were rare and excellent. But ſo ſoon as by the Romaine Empire, the ſalary and honour of Learning was taken away and aboliſhed; euen as ſodainly was the profeſſion of thoſe Diſciplines eſteemed and held to bee but a ſeruile and mechanicall thing. Which was the onely occaſion, that (neceſſarily as it were) thoſe honeſt and liberall ſtudies languiſhed for a long time; and by an ouer-tedious experience, hath approoued the ſaying of the Orator to be true; That Honor is the Nurſe of arts, and all hearts are enflamed with the loue of the Sciences, onely in regard of their glorie. For neuer ſhould any account bee made of ſuch things as are miſprized and condemned by euery man.

Thus the loſſe and burying of the Gauls diſciplines, are due to none but vnto the Romaines, by whoſe tyranny the honour of their profeſſion, and their liberty together, was violently taken from the Druides. Wherefore Mela (who flouriſht vnder Claudius ſaith. Now are not the braue and worthy Schooles of the Druydes; becauſe they are become clandeſtine, and ſuppreſſed by other, baniſhed into the deepeſt & furtheſt off Forreſts. So that the Diſcipline of the Druydes, was not onely robbed of her former honour, but compelled in meere feare of danger, to hide her ſelfe in caues and thickeſt woodes. Lucane ſeemeth to take knowledge thereof with Mela, ſpeaking thus of the Druydes.

are the men that giue ſentence, and conſtitute the reward of well doing, and puniſhment of miſdemeanors. Strabo addeth heereto (I know not how) that by their Magical ſuperſtition, they iudge of the fertility of the yeare, according to the multitude of criminall cauſes.

But proceede we with the reſt of Cæſar. If there be any man, either a priuate, or publique perſon among the common people, that wil not obey their ordinances & decrees: he is interdicted from comming to the ſacrifices, which is the moſt greeuous puniſhment in all their Nation. They that ſtand ſo interdicted from the ſacrifices, are reputed among the number of lewd and wicked people: All men flyes from them, and euery man ſtands in feare to ſpeake to them, or to keepe company with them, as dreading ſome Contagion or Plague ſhould happen to them by ſuch frequẽtation. And if they demand Law or Iuſtice, it is denyed, and may not be granted them, neyther may they enioy any preferment or honor, or the leaſt reuerence done vnto them by any. But what manner of ſentences or iudgments do the Germaines obſerue? What penalties and puniſhments are amongſt them? It appertaineth to none but Prieſts, who haue the full power of commaunding (ſaith Tacitus) to impoſe ſilence in publicke conſultation. Moreouer, it is not permitted but to Prieſts onely, to chaſtiſe, beate, or bind them, not as the paine or puniſhment of the offence, nor by the commaund of the Prince: but euen as by diuine permiſsion, & as a commandement giuen by God, whom they make account to be then in preſence, and to be aſſiſting in their fights. In Warre alſo they carry certaine Pictures and Images, vvhich they bring away from their hallowed places. The difference of punniſhment is anſwerable vnto the delict, Traytors, and ſuch as forſake their Captaines of their Nation, to doe any ſeruice vnto a Stranger-enemy, are hanged vp vpon the Trees. Vagabondes, Rogues, ydle liuers, and all ſuch as are noted of foule infamie, are drowned in mudde, or in ſome Mariſh place, & couered all ouer with filth. The variety of puniſhment is much reſpected there, to the end, that the enormity of the offence, may be knowne by the qualitie of the infliction, and that vice may by no meanes be couered. But in crimes of leſſer nature, the parties which are conuinced, are condemned in Fines, of a certaine number of Horſſes, or other Beaſts, whereof one part of the forfeite is giuen vnto the King, or to the Cittie: and the other part is giuen to him, for whom the penaltie is done, or to his neereſt Kindred.

Returne we now again vnto the Druides of the Gaules: for, Cæſar deſcribeth the times and the places, where they did vſe to keepe their Seſſions. The Druides (ſaith hee) vpon certaine dayes in the yeare, and vpon the Borders of the Caruntes (the which Countrey is reputed to bee the verie middeſt of all Gaule or Gallia) do vſe to keep their great dayes meeting, in a certaine conſecrated place, where all ſortes of men, that haue ſuites or Controuerſies, make their Aſſembly, being obedient vnto the ſentences & iudgements of the Druydes. Cæſar doeth not diſtinguiſh the times of the yeare, but onely the place, which was on the Limites and Confines of the Caruntes, as being the Center and middle of Gaule, where the Druides of all the Countries of Gaule (euen as of all the world) were wont to meete together. Neuertheleſſe, the Cittie of the Caruntes, named Chartres, was (in thoſe ancient times) of much larger extendure, then now it is; and it is very likely, that it contained not onely the Chartrain Dioceſſe, but that alſo of Orleance. For before that Cæſar arriued there, it was a Realm, which afterward was put by Cæſar into the power of Taſgetius the Carunt, as himſelfe hath written in his 5. booke.

The geuerall meeting of all the Druydes of Gaul together.

Iul. Cæſ. in Comment. lib. 5.

In breefe; it ſeemeth that the Realme of Orleance, which afterwards was a long time maintained to bee a Realme by the Franconians, was the very ſame of Chartres: Conſidering withall, that Genabum or Genaba, was one of the Townes in the Caruntes Kingdome, and ſeated vpon the Riuer of Loire, beeing in the time of Cæſar beyond Orleance, a farre off by a great many Miles, and which hindered him in his way, when hee went from [a] Agendicum to [b] Gergobia. But thoſe Druydes aſſembled themſelues together in that place from all partes, as in the Center of Gaule, according as Cæſar hath ſpoken. I ſay then, that in all Gaule, and in the Citties, Townes, and Villages of Gaule, there were Druydes, who gouerned in ſuites and Controuerſies, and likewiſe in the Ceremonies of Religion: In breefe, the care of all things was committed to them. The Druydes were then diſperſed thoroughout Gaule, as now adayes are the the men of the Church: notwithstanding the Princes were wont to refer to a common Councell (at certaine times of the yeare) all the suites of their Citizens and subiects, wherein the chiefe Priest of the Druydes gouerned onely.

A common Councell, or generall meeting for all suites.

Such (in elder times) was the Councel of the* Amphictiones, which during the liberty of Greece was kept in Delphos (as Pausanias reporteth in his Phociques) & in the middest of Greece. Whereby appeareth, that the Druydes of the Gaules, were like to the Amphyctions of Greece, & their place as sacred in the Chartraine Countrey, answerable to the Temple of Delphos, made so famous by the Oracles of Apollo. The matter would haue beene a little the more noble, if Cæsar had called the place Delphos, which was consecrated within the limites of the Countrie of Chartres. Heerein is shewen the authority, and (almost) royall power, which the Druydes not onely held in priuate and particular, but intirely ouer all the people. The profession of Disciplines was in great reputation; the estate of iudgment a most famous authority; the power to performe sacrifices, and to speake of Diuination, appertained vnto royall Maiestie.

The royal power and authoritie of the Gaules Druydes.

The first degree of the Gaulish Commonwealth, was that of the supreme Magistrate; next, the Princes; then, the Cheualiers; the people made election according to his aduice, and for his benefit and the commodity in generall, the Princes gaue him order how to make his warres; and such as did not well by their instruction, they would expulse and banish thē. But you may demand of me, how this is to be proued? I will answer from Cæsar, who speaketh thus in his sixt Booke. In Gaule (saith he) there are certaine factions, not onely in all Cities, Burroughes, and quarters, but also in euery particular Houshold, & the Princes or Heads of such Factions, are they whom they conceiue (in their iudgment) to be the worthiest persons for authoritie: by whose aduice and determination, the verie greatest matters of waight or importance, either for publique affayres or Councell, are wholly disposed. Vpon which occasion it seemeth, that this matter hath bin thus ordered from reuerend Antiquity, that none of the meanest should be destitute of helpe, against a rich or potent superior. For there is no man, that will indure or suffer, that such as appertaine or depend vpon him, shall any way be oppressed or circumuented: for if he offered to do otherwise, hee shall not beare any sway among the people.

The order & degree of the Gauls Commonwealth.

Iul. Cæsar in Com. lib. 6. Particular factions throughout Gaule, in euery City, Towne, and Village.

Thus you heare what Cæsar saith, whereby may be vnderstood, the Timocraticall gouernment of a Commonwealth, which Plato and Aristotle so much commended, and which Greece (being in her libertie, and Italy also) did keepe so carefully: wherein, all the kinds of a iust and equitable policy are comprehended. Note the selfesame reason, in the whole charge of the affaires of Gaule; for there was royalty in the annuall Magistrate, whereas Aristocratie was discerned in the Senate, and briefly, Timocratie in the plaine power & authority of the people, by whom the Senators and Magistrates were created. And therefore let vs goe somewhat neerer, and examine the testimonie of Cæsar a little more narrowly, speaking of the Common-wealth of our Ancestors.

The Timocraticall gouernment of a Common wealth allowed by Plato & Aristotle.

Cæsar in comment lib. 6.

Such was the freedom and liberty of Gaul (saith Cæsar) that in euery City, Towne, and Burrough, and almost in euery house, there were certaine factions, and it was in such sort, that euery one was permitted to deale closely and vnderhand, by voices and suffrages: so that the very meanest and simplest, had power to giue their sentence, and deliuer their voyces. Heere then we are to vnderstand, that the Electors of the Magistrats amongst the Gaules, were such kinde of men. And heereby wee plainly perceiue, that the authority of the people was not small in their Commonwealth: in regard that by voices and suffrages of the people, the Magistrates were then created. But what was hee that had the power to make election of these men? He that was reputed to be in the greatest authority, & beside, all the affayres of consequence, and the whole deliberation of the Councell came onely to him. But why was it requisite, that so much authority should be in one Magistrate? Cæsar himselfe makes answer vnto this Obiection. Because (vppon this occasion) it seemed that Antiquity (venerably) had so instituted it: to the end, that no man among the people (how meane or poore soeuer) should stand in neede of ayde against the richest oppressor. For he might not indure that any of his faction should be oppressed or circumuented. This then was the end of the Authority of the people amongst the Gauls in creation of their Magistrates.

the Magistrate, and the reason why the people said; We will not haue this man, except by his vertue, and by his authority, he do defend that no man offer vs iniury. We will not haue this man, because he is both bad and ignorant.

The punnishment of one that beginneth well, and neglecteth his care of the weal-publike.

But if a good Prince, who (at the beginning) hath made proofe of his vertue, happened afterwards to change his manners; and, as one that hath no longer care of the weale-publike, proposeth his owne particular profit before the publike, and carry himselfe otherwise then the Ordinances of the people haue commanded: he is excluded and banished, and (as Cæsar saith) Depriued of all power and authority among his owne people. And to the end that this might not be imagined to be obserued in some one Citty only, The selfe-same course (saith Cæsar) is kept thorough-out all Gaule. Heerein then may be noted, the politicall authority of the people, when Magistrates are not onely chosen by the people, but also deposed & expulsed. But Cæsar saith nothing, whether this principality was constituted in the authority of many, or of one onely, neither for how long time it continued. Neuertheless, Strabo (in his fourth book) defineth both the one and the other, saying: There were many kinds of Aristocratical policy, in ancient times they elected euery yeare a Prince, as the people elected a Chiefe or Commander for the warre. Thus wee see, what Strabo saith: but a matter so goodly and commendable, should bee enriched with some examples.

The politicall authoritie of the people.

Strabo in lib 4. cap. 7.

Cicero hath so highly extolled the commonwealth of the Massylians, that before the people of Rome, in the defence of Fonteius, hee sayde: That the Discipline and grauity of the Citty of * Marsiles, deserued not onely to bee preferred equall to Greece, but almost with all other Nations of the world. In that Citty (sayth Strabo) there were sixe hundred Senators, whome they tearmed Timouches, as men honourable, and who (all theyr life time) enioyed that honour: from foorth of which number, were elected and chosen fifteene Princes, to iudge such suits & causes, as happened day by day amongst them. And questionlesse, these were the sixe hundred Marsilians, and the fifteene cheefest men among them, whereof Cæsar speaketh in his first booke. But let vs go on with the words of Strabo. Out of these fifteene (saith hee) they elected three, which had the most authority and power. In this manner Strabo describeth the Common-wealth of the Massilians, which neuertheles I alledge not as a name of Gaule onely, because it was better beloued and esteemed to be Greekish, rather thē Gaulish: but also, because none of those Timouches was to bee elected, that had not bin a childe borne there, and had not bene a Cittizen, euen to the third race or descent, as the same Strabo saith. Vpon this occasion, Aristotle (and very desertfully) calleth the Common-wealth of the Massilians Oligarchia, and not Aristocratia: for this declareth her Oligarchie, that Princes were not elected by their vertue, but in regard of their race.

I doe not alledge (I say) this Commonwealth, as an example of the Gaules Common-wealth: I desire to deliuer their owne true estates indeed, and those that truely were of Gaule, and first of all in generall of all Gaule; next, of the Nations, and then particularly of euery Cittie. The seauenth Booke of Iulius Cæsar, shall serue as a sufficient Testimonie in my common example, wherein Gaule is intirely described, both in orders, and all reuennewes: albeit in the seauenth yeare of the warres in Gaule, great store of the afflicted Townes and Citties, had diminished much of their reuennues. First (by a Common Councell) Vercingetorix was elected for cheefe Commaunder, as Cæsar himselfe saieth, when the Heduans fought, that the Empire might bee giuen to them, as the matter came then in controuersie. The whole Councell of Gaul (saith hee) was called at [a] Bibracte or Beaulne, where arriued a great number of men, and the Election was appointed to the most voyces: but by generall consent it was concluded that Vercingetorix should be Emperor, & the chiefe Leader of their Armies. Onely Cæsar saieth, that the men of Rhems, [b] the [c] Lingones, and the [d] Treuiraines, were not present at this Councell: but hee maketh no mention at all of the Aquitaines.

In the time of the warre in Gaul, it neuer hapned, that the Celts kept the like ceremony of Councell: for the greater part of them wer aſſociated with the Romaines, either by amity or alliance, or by what kind of dutie elſe, I know not. Notwithſtanding, in the war of the [c] Venetes, a coniuration was made of the Armorican Citties, the [d] Venetes, the [e] Oſiſines, the [f] Lexobians, the [g] Nannets or Nannetians; the [h] Diablinters, the [i] Curioſolites, the [k] Vuellians, the Ambiliates, and the Eburones. Suddenly were Ambaſſadorus ſent (ſaieth Iulius Cæſar in his third booke) and by aduice of their Princes & Noblemen, they conferred together, to do nothing without Councell, and to abide ſuch diſaſters as Fortune ſhould ſend vnto them, Solliciting the reſt of the Cities, to chooſe rather to continue in the liberty which they had receyued from their Anceſtors, then to endure the ſeruitude of the Romaines. Neuertheleſſe, the cheefe Head or Commander of all the Army, is not named by Cæſar in any part whatſoeuer. And yet in the publike councell of the Belgians (whereby was plainely and openly determined againſt Cæſar, the intire liberty of all Gallia:) the maine and eminent charge of the affaires (by the wil and conſent of all men) was put on Galba King of the [k] Sweſſiones, as well in regard of his owne good deſeruing, as for his wiſedom and prouidence.

The Celts did differ from the Gaules in the ceremony of Councell.

In this warre at that time, the [l] Bellouacanes contributed to the number of three ſcore thouſand armed men; the Sweſſions fifty thouſand; as many the Neruians, the Atrebatians fifteene; the Ambians ten; the Morines fiue and twenty; the [m] Menapians ſeuen; the Caletines ten; the Velocaſſians & Veromanduans as many; the Aduaticians nineteene; the Condruſians, Eburones, Cereſians, Pemanians (which al by one name are called Germanes) forty thouſand. Such a coniuration alſo was amongſt the Aquitaines, of whom Cæſar writeth thus. Then the Aquitaines began to ſend foorth Ambaſſadors, and to enterchange Hoſtages, to muſter men of warre, and to craue ayde of the [n] Cantabrians *their Neighbors: as alſo to elect for their Captaines, certain men that had ſerued (all their time) with Q. CHAP. XVII.

Of the forme of Gouernment obſerued in the Common-wealths of the ſeuerall Cities and Nations: and what their Rulers and Magiſtrates were: as alſo how they attayned to their authority.

The particular gouernement in euery Common-wealth of the Nations.

LET vs now particularly illuſtrate the Gouernments in the Commonwealths of the Nations and Cities of the people. And firſt of all, let vs ſpeake of the Celts, among whome the Heluetians haue beene reputed to be the moſt braue and valiant Nation. What adminiſtration & gouernment of Commonwealth hath beene obſerued in their cheefeſt City? The City of the Heluetians was ſituated betweene Rhein & Rhone, as alſo the Mountaine Iura, in a triangular forme or ſhape, hauing twelue towns, and foure hundred Villages, & the whole diuided into foure Regions: yet not for warre onely, but likewiſe for Iuſtice, and for doing right to all men. There were two, named by Cæſar himſelfe, * Tigurine and Verbigenia. Theſe Regions were as one Parliament, that had the whol charge of the affairs of the Realme, and for matters of conſequence, were wont to come into a publike Councell; where for the Election of a Prince, hapned a coniuration amongſt them of the Citie, to burne all their Townes, Burroughes, and Villages, to forſake their own limites, and by force to ſeize and ſurprize the kingdome of the Gaules.

The ſituation of the Heluetians in theyr Cities, townes and villages.

*The Canton of Zurich.

Orgetorix cheefe in the conſpiracie againſt the Heluetians, which hapned to be reuealed, and hee impriſoned.

For the better execution of this enterprize, Orgetorix, one of the moſt apparant and Noblemen was made choiſe of; and this act declared at the firſt, euen a meere and certaine Timocraticall affliction. Orgetorix ouercome with a couetous affection of Soueraignty and reigning, imbraced this Conſpiracy: but the iſſue requireth obſeruation, after the matter came to be diſcouered. This happening to the knowledge of the Heluetians, by ſome preſumptions and coniectures; Orgetorix was taken priſoner, and they would haue compelled him (according to their manner) to confeſſe the truth: which if it fell out to be approued, their Law condemned him to be burned with fire. Orgetorix ſummoned to this Seſsions al his friends, kindred, and alliance, who were in number ten thouſand men, together with his ſeruants and debters, who were a great company, that they might aſsiſt in the caſe of iudgement. Hee preuayled ſo well by this multitude of men, that hee freed himſelfe from anſwering to his enditement, or diſcloſing vppon what occaſion hee was incited to this matter of conſpiracy.

Orgetorix ſupporteth his bad cauſe by power.

In the meane ſpace, while the Cittie (being offended) ſought to maintain the execution of their Lawes by the ſword, & the Magiſtrates muſtered men from all parts: Orgetorix dyed in priſon, not without ſuſpition (as the Heluetians imagined) of murthering himſelfe. Kingdomes (ſaith Cæſar) were bought in Gaul, by ſuch as were moſt potent and abounding in riches, and ſuch as had the meanes to command moſt men at their pay. But what theſe kingdoms were, is eaſily to be coniectured, by the example of Orgetorix, and by others beſide, whereof we are to ſpeake hereafter. The Commonwealth then of the Heluetians, was parted in this manner by Regions, as at this day that of the Switzers is, who vſurp and make vſe of the borders of the Heluetians. Next, there were three great Cities of the Heduans and * Aruernians; let vs now ſurney theſe Commonwealths, and firſt that of the Heduanes, who were the very braueſt and moſt valiant people, when Cæſar made his warre in Gaule. Let vs make a good obſeruation of this Common-wealth, and how (in three kindes of a iuſt and commendable gouernment) it was iudicially ordered & maintained.

Orgetorix thoght by the Heluetians to kil himſelfe in priſon. Iul. Cæſ. in com. lib. 1.

By a yearly election of Prieſts, in a certaine place, at a certaine time, & of diuers deſcents, amongſt the Heduanes was choſen one called a Vergobret, who had full power, as a King, and abſolute authoritie of life and death; but he was not permitted to go forth of their iuriſdictions. Cæſar in his firſt booke, making mention of the Heduanes, ſpeaketh in this maner. After he had ſummoned together the chiefe Noblemen and Princes in his Campe; amongſt whom were Diuitiacus and Liſcus, who at that that time was the cheefe Magistrate, and by the Heduanes called Vergobret, created yeare by yeare, & hauing power of life and death.

The Heduans in sedition about theyr Magistrate Iul. Cæs. in comment. Lib. 7.

The rest is reported in the seauenth Booke, where is declared how the Senate and people of the Heduanes, were in a great sedition about their Magistrate, for the appeasing whereof, Cæsar was called: these are his own words. The Princes Ambassadors of the Heduanes, came to Cæsar & intreated him, that he would come to succour their Citie, especially in a time of such necessity, when their Common-wealth was in great danger. For whereas (in former time) they were wont to haue but one Magistrate yearely, who had authority Royall: now there were two that bare that Office, yet both making their vaunt, to bee created by order of Law. One of them was called Conuictolitane, a man in the floure of his youth, of great power, and well allyed: the other named himselfe Cottus, of a most ancient race, and one that was able to doe much: whose brother, named Valetiacus, had borne the same Office the yeare before. Moreouer they sayd, that all the Citty was vp in Armes, that the Senate and the people were diuided, each holding apart their seuerall factions: And if this mutinie should bee suffered for any long time among them, and no other means of help were affoorded, they would make prize and bootie of one another, and all must goe to generall ruine.

Two Magistrates instead of one, Conuictolitane & Cottus.

Great dagers grow out of particular variances.

Cæsar, though he knew it to be a dangerous matter, to forbeare his wars, and depart from his enemy: yet, in regard he was not ignorant what great inconueniences do grow out of such dissentions; and fearing withall, that such a Cittie, so well allyed to the Romane people, which he had alwayes maintained, and furnished with all things he could deuise; least also the part that was most distrustfull of him, should send for ayde to King Vercingetorix, he resolued to go thither, & preuent the perill betimes. And because, by the Lawes of the Heduanes, the cheefe Magistrate might not absent himself out of the countrey, as doubting thereby, that hee should diminish any part of their right & Lawes; hee went himselfe in person vnto them, and called before him al the Senat, and they also among whom the strife had happened. When the whole Cittie was (wel-neere) assembled together, and hee was fully informed, that by the consent of a few, priuily congregated together in an vnmeete place, and at an vnlawfull time; vnderstanding withal, that one brother had subrogated the other in his place, contrary to the lawes, which plainly did prohibite, that two of one Linage and family (being both liuing) should not onely bee disabled from creation in the Magistracie, but also not admitted into the Senat: Cottus was compelled to giue ouer his Office, and Conuictolitane (who according to the custome of the City, vpon the ceasing of the former Magistrats, had bene created by the Priestes) had the full authority appointed to him. Cæsar wrote all this himself, about the commotion of the Heduanes, whereby most clearly appeareth: that the royall dignitie was in the Vergobret, and the authority of the Seigneurie in the Senate; and finally, the Democraticall power in all the people.

Cæsars sentence concerning this important difference.

But to know what, and how noble this City vvas, vve need no more then to look vpon so many Towns, as were in the protection of the Heduanes, whereof Cæsar speaketh in his Commentaries. Among them of greatest note in this Common-wealth, is Bibract named, whereunto Cæsar (as he writeth in his first booke) meant to go (as to the principal place of the Heduane Nation) to haue Corne of the Heduanes. And to this place (as it is recorded in his seauenth booke) Litauicus had withdrawne himselfe, because this vvas a Citie highly authorized among the Heduanes; and there the Magistrat Conuictolitane, with a great part of the Senat came vnto him. Thither also were all the hostages of Gaule brought, when Cæsars Guards vvere slaine at Noniodunum. And there likewise vvas assigned the Councel of all Gaule, against Cæsar: and thither also (finally) Cæsar, after that he had recouered the Heduanes, betooke himselfe to winter for that season. This Citty (I say) was the very principal of the Heduanes, & (as the ambassador said in the Panegyrick of Constantine) it vvas after called Iulia, Polia, Florencia, Flauia. Moreouer (in his 7. book) [a] Cabillone, & [b] Matiscon on [c] Arar, are named among the Heduanes, and Nauiodunū on [d] Ligere. These that I haue named vvere their Tributaries, but their honors were the greatest in all Gaul. For the Biturigias, vvhere in elder times vvere the ancient Kings of the Gaules; the Senones, and (by the ſame meanes) the Pariſians (who were in the protection of the Senones) and the* Bellouacanes, are called by Cæſar their Clients, as being vnder their protection. So then, the City and Commonwealth of the Heduanes, had the moſt abſolute authority in all Gaule anciently: according as hee hath written in his ſixt Booke, but as wee may ſooner ſee in his firſt booke; at all times it had the principality throughout Gaule, eſpecially before it had aſpired to the friendſhip of the Romane people. But after that the Heduanes were called Coſins and Brothers to the Romaines: what decrees of the Senate, how many times, and in what honourable manner were they pronounced on their behalfe? VVe ſee then, that ſuch and ſo great a City of Celtick Gaul, hath had this Democraticall Common-wealth, and Pliny numbers it not among the Tributaries, but among the Cities allyed together.

The Commonwealth of the Aruernians, and the extendure thereof.

Now, concerning the commonwealth of the Aruernians, it was ſometime the cheefeſt of Gaule; for (anciently) there were two leagues throughout Gaule, as we reade in the firſt booke: the Heduanes were the ring-leaders of the one, and the Aruernians of the other. And Strabo hath related in his 4. booke, that that of the Aruernians, was more potent thē the other; extending their Seigneury ſo farre as the confines of the Narbonians and Maſſilians to the Pyrenean Mountaines, to the Ocean, and to the Rheine. In like manner he ſpeaketh faithfully, concerning two cruell battailes of the Gaules, giuen vnder the conduct of Bituitus the Aruernian: and Strabo reporteth them in the ſame place, & Titus Liuius in his 61. booke. The one was againſt Domitius, at the confluent of Sulgo and of Rhone; and the other againſt Fabius at Tiſara & the ſame Rhone: whereby we may plainly perceiue, that ther was the ſame forme of Common-wealth, as formerly we haue ſpoken of.

Titus Liuius in lib. 61. cap. 10.

For the Romane Senate, as it is in the firſt booke, being willing that the vanquiſhed Gauls, or repulſed (at leaſt) from the confines of the Roman Prouince, ſhould continue in their franchiſes and liberties: nay, which is more, to the end that Gaule might remaine in the greater libertie; ordained, that Bituitus himſelfe (King of the Aruernians, according as Titus Liuius ter-meth him in his 61. book) who was gone to Rome to purge himſelfe, ſhold be kept in guard within Alba: but Congentiatus his ſon was taken and brought to Rome. Afterward, Celtilus the Father of Vercingetorix, although he had held the principall place of all Gaule in a warre, yet notwithſtanding, becauſe hee pretended to make himſelfe King, as it is the 7. booke, the City put him to death. Vercingetorix, by the meanes of his own people, was ſaluted as King of the Aruernians, and likewiſe it is ſaid in the ſame book, that all the Gaules called him King: neuertheles, vpon the ſame occaſion hee was charged with treaſon, and hee came in iudgement before them as ſoueraigne Iudges, and in the end, couetouſnes in deſire of rule, proued alike to the father and ſon.

Bituitus & his ſon Congentiatus ſent to Rome to the Senate.

Vercingetorix and his father both put to death.

Thus the Kings were excluded out of the Commonwealth of the Aruernians, & they remained at liberty, euen to the time of Cæſar. And Pliny (in his time) remembreth it amongſt the Cities of the Celtes, which were at freedom: and then it had no leſſe protection, then they of the Heduans as is already made manifeſt by the numbring of military forces formerly declared. The city then of the Aruernians hath anciently bin the Lady ouer that of the Heduanes, and after that, the Heduanes affected rather to bee brethren and coſines of the Romanes, then of the Aruernians: they became like vnto them in habits and manners. And when at the laſt comming of Cæſar, the Heduanes were ouercome & ſpoiled by the Germaines, yet were they then far greater in forces. Finally, when (by the courteſie and fauor of Cæſar) the Heduans were not only replanted in their former condition, but it plainly appeared that they had more countenance and authority, then euer before: yet the other were equall to them, and alike in wealthie poſſeſſions. But in fauour and eſteem thoroughout all Gaul, they were much greater, as the election of Vercingetorix hath ſufficiently ſhewne. VVherefore we may perceiue, that the liberty of a Commonwelth remained in theſe two cities of Celtike Gaul. For the remainder of the other that were of meaner ranke, hee ſpeaketh not ſo much as of any one King, or of a Prince: but only we heare no other name, then of the people, and of the City.

The city of the* Senons, was accounted among among the principals, and of great authority among the Celts. Of some store of Towns that were vnder it, Cæsar hath named two, Agendecum & * Vellaunodunum. Cæsar wrought by certaine meanes, that Cauarinus was their King; because Moritasgus, brother to Cauarinus and his ancestors, had held the same authority in that realme; for Cæsar had vndertaken this colour, only to establish a kingdome there. Neuertheless, the Senones, although Cæsar was present, essayed by a counc l publike, to put Cauarinus to death. And as he (hauing intelligence thereof) fled away, they pursued him so far as the Frontiers, expelling him from his house & kingdom The commonwealth of the Parisians was the like, by that which we reade in his 7. Booke. For the Parisians, by a Common Councell of diuers Cities, vndertooke warre for the liberty of their country, electing Camulogenus to bee their commander, by reason of the experience he had in actions of Armes, and the good will they bare vnto him.

Carnutum also was a great City, as already hath bin shewn, & Cæsar wrought the like meanes to establish a kingdome there. Among the Carnutes there was one Tasgettus, a mã descended of a great place and whose Ancestors had held dominion in that City. Cæsar (as he saith himself) in regard of his vertue, and for the good wil he had found in him, because he had bene a great helpe to him in all the wars, planted him in the same place which his Ancestors had held. He had reigned but 4. yeeres, when his enemies being authorized by many men of the city, openly slew him. These Cities then had their Bruti, as well as Rome. So Cæsar named the Senate of the Eburones, Lexobians, and Venetes. At the same time, Teutomatus vvas king of the* Nitiobrigians, but by a publike Councel of Gaul, hee yeelded obedience against Cæsar. This may serue as sufficient, concerning the gouernment of the Celts Cities.

What then is to be said of the Citties of the Belgians? By what manner of Empire were they particularly gouern'd? The extendure of the men of Rhemes was very great: because it ioyned with the Sequans, Mediomatrices, Treuirians, Veromanduans, and the Swessiones. Notwithstanding, in all these parts, he nameth but two towns or Cities, [c] Durocottorum and Bibrax. In the sixt Booke, the councell of Gaule was assigned at Durocottorum; and in the second booke Bibrax was besiedged. Concerning the men of Rhemes, in the time of Cæsar, they hadde the managing of the Gauls, and held the second place in dignity, next to the Heduanes. Cæsar nameth their Senate, and the Prince and Prouost of the city; as that Vertiscus, whereof wee haue already spoken.

In the time of Cæsar, the Swessiones had Diuitiacus as their king, who was the most powerfull man in all Gaul, and who opened a great part on this side of the country which he helde, holding also the Empire of Great Bretaigne. After Galba (of whom he hath spoken) he succeeded. But vve may vvell perceiue hereby, what maner of kingdome this was: in regard that the Swessions (who vvere brothers & cousines to the men of Rhemes) vsed the same course of authority, and the same lawes, hauing one and the same Gouernement, and one Magistrate, as they had. For such are the vvords of Cæsar himself, by vvhom one only Magistrate vvas allowed in their cities. But yet notwithstanding, the Swessiones, although they were brethren; yet they had a field (apart) of great largenesse, and very fertile, and twelue towns, vvher- of Cæsar nameth onely one, vvhich is Noviodunum, and vvhich Cæsar (after the Belgians vvere retired to him) passing thorough the countrey, essayed to surprize. But hee could not compasse it, by reason of the deepnesse of the ditch, and heighth of the wall: and yet there vvere but verie few people to defend it.

We come now to the Bellouacanse, what kind of commonwealth vvas kept among them? These men vvere highly esteemed vvith the Belgians, for their vertue, authority & number of people. For their extendure vvas from the limits of the Swessions, & also frõ the Normans, so termed at this day (euen there vvhere the riuer of [b] Seine, throvves it selfe into the sea) so far as Calete, knovvn by the name of Callice. Cæsar nameth Bratuspantium, a city of the Bellouacanes. But by vvhat forme of common- vvealth did they gouern their city? They chose their Princes, as (among other) Corbus, vvho though his Army had bin defeated; yet vvould he neuer for any discomfort hapning, or posible to befal hm; nei-

But now concerning the moſt potent Cittie of the * Neruians, after what manner of order wer they gouerned? Theſe are the very words of Cæſar. But the Grudians & Leuakes were enskirted with Louane, in the Countrey of Brabant; and the Gordunes (as much to ſay as the men of Gaunt) were in the Mediterrane countrey of Flanders. This ſo great Commonwealth of the Neruians, and which was of ſuch large extendure, elected a Prince, ſuch as Boduognatus was in the firſt warre ōf the Neruians. It had alſo a very great Senat, for Cæſar reckoneth vp ſixe hundred Senators of the Neruians. *The people of Tirwin in Belgica, or (as Ioſephus Molet ſayth) the Flemings.

The commonwealth of the Morines was anſwerable to that of the Heluetians, althogh it was diuided by diuers villages, & had extendure farre off ftom them: as to Callis, and all along the coaſt of Piccardie and Flanders, in the Forreſts & mariſhes; euen ſo far as the * Menapians, who dwell vppon the confluent of Rheine, as alſo of the Meuze or Maze, and who were their neighbors, as is to be ſeene in the Teuctbers war, in the 4. booke. But the Treuirians, as well for a kinde of gouernement, (wherein they were very skilfull) as alſo for the occaſion of tumult and ſedition, very frequent among them; reſembled in quality the Heduans. Cingetorix and Indiciomarus quarrelled for the principalitie, euen euen as did y other two, Conuictolitane & Cottus, but Cæsar seated again Cingetorix as he had done Conuictolitane. Thus the gouernment of the Belgian Cities, were mingled with three formes of estates.

The* Santone Aquitaines seemed to bee gouerned by such a kind of cõmonwealth. For that City, when she made proofe of her own vertue, by fighting both on foot and horseback, and well to sustaine all assaults in her own defence: she rendred hir necke to such authority. But Adcantuanus their Prince (of his owne power) stept in to do his duty, and sallied forth with 600 Soldures, or Soldurij. Wherefore I think that the gouernment of the Gauls Commonweales, hath bin already sufficiently explicated, and by so many examples, as we may well conclude, that the principalities of the Gaules (according to Cæsar) were such, as wold not suffer that the subiects should be oppressed or circumuented; but if any Prince did otherwise, hee helde no authority amongst his subiects. VVe haue spoken then enough of the gouernment and authority obserued among the ancient Gaules.

Let vs now listen vnto the Commonwealth of Great Britaine, and that likewise of the Germains. There is mention made in the fourth Book, concerning the Princes of the Britains, with their conferences and consultations held among thẽselues, for the common good of Great Britaine. And in the fift booke, the common councell is obserued by Cæsar; and that the whole charge and command of warre against Cæsar, was put into the power of Cassibelane, and the diuersity of Kinges which were subiect vnto that common Councell, doe sufficiently declare, that Great Britaine vsed the same kinde of gouernment that Gaule did. Cæsar also deliuereth (almost) the very same gouernement of the Germaines. When a Commonwealth (sayth he) either endured warre made vpon it, or attempted any, Magistrates were elected to vndertake the charge of the warre, and they might also take or saue life. In times of peace, there was no common Magistrate, but the Lordes of the Countries, and of the Burroughes, who exercised law to their vassals, and appeased all their contentions.

In the time of Tacitus, Germany had some Kings: but they were such as had more honor then power; in other matters they were like to the Gauls manners. They made Kings (saith he) for their Nobility, and Captaines for their vertue. Nor had those Kings any vndefined or free power, & the Captaines were obeyed more by example, then by command: either, whether they were deliberated; in fight, or doing their deuoyre vpon the point, making wonderfull proofe of their proweſſe. As concerning the Captaines or Princes (as the same Author relateth) & likewise for them, termed companions of the Princes, thus it followeth.

The Princes also they elect in the publike Councels, which doe hold the iurisdiction of Burroughes and villages. Euery man hath an hundred Companions, who are of the popularity, and doe giue assistance vnto them in Councell together, and also in their Authority. A Noble or generous stock of fame, whose high deserts of theyr Fore-fathers, doe challenge to haue the dignity of a Prince, amongst the younger sort of people: They are accompanied with other of more robust complexion; and such as haue had (long time) good proofe made of them: and yet they bluſh not a iotte, to bee seene amongest such Companions, albeit there are some degrees in this companie, according to his iudgement whom they follow. VVhy then I may safely say of the Germaines (according to Tacitus) that their Magistrates haue bin answerable to their Kings, Captaines, or Princes, and likewise to them called the Companions of Princes.

I come againe vnto the Knights of the Gaules, which (in the times of warre) haue the managing of the affayres. And these Knights (thus saith Cæsar in his fift book) when there is neede, and any warre hapneth: they are all employed, and according as each man hath authority and meanes, so hath hee most seruants and clyents about him, & this is the onely fauour and power that they doe know. Heerein is continued the ancient Gaules manner, for election of Magistrates, and we may learne by a new argument: that the Gaules Princes were chosen for their Vertues, and for their deserts towards the Common-wealth, and that this eminencie came from Vertue onely. For euery Prince would not suffer his subiects to bee oppressed, nor deceyued (so hath Iulius Cæsar formerly said) but if hee should do otherwise, he must beare no authority among his people. And hereto doth this

*The people of Santone in Aquitaine.

*Soldurij (as Cæsar sayth) were in the Gauliſh Language, such kinde of men, as destinied & vowed themselues to the amity of any, to take part in all their good or bad Fortunes.

Great Britain had the same gouernement as Gaule, and the Germains very little differing.

Corn. Tacitus in lib. 4. cap: 7.

Concerning Kings & Captaines among the Germans, and the Companions of Princes.

The election of their Princes.

The stronger ought alwaies to helpe the weaker.

Iul. Cæsar in Com. lib. 6. The knightes of the Gaules The words of Cæsar himself iuſtly make anſwer: That this is the onely fauour and power which the Knightes knowe, if according as they haue moſt meanes and authoritie, ſo they ſhall haue the more ſeruants, and the more Clients about them.

The differēce betweene ſeruants and clients.

By ſeruants or vaſſailes, are meant ſuch as ſtand obliged or indebted (of whom I haue formerly ſpoken) and who, vppon that occaſion are dedicated to the ſeruice of thoſe Knights: for, theſe vaſſals ſerue as Waggoners to their Maſters, and carry their ſhields. And the Clients (as it is in the ſeauenth Booke) neuer dare, euen in the extreamity of all misfortune, forſake or leaue their Lords. Thus then the vaſſals or ſeruants, do accompanie theyr Knights and Maſters in warre, and the Clients doe attend on their Lords, and theſe are the companions of the Germans, whereof Tacitus ſpeaketh, as already hath bene ſaide.

Strife for popularitie, and eminency in the Princes fauour.

There is great iealouſie amongſt theſe companions, who ſhall haue the cheefeſt place about his Prince: and amongſt the Princes, who ſhalbe followed by the moſt and beſt companions or attendants. It is held a high dignity, to bee dayly rounded with a great troope of young and choyſe men: it is an honour in time of peace, & ſecurity in time of warre. This honor, and this glorie is not onely in euerie Nation, but euen in the neighbouring Cities, coueting as much to be accompanied with ſuch a company of men, as with ſo manie vertues. Whereof practiſe is made by Ambaſſages, and plenty of preſents ſent; nay, oftentimes, they will vndertake Armes, for the bare name to be termed a ſouldier. When a man is in the fight, it is ſhame to a Prince to be ſurmounted in vertue: and it is a more ſhame to his follower, if he doe not equall the Vertue of his Prince. It is a moſt infamous & ſhame full thing, and not to be waſhed off in a mans whole life time, to return from the battell, his Prince being there ſlaine. The principall Oath that he takes, is to defend and ſuſtaine him, and if he doe any braue or worthy acte in his owne perſon, to referre it to his Princes glory onely. Princes fight for victory, companions and followers fight for their Prince. Tacitus writeth: The Prince recompenceth ſuch as follow him: for they receiue (ſaith he) from the Princes liberality: this Horſe of ſeruice, that victorious and bloudied Sword: for ſuch Bankets, although they are not properly ſerued, yet are they ſumptuous to them, & men are well contented with ſuch wages.

Princes and their followers ſhould be alike in theyr vertues.

Corn. Tacit. in l. 5. c. 11.

Recompences to the Gaules Knightes for their ſeruices.

But can you tell me, what were the recompences of the Knights amongeſt the Gauls, and who managed this other part of their Common-wealth? As for the recompence of the Druydes, it hath bin ſpoken of already; which was honor, the greateſt payment that could be, and only proper to vertue. Neuertheleſſe, the Common-wealth it ſelfe could not be ingratefull towards them in recompences: conſidering that there were Impoſts & Tolles, which appertained to each Cittie, as is to be ſeene in the firſt Book, and their greatneſſe of Tribute, in the ſixt Booke. Tacitus hath declared among the Germaines, what worthy recompences were performed to Princes. Cities had a cuſtome, to collect (with their owne good liking) by the poll or head, either of their cattle, or of their fruites, to giue to their Princes: which being receiued as an honor, ſerued alſo to ſupply neceſsity. Aboue all, they tooke delight in preſents giuen by theyr neighbouring Nations, not onely by particular perſons, but in generall: as of choiſe Horſes, faire Armours, trappings for ſeruice, and alſo of Chaines. And ſince then they haue taught vs to accept of mony.

Recompences to Princes amongſt the Germaines.

But let vs purſue other manners of the Gaules Common-wealth. Cæſar doth often accuſe the infirmity of the Gauls, becauſe in aduice they were ſodain and mutable: but eſpecially in this place of his 4. Booke. There is a common cuſtome (ſayth he) amongſt them, to compell paſſengers or way-faring men, to ſtay whether they will or no, and to enquire of them, what each man hath heard, or knoweth of euery matter what ſoeuer. The popular and common people, they flocke about Merchants in the Citie, and conſtrain them to tell, out of what countries they come, and what things they knowe, or haue heard of there. The ancient Gauls, had not onely this wonderful deſire, to know matters of nouelty: but beſides, that they ſhould be imparted, and made knowne to them and theirs.

Cæſar his blaming the Gaules for their variablenes & raſhneſſe. Iul. Cæſar in Com. lib. 4.

I will ſet downe two examples of ſome admiration, the firſt is in the fift booke, of the victorie which Iulius Cæſar had againſt the Neruians. During the bruite of Cæſars victory (this he writes himſelfe) the Cæsars victory of the Neruians. Iul. Cæs. in com lib. 5.

the men of Rhemes (with incredible ſwiftneſſe) carried tidings thereof to Labienus, inſomuch, that whereas he was about threeſcore miles from the Garriſon of Cicero, and that Cæſar came thether after the ninth hour of the day: yet notwithſtanding, there aroſe ſuch a cry or noiſe before the gates of the Campe, and before it was midnight; that the men of Rhemes (onely thereby) gaue vnderſtanding to Labienus of the victory, & made a ſigne of their reioycing with him. But the other is an eſpeciall, and moſt notable cry or noiſe, when the Romanes were ouerthrowne at Genabum before Sun-ſetting: yet before the firſt watch was ſet, the cry was heard to the Aruernians, the noiſe running through all the Townes of Gaul, as Cæſar affirmeth in his ſeuenth Booke. For ſo ſoone as any important matter happened, by a cry they made it knowne in the fields, and ſo along thorough the Countries, and ſtill as it was heard, others ſent it in like manner to their neighbours, and according as it came to them. And that which had bene done at Genabum before Sun-ſetting, was knowne in the confines of Aruerne before the firſt watch, & yet the diſtance was aboue an hundred & ſixty miles. So ſaith Cæſar, and haply it may ſeeme, that that ſingular deſcription of Fame, which is ſet downe in Virgill, tooke hence the firſt originall.

Strange cries and noiſes obſerued among the Gaules.

Virg. in lib. 9. de Aencia.

Fame, an euill, vnmatchable in ſwiftneſſe,
Is ſudden, mouing, gadding with raſhneſſe.

Rumor is cõmonly a babbling lyar.

Cæſar deſcribeth the like celerity and effect of this cry, as Virgill doth of Fame. This concerneth the bruite and cries among the Gaules, whereby being moued, they often held Councels of important matters: wherof (not long after) they repented themſelues, in regard they gaue credite to vncertaine noyſes, and found them in the end to be nothing but fables, But hee that thus reproued the common people of Gaule of lightneſſe; commended their conſtant & politicall wiſedome. Thoſe Cities (ſaith he) which are accounted to gouern beſt their Commõ-weals, haue their Lawes, which ordaine, that if a man that hath heard any thing of his neighbour (eyther by report or otherwiſe) concerning the eſtate of the Common-wealth: he is to impart the ſame to the Magiſtrate, and not to any other whatſoeuer. Becauſe it hath bin oftẽ ſeen, that raſh- headed men, and of ſmall vnderſtanding, are affrighted by falſe noiſes, or prouoked on to vnhappy attempts, and (dreadleſſe) enter into important enterprizes. The Magiſtrate concealeth what he thinketh fitteſt; and diſcouereth to the Commons, any matter needfull to be knowne.

A good obſeruation to preuent ydle rumors.

This laſt paſſage of Cæſar, refuteth (very ſtrongly) popular ſeruitude, for it teſtifieth, that euen in thoſe Cities, which gouerned beſt their Common-weales: that yet the Commons haue their authority, becauſe the Magiſtrate imparteth to the people, what is neceſſary for thẽ to know. Strabo auoucheth in his fourth Book, that this was alſo vſed in the Councels of the Gaules. If any one (ſaith he) did interrupt him that ſpake: the publike Miniſter ſtept vp with a drawne ſword, and vſing threatnings to the party, commanded him to hold his peace. If he would not do it, he aduertiſed him in the ſame manner a ſecond and third time. In the end, he would cut off ſuch a peece of his garment, as the reſt ſhould afterward do him no ſeruice. Tacitus expreſſeth it more plainly, as hee doth many other things; concerning the manner of electing Magiſtrates, and the Councels kept among the Germanes.

Popular ſeruitude reproued by Cæsar

Strabo in Lib. 4 cap. 7.

The Princes (ſaith hee) hold a Councell, wherein matters of meaneſt importance, and ſuch alſo as are of greateſt conſequence, are handled together: And yet in ſuch manner, that thoſe affaires which appertaine vnto the people, are managed and ordered by the Princes. They aſſemble together (if there happen no ſudden accident or aduenture) on certaine daies, either at the new Moone, or the full of the Moone: For they beleeue, that thoſe ſeaſons are moſt happy to treate on ther affaires. And they do not make their account by the daies, as we vſe to doe, but by the nights. The fault enſuing on their liberty, is, that they are not altogether on the day aſſigned: but two or three daies is loſt, to attend for ſuch as ſlacke to come.

Corn. Tacit. in li. 5. cap. 3

Ceremonial daies of meeting for generall conferẽce

The ſame Authour declareth another ſtrange thing of the Germanes, affirming, that many times they deliberate at Banquets, to reconcile enemies, to make alliances, and to gaine grace of Princes, yea, euen then to conſult of peace or warre: becauſe as then (rather then at any other time) they haue their ſpirits moſt open, eyther to ſimple thoughts, or more earneſt to them of greater importance. This Nation,

Nation, which is neyther ſubtile nor cautelous, will diſcouer the ſecrets of their ſoules in ieſting manner: for the minde being naked and diſcouered, bethinks it ſelfe better on the day following, & then hath more regard to eyther time. They deliberate when they know no diſſembling, and determine when they cannot erre. Such alſo was the cuſtome of the Country, when the Gaules helde their chiefeſt conſultations: as hath already bene declared, in the leuying of their men for warre.

Tit. Liu. in li. 31 Decad. 6.

Titus Liuius, ſpeaking of the Gaules, reporteth the ſame in his one and thirtieth Booke, ſaying. Then is ſeene in them a new and terrible apparance, becauſe (according to the cuſtome of their Nation) they are armed when they come to Councell. Why then the Pallas of the ancient Gauls, came herſelfe armed to the Councell: and becauſe they would not do any thing, but it ſhould expreſſe the courage of the Gauls, their aſſemblies were alwayes made by ſound of Trumpet. For Hirtius writeth ſo of the Bellouacanes Senate, hauing knowne their misfortunes by all contrary things. Corbus being ſlaine, all their Cauallery ouerthrowne, and the very valianteſt of their foote-ſouldiers, when they thought that the Romans drew nere vnto them; then ſuddenly they aſſembled a Councell by ſound of Trumpet, crying all with one voyce, to ſend Ambaſſadors and Hoſtages to Cæſar.

The ancient Gaules came armed to Councell.

The garments of the german ſitting in coũcell.

What ſhall wee ſay of the Germanes? What garments did they weare whẽ they came to councell? They did not any thing (ſaith Tacitus) neither in affaires publike or particular, but all in Armes. They went armed about their daily negotiations, and came in the ſame manner to their Banquets. Blame not then the councels of the Gaules to be done in Armes: for the Romane Oratour could ſay in his owne Language.

Let Armes giue place to Gownes.

The habite of Warre and Peace.

Becauſe Armes are the accouſtrements of Warre, and the Gowne is the habite of Peace, followed and attended on by Eloquence. And when the Court of Rome was enuironed with ſouldiers of Armes, at the pleading of * Milo: the ſpirit therof was not onely terrified, but the whole body alſo trembled with feare. But Eloquence vnited it ſelfe with the Armes of the Gaules, ſo that there wanted not at one time and place, both Commanders of warre, and learned Orators: for the Gaules Orators (by the irradiation of Armes) were encouraged to ſpeake the more brauely. Princes were pleading Orators in the Gaules councels, where (in generall) all might heare, that had intereſt in the caſe in queſtion, as is euident by the examples of Cæſar.

* The Roman that was defended by Tully.

Princes were pleading Orators.

Among the Germanes (ſaith Tacitus) in publike Councels, the King or Prince, according to his age, according to Nobility, according to the place for warre, and according to his readineſſe in vtterance: was much rather heard for authority in perſwading, then any power in commanding. It was alſo permitted in a full Councell, to accuſe of crimes deſeruing death. The cry or noiſe of the people, by liſtening fauourably, or otherwiſe: ſignified to the Romane Orators, that their Oration had found good or bad ſucceſſe. But the counſell of the Gaules, which was made in Arms, as it was reaſonable; made a ſigne by their Arms (although the clattering of weapons was a ſigne among the Gaules) how they tooke liking of that which had beene ſaid. Cæſar writeth ſo in his 7. Booke, ſpeaking of the Oration of Vercingetorix: All the people made a cry (ſaith he) and according to their cuſtome, made a clattering with their Armes, as they do, when they approue the Oration of any man.

Corn. Tacit. in li. 9. cap. 9

Iulius Cæſar in comment. Lib. 7

Marcellinus declareth in his 21. Booke, that after Iulian had made his Oration: the Army of the Gaules applauded him, and mingled dreadfull cries, among the loud claſhings of their Targets. The Gaules conſultations were in Armes; their Orations were approued by Armes, and the oath they take, was vpon Armes. The Caruntes (as it is in the 7. Booke) promiſed in a full councell of the Gaules, that they would be chiefeſt in the warre againſt Cæſar, and becauſe they could not in fielde giue aſſurance by the meanes of Hoſtages, fearing how matters might come about: to the end that all might be certaine and ſworne, after they had brought together al their Enſignes of warre (as alwaies they vſed to do in very ceremonious manner) they requeſted, that they wold begin the war, and the other would not forſake them. And in the ſame Booke there is a moſt holy oath, to aſſure the battel giuen by Marcel: in l. 21.

by the horſemen. They on horſe cry altogether, that this holy oath may be impoſed on euery man: Neuer to be receiued into his houſe; neuer to goe backe to his parents, nor to his wife, vntill hee haue twice thwarted ouer the enemies armies. Wherto that of Marcellinus conformeth, ſpeaking of Iulian: All were commanded to ſweare in his Name, & ſetting ſolemnly the points of their ſwords vnto their throtes, made execrable oathes and curſes on themſelues, if they brake their vowes.

But now it is time to finiſh our diſcourſe. Hauing thus reported the manners and cuſtomes of ancient Gaule, the temperance of the peoples liues, their aſſurance in dangers, their wiſedome in artes and diſciplines, their iuſtice, in ruling and eſtabliſhing the beſt meanes, for good ordering and gouerning their common-wealth: There remaineth now no more, but if we can recouer the like leyſure (hauing finiſhed ſome other ſtudies already entred on) we hope to proceed in the manners and cuſtomes of our new Gaules or Frenchmen, which will yeelde the more delight and pleaſure, becauſe the ſubiect is of a farre more excellent nature.

CHAP. I.

Of the new Gaules, or thoſe that are called (now adaies) Frenchmen, or the people of France, ſucceeding after their Predeceſſors, the Ancient Gaules.

AS among all parts of the Earth, Europe, (though it is the leaſt) holdeth the verie cheefeſt rancke, as beeing the principall, and moſt worthy: So it is not to bee doubted, but that among all the Countries of Europe, France muſt needs be the moſt excellent in al reſpects. The people of Arabia that now are, haue a cuſtomary kinde of ſaying, that if the world were a Ring, the Citty of Ormuz muſt bee the Beaziell, Collet or Head, wherein the moſt precious Stone is to be enchaſed. By much better reaſon then, may it lawfully be ſaide of France, and a true ſaying:

France the cheefeſt country of Europe

Ronſard in Cant. 5.

It is the leſſer eye, & the Pearle of the world.

As one of her owne Poets formerly hath ſung. Which no way can be accounted ſtrange, when conſideration is iuſtly made, of the great bleſsings, commodities, and graces of Heauen, wherwith the Land is and hath beene endowed. For there is nothing elſe found to be compared therewith; be it if we regard the fertility and aboundance of all things, not only neceſſary for the life of man, but alſo for all ſorts of pleaſures and delights. Bee it alſo, for the ſweetneſſe, temperature, & amenity of the Ayre: not hauing any other, more graciouſly regarded by the eie of the Sunne. No leſſe commendable (for valour) is the courage and ſpirit of the people, which haue inhabited there to this preſent time, who not onely haue extended their renowne through all Lands habitable: but alſo haue excelled in whatſoeuer can bee applied to the height of minde.

France aboūding in the fertility of all things.

Aboue all (as moſt admirable) is the dignity, greatneſſe, and Maieſty of their Kings, redoubtable and exalted (for their vertues truely heroycall) aboue all other on the earth. In this excellency then, ther are three things to be diſcourſed: the firſt is that of the Land it ſelfe; the ſecond is of the People; and the third is of their Kings, which reſult as well from the two Precedents, as from their owne proper vertue.

The Maieſty and dignity of the Kings of France.

The three arguments of this inſtant diſcourſe.

Concerning the goodnes of the Land, it were an infinite labour to expreſſe ſo many bleſsings, and all things elſe which it produceth, euen of beſt vſe for the life of man, and that in ſuch aboundance, as ſufficeth not only for the people; but alſo are imparted and diſperſed to other Nations, without any incommodity to it ſelfe, and (in a manner) not to bee diſcerned. The fat fields, couered with good wheate and all graines elſe of any kinde, filles the Graunges & Garners euery harueſt ſeaſon. The Mountaines and Hilles, cloathed with goodly Vineyards, which bring foorth moſt healthfull and delicate wines: & almoſt euery where ſtored with all kinde of fruite trees. There is not a iote of vnprofitable Land, all is laboured and husbanded, or ſerues for paſturage for feeding beaſts, which cauſeth ſuch plenty of all ſorts of fleſh. There ye may likewiſe behold goodly VVoods & Forreſts, filled with all kinde of game and Veniſon. Moſt excellent Flax & Hempe, wherof cloth is made in great aboundance. Dyers woad alſo, Scarlet holme-oake, Saffron, with many many ſingular Plants and Hearbs, not onely for Medicine, but alſo nouriſhable.

Nauigable & fiſhing riuers.

Heereto I may adde, the admirable ſight of great and goodly Riuers, both nauigable, and abounding with fiſh, diſperſing themſelues through France, as veines in the body of man: making the mid-land Regions as apt for commerce, as thoſe on the Sea-coaſts. Beſide a great number of other waters, great Pooles & Pondes, Fountaines, and cleere running Riuers, all meruailous and delectable.

Houſes, Cities, Townes, and Villages.

Then haue yee goodly houſes and buildings; an infinite number of rich and great Cities, Townes, Burroughs, Villages, Caſtels, and other Edifices. Moreouer, greater plenty of people, then in any other Region of the world.

The great plenty of people.

This is that which is ſo much wondred at by ſtrangers, who haue thought France to bee a terreſtriall Paradiſe: making more account (in this caſe) then Frenchmen do themſelues, becauſe it is ſo ordinary and frequent vnto them. But to ſuch as haue ſayled into farre remote ſtrange Countries, or otherwiſe haue had intelligence of them: they hold it a happineſſe to themſelues, to ſee the felicity of France ſo farre beyond other, and therby to know their owne good. All theſe graces might much better bee acknowledged, if we did but ſeuer and conſider them particularly.

Of Wheate & other Corne.

Firſt, for Wheate and other Corne, which is the principall ſuſtentation, to maintaine and ſtrengthen the bodye of man: it encreaſeth and aboundeth ſo in France (and that of the beſt that can bee) more then in any part of the world, and likewiſe all other ſorts of graine. It is not a time now to acknowledge ſo great a happineſſe, for wee ſee that our Elders haue better knowne and felt it, when the Land was not throughly ſo well husbanded and tilled. As wee diſcerne by that which is written by Strabo, Iulius Solinus Polyhiſtor, & Pomponius Mela, who ſpeake thereof expreſſely. Alſo Cicero reporteth, that (in his time) was brought to Rome, and into Italy, great quantities of Corne from the Gaules. Pliny the Great hath alſo obſerued the ſame, for ſpeaking of the Corne of France, he ſaith: That it was moſt cleane Corne, and that it yeelded foure pound of Bread, more then any other. It is well known in theſe dayes, that Spaine furniſheth herſelfe with the Wheate and Graine of France, and that it is to her as a nurſing Mother. And Portugall it ſelfe, which is deſcribed to bee one of the moſt happy and fertile countries of the Spains, hath recourſe to France: as we may ſee by ỳ which Ozorius ſaith, a Portugall Biſhop of Sylues; & the ſame is reported likewiſe by others, who haue written of Relations.

Plin. in lib. 18. cap. 7. Nitidiſsimi grani, & quatuor libris plus panis reddere, quam far aliud.

Of the plenty of Wines.

And for Wines, the country is no leſſe fruitfull, in producing ſuch as are very good, and in great affluence. This hath alſo beene confeſſed by our Ancients, according to the teſtimonie of Solinus and Pliny, who renowne Bituricam vitem. Perhaps this may be interpreted, not of Bourges: but of the wine about Bordeaux, wherof the people are called Bituriges Viuiſci. He ſpeaketh alſo of the wine of Beziers, whereto hee giueth the cheefeſt place among all them of Gaule. And Iulian the Emperor ſaid, that there were good vines in the grounds of Paris. Behold how Columella makes his moane, at that which the Italians did, for planting of Vines: forſaking their owne country, they went to ſeek in the delicate grounds of France, in the Iſles Cyclades, and thoſe of Andolouzia. Whereby we may perceiue, that he equalleth the grounds of France and their wines, with them of Muſcadella, Greeke, and of Spaine.

Polybiſt cap. 24 Bituricam vitē. Plin. in li. 14 cap. 2. Bituriges Viuiſci. Plin. in lib. 14. cap. 6.

In Miſopogone. φύεται παρ' αὐτοῖς ἄμπελος ἀγαθή. In præfat. lib 1. de re Ruſt. Vindemias condimus ex inſulis Cycladibus ac regionibus Gallicis petiſſe;

Pliny ſaieth, that in Italy they highly eſteemed the Grapes of France, making mention alſo of a certaine kinde of admirable Grape there growing; which daily turneth it ſelfe to the Sunne, like as the Heliotropium doth, and therefore is called after the Greeke word Streptos. Wine is tranſported from France to Rome, which is there accounted very delicious: eſpecially, that which is gathered in the grounds of Vienna, which they call Picatum, as Plutarch declareth in his Sympoſiaques. Notwithſtanding, there is a difficulty found in theſe words, as namely, that which Vopiſcus ſaith, in the life of the Emperour Probus. That he had permitted to the Frenchmen to haue and plant Vines. Notwithſtanding, it appeareth, that they were in France before his time.

Plin. lib. 14. c. 3 Mirum vbique cum Sole circumagi vuam quæ ob id Streptos dicitur & in Italia Gallicam placere trans Alpes vero Picenam.

Plut. Lib. 5. queſt. 3.

The reſolution of this, dependeth thus; that by the Edict of the Emperor Domitian, he had enioyned to the inhabitants of the Prouinces, to cut all the Vines, fewe excepexcepted. Induced ſo to do, becauſe vpon view taken, that ſome yeares there was abundance of Wine, & ſcarſity of Corne: he conceiued, that the eare-able Landes were left barren, in regard of the Vines. Afterward, the Emperor Probus tooke off thoſe inhibitions in Gaule, permitting them to haue Vines. And ſo to this day, the wines of France are tranſported by great quantity into England, Flanders, Holland, Germany, Denmarke, Sweden, and into other Notherne Regions.

Sueton. in Domit. cap. 7.

The former doubt reſolued.

Moreouer, France produceth ſtore of fruite Trees, bearing (in abounding affluence) moſt excellent, dainty and delicious fruites: as well ſtone-fruite of all ſorts, as thoſe of other nature. And yet notwithſtanding, Italy and Spaine cannot vaunt to haue any that come not into France: as Oranges, Citrones, Pomegranates, Oliues, &c. For though the Land doth not produce theſe euery where: yet notwithſtanding, Prouence & Languedock, which is the Narbone Gaule of our Ancients, do beare the ſame fruites, yea, and much better, as hath beene noted by experience. Alſo Strabo obſerued it well enough. The Country of Narbone (ſaith he) produceth all the ſame fruites as Italy doth.

Of the plenty of fruit-trees.

Strabo in Lib. 4. τὰς ἄλλας ἡμέρους ὁ Ναρβωνίτης καρποὺς ὁμοίως φέρει τῇ Ἰταλίᾳ

Our Ancients haue alſo giuen thereto another commendation, to haue great ſtore of paſture grounds; and ſo (by conſequence) plenty of beaſts to feed in thē. Strabo teſtifieth as much, making ſo good eſteeme of the woolles and clothes of this Country: that they are carried thence to diuers parts, and therewith all Italy is ſufficiently furniſhed. But ouer and beſide the great commodity, enſuing by the fleſh of domeſticke creatures: there are Deare in abundance, as alſo all kinde of game, & Fowles in no meane plenty.

Plenty of Paſturages.

Strabo in Lib. 4

Plenty of Deare and other game.

And to the ende that nothing ſhould be wanting in neceſſary matters for ſupport of life: the Country is not deſtitute of good, proper and profitable horſes, as well for ordinary trauell, as alſo for combates, fights, and battels; bred in the Nation, and continually nouriſhed. The Romanes were thereto addicted, but principally to the horſes of France: as is to bee ſeene in Trebellius Pollio, who ſaith, That the Horſes of the Celts, were renowned aboue all other. Pollux the Grammarian, interlaceth (among the reſt) dogges of a good and gallant breede, apt for the Celts hunting, or ſuch dogs as the Gauls vſed.

Plety of good horſes.

In Claudio. Quid equarum quas fama nobilitat celticarum? Gnomaſt. lib. 5. cap. 5.

This may ſerue ſufficiently for terreſtriall creatures, becauſe to number thē particularly, would require an infinite labor: let vs come now to them that liue in the waters. It is apparantly knowne, that the coaſts of the Sea which enuiron France, are richly ſtored with fiſh, and the fiſh alſo to be delicate and excellent, better thē elſewhere is to be found. And as for the mid-land Regions, where Sea-fiſh is wanting: the freſh and ſweete waters are moſt copiouſly ſtored. For the Riuers, Streams Pooles, Ponds and Riuolets haue moſt dainty freſh-fiſh, and countleſſe in number. Daily experience makes proofe thereof, Strabo auoucheth it, and Auſonius ſings it, making mention thereof in his worke called Moſella.

Abounding plenty of fiſh.

Strabo in li. 4. Auſonius in Moſella.

There are many other commodities, which come and encreaſe vnder this ayre, for the neceſſity, vtility and ornament of mans life. Among other, Flax and Hemp, and the cloathes made of them, are labored and ſought for by ſtrangers: whereof great traffique and tranſportation goes to other Nations, & returnes home ſtore of money to France: In briefe, it is one of her beſt wealths and riches.

Of the Flaxe and Hempe.

In this place, to ſtay no longer on a matter ſo frequent, and ordinary in vſe, as cloathes and other works, it may appeare lawfull (with Pliny) to enter into conſideration (it may bee) of one of the moſt admired things that is in nature: To ſay, that ſo ſmall a plant ſhould bee the cauſe, that the Sea cannot bound men within limits, nor ſeparate their Countries, but ſuffers herſelfe (thereby) to bee vanquiſhed. This is that hearb that drawes Syria neere to vs, Egipt to Italy, and Affrica and America to France. In a word, it is that which makes man tread vnder his feete, and trauerſe ouer that dreadfull gulfe, the heape or pile of the whole Element of water, the vaſte and profound Ocean; wherein principally appeareth the admirable workes of the high and Soueraigne Creator of all things. And the ſame Pliny wondreth not a little, that (of ſo ſmall a graine) ſuch a matter ſhould come, as carries men through all the Cantons of the world. Which onely is by the meanes of Sayles & Cordages, the principall helpes and wings of nauigation. Such workmanſhips are performed in France in mighty quantiquantities, and thence transported to infinite other Countries: especially into Spaine, where they haue greatest need, to arme and prepare their Ships for seruice. And this is that ẏ hath so often serued them, and yet daily doth in their greatest nauigations: beside their very finest clothes, and others of all fashions, broght thether to them. Pliny also recordeth, that (in his time) the Gaules were esteemed and renowned for this reuenue.

Plin. lib. 19 cap. 1. Itane Galliæ censentur hoc reditu? Et infra. Vniuersæ Galliæ vela texunt.

France produceth also Woad, apt and needfull for al good Dyers; and the grain for Scarlet dye, anciently called Coccus, which groweth in the Country of Narbone, and Saffron likewise, with infinite other shrubs & hearbs of great vse, especially in Physicke. Boterus, Benesus, and other strangers haue obserued and reported, that there is a Mount in Auuergne, called the Mount of gold, full of an infinite number of rare and singular simples, proper for Physicke, which nature there produceth liberally, & without any constraint. So that to speake no more then truth, France hath no neede of the rich East & West Indiaes. It is a little world, a collection and an abridgment of the happinesse and felicity of all Lands: not onely for necessity and profite, but also for the delicacy of life. And if we goe so farre as medicaments themselues, such Simples are there to be found, as equall the drugs of strange Countries, which yeeld nothing else.

Woad growing in France

France hath no need of the Indiaes.

Ther are also goodly Thickets, Woods and Forrests, to furnish whatsoeuer is requisite (beside fewell) for building, engines for warre, fabrication of ships, and other vessels, as also for mooueables and houshold-stuffe. Heerewithall one of the cheefest considerations which causeth France to be esteemed, is, that it is wholly inhabited and well husbanded: not a iote of desert or waste ground, no place empty, nor any thing but hath his vse. Heare what Strabo acknowledged in his time, vnder the Empire of Augustus. There is not any thing vnprofitable (saith he) nor any idle grounds: except such as are hindred & vsed with Pooles and Forrests. By much more reason maywe now say, ẏ al grounds there are better tilled and husbanded, thē in those times they were: & that ẏ Pooles and Forrests yet remaining, are not a iote the lesse beneficiall, but rather more then some other grounds be.

Of Woods & Forrests.

Strabo in lib. 4.

But no man can better breefely figure foorth the felicity of this goodly peece of Landship, seeming heere to be done but in distemper or dry colours: then it hath bin already wrought by two Ancients, Iulius Solinus Polyhistor, and Pomponius Mela; the one of thē describing it thus. Happy Gaules, in fatted Lands; wholly proper and commodious, in bringing the reuennues of fruites: A great part planted with Vines, shrubs, and fruit-trees. Most happy and rich, to produce all kindes of creatures, and that which is needfull for them: washed with cleere wters of Riuers and Fountaines.

Sol in poly. c. 22. Felices præpinguibus glebis, accomodæ prouentibus fructuariis: plere quæ consitæ vitibus & arbustis, omni ad vsum animantium fœtu beatissime. Riguæ aqui, fluminum & fontium.

Pomponius Mela speaks thus. Terra est frumenti præcipuè & pabuli ferax, & amœna lucis immanibus: noxio genere anamaliū minimè frequens. It is a land principally fertile, and abounding in Corne & pasture grounds: pleasant and delight full for goodly and great Woods, and wherein few liuing creatures are to be found hurtfull, or doing any harme.

Pomponius Mela in lib. 3. cap. 2.

In like manner, Messire Michell Suriano, a Venetian Lord, and one of the Clarissimies; hauing bene Ambassador from the high and honourable Common-wealth of Venice, in France, in the time of King Charles the 9. left vs this figure, of his own skilfull handy-worke.

Fù sempre riputata la Francia richissima, & piena d'ogni commodita, & abondantissima di tutte le cose ne essarie alla vita huna: perche essendo quasi nel mezzo della piu nobil parte del mondo, che è l'Europa, ha il cielo molto temperato & benigno, libero da quei freddi grandissimi di Allemagna & da gli eccessiui caldi di Spagn. L'aere benche sia alquanto ventoso, é però salubre & sottile, & non ha del grosso & paludoso come la Fiandra vicina. Il paese è amœno & piaceuole, pieno di fiumi, & tutti nauigabili: non ha monti aspri, saluo nel estremità de' confini: ma nel mezzo per tutto sono colline & pianure, tutte fertili & lauorate. Et fa tanta copia di biade, & do vini, di lini & canepe, di guadi & di altre cose, che non solamente bastano per vso del regno, ma serue ancora a mandarne fino in Spagna, Portogallo, in Inghilterra, Soria, Danemarka & altri paesi piu lontani.

France was alwaies reputed to be most rich and full of all commodities, and abounding in all those things necessary for the life of man. For (beeing as it were) in the middest of the most noble part of the world, which is Europe: it hath the heauens very temperate and benigne, free from those mighty coldes of Germany, and the excessiue heates of Spaine. The Aire, although it be somewhat windy, is therefore healthfull and subtile, and hath no grosse & paludus moistures, as nere neighboring Flanders hath. The Country is milde & pleasing, full of Riuers, and all nauigable. It hath no sharpe Mountaines, except on the extremity of the Confines: but in the middest, euery where are little hillocks & plaine champaigne grounds, all fertile, and husbanded or tilled. And yeeldeth such plenty of Corne & Wine, of Flax and Hempe, of Woad, and of other things: as not onely serue for the vse of the kingdome, but also sufficeth to send into Spaine, Portugall, into England, Scotland, Denmarke, and other Countries farther off. The same Suriano, hauing bene (before that time) Ambassador in Spaine, & made there his Relation: speaketh not in the same manner, but in other tearmes farre different.

Among the causes of this fertility, and delicious aboundance in so happy a seating: one part of this felicity may bee referred to the temperature of the Ayre, & the Climate of Heauen, vnder which it is scituated: Being iustly the midst of one of the temperate Zoanes, to wit, the 42. degree of Latitude, about which is Marseillis, and the coast of Prouence and Languedock, so farre as about the 50. degree towards the North; which is the breadth of France. Whereunto in like manner do contribute, the great number of waters wherewith it is bedewed: which serue as well for the generation of fruites, as pleasure and amenity, beside (in greater manner) for commerce and traffique. For Gaule hath beene alwayes (throughout) furnished with sprightly Fountaines, and cleare running Riuers, with some of small and greater current, yet very nauigable, for the carriage and recarriage of Merchandizes, and communication of the Prouinces one with another; a mighty commodity, and (then which) there is not a greater in the world.

This is that also, which makes the midland Regions, and the Cities & Townes there seated, as Merchantable as the Sea coasts, as strangers themselues haue both knowne & reported; that there are more great and nauigable Riuers in France, thē in all other parts of the earth; & though they speak it as an hyperbole, yet nothing commeth neerer to truth. For in all Italy, hardly can any nauigable Riuer be found beside that of Poe: and likewise in Spaine almost as few, at lest that haue any course (how little soeuer) in length. Strabo hath made good obseruation therof, as before is saide, and that in euery Country heere, are Riuers, which come and returne to all parts, coasting the very principall places. But (aboue all) that of * Seine is to be admired, a sweet Riuer, the most profitable and commodious for nauigation, & this only (among all those in the world) is best bounded and restrained within his bed, fildome or little ouerflowing, and when it ouerfloweth, doth little or no harme at all, yeelding (beside) a most cleare water, and fit to be drunke; abounding also with plenty of fish.

Which moued the Emperor Iulian to speake in this manner. Very fildome (saith he) doth this Riuer exalt or abase it selfe, & it keepeth (almost) one ordinary course in winter, as it doth in Summer: furnishing generally with a most neate water, sweet & cleare to the eie, and wholsome to be drunk by such as will. And although this should not be alwayes certaine: yet notwithstanding, there are few to be spoken of, concerning other Riuers to be seene, in comparison of this. Whereto may be added, that which is spoken by Botero Benese the Italian; these are his owne words. It beareth such great Ships, and sustaineth so mighty burthens, as they that see it, will not beleeue it, and there is no Riuer, that (in proportion) gouernes an equall weight: so that although it exceedeth not mediocrity, yet admirably it supplieth the businesse and the necessities of Paris, &c.

I might also make some reckoning of diuers waters there, producing effects admirable and prodigious: but because it would be a labour long and infinite, to stand vpon all their particularities; I will satisfie my selfe, to touch that which concerneth matters wholesome and medicinall, wherewith the fauour of Heauen hath in like manner graced this Region, to the ende it shoulde not faile in any thing.

Ther are many Wels or Springs, which are found in diuers parts of France, that haue certaine properties and vertues, as receiuing a iuyce & taste, by the mixtion of Niter, Sulpher, and Allum, which are vnder-Wels that cure very strange diseases, onely by the vertue of their water.

Such are the famous Wels of Pougues in Niuernoys, and of Forges in Normandy. Such also are many other, especially towards the Pyrenean Mountaines, which haue the vertue to stay the bloody flixe; to soften and make come forth (in forme of paste) the stone that is in the bladder or reines; to fetch again sight almost lost; to warme and strengthen the nerues; and to cure the gout. In the time of Pliny, he had then discouered something, for hee makes mention of a certaine Well, in the Towne of Tongri among the Gaules; the water whereof sauoured like yron (as all other Wels almost doe) which healed Tertian Feuers, and the diseases of the stone, as also the running of the reines.

Of Mettals and Minerals in France.

Now, to speake of Mettals and Mineralles, France cannot be destitute, neither can other Nations make vaunt of any aduantage aboue it, if due search might bee made. Strabo declareth, that in his time, the Gaules affirmed themselues, to haue the best in the Cemenes and Pyreneans: and that therefore they would not giue place to any other people, especially the Spaniards, who made their glory, in hauing great quantities. Gold, which is held and esteemed to bee the most precious, shining, resplending, and domineering aboue all other, yea, qualifying the Sunnes bright beames, is to bee found in France. For Strabo testifieth, that there was excellent Gold, and in great quantity, in Cemenus. To which purpose, we reade in Procopius, a Greeke Historian, that the Kings of France caused mony to be stãped of Gold, with their marke and character, found in France: reporting withall, that other barbarous Kings had not that prerogatiue, no, not the Kings themselues of the Persians.

Of Gold.

Strabo in Lib. 4

* A hil by the Alpes, not far from the Riuer Varus. Procop. in lib. 3. Belli Goth

In like manner, France hath Riuers, among whose sandes, gold is mingled, as being excoriated from the Mines vnder their current, according to the opinion of the most learned Philosophers. And they further say, that this gold commeth, as being deriued by continuall agitation of the waters rowling, and maketh it so much the purer, aboue the Marcasity or Rocke, yea, or that in the earth. Among other Ancients, Diodorus Siculus assureth vs, that there are many of these Riuers in France. Ausonius (by his verses) celebrates his golden Tarne: and (euen now) it is a matter most certaine, that there are such Riuers in Gascoigne, which descend, either from the Pyreneans, or the Cemenes. Let the Cappadocians cease thẽ, to make vaunt of their Pactolus, the Thracians, of their Hebrus or Marissa; the Colchians of their Phasis the Italians, of their Eridanus or Poe; and the Spaniards, of their Tagus.

And as for Mettall, whereunto the second value is giuen next to gold; Strabo affirmeth, that there are many Mines in France, as Cæsar himselfe also doth the like; and (at this day) good proofe and experience hath bin made thereof. Cæsar saith, there is found Copper and Brasse in large aboundance. But aboue all, there is great plenty of excellent Iron & Steele: whence it came, that reuerend Antiquity so highly commended the Swords and Courtelasses of the ancient Gaules. Let the skilfull Iulius Pollux be credited, who saith; that the Emperor Marcus Aurelius made his choyse of such a man to bee Schoolemaster to his Sonne, who preferred the Gaules Courtelasse, among those other weapon that were most excellent. This Mettall highly aboundeth there, & is the most common in France. Beside, it best agreeth with the Frenchmens generosity, who haue euermore made themselues famous by Armes, and bin knowne by their manhood, to all the vtmost parts of the world.

The Frenchmen haue euer bin worthy souldiers.

Gold and Siluer, so much esteemed among vs to be precious, are no more apt for Armes, then other instruments and vtensilles for the commodity of men, and the great account we make of gold, proceedeth onely from the rarity thereof. But we ought rather, to value things by their vtility & vse, although they be common, as Aristotle saith; among which is Iron, the most profitable Mettall of all other, & not by thẽ to be surmounted: so y (without it) with great difficulty can gold (more harmefull and lesse beneficiall) be

The people dwelling in the Iſle De Los Ladrones, in the Sea called Su, although they haue no more ſtore of gold, then of other mettals: yet notwithſtanding, they couet not, or demaund any of paſſengers Ships ſayling by them; but call to them with loud cries, to let them haue yron, which they acknowledge to be moſt neceſſary.

It is to be credited, that there are no leſſe ſtore of Mines (both of gold and ſiluer) at this day in France, then formerly hath beene knowne, and ſpoken of by our Ancients: as daily might bee diſcouered, if men would giue their mindes to ſearch and breake open the ground for them. But the French wer neuer affected to ſuch greedy deſires, the earth yeelds and caſts them vp commodities ſufficient, goods & treaſures in abounding plenty: without violencing or deluing into the earths entrailes, and very profoundeſt deeps, euen (as if we ſhould ſay) to burye men aliue, renting and tearing hard Rockes in peeces, leuelling high Mountaines, to melte and fine them, with the loſſe of an infinite number of liues. Day and night is ſpent in theſe extreme paſſions, to get this vile mettall, and then to adore it as a God, being the true cauſe & originall of the greateſt miſeries that can happen to man: albeit Nature (in her purity of wiſedome) placed it to be trodden on vnder our feet, and hid it cloſe in the earth, as a thing vnworthy to be ſeene.

The French were neuer couetous of gold or ſiluer.

To get gold, hath bene the loſſe of many liues.

There are many other treaſures & gifts of Nature, which are affoorded vs by France. *Quantum apud nos margaritis Indicis precium eſt, tantum apud Indos in Coralio: gignitur in Rubro mari, laudatiſsimum vero in Gallico ſinu ad Stœchades. In diuers parts of France, are the materials fit for all kindes of building. Hard ſtone and other matters, wherof infinite are to be ſeene in goodly, great, and rich buildings, Caſtles, and publike Edifices, wherewith the Country is wel filled, and cities beautified. Nor is it deſtitute of the faireſt Marbles, in which reſpect, wee may not omit that which hath beene obſerued by our Ancients, as a thing particular giuen to Gaule: that thoſe Stones and materials do encreaſe in the Quarries, how liberally ſoeuer diſperſed abroad, as Vlpian the Lawyer hath left vs in writing.

It was not then without great reaſon, that the Poet Manilius calld France Rich. And Dion tearmes it Floriſhing in riches. It ſeemeth alſo to be knowne to Ioſephus, who declareth, how King Agrippa deliuering to the Iewes, what inconueniences might come vnto them, by reuolting a gainſt the Romanes: demanded of them if they could ſpeake of more wealth then the Gaules had; more ſtrength then the Allemaignes or Germanes; and better vnity and vnderſtanding, then among the Greekes, all which (neuertheleſſe) were vnder the dominion of the Romans. And the better to perſwade them, in the commodities and aduantages of all thoſe people, being vnder their yoke & obedience: he ſaith of the Gaules, that they were (in multitude) three hundred & fiue kindes of people. And had among them (by his maner of ſpeaking) Welles and Springs of all happines and felicity, watering and bedewing the whole Land habitable, with riches and good bleſsings. He addeth beſide, that ther were then in Gaule, aboue twelue hundred Townes and Cities.

Which acordingly came to paſſe, for by themeans of the Gaules riches, not onely he diſcharged himſelfe of his great debts: but enriched likewiſe al his friends, practiſing with diuers, & winning an infinite number of Lords in Rome, yea, they that were the cheefeſt Magiſtrates: In briefe, hee omitted not any kinde of bounty, as well publike as particular,

Suetonius in Iulio cap. 22. Ex omni prouinciarum copia Gallias potiſſimum elegit, cuius emolumento & opportunitate idonea eſſet materia triumphorum.

Among other matters, hee attempted the building of a Pallace, for the iudging of cauſes, the meere place coſting him aboue 1400000 crownes, and al this came from the pillage of the Gauls. He feaſted all the people of Rome, which was a thing (well neere) impoſſible and infinite. He doubled the pay of his Legions & companies of ſoldiers, to perpetuity; enriching the reſt with good gifts, beſide great diſtributions, as well of monies as ſlaues, as alſo lands and victuals, which he cauſed to be giuen to euery Citizen of Rome, & likewiſe to his Captains & Soldiers. All this bounty, all theſe goods & treaſure, were taken in Gaule, & (as Suetonius ſaith) without any ſpare of the Temples, which he knew to be rich in gifts: & many times ſacking Cities, rather for the greedy deſire of booty, then any other iuſt cauſe. And Cicero ſaith: That he had ouercome Nations, abounding in all things & in all the ſeueral kinds of power; this he meant of the Gaules. For, not only was that true which Procopius ſaide; That Gaule is much more powerfull then Spaine: but alſo aboue all the other Prouinces of the Romane Empire, according to the iudgement of Cæſar. So then, it may iuſtly be ſaide, that Gaule, as well for riches, as for the mē that he found ther, gaue entrance to the great power of Cæſar, & was the cauſe, means, and inſtrument of his deſignes, & obtaining the Empire of the world, which hee enioyed, in deſpight of ſo many Romane Lords, his aduerſaries and competitors.

But among ſo many proſperities, it is a matter both rare & admirable, that ther are to be found few or no diſcomodities at all wherwith the land ſhould be annoied. There is not any Region in the world, how goodly or happy ſoeuer it may bee ſaid to be, but is ſubiect to ſundry inconueniences, that make a counterpoiſe to the felicity therof. Arabia, which carrieth the ſurname of Happy, wherein, beſide ſo many bleſsings it affoordeth, the odors & perfumes there growing, maketh the aire all embalmed, as it were: yet in counterchange, it hath two very great diſcommodities. One is, that in thoſe Forreſts of moſt odoriferous trees, throughout in euery place, are found a great number of ſmall and ſhort ſerpents, of the ſame colour as the earth is, that ſubtilly ſting and byte men, before they haue any power to perceiue it, or defend themſelues againſt it; and being thus bitten, they cauſe their death in a million of torments. The other is that theſe ſo happy people are ſubiect to a ſtrange diſeaſe, proceeding frō their ouermuch eaſe, and hot perfumes of the country: ſo that to helpe themſelues, they are enforced to find out all kinds of ſtinking and infectious ſmels, euen the fouleſt that can be, ſo ſaith Diodorus. So that ther is no happineſſe in any part, neither any ſuch pleaſing ſweetnes; but it is conioynd & neighbored with one greeſe or other.

cular houſes; but Villages, Burroughs, & great Cities altogether, yea, many times whole Prouinces. Deluges and inundations haue alſo wrought there ſtrange effects, ſpoyling, ouerthrowing, and defacing whole Countries, & that very often Earthquakes, ingulfings, and impetuous ſhowres of raine, are (as a man ſhould ſay) there daily: thus you ſee what delight and happineſſe, is in the greateſt & moſt renowned kingdome of the Eaſt.

Strabo hauing related the goodneſſe of Bætica in Spaine, which is now Granada & Andalouſia, ſaith withall; that the country is perſecuted with an affliction very ſtrange yet reputed to be ridiculous. It is by the great and immenſe multitude of Conies or Rabbets, which feede on, and conſume their ſeedes, plants, and rootes of trees. He alſo ſaith, it hence enſueth, that almoſt throughout Spaine yea, and the neighboring Iſles, are thereby afflicted. Adding beſide, that the inhabitants of the Iſles Gymnaſiaes or Baleares, now called Maiorque and Minorque, ſent Ambaſſadors, to requeſt ayd of the Romanes, againſt theſe hurtfull creatures, and to chaſe them out of their country, as beeing vnable to endure their multitude. And ſuccour was neceſſarily required in ſo great a warre, which doth not alwayes happen (ſaieth he) but when the country is ſubiect to be infected with ſome plague of peſtilence, famine, or ſuch other affliction and puniſhment ſent from Heauen.

Marcus Varro writeth, that a Towne in Spaine was wholly vndermined, and ruined by thoſe Conies, & another in Theſſalie, by Moales. Some that haue bene diſpeopled & forſaken, in regard of the great multitude of Frogs. Another in Affrica, by Locuſts. Alſo, that the inhabitants of the City * Gyaros, now called Gura, in one of the Cyclades; were expulſed thence by Rats: and that in Italy, an ancient Citty called Amyclea, was vtterly ruined and loſt by Serpents. There is a Region in Affrica, where a great extendure of the country is become deſert, the people which dwelled there being driuen to all extremities, and quite exterminated, onely by Scorpions and Piſſemires, which are a kinde of venomous Ants. Theophraſtus reporteth, that others were expulſed by * Scolopendraes. And Strabo ſaith, that Spaine was ordinarily infected with a ſtrange multitude of Rats: whereupon (oftentimes) followed contagious diſeaſes. The like happened once to the Romanes, when they were in the countries of the Baſques and Aſtures: ſo that they wer glad to hire men to chaſe them away, the Rats came ſo faſt vppon them, and hardly could they ſaue themſelues from them. An ancient Philoſopher, named * Dicaarchus, wrote a Book, of the ruine of men, and had collected together, how many ruines had happened in diuers countries, by reaſon of the inopinate multitude of beaſts: by whoſe impetuous violence, he ſheweth, that ſome Nations haue bene loſt and conſumed.

A man may safely take the Euening or Mornings benefit on the greene grasse, without dread of any venomous creature, which are most dangerous in other countries. But admit that there were some kinde of Serpents or Snakes in some peculiar parts: yet are they very few, and no harme at all discerned to come from them.

Of the Aspick in France.

No Egyptian Aspicke is there to bee found, and that which is termed in France an Aspicke: it is no Aspicke at all but rather a Viper, as is verified in the Obseruations of P. Bolonius.

In lib. 1 cap. 2.

Neuertheless, it is rare or sildome to be seene there, and benefit (rather then any harme) is to be receiued therby. And say that this Serpent were very venomous: yet notwithstāding, it serueth most commodiously for the life of man, and Treacle is compounded thereof. The verie learnedst Physitians do hold, that the flesh thereof is soueraigne for many diseases; and, that which is much more, it hath power to lengthen the life of man, in such as make ordinary vse of it, as manie of our Ancients did, and other healthfull people yet liuing, who haue heretofore referred the cause of their so long healthfull continuance.

The flesh is soueraign for diseases. Bald. Ang. Abbatius lib. de Vipera.

Thus our Ancients, and especially the learned Egyptians, vsed the Snake as an Hieroglyphick, marke and signe of health: presenting it to theyr Goddesse Sanitas, rouled about with other creatures.

Moreouer, France is not subiect to the miseries and horrors of earth-quakes. Neuer shall ye there heare the earth grone, bellow, then tremble, shake, and swallow vp houses, Burroughes, & whol Townes, making groweth of Mountaines, by leuelling and plaining other places, to drie vp waters and riuers, and then sodainly to let loose Flood-gates of Nouelties; to stay their violent course of a streame, and then to make it run directly against his currēt: to let foorth flaming fires, to finish that with greater desolation, which the former Earth-quake had left behinde it. By an especiall priuiledge of heauen, France stands exempted from all these; experience hath made it apparant, & Pliny long ago witnessed it, when he saide: That the Gaules were not shaken by tremblings of the earth.

None of these nouelties are in France.

Lib. 7. cap. 80. Gallie terræmotu minime quatiuntur.

To know the quiet condition and felicity of France in this case, wee may compare and consider other Nations & Prouinces, and what great afflictions and ruines haue insued to them by such harmes, in most part of the worlds Regions. We finde, that in Italy and other Countries, in the time of the Punicke warres, the people were tormented with Earth-quakes, seuen and fifty times in one yeare. VVho would not be amazed, to heare that two hilles should approach neere each to other, to iustle (as it were) together; then, to retire and auancer on againe, after the manner of fight, stirring and mouing furiously, with an horrible noise and breaking? A great fire and smoake rose vp betweene them; and by this their rude encounter, houses and villages (seated in the valley) were bruised and beaten downe, & both men and beasts smothered to death: euen as it happened in the Territorie of Modena, in the yeere 622. and in the City of Rome, in the time of the wars of Marius and Sylla. This was seene in broad day time, by a great number of passengers & Romane Citties, who beheld this wofull spectacle, from the neere-neighbouring high-way, or hill ascending to the Capitoll.

Plin. l. 2. cap. 84

Two great mountaines met together.

Plin. l. 2. cap. 83

It was a strange thing, that trembling or Earth-quake, which happened vnder the Emperor Tiberius, and in the 5. yeare of his Empire (to the end we may not, as Orosius doth, confound it with that which chanced twelue years after, miraculously, euen at the passion of our Sauiour:) Tacitus reporteth, that in this yeere (which was the 770. of the City of Rome) in one night, twelue great and famous Cittes of Natolia, were ruined and vtterly ouerthrowne; such as was Ephesus, Sardis, Cuma, Philadelphia, and other of the same ranke. And that which vvas most terrible, they had not the meanes of open flight, an ordinary succour in such misfortunes: yet thereof they were depriued, because the earth shrunke and opened vnder their feete, and swallowed them vp immediately. Herewithall arose shinings and flames of fire among the ruines; and that which vvas plaine champaigne grounde before, was exalted to Mountaines, and contrarywise, Mountaines became euen and leuell ground.

ſuall and frequent earthquakes at Constantinople, and whereto it hath bene alwayes ſubiect. And in ſuch manner, as during the reigne of the Emperour Theodoſius, there happened ſuch an Earth-quake, as laſted foure moneths continually: the people beeing conſtrained to flye out of the Citty, not daring to return in againe. There was another as ſtrange, which chãced in ſome yeares before, in the City of Nicea in Natolia, which was ruined; and the dreadfull effectes thereof are particularly written by Amianus Marcellinus, and vnder the reigne of the Emperor Conſtantine. Zonarus reporteth, that thirteene great Townes of Champaigne ground in Italy, or in the ſoyle called Terra di Lauora, were vtterly ouerthrowne. But among other, the City of Antioche was wonderfully afflicted. In the reigne of the Emperor Iuſtinian, it was ouerthrowne; and an infinite number of men therein ſwallowed. Soone after, it was re-builded by the liberality of the Emperor, and two yeares were not fully expired, when this goodlie and flouriſhing Cittie had beene newly finiſhed; but againe in like manner it was wholly ruined, and the greater part of the inhabitants buried in the downfall. This was in the beginning of Iuſtinians empire. Such miſt ries neuer hapned in the Kingdome of France: Galliæ terræmotibus mimimè quatiuntur.

It is likewiſe a happineſſe particular to France, that the ſweetneſſe and temperature of the Ayre is ſuch; as, in compariſon of that in other Prouinces, there is neyther exceſſiue colds, nor inſupportable heats. And if in ſome yeare it happen otherwiſe, it is but once in an hundred yeeres, and of ſo ſmall continuance, that it is onely but as a ſcantling: therby to let the Frenchmen know, the ſharpe rigour and diſcommodity that other people endure, to the end they may the better vnderſtand their owne felicity, and ſhape their comforts anſwerable therto. Length of Winters, and of Nightes; the bitter North-eaſt windes of Scythia; Mountaines of Ice and Snow, neuer hindereth their Commerce, nor their Voyages at all ſeaſons of the yeare. Theyr Seas doe not freeze, as often it dooeth in Pontus Euxinus, or Mare maior, euen ſo farre as the ſtreights of Conſtantinople. On the contrarie ſide, extreamity of heate conſtraines not men to keepe them a long while hidden vnder ground, without daring to come forth but in the night time: neyther to ſleepe in the water, and like the Amphibij or halfe Fiſhes, to dvvell there the moſt part of their time. That which is reported of many people, & particularly of the dwellers in Barbarie, Ormuz, and them of Taprobane, now called Samotra*: not any thing heere is like vnto them, but all moſt temperate. From ſo ſweete an Ayre, can proceede nothing but healthfulneſſe, the Heauens being no way ſubiect to ingender frequent and irkſome Diſeaſes. Therefore did Cæſar deſeruedly ſet this commendation on France: To be a Countrey moſt ſweete and healthfull. And ſo the Engliſh-men likewiſe, in the recitall of Froiſſard, doe note France, To be a moſt ſafe Country, and very ſweete, a courteous Country, with mild aire, and delicate Riuers.

It is an admirable matter alſo; that France produceth ſuch diuerſity of things and in ſuch aboundance: there being no Countrey throughout the World more commixed, and that hath leſſe meanes of ſubiect, for recourſe vnto other. It is by a priuiledge and particular right, and againſt the Law vvhich Nature hath giuen vnto other landes; but to ſpeake vprightly of France, it is proper to all, and in ſuch ſort, as there is not any thing particular to other, which is not common in it. In regard whereof, and conſidering what hath formerly bene ſaid, there needs no doubt to bee made: but that which Virgil meant to ſay in commendation of his Italy, was much more fitting for the Land of France.

How France is seated for Nauigation.

Moreouer, the Kingdome is most absolutely seated for Nauigation: because on the one side it hath the Mediterranean sea, and the Ocean sea on the other, enuironing it by a long extendure, and wherein are many goodly and commodious Ports and Hauens. As for the Land it selfe, it is as in the very middest or hart of Europe. Suriano, in his relation of France, hath well obserued it, and makes great reckoning of the commodiousnesse of the situation, vsing these very words.

Il regno di Francia, come quello che è in mezo de la Christiantià, è commodo & oportuno piu d'ogn'altro per vnire & diuidere a sua volontà le forze de i piu gran Principi, & de i popoli piu bellicosi, perche à dinanzi l'Italia, & l'Inghilterra a le spalle, a man destra la Spagna, da sinistra è la Germania, di qua Suizzeri, di qua Flamenghi, & oltra di questo è fra due mari, il Mediterraneo dell' vna parte, & l'Oceano d'all' altra: onde per mare & per terra puo facilmente fauorire tutte le imprese & tutti li disegni di ciascun Principe & Potentato del mondo. Et quanto a se è sicurissimo di ogni banda & per Natura, & per Arte.

The Kingdome of France, as that which is in the midst of Christendome, is oportune & commodious (more then all other) to vnite and diuide (at her owne will) the forces of the very greatest Princes, and of the most warlike people. Because it hath Italy before it, England to shoulder it, Spain on the right hand, Germany on the left: on this side the Switzers, on that side the Flemings. And beside all this, it is betweene two Seas, the Mediterranean on the one part, & the Ocean on the other: so that by sea and land, she may easily faubur all the enterprizes, and all the designs of euery Prince and Potentate in the World. And as for her selfe, she is most secure on euery side, both by Nature, and by Art.

Let no man then thinke strangely of it, if France be endowed with so many celestiall graces and fauours, and so wel peopled and inhabited, that any thing can be compareable thereto, in all other Countreyes whatsoeuer. There is not a iotte of voyde or waste ground; the goodly and great Cities and Townes, are all well filled with inhabitants, and very neer neighbouring one to another. Trauailing vpon the common high-wayes, from any part whither you please: you shal finde them bordered with great villages, faire Houses and Castles, and the people swarming euery where, euen as if al France were but one City.

The iniuries that are in other countries different from France.

It is not so in other regions, for in some there are immense Forrests, Lakes, and Marish grounds, taking vp immeasurable roome; as in Germany, and in the Low Countries. In other places, are great and sterile Mountaines, which take vppe no meane part of the Countrey: as Botero acknowledgeth, that the Apennines vsurpe a whole quarter of Italy. There can you not behold (as you may in France) small hils and dales, sweetly cloathed, and flourishing with delicate fruite trees, or vvealthie Vineyards, or else employed to some other profitable vse. As for the Alpes and Apennines, for the most part, there is nothing to be seene but sharpe and craggie rockes, bearing their heads vp vnto the clouds, couered with Mosse & Saltpeter, and hauing very dreadfull downefalles. There is nothing but hardnesse, rocks full of horror, places vnaccessable, vnprofitable, and fruiteleſſe, eyther for Men or Beasts.

Spain no way compareable to France.

Concerning Spaine, so much as it is far off from this happinesse of France, euen so (in comparison) is it as slenderly peopled. Behold the perspectiue thereof, according as Strabo hath drawne it downe for vs. Spaine (saith he) for the most part is very ill inhabited. For the Mountaines, Forrests, and Plaines (wherby the earth is dried, meager and barren, being but slenderly holpen with waters) takes vp too much ground.

Strabo in lib. 3 Τῆς Ἰβηρίας, τῶν μὲν πλέον ἐκατοντάρχας φασὶν ὄρη γὰρ καὶ δρυμοὺς καὶ πεδία λιπαρὰ ὀλίγοις ὕδασι ῥᾳδίως ἐκφέρειν, ὧν δὲ πάντων ἐστὶ μεγάλων ἐνίοτε ἐνδεῶς τοῖς πολλοῖς

The same Author saith in another place; that hee cannot beleeue that there hath bin so many Cities or Townes in Spain, as some haue reported, or else they counted Villages for Townes. For (saith hee) The Nature of the Countrey cannot receiue any number of Townes, in regard of the barrennesse of the ground; by being farre off, & retired from one of the worlds corners: and also the ayre breathing not gracious & agreeable. Thus you see the true description of Spaine, and this hee sayeth, because it is found in som Authors of Antiquity, who haue tearmed it to be happy and fertile: it is to be vnderstood of the Sea shores, and some Countries, where (in trueth) it is so. As in Batica, containing nowe the

But hee omitteth not alſo, to deſcribe the rigour, hardneſſe and ſharpeneſſe of the very greateſt part, which turneth towards the North: anſwerable to that now ſtill there to be ſeene. Heere is to be obſerued, that Spaine muſt needs giue place (by ods) to France for healthfulneſſe, when the ayre is there ſo hard, the riuers troubled, and the waters naught: whence inſueth the inflations, ſwellings, and euils in their throats, commonly termed the Kings euill, and ouer-frequent among them, ſo that they are enforced to ſeeke helpe in France, by the hands of the moſt Chriſtian King. Beſide, France hath alwayes had the prayſe to be well peopled, and to produce men at due ſeaſons. Cæſar himſelfe ſpeakes it, ſaying; A moſt fruitfull mother of men. And Strabo writeth, That the women are apt to beare children, and to nouriſh & bring them vp. In another place hee confeſſeth, That there is a certaine kinde of vertue and propriety, particular to the women of France, both in their teeming, and giuing ſucke vnto their children.

In Germany, with the Lowe Countries, and the Switzers Cantons (althogh they exceeded France twice or thrice in extendure of ground) they grant no more. Prou. 14, 28. In multitudine populi dignitas Regis, & in paucitate plebis ignominia Principis.

Likewiſe, the promiſe that God made to Abraham, was; That he would make him the cheefe of a great people: and his ſeede to be as the duſt of the earth: ſo that if one could number the duſt of the earth, ſo likewiſe ſhold his ſeede be numbred. At another time hee ſayde vnto him; Lift vp thine eyes to Heauen, and tell the ſtarres, if thou bee able to number them; in ſuch number ſhall thy ſeede be. The ſame promiſe he reiterated againe to his yongeſt ſonne Iacob. And this vvas it, that excited the hatred and enuy of the Egyptians, againſt this people of Iſrael; becauſe they ſaw their number to multiply, and for that reaſon they oppreſſed them: but the more they were oppreſſed ſo much the more were they encreaſed and multiplyed. But Dauid exalting himſelfe beyond meaſure, and glorying in the number of his people, would needs haue them counted, to knowe their iuſt number: whereby he prouoked God to anger againſt him, there beeing found in Iſrael eight hundred thouſand ſtrong men, able to beare armes and weapons, and in Iuda fiue hundred thouſand fighting men.

In the Romane hiſtory, when wee obſerue the encreaſing of that Commonwealth from time to time: it was by the number of the Cittizens, which were downe regiſtred by the Cenſors. Kings are Kings of men, and not of Lands. For no account is made of a King, by poſſeſſing a large length of vaine lands, barren, waſte, vnprofitable, and vnpeopled; nor for his multitude of high Mountains, deſert sert rockes, wild Forrests, which haue no other Inhabitants but sauage beasts. But rather, by commanding infinite numbers of people, that acknowledge him as their Soueraigne, willingly obey him, and reuerently respect him for their own good. This is that which maketh his state assured, and maketh him dreadfull to neighbours or enemies.

The true dignity of a king.

Moreouer, what great numbers of people Gaule hath produced at all times, yeelds proofes sufficient, as well by the troopes heeretofore parting thence, the Countrey being vncapeable to containe them; as also others, that haue gone and filled all other regions on the earth, aswel by Colonies and plantations in their coming thither, as some other Countries still inhabited by them, whereof we shall haue cause to speake more particularlie heereafter.

The plentie of people among the ancient Gaules, and the new.

This great number of men is the cause that France is adorned with so many faire and goodly Cities, as alwayes it hath bin, and at this day more then euer. Iosephus maketh mention, that at the time as Cæsar inuaded Gaule, there were then aboue twelue hundred. Among them that are now at this present, there are three hundred; wherein there are three and thirtie Byshops Sees, and fourteene Metropolitane or Archbyshopprickes; besides, an infinite number of other, a great company whereof are so potent in extendure & dignity, as they equall the verie capitall Cities of strange Nations, sparing here (beside) to speake of their strength.

The number of Cities whē Cæsar inuaded Gaule.

33. Bishopprickes, & 14 Archbyshopprickes.

I forbeare also a matter remarkable in France, that there hath beene (and some say now is) seauen and twentie thousand Burroughes or Townes, being Parishes, and hauing Steeples, and amongst them Villages so great and wealthy, as may compare with good Townes in other Countries, not bringing within the Lists of this account, all the Hamlets, Graunges, and particular houses, because they are innumerable.

Heere giue me leaue to sit downe and rest, as not knowing how to bee silent, or in what manner to speake, of the great, puissant, and opulent Cittie of Paris, which hath exalted her head aboue all other of the world. To forget it, I cannot; to speak worthily, or to describe and present it to the life indeede, it is impossible for me. It is the seat of the Kings of France, it is the principall residence of their Maiesties; it is the dwelling of their Soueraigne Iustice: which is there rendred & distributed by the Court of Parliament, being called the Court of Peeres; from whence all other are deriued; the same is the Chamber of Accompts, or of the Exchequer, and the arriuall for all the reuenewes of the Realme whatsoeuer.

The Authors modestie, in speaking of the City of Paris.

Also in this Citie, is that most ancient Vniuersity, so famously renowned thorough the world. All there is admirable, either in regard of the greatnesse and extent, or for the infinit structure of so many buildings, both publike and particular: but aboue all, the preasse and throngs of people wherewith it is inhabited, and which commeth thither from all parts, so that the like can hardly be spoken of in any place else. Beside, it is seconded with aboundance of all things, that can be desired for happinesse of life.

The famous vniuersitie of Paris.

Paris est en scauoir vne Greece feconde,
Vne Rome en grandeur Paris on peut nõmer.
Vne Asie en richesse on le peut estimer,
En rares nouueautez vne Afrique seconde.

That is;

Paris in knowledge may be Greece, as wise;
A Rome for greatnes, Paris may be nam'd:
An Asia in wealth it may be found;
A second Affricke, for rare nouelties.

Heereto might be added the grace of the situation, the faireſt and fitteſt that is to be seene: for being as pleasing and delectable, as commodious and profitable. In the very middest of rich Prouinces, enuironed with many Nauigable riuers that come and render their riches to Seine: passing thorow the middle of the Cittie, to gather and bring thither commodities from all the Countryes round about, coming from, and into an Ayre so good & healthfull. In which respect, though hauing such mightie accesse of people: it is lesse subiect to contagious diseases, then other the greatest Cities are ordinarily afflicted withall. And when any do happen, the effects are much more moderate, of far lesse danger and contagion, then is to be seene in other places.

The situation of the City of Paris, most pleasant and wholesome.

It is reported of the Citty of Constantinople, that from three yeeres to 3. yeeres, (without fayle) it is most strangely tormented mented with a peſtilence, vvhich doeth greatly diſpeople it: to the no meane amazement of many, that haue made deep ſearch into the cauſe. So it is in like manner affirmed by diuers, that the Grand Cairo is euery yeare afflicted with the Peſtilence. Vndoubtedly, when I conſider with my ſelfe, that great Louys, vulgarly called Chlouis, ſtayed his opinion, and made Paris the ſeat of his kingdome, leauing many other Cities which were then far greater: and that before him, the Emperor Iulian (being come into France) eſtabliſhed there his ordinary aboade, and called it Amiable or Louely. I am compelled to admire therein, their great Wiſedome and vnderſtanding, in chooſing a place ſo commodious, ſo pleaſant and anſwerable; although then it ſeemed to bee one of the leaſt Citties of Gaul. It would require an entire volumne to ſpeak thereof, and yet none will credit vvhat it is, except they haue the happineſſe to ſee it: & the ſight may much better ſatisfye them, then all that can be ſayde or written of it. Therefore I wil end this diſcourſe, adding onely that which is ſayde by Botero Parigi, Città che di popolo, & di abbondanza d'ogni coſa, auanza di gran lunga tutte l'altre di Chriſtianita. Paris, a City that in people and abundance of all things, goeth farre beyond all the reſt of Chriſtendome.

CHAP. II.

Of the People dwelling in this fruitfull Land of France, what they were being anciently Gaules, and afterwards Frenchmen: their Manhood, Valour, and ſucceſſefull Fortunes.

He proceedeth on with his ſecond diſcourſe.

NOugh hathbene ſayde (though too vnskilfully and altogether weakly) concerning the beauty, bountie, perfections & excellencies of the Land it ſelfe in all things: let vs now ſee (according vnto our intended purpoſe) what the people haue beene and are in their condition. Such as haue heard of ſo extraordinary felicity, perhappes may quickly condemne mee, by alledging it as a matter impoſsible: that in a Region ſo pleaſant, gracefull, and abounding in all kindes of goodneſſe: the inhabitants can any way be vertuous, valiant, and couragious. Great Cyrus was of that Opinion, when his victorious Perſians laboured to change their Countrey, in regard it vvas ſharpe, rough, rude, and Mountainous; for one of them which they had conquered, that was more pleaſant, conſiſting of goodly plaines, and euen Champaigne grounds. Which hee would not ſuffer them to doe, but ſhewed them, that like vnto ſeeds and plants, ſo are the liues of men made conformeable vnto thoſe Regions where they abide. As if hee would haue ſayd, that in a fair & fortunate countrey, the mindes of men alter, and quickly become effeminate.

The wiſedom of Cyrus againſt the folly of his ſoldiers.

Hanniball, not onely inuincible by the Armies of the Romaines, but alſo by ſo many victories ouer them, bringing them neerer to their vtter ruine, then euer they were or had bene: was ouerthrowne and confounded, by the ſoft and eaſefull delights of Capua. The ſweets of his winter ſoiourning there, did eneruate and weaken both him and all his army, which the rough Alpes and freezing ſnowes, had formerly made vnconquerable. Euen ſo we may ſay, and very truely, that the high and mighty courage of Alexander, was ſoftned by the luxury, ſumptuouſnes, and diſſolutions among the Perſians.

Hanniball victorious againſt the Romaines, loſt at his honor at Capua.

Alexanders diſſolutions in Perſia.

It is a matter verie frequent and ordinarie, that the Prouinces of greateſt happineſſe, become a prey to others, in beeing voluntarily deſtitute of couragious men, For, a more warlike people coming to inuade them, after they haue continued there for ſome time: they forget their former generoſity, as if they were wholly changed, and with the very ayre of the countrey, had deriued to themſelues the verie ſame Nature. Sicily hath alwaies bin the butte and ayme of all warlike people, as of the Grecians, the Carthagenians, and the Romaines, and of many other beſide.

Sicily the aim of warlike nations.

Alſo in Egypt, which is one of the verie choiſeſt, fertileſt, and richeſt Nations of the worlde: the moſt martiall people that come to ſtay there, doe after enter into ſuch a lazie condition, that they ſtand in neede of chaſing thence, euen as they they did to the first inhabitants. The like great and frequent changes haue bin often obserued, as well in ancient as more moderne times; and namely, vnder the Mahometane Calyffes. It is reported of the Wel* Salmacis in Caria (which is one of the regions of Natolia) that such as drinke the water thereof; of men, doe immediately become women. But the truth is, according to the relation of Vitruuius, that it is a place so goodly, pleasant, and where the people liue in such delights and dissolutions; that the courages of men, after they haue liued there any long while, becommeth altogither effeminate or womanish; which gaue such a subiect to the Fable, as if they had beene changed into women, and receyued into another Nature. Some haue attributed (to the selfesame reason) the vnmanlinesse of the latter Grecian Emperors of Constantinople, through the ouer-much delicacie of the Countrey.

*A Spring neere to Halycarnassus.

A morall Allusion of the Fable.

All this is contrary in France, for amidst such a great affluence, and euen among a world of pleasures; generous spirits are borne, truly warriors, and of men excelling in all vertues, it yeeldeth withall the like abundance of euery other thing; yea, euen among those Frenchmen as suffer themselues to be led into all pleasures, in peaceful & vndisturbed times; yet are they not thereby softned a iotte, neyther loose any of their courage, valour, and addresse to actions of Armes. But euen, as if they were meerely borne thereto, nor euer learned any other kinde of exercise: beeing euermore readie to giue ouer all pleasures, to follow the warres, march to fights, and throw themselues first into the mouth of danger. This is their true exercise, their naturall inclination, vvhich they knowe not how to forget or giue ouer: and whensoeuer they delight in hunting, yet are they more readie to returne to Armes.

Frenchmen are truly borne warriors.

The like naturall disposition is described by Zozimus, of the Emperor Valentinian, who although hee was a man giuen to much pleasure, and addicted himselfe thereto at due seasons: yet notwithstanding, when occasion required, he was alwayes readie to vndertake Armes, whereof as patiently hee endured all the paines, toiles, and incommodities, euen as if hee had taken a great pleasure and felicitie therein. Such a man was Demetrius King of Macedon among the Grecians, and Marcus Antonius among the Romaines; and Scipio giues very little ground vnto them in martial disposition. Cæsar also, speaking of his Army (composed for the most part of Gaules) saide: That his Souldiers, howsoeuer they were perfumed, yet they left not (for all that) to fight valiantly and couragiously. Milites suos etiam vnguentatos, bene pugnare. The like account vvas heretofore made, that the Belgians were the most hardiest and valiant amongst the Gaules: because, they would permit no Merchandizes to bee brought into theyr Countrey, that any way might serue to soften the naturall inclination of Men. But he knew well enough soon after, that valiancie and Militarie vertue was so natural, vnto them that were borne and norished vnder the ayre of Gaul, as it could not by any meanes bee quailed in them, or separated from them, by the plentie of any thing seruing vnto voluptuousnesse.

Sueton in Iulio, Cap. 67.

Some haue held opinion, that the rigour and austerity of the Persian youths, and their continuall manner of liuing in so stricte a kinde; prooued to be the onely cause, that they were much better men of warre, then their neighbours. And surely, the Lacedemonians differed not from this coniecture of them, when they saide: They made no great mervaile why they went so boldly to warre, and exposed themselues vnto death; considering, what small delight and contentment they tooke in life, in regard of the harsh and rigorous discipline of their lawes. But the Gentlemen of France, although they be borne and bred delicately, they do neuer fayle in generous courage: Armes, and verie hard Trauailes in Warre, are vnto them as sportes and pastimes; and, to speake iustly, they are born thereto, without neede of so much cunning and instruction, as others haue to exercise and prepare them.

The stricte forme of life obserued amongest the young men of Persia, wondred at amongest the Lacedemonians.

Those people that France hath bred and yeelded, haue alwayes bene redoubtable for their Armes, to all other Nations of the world. The Romaines well felte it, when they were hewed in peeces by the Gaules, on the day at Allia. And afterward, when (vpon their sodaine coming on them) they were constrained to hide themſelues in their Capitoll; the which yet was not ſufficient to ſaue them till (in the end) they were gladde to pay a great quantity of golde and ſiluer to the Gauls, for their ranſom. And althogh their hiſtorians labour to make men beleeue, that Camillus the Dictator exterminated the greater part of the Gaules, & brought back againe that which was giuen for ranſome; yet notwithſtanding, Polybius a very ancient Author, neere enough to thoſe times, well experienced in the hiſtory, & being an excellent writer beſide, hee declareth the contrary, ſaying: The Gaules went away victorious, hauing granted peace to the Romanes, by meanes of a great ſumme of gold, which they brought thence with thē. Which is moreouer confirmed by Suetonius, who ſayeth; One of the houſe of the Neroes, Anceſtors to the Emperor Tiberius, hauing made warre on the Gaules called Senones, deſcending from them that ſurprized Rome: brought backe the gold of the ranſom which had bin payed them, & that it was not recouered by Camillus, as the rumour ranne. And beſide, thoſe very men that ſacked Rome, returning thorow Italy, made alliance with the elder Dioniſius, the Tyrant of Siracuſa, and aided him vvith theyr troopes againſt the Locrians and Crotones his enemies, as it is auouched by Trogus Pompeius.

If the loſſe of the Gauls had bin ſo notable, as Liuius hath deſcribed it: they could not haue peopled a greater country in Italy, & made war ſo often on the Romans, as at diuers times they did. Wee had enough to do (ſaith Cicero) to reſiſt them & to defend our ſelues, being continually aſſailed by them. And our Captaines and Commanders in war perpetually accounted, that it was fitter to defend & beare off their blowes in ſuch a war, then to ſet on or aſſault them. It is wel known of great Marius, when he oppoſed himſelfe againſt the effortes and ſtratagems of the Gaules, that hee neuer durſt attempt to enter their Lands. They to whome all other war was eaſie, loſt all their fencing trickes againſt the Gaules. Hitherto (ſaith Saluſt) the Romans euermore conceiued, that all things gaue way, and were to be yoaked by their vertue. But only againſt the Gaules, when they were to fight with thē, not for honour and glory, but for defence of their liues.

Nor did they tearme this warre but tumult & inſurrection, becauſe that by the promptitude of the Frēch, in vſing arms; they had not the leiſure to beate their drum, to raiſe or call their companies; but ſuddenly, without any choiſe, tooke ſuch for ſoldiers as could carry Armes. They had a particular Exchequer or Treaſurie by it ſelfe, deſtined to be imployed onely about the charges of the Gauliſh warres, whenſoeuer they hapned: as being one of the greateſt & moſt extreame neceſsities belonging to their City. And though in all other wars ſome ſtood exempted from going to them, as ſuch as had ſpent their time in war, being called Veteranes, or ancient ſeruitors; yet (in ſuch a caſe) they much needs march, without any regard at all of ſuch exemption. Vt oportet bello Gallico vt maiorū iura moreſq; præſcribunt, nemo eſt Ciuis Romanus, qui ſibi vlla excuſatione vtendum putet. According to the Lawes of our Anceſtors (ſaith Cicero) and according vnto ordinary cuſtome, there is not any Romane Citizen, that muſt think onely to propound any exemption, when there happeneth any war with the French.

Nay, that which is more, the Romaines quitted and gaue them freely the honour belonging to actions of arms. Cato voluntarily confeſſeth in Saluſt, That the Grecians had gone beyond the Romans in eloquēce, and the Gauls them, in the glory of war. And this is the reaſon, why they alwaies ſtood in feare of the country that brought forth a people naturally warriors, & in ſo great a number. When they named that Prouince, they would ſay, It was too fearefull for the Romaines. Neuer was any ſpeech of the leaſt ſtir or tumult in Gaule, but they would all tremble. And thereupon, immediately after the death of great Cæſar the Dictator, it was propounded to the Senate to giue ouer Gaule, leauing it to full liberty, although it was formerly conquered and aſſured. Theſe are the very words of Appian: There was (ſaith hee) made a Decree and arreſt to the Senate, concerning Gaule: all the Senators being poſſeſſed with feare. A little lower hee ſaith: Some amongſt them were of the minde, That they muſt needes giue ouer, and forſake all the whole Countrey and People, leauing them at libertie, and to enfranchiſe them from ſubiection vnto the Empire. So much they ſtood in feare and dread of the Neighbourhoode of Gaule.

It is not to the Romains only, that the French haue made knowne their vnconquerable corage, and to feel the strength of dreadles armes; what Canton? what quarter of the world is there, where they haue not planted their conquering Ensigns? The Celts (for so the Grecians termed the French) are found to dwell in most parts of the vniuerse, as hauing lefte France, in regard of their ouer-great multitude, to seeke new countries elsewhere, which they conquered with their swords, and became Mastersofthem. They are dispersed ouer al Europe, and hardly is there any quarter, where they haue not left the markes of their victories, and records of their name. Spaine is full of such Colonies, whose names would bee considered out of diuers countries, according as ancient Geographers haue stiled them. And first to speake of the Celtiberians*, who are proofe sufficient to our purpose, and accounted to be the most valiant people in Spaine. No doubt, as they stil retaine the name, so doe they (in like manner) keepe the vertue and valour of the Gaules their Ancestors, that came to inhabite there, and also to make a Plantation of theyr name.

*People of the Celtes in France, planting themselues by the Riuer Iberus.

Some foure thousand of those Celtiberians, defended most couragiously the citty of  Numantia*, and sustained the siege for fourteene years, against the Effortes of many Roman armies, yea, and of theyr very cheefest Captaines, vntill such time as they were inforced to send their Scipio thither. In the end, the so long besiedged Celtiberians, chose rather to burn themselues and their Citty together, then to yeeld to their implacable Enemies, vnto whom they left nothing to adorne theyr triumph, but their very name onely.

*A Citie of Celtiberia, in Spain, besiedged 14 yeares by the Romaines.

At this very day, Portugal and Gallizia do carry the names of their first founders the Gaules. They entred also vpon a great part of Italy, comprehending (in the same respect) the name of Gallia Cisalpina, wher they first entred in the reigne of Tarquinius Priscus, King of the Romaines, about the year of the world, MMM.CCC.LX. There they founded Millain, & afterward Brescia, Verona and other Cities: this couragious, hardy, and warlike Nation (I vse the very wordes of Trogus) the cheefest next to Hercules, and iustly deseruing to be called immortal, they (I say) ouerwent the sharpnesse and bitternes of the Alps, vnpasible for the snowes & colds. They are found to dwell thorow all Germanie, where are the Boemes and Carnes; in Pannonia or Austria, and Hongaria; in Transyluania, Valachia, and Albania; in Thrace, where they haue reigned a sufficient lēgth of time. This may be the reason, why som of our Ancients named Europe, Celtica, Κέλτιαν, because that the most part of the inhabitants, called themselues Celtes or Gauls, as is plainly auouched.

Called also Gallia Togata, and Citerior Gallia, now named Lombardie.

For the same respect, an ancient Geographer saide, that the Northerne part of the earth, was inhabited by the Scithians; the Eastern by the Indians, the Southerne by the Æthyopians; and the Occidentall or Western by the Celts or Gaules: each place and part of the world taking first denomination, according to the excellency of the people that were the principal and most renowned in euerie part. The verie same Gaules haue made all Macedon and Greece to tremble, and haue solde peace to all other people, who came to buy it, before they were any way assailed, as affrighted with the name of the Gauls onely. Trogus reporteth it in this manner: Tantus terror Gallici nominis erat, vt etiam Reges non lacessiti, vltro pacem ingenti pecunia mercarentur. Such was (saith he) the terrour of the Frenchmens name, that Kings neuer beeing encountred, came of themselues, and by theyr owne meere motion, to purchase their peace with great summes of Money.

In like manner, such account was made of their man-hoode, that there hapned not any war in the East, but they were the forwardest partakers therein. It was euermore to them, that afflicted Princes fled for succour, as it is declared by the same Trogus, and heere you may reade his owne verie Words. Gallorum ea Tempestate tantæ fœcunditatis iuuentus fuit, vt Asiam omnem velut examine

There was then ſuch an aboundance of youthfull French, that they filled Aſia, euen as if it had bin ſwarms of Bees: in ſuch ſort, that the Kings of thoſe quarters of the Eaſt, attempted not any war, wherein they had not Frenchmen vnder pay. And if they chāced to be expulſed from their eſtates, they had no other recourſe, but to throwe themſelues into the armes of the French. Such was the terror of the Frenchmens Name, or the inuincible felicity of their Armes; that Kings knew not howe to prouide, nor conſerue their Maieſtie, or to recouer it againe being loſt, without the valor of the French. To conclude, being called by the King of Bithinia, to lend him ſuccour, after they had parted away with victory; they alſo parted or diuided his kingdom with thē, and ſurnamed the Countrey Gallo-Græcia, or French-Greece.

Nowe, as concerning ſuch as haue caried the name of Frenchmen or Gauls, ancient ſtanders, and dwellers in partes neerer hand, as well on this ſide, as beyond the Rheine: they long time made warre with the Romanes, purſuing them with their Armies, and ouer-labouring them by ſo many courſes; that at length they expulſed them quite from amongſt the Gaules. They were firſt obſerued to appeare vnder that name of Frenchmen, in the time of the Emperor Galien; and from thence onward, the Romane Hiſtories are copious, how manie times they paſſed and repaſſed the Rheine, to make warre with the Romaines, vvhen they thought to teare away Gaule out of their hands. Panegyricall Authors, exalting thoſe Emperors with praiſes to heauen, that had in any encounter (how ſilly ſoeuer) got any aduantage againſt the French; do yet make it ſufficiently known what great account was made of this people and generous Nation, yea, more then of any other, as being moſt fearefull to them, and to whome (for this cauſe) they yeelded themſelues tributaries.

The Emperor Probus hauing made warre on them, and wonne the vpper-hand in ſome encounter; hee tooke diuers of them priſoners, which he led away into Aſia. Soon after, they made an eſcape, & being imbarked in certaine ſmal veſſels, which they found fitting for their purpoſe: they ouer-ran and rauaged the coaſts of Greece, and the Iſles of the Ionian ſea, beſieging and taking Siracuſa; and afterward paſsing the ſtraites of Gebaltare, returned home againe into theyr owne country. The inuaſion of Holland, & other places by the Gaules.

The ſucceſſe of the Gaules that were led priſoners into Aſia.

In the end, the Emperors well vnderſtood their valour, and made vſe thereof to their ſeruice. Conſtantine the Great, in the warre hee made againſt Licinius: had great ſtore of them in his Armie, vnder conduct of a verie valiant French Captaine, named Bonicius, whoſe manhood is well noted by Ammianus Marcellinus. At the ſame time, partly by conqueſt, partly by conniuence of the Emperours; they extended the Gaules name very farre, and did ſo great ſeruices to the Romains, that they filled whole Legions of them. Eſpecially, vnder the Emperors Conſtans, Conſtantius, Valens and Valentinian, as is to be ſeene in Ammianus Marcellinus, Zozimus, and diuers other Hiſtorians of thoſe times.

more ſtrict alliance with them, could find out a Mellobands, Prince of the French, beſide many other Captaines and Soldiers: by whoſe meanes he aſſured his owne eſtate, and carried away great Victories from the Germanes, whereof thirty thouſand were ſlaine in the field. This Prince did ſo highly eſteeme of them, as they ſerued him in all occaſions: yea, they filled vp the Army which he gaue to Theodoſius, to make quietneſſe in the Eaſt, and to repulſe thence the Gothes. Moreouer, he fauoured and aduanced them to great charges of his Court, and euen (as if (in reſpect of them) he began to grow in diſtaſte with his Romanes; ſo prooued it (partly) to be the cauſe of death.

Claudian his words of the Gaules.

It is moſt plaine and apparant, that for the ſpace of about 200. yeares, they were the threſhing Flaile, the terror & amazement of the Romane Empire: wherto (to vſe the ſame words that Claudian ſayth of them) They ſolde peace and quietneſſe at the prizes of money, and tooke great recompences to ceaſe their fights. The Epithets vvhich the Authors of thoſe times gaue them, were the names of Terrible, dreadfull, and redoubted Warriors; as being the onely nation, that (more then all other elſe could do) amated, bruiſed, yea, & vtterly brake in peeces the Romane forces.

The paſſage of the Gaules into Aſia and Affrica.

After that this Monarchy of the French in Gaule was fully eſtabliſhed: they could then vndertake other great enterptizes & voyages. How many times did they paſſe in Armes, both into Aſia and Affrica, to chaſe thence the Infidels, Sarazens, and Turkes, to deliuer the Holy land, and the Chriſtians that were there in their ſeruitude? There hath not bene any expedition in Chriſtendome, wherein they haue not bene heads and conducters, yea euen the better part it ſelfe. Many times haue they ſuccoured & re-eſtabliſhed the Emperors of Conſtantinople. And in the end, to reuenge the death of Iſaacius Angelus, (whom they had reſeated ſom ſhort time before) cruelly murdred by the Tyrant Murſuffle: they took in their aſſault) that great City, where they commanded (almoſt) foure hundred yeares. They made themſelues ſo knowne thoroughout the Eaſt and South parts, and haue ſo liuely engrauen there the memorie of theyr name: that (euen to this day) all the Orientals terme the inhabitants of Europe, by the word Franki, as thinking that name to be vniuerſall. As in like manner the Arabians and the Abyſſines, who call Europe by the name of Frankia.

The Gaules gaue great ſuccour to the Emperors of Conſtantinople. Nicet. Choniates

Ozorius, the learned byſhop of Sylues reporteth, that the Indians when the Portugals make warre againſt them: they call them by no other name then Francki, as confeſſing naturally, that ſince the braue expeditions of the French, againſt the Turkes and Sarazins; this name (full of admiration among thoſe people) had ſo ſpread it ſelfe thoroughout all Aſia and Affrica, that alwayes afterward, the ſame was to be attributed vnto all the Weſtern people.

The Portugals warring on the Indias.

But to deliberate no longer at this time on all the expeditions of warre, and voyages attempted by the French for the chriſtian name, for the defence of religion & the Church, againſt Moores, Sarazins, Turkes, and other Mahometanes, in diuers Countries of the world, and the glorious and goodly actions there by them performed: Can any thing bee tearmed more hardy, valiant and generous, then that which they did for conqueſt of the holy Land? Vndertaking ſo long a Voyage, croſſing ſo many Countries, & with ſuch ſtore of difficulties: Nothing could dant or turne them; nothing ſeemed impoſſible to them, beeing altogether inflamed with a zealous & diuine deſire. They expoſed themſelues to all kindes of dangers, iuconuenience of places and paſſages, famine, thirſt, peſtilence and warre: meerly prodigal of their liues, for religious zeale. In whatſoeuer we read concerning antiquity, yea euen of the fabulous ages, neuer are to be found ſuch deedes of proweſſe, as they did in that conqueſt.

The painefull trauailes of the French, for conqueſt of the Holy Land.

Let Godfrey of Bullen ſet himſelf before you, with his gallant French troopes, trauerſing al Germany & Hungaria, & ariuing at Conſtantinople; there is aſſailed by diuers ambuſcadoes on the Emperors behalf, yet ouercoming them al, euen as if it were againſt his wil to preuaile. Then looke on him paſsing the ſtraits of the Helleſpont, beſieging the city of Nicea, one of the ſtrongeſt in all the Eaſt, munited with al things ſuſtained and defended by a people reſolued, as wel for aſſaults giuen, as ſallies repulſed, or by any cunning to bee circumuented. During this ſiedge, the Army of Soliman, conſiſting of 500000. men, comming expreſſely to rayſe the ſiedge, is ouercom, broken, and cut in peeces, & the City ſurprized in the end.

A battell giuē by the French in Caramania againſt Soliman and his Turkes.

After this, behold another battel giuen in Cicilia or Caramania, by thirty thouſand French onely, againſt an Armie of tvvo hundred thouſand Turkes and Mahometanes, led by the ſame Soliman, and the Sultane of Perſia. Theſe two hundred thouſand Turkes, hauing (at theyr firſt charge from farre off) couered all the Chriſtian Army with a cloud of Arrows; and making a counterfet ſhew of flight, ſent another ſhower of ſhafts in the ſame maner, and then a third, they not hauing any meanes to ioyne or come nere them. So that there was ſcarſely one man among the Chriſtians, but was wounded with their ſteeled Arrowes, ſome in the armes, others in the legges, and many in diuers parts of their bodies, notwithſtanding the helpe of their Targets: euen as if we ſaw the like Army of the Romanes led by M. Craſſus againſt the Parthians. Vntill ſuch time as Godfrey reſolued to make a pretence of flight, and (indeed) retyred; as if he had bene no longer able to endure them. Which moued the Turkes to purſue after them out of order, as if they wer; altogether ouerthrown and diſhartned. But when the French behelde them within their compaſſe, that they might deale with them by handy ſtroakes: all wounded as they were, they gaue ſuch a couragious charge vpon the Infidels, that they foiled and vanquiſhed the whole Army. So proceeding on, the Citties of Tharſus and of Edeſſa, and all the other betweene them, were likewiſe taken.

A worthy ſtratagem of Godfrey of Bullen, in an vrgent neceſſty.

The ſharpe & ſeuere beſiedging of the City of Antioche by Godfrey of Bullen.

Antioche beſiedged by a long ſiedge, the beſiegers being inceſſantly aſſayled, as well with the yſſuing foorth of an Army that was vvithin, as by the ambuſcadoes of many troopes at liberty abroad, beſides cutting off victuals, and all other commodities from them. In theſe extremities they were alſo oppreſſed with contagious diſeaſes, famine, and other kindes of neceſsities and miſeries, euery thing being oppoſite and contrary to them, and the Emperor of Conſtantinople, doing his very vttermoſt to endamage them. All which notwithſtanding, they loſt not a iot of courage, or became any way at all diſheartned in this theyr enterprize, although to make their miſery much more: there came alſo on them another dreadfull Army, containing all the powers of the Eaſt, and appearing impoſſible to bee reſiſted. But the Chriſtians conducted by Godfrey of Bullen, ouer-ſpent and wearied as they were, hauing giuen the battaile; ouercame the great Armies, and droue them to flight.

The happie ſucceſſe of the Chriſtiās againſt the Infidels.

I let paſſe an infinite number of particular charges, encounters, combates, fights, ambuſhes, ſurprizes and aſſaults, to come to the ſiedge of Ieruſalem, where they met with all reſiſtance poſſible, both by force and cunning: which neuertheleſſe (in the ende) after infinite famous actions of Armes, was wonne by liuely force, and in a generall aſſault. All this was done in leſſe then two yeares, from the yeare 1097. to the yeare 1099. when Ieruſalem was wonne, and in the Moneth of Iuly. Then was Godfrey choſen King of Ieruſalem, who yet refuſed the crowne of gold, ſaying; It fitted not him to weare that pompe, where his Lord and Sauior wore one of ſharpe pricking thornes. Euery one of the other Princes & French Lords, which made vp the body of the Army, were alſo partakers in the chiefe poſſeſsion of Citties and Prouinces thereabout; & there was not a man among them, but was capable of holding the Empire of the world, and by farre greater reaſon, then is reported of Alexanders Captaines. And this may iuſtly be the cauſe (in part) that the ſucceſſe was not ſo great as it might haue bene: they beeing able to haue paſſed on, ſo farre as the extremeſt parts of the Eaſt, to conquer all the Country, and plant their Enſignes on the banks of the Indian Seas. In briefe, there was neuer any thing comparable thereto, neither for religious piety, nor manhood in Armes.

The conquest of Ieruſalem by Godfrey of Bullen.

The honor & rewards of ſo great deſeruing.

It was alſo a matter admirable in Godfrey, that being Souldier; he ſhould bee culpable of ſo great prouidence, iuſtice, and moderation of ſpirit. It is reported of him, that although he was King; yet he cloathed himſelfe, and liued ſo ſimply, as the very meaneſt Souldier about him. So that vpon a certain day, diuers Lords of the Country being come vnto him, to preſent him with gifts, but (to ſpeak truly) to eſpie and take knowledge of what they could: being brought before him, they found him ſitting on a Sacke ful of ſtraw, & vpon the ground. After they had well obſerued obserued it, beeing driuen to no meane admiration, they made enquiry; how so great a Prince, beeing a Lord of such matchlesse merit, hauing shaken all the East, and seized on the very greatest kingdome, should be seated so poorely, without any pompe, no rich hangings, nor any Guard about him, to make him dreadfull to such as should come neere him. But he demanding what they had saide, replied thus: It is the best seate for a mortall man, and by good right the earth should suffer and serue to beare him for a time: in regard that (afterward) it must be the house for his body to dwell in. Which when the Lords had heard, admiring his answer, humility, and wisedome, they returned thence, saying: This is (indeede) such a man, as ought to rule ouer all these Regions: and to him (in equity of desert) it belongeth, to commaund ouer all other people whatsoeuer.

The admirable humility and moderation of Godfrey of Bullen & his answer to certaine Lords.

How long time the frech held the kingdome of Ierusalem.

Thus the kingdome of Ierusalem was held for the space of about fourescore & tenne yeares by the French, who (in the meane while) made warre vpon the Infidels, being succoured from time to time by the Kings of France: among whom, Lewes the seuenth, called the young, and Philip Augustus went thither in person. But afterward, this kingdome was conquered by Saladine, first Souldan of Egipt: And then the French, vnder conduct of their Kings, ceassed not alwayes to attempt voyages and expeditions, as shall be declared in place more conuenient. Heere I forbeare to speake of the great warres and goodly exploits in Armes, of the French against the Allemaignes, Hunnes, Danes, Normans, Saxons, Sarrazins, Gothes, Lombards, and English, which are to be discourssed heereafter.

The apparant singularity of the French, aboue all other Nations.

There is not any other people, that haue caused themselues more to bee spoken of, to spread their renowne so far, and enterprise matters more great, goodly, & difficult, then they haue done. Other Nations neuer could come neere them, no, not the Spaniards, of whom Strabo yeeldeth testimony, that they neuer did, or euer durst vndertake great occasions. They beeing (saith he) exercised and inured to slender exploits, & lowe or base enterprises; as some light ambuscadoes, courses, and brigandages or theeueries. But concerning the valour of the French, and the greatnesse of their courage; there remaineth very sufficient proofes in antiquity. Some haue attributed this quality to them, to be voyd of feare, and boldly to cast themselues into the midst of dangers. Strabo reporteth, that certaine Frenchmen beeing brought to Alexander the Great; when hee demanded of them, what it was they most feared; made this answer: Nothing at all, except the Heauens should fall on our heads. Signifying by this manly reply, that feare had no power to freeze their blood, or vsurpe any place in their warlike soules.

Strabo in Lib. 7.

A braue answer of the French to Alexander the Great.

In like manner, they neuer knew what it was to flye, or turne their backs in the most dangerous fights; neither to giue so much as the least inch of ground: as the Emperour Leo declareth in his Art Military or Tacticks, and Chalcondilus the Grecian, in his Turkish History. Both of these Authors do affirme, that they hold this the heauiest sinne, which can happen to be committed by them. The selfesame is also auouched by Aelianus, who deliuereth these very words. Among all men, they that most affect dangers, and most valiantly expose their liues to perilles; I vnderstand them to be the Gaules. The whole subiect of their Songs, is of such men of vertue, as died valiantly in foughten battels. Crowned they combate, and adorned with Markes & Trophees of their victories: as well to honor the worthy acts which they haue done, as to serue for memory to posterity, according to the manner of the Grecians. But aboue all, flight is held so dishonest and shameful among them, that very many times, they will not get them gone, or make escape away from a tottering house, though it be ready to fall vppon them, or all on a flame, and themselues in immediate danger to be burned. This may seeme very strange, and rather blame worthy, then commendable: yet it is done in no other regard, but only to shew what their resolution hath alwaies bene, as shunning all occasions, whereby they might bee reputed timorous.

Aelian. De var Hist. lib. 11.

In like manner, the Emperor Iulian, speaking of his soiourning among the Gaules, saieth; That it was with the most warlike, and onely couragious people of all other Nations. Pausanias declareth, that although they were wounded quite thorough their bodies with the sword, and euen cleft in twaine with axes sharpe slices; yet notwithstanding, not a iote of their their courage abated. And when they wer ſhot through with darts and arrowes, ſo long as any reſpite of life remained, or the very laſt gaſpe or breathing; they fought ſtil manfully, and made a maſſacre among their enemies: yea, there were many among them that ſnatched the Arrowes & Darts out of their own wounds, and ſhot them backe againſt the Greeks, or, being neerer hand, ſlew them with the ſame Arrowes and Darts, euen by meere ſtabs. Whereat the Greekes being amazed, to behold ſuch wilfulneſſe in fight, ſuch courage, contempt of death, & prodigality of life; not knowing whereto they ſhould attribute it, nor (to ſpeake truely) what to ſay of it, (beeing wont to commend no men but themſelues) they ſaide; This goes quite beyond the nature of men.

Ariſt. in Ethic. lib. 3. cap. 7.

In the ſame caſe and reſpect, Ariſtotle, imagining that ſuch ſtrength and valiancy was without example, and aboue the capacity of any humane ſpirit: attributed this viuacite of ſoule, to a kinde of furious and naturall inſenſibility, not fearfull of any thing; neither earthquakes, nor the rougheſt ſtormes or tempeſts: Euen like (ſaieth hee) as it is reported of the Celts or Gaules. Warre was their true trade & exerciſe, there was not a man among them, that would excuſe himſelfe from marching to the field, without any diſtinction of ages. The olde man, wearied and ſpent as he was, went to it as cheerefully, as hee that farre greater force and vigor. A yong lad, euen in the firſt floure of his time, found therein no difficulty at all; he made offer of his youthfull members freely, to be hardened by colds, and inured to trauailes, alwayes diſpoſed and ready to ſupport moſt difficult occaſions, yea, and the very dreadfulleſt accidents of war.

No diſtinction of yeares among the Gaules from marching in Armes.

Amian Marcel. in l. 15.

In briefe, as it is confirmed by Marcellinus, a faithfull Author, a Souldier or mā fit for the warre, who hath liued any time among them; ſhall neuer be there mette withall, as among the Romanes: where there were ſome, that to ſhun the warres, wold cut off ſome member of their owne, eſpecially their thumbs; Whom we termed (ſaith he) in deriſion and mockery, * Murci. To men of ſuch baſe and ſeruile condition, as will thus cut off a ioynt, to make themſelues vncapable of being Soldiers, may bee referred that iniurious French diſgrace, Poltron, à police trunco; A knaue hath his thumbe cut off.

* One that cutteth off his thumb, becauſe he will not go to war.

This generoſity and greatneſſe of courage, is likewiſe familiar among the womē of France, whereof we haue teſtimony in the ſame Author Ammianus Marcellinus, who writeth thus. If a man of Gaule enter into a quarrell, his wife being with him, there is not any troupe of ſtrangers able to reſiſt or ſtand againſt their ſtrength. Eſpecially, when the women are moued & enflamed with choller, ſtretching foorth their brawny armes, griping their ſtrong knit hands together, great and white as ſnow: ſo that both with feet & fiſts, they diſcharge blowes as liberally, as if they wer ſtones from ſlings, or quarrels from Croſſebowes. And as they are thus excelling in magnanimity, ſo are they as complete in other perfections: but cheefely in prouidence, diſcretion, and good aduice.

The ſprightly courage of the Gauliſh women. Marcel. in l. 14.

VVe reade, that before the Gaules paſſed into Italy, a ſtrong ſedition happened to grow among them, which diſperſed it ſelfe into a ciuill warre. But the women, euen as the two Armies were ready to meete each other; threw themſelues into the middeſt betweene them, and queſtioning the reaſon of their difference, drew them to ſo great equity, and fulneſſe of content on eyther ſide; that they bega admirable and reciprocall loue and kindneſſe among them, not onely betweene the Townes and Citties, but alſo in the houſes neighbouring together. Wherupon, after that time, they continued all conſultations of their affaires (as well concerning warre as peace) with theyr wiues, and pacified all quarrels and differences with their neighbors and kindred, onely by their meanes. And therefore, in the compoſition which they made with Hannibal, when he paſſed by the Gaules, they concluded (among other Articles) in this manner. That if it ſo came to paſſe that if the Gaules pretended any wrong to be done them by the Carthegenians; the Carthagenian Captaines and Gouernours (which were in Spaine) ſhould be the Iudges thereof. Contrariwiſe, if the Carthagenians could alleadge, that the Gaules had offered them any iniury; the women of Gaule ſhould bee Iudges therein. And therfore Plutarke had great reaſon, to ranke thoſe Ladyes in number, among them reputed to be vertuous women.

Plut. in De clar. Mulier.

The compoſition that was made betweene Hanniball & the Gaules.

The

The Gaules euer called them to their councels and conſultations, as well for warre as peace, becauſe they knew their naturall diſpoſition to be ſuch; as not a woman among them, would ſeeke any to ſoften and weaken (willingly) the boldeſt or moſt couragious enterprize her husband could vndertake. And this may be the cauſe, why the ancient Romane Soldiers would not be maried: As now at this day, there are certaine kingdomes of the Indiaes, where the Noble-men will by no meanes admit mariage. But the Gaules knew well enough, that this ſexe were ſo farre off, from any way hindring their Martiall deſignes; that they would by no meanes permit the very leaſt inclination to negligence or cowardiſe; they rather ſerued as ſharpe ſpurres to their vertue, to excite, encourage, and animate them more and more.

The Gaules called their wiues to conſultations and councels.

Kingdomes in India where Noble men admit not mariage.

To this purpoſe, I may not omit a notable example, though not of the ancient Gauliſh women; but of a French Lady, as yet recent and freſh in memory. Bertrand du Gueſclin had beene alwayes a moſt valiant Knight, and one highly renowned in all Hiſtories. After he had performed many worthy enterprizes, euer to his fame and honour: he maried with a beautifull Lady, named Tiphania, deſcended of a noble family. After which mariage, he growing to leaue, and diſcontinue his former exerciſe of Armes; as he ſate diſcourſing with his Lady, ſhe gently began to blame and reproue him, declaring, that (before their mariage) hee followed the warres, wherein hee had atchieued the cheefeſt reputation. And that it neyther ſuted with the nature, nor duty of a true Gentleman, to loſe the leaſt repute of honour wonne before, by ouer-much affecting a new made choiſe. As for mee (quoth ſhee) who ought to ſhine by the bright radiance of your fame, I ſhall account my ſelfe too low deiected, if you giue ouer a courſe ſo well begun, and loſe your ſpirits in doating loue, wer it to one more worthy then my ſelfe.

Behold what generous words of a woman can doe.

Theſe words did ſo neerely touch the Knight, that hee began againe to follow Armes, wherein he carried himſelfe ſo valiantly, that they did well and worthily attribute it to him, to ſtand as a ſtout Rampier for France, in the very ſharpeſt times of warre, and euermore made a meere Barre of his body, againſt the hotteſt inuaſions of the Engliſh. By vertue of his valour, King Charles the fift, hauing reconquered moſt part of thoſe territories, which had bene inſulted on in the reignes of the precedent Kings: alwayes helde head againſt that valiant Edward, ſurnamed the Blacke Prince, and Prince of Wales, and diſappointed all his hopes. It was he that re-eſtabliſhed Henry the 11. King of Caſtille, in his kingdome, in deſpight of all the Armies and Engliſh forces. Hee was alſo made Conſtable of France, by King Charles the fift, who helde him in ſuch endeared affection for his valour, that hauing beſtowed great gifts on him in his life time; after his death, hee did him ſo much honour, as to let him be buried at S. Denis, at the feete of the ſame Toombe, which this King had prepared there for himſelfe.

The honorable actions of Bertrand du Gueſclin.

Whatſoeuer is heere ſet downe, concerning this honourable Lady Tiphania, hath beene, and is as familar to all the Ladies of France, who partake in the ſelfeſame affection; and couet rather to enflame, thē freeze their husbands forwardneſſe, in winning honour by Armes; and the like they are (in all reſpects) to their children. For whoſoeuer will but aduiſedly well conſider, on the admirable generoſity, and greatneſſe of courage in the people of Gaule; they will make no meruaile at all, of thoſe bolde words vſed by the braue Souldier Vercingetorix. If I could (quoth hee) vnite together all the French: I ſhould compoſe ſuch an Army of men, as if the whole world did coniure, and bend all force againſt them, they were not able to withſtand them. Take it as a vaunt or brauado who will. The very proofe of their fights and conqueſts, made but by ſome part of their people, may yeeld ſufficient teſtimony, that if the words ſpoken by Vercingetorix had bene put in execution; they would haue prooued true, and the ſame effect muſt needes haue followed.

All the Ladies of France are equall to Tiphania.

Iul. Ceſ. in com. lib. 5.

And to ſpeake truely, if we conferre them with other Nations, we ſhall apparantly perceiue, that the French haue gon beyond all in Military vertue. So many expeditions, and yet in ſo farre remote Countries, ſo many warres attempted, & fortunately finiſhed; ſo many foughten battels; and ſo many actions of Generoſity, ſity, haue made them ſufficiently knowne to the world. The Greeks and the Romanes (albeit their ſworne enemies) doe render but too true teſtimonies thereof: not ſpeaking (in the like tearmes) of any other people whatſoeuer. But eſpecially the Romanes, who neuer feared any Nation ſo much as they, whom they acknowledged to be fatall to their City, and the greatneſſe thereof. So that when the Gaules of Italy, but particularly thoſe on the hither ſide of the Alpes, made but a countenance of remouing themſelues; or deſigned any enterpriſe: they were immediately poſſeſſed with terror, and in a continuall apprehenſion, omitting no needfull prouiſion of all things, euen as if their City were to be beſiedged againe, or halfe ſurprized. Polybius ſaith. They verily perſwaded themſelues, that they ſhould neuer become Maſters of Italy; no, nor conſerue their owne lands ſufficiently; ſo long as they had the Gaules to be their neighbors.

The Romanes alwayes ſtood in feare of the Gaules.

Polyb. in lib. 2.

They felt againe the force of the warlike Gaules in the ſecond Punicke warre, when Hannibal went to encounter them in Italy. That great Captaine paſſed then through Gaule, and made alliance with the Gaules, whoſe valor was well enough knowne vnto him: and hee conducted them into Italy, where they did him great ſeruice againſt the Romanes. And notably doth Polybius remember them, when in that great day at Cannas, there were ſlaine 4000. Gaules in the fielde on the Carthagenian ſide: That were (ſaith he) the principall inſtruments of the victory, wonne by their blood for the Carthagenians, which was the moſt deadly day for the Romanes, next to that of Allia, where the Gauls ouercame as many. I forbeare to ſpeake of all the other encounters, battailes, and moſt ſignale warres, which this couragious Nation had againſt the Romanes, for the ſpace of about two hundred yeares. It is eaſily diſcerned (euen out of their owne reports) how many times the Gauls had the vpper hand of them, and what diſmal feares and amazements they haue put them to. Alſo, where they haue noted downe any conquering of the Gauls, it may be well obſerued, that it was compaſſed onely by ſome ſtratagem, deceit or cunning, wherby (according to their own ſaying) they brought all their purpoſes to paſſe.

Of the ſecond Punick warre.

Had leagued with the Gaules, & led them into Italy. Polyb. in lib. 4.

The Gaules had war with the Romanes aboue 200. yeares.

Stratagems & cuning, argue the leaſt part of manhood.

In a word, after that the Gaules of Italy were emptied of men (by continual wars) and brought into ſubiection, Polybius reporteth, That there was the end of the Gauls war, the like wherof was neuer heard or ſeen, be it for courage, boldneſſe, and reſolution in Souldiers; be it for greatnes of fights; be it for numbers of ſlaine men, or multitudes of their troupes. Further he proceedeth on in the accidents of their wars, by way of giuing ſome encouragement to weake mindes, againſt the dreadfull attempts of the Gaules: Who made ſeizure (ſaith he) on the Greeks, not only before, but alſo in my time. Of any other nation, he findeth none but the Grecians & the Romans, that can deliuer any ſuch true teſtimony of them: which rendreth faith ſufficiently on their ſide, & (among al other people) they neuer could be fellowed. Albeit Cicero in his time, ſpeaking of the Spaniards and the French) ſaith; That the Spaniards exceeded in number, but the Gaules or French in valiancy. Wherby is euidently ſeene, that in the compariſon of theſe two Nations, he giueth the honour to the French, attributing to the other, nothing but number.

Cicero pro Plancio Hiſpani numero, fortitudine Galli.

And yet me-thinkes it is ſtrange to be credited, that the Spaniards ſhould exceed the French in multitude of men, cõſidering, that Spaine (as hath bin ſpoken heeretofore) is deſcribed to be but badly inhabited, euen by ancient Geographers, and them more moderne: whereas contrariwiſe, that France is ſo filled with mẽ, and ſo greatly inhabited, as it is wonderfull to behold. But it may bee, that the mighty numbers of the Gaules were not (as then) knowne, Gaule beeing not ſubiected to the Romanes, as Spaine was, which they held almoſt wholy. For whoſoeuer ſhall conſider, what Armies the Gaules gathered from time to time, to make warre vpon the Romans, according to the recital of Cæſar himſelfe: wil iudge that Spaine, nor any other Prouince of Europe, could not be ſo fully furniſhed.

Concerning the ſlender inhabiting of Spaine.

Iul. Cæſ. in com. Lib. 7.

Moreouer, it would not be much differing from our purpoſe, if wee ſhould ſet downe, what troups of ſtrangers the Romanes then kept at their pay: & namely, that they had more mercenary Soldiers out of Spaine, then euer they could get from France. Becauſe thoſe people beeing more barbarous, leſſe ciuilized, & poliſhed with good cariage; gaue thẽſelues ſelues to no other exerciſes, but to wander at randome among the Mountaines, there to pilfer and rob from one another, or elſe to ſerue as mercinaries, partly to the Carthagenians, and partly to the Romanes, after they had once got footing there. On the contrary, the Gaules (of whom no queſtion was at any time made to be all warriors, excelling in valour and greatneſſe of courage) in regard that they were much ciuilized, neuer liued after ſo baſe a manner. And although they had ſuch plenty of warlike people, yet wanted they no meanes of freeing themſelues from ydleneſſe, when their grounds were to be tilled and husbanded, or other Arts and Trades vſed, neceſſary for the life of man, as well in times of greateſt turbulence, as ſeaſons of more ſecurity. For no where can it bee read of them, as it is of the Spaniards, that they left their Lands barren, becauſe they would not till them, but referred them wholly to their wiues to take that paines, who both before and after their times of childing, were feigne ſo to toyle and moyle themſelues.

The Romans had more mercinary Soldiers from Spain: then from France.

The naturall breeding and ciuility of the Gaules.

The negligence of the Spaniards in tilling their grounds, leauing them to be done by their wiues.

Other of our Gaules imployed themſelues in the ſtudie of Letters, and exerciſes of Religion, and contemplation in celeſtiall matters: witneſſe ſo many skilfull Druides, and ſuch beſide as followed after them, renowned for their Learning through all the parts of the world. So that the Gaules dwelling beyond Gaule, ſerued but very ſlenderly to the Romans, vntill ſuch time as they had conquered Gaule: then they found the ſufficiency of their aſsiſtance, and acknowledged not only their vertue and valiancy, but alſo their infinite number of warriors. And this was the reaſon, why Cicero, ſpeaking afterward to Cæſar, concerning his victories in Gaule, ſaid: That hee had ouercome Nations, inumerable in multitudes.

Learned ſtudies among the Gaules.

Cicero pro M. Marcello.

Now, to ſpeake of all other Countries, there is hardly any one of them, but it hath bene as a prey to ſtrangers. Italy, ſometime the Conquereſſe of many people, with her Rome, calling her-ſelfe, cheefe Lady of the world: was ſhee not (for long time) expoſed to the rauages, irruptions and pillages of the Vuiſigothes, Herules, Gerpides, Oſtrogothes, and Lombards: who intirely ſacked and rent her in peeces (each after other) and droue the people out of their dwellings? Spaine became inuaded in the ſame manner, and afterward was cantonned by the Vandales, Alanes, and Sweues: yet were they alſo expulſed (in following time) by the Vuiſigothes, who eſtabliſhed their owne abiding there. Next to them, came the Oſtrogothes, who held the Country powerfully ſo long, till the Sarrazines ouercomming them, were vſurpingly poſſeſſed of well neere all Spaine. Allemaigne, or Germany, was not it likewiſe made ſubiect to the inuaſions of thoſe people which dwelt more Northerly, who at length ouerthrew the whole Romane Empire? I ſay nothing of ſome other quarters of the world, where the like fortune hath many times happened: yet this is moſt certaine, that thorough all the Prouinces of the earth, there haue bene changes of people, and of frequent Colonies.

But to ſpeake more particularly of Spaine, at the firſt it was filled with people of the French Nation, as along the Riuer * Anas or Ana, now called Guadiana in Caſtille, ſo farre as the Promontory Artabrum, or Cabo de finis terræ, in Gallicia in Portugall. Alſo the Celtiberians in Caſtille, by the teſtimony of Strabo, Ptolomie, Pomponius Mela, Pliny and Appian. Frō whence it enſueth, that ſome ancient Geographers, as Ephorus and others, haue comprized them vnder France. But be it howſoeuer, Spaine hath continually beene taken, held and commanded by ſtrangers: as by the Ionians, Lydians, Thracians, Rhodians, Phrygians, Cypriots, Phœnicians, Egiptians, Phocenſes, and Carthagenians, according as their owne Hiſtorians haue acknowledged. Since then, by the Vandales, Alanes, and Sweues, that inhabited there for a long time: and afterward by the Vuiſigothes and Oſtrogothes. At laſt, wholly filled with Moores and Sarrazins, who held it in poſſeſſion aboue ſeuen hundred yeares. And there they remaine yet to this day (according to ſome Writers) in the Mountaines of Andalouzia, called Alpuxarras, whether the Armies of Conquerours could neuer come or reach.

But France is a Country, which hath least bene that way ill entreated: as hauing kept herselfe more pure, entire, and neate from rauage, and incursions of so great numbers of strangers.

I know well, how it may be obiected to me, that Marseilles was builded, and inhabited by the Phocenses: yet there was none other but that onely Colonie, beside that which is reported of the children of valiant Hercules, which he had by the women of France, and who there cōmanded for sometime, as is testified by ancient Monuments and Antiquities of the Gaules, which Ammianus Marcellinus saith, That he himselfe had seene in Gaule.

As concerning the Britannians or Bretons, who being expulsed out of England by the English Saxons: they withdrew themselues into Bretaigne, thē called Armorica. I hold, agreeing with the iudgement of many learned men, that they being ancient Pillars of the French, parting from the firme land of the Gauls, to dwell in the Isle which was before it: comming backe afterward, to refuge thēselues in France; did but re-establish their owne ancient Country, and returne to their true orginall. Naturall reason, for the neighbourhood both of the one and other, doth apparantly shew it selfe. The same is confirmed by Cornelius Tacitus, & by the common opinion that then was, as also by the similitude and likenes, both in faces and manners of the inhabitants. And beside, there is to bee seene in the Geographicall description of that Island (according to Ptolomy) the names of many Gaulish people, who vndoubtedly had planted Colonies there. Such were the Belgiaus, the Parisians, the Atrebatians, & the Cornabians.

As for the French, they were no strangers, they entred among the Gaules, not as enemies, but as friends and brethren to the Gaules: to deliuer them from the tyranny of the Romanes and Gothes, who had expulsed them, and were (in that māner) restored to their former freedome, and so the Gaules and French became but one people, as shall heereafter more plainly be declared.

The entrance of the French among the Gaules.

The Gothes, hauing so long time kept their reuels in Spaine; to speake truely, came also among the Gaules, but yet for a very short while: nor was there any Ensigne or remarkable valor in those Goths, making comparison of them with the French. It is said, that their property was to be fearefull, and soone put to flight: so reporteth S. Gregory Florentius, Arch-Bishop of Tours, who liued somewhat neere to those times. And Saluianus, that eloquent Priest of Marseilles, acknowledged the Gothes to be the most feeble and slothfull, among the generous Nations of the North parts. When they were in Gaule, and stood to encounter with the French: they durst not tarry, or make any head against them. The Kings Merouæus, Chlouis, and Childebert, beheld them to passe ouer the Pyrenean Mountains, yet they assailed and ouercame them in battaile, euen in Spaine, hard by Toledo, their capitall abiding. The Burguignons and Germanes, who had inuaded some small parcels of France, were soone cut off, and quite extermined.

The Gothes came among the Gaules.

So the French and Gaules, conserued themselues within their own limits, without hauing any strāgers mingled among them. And as (in former times) they filled the world with their Colonies or troops of people, so did they continually the like afterward: hauing againe peopled Germany and Italy, vnder the Emperour Charles the Great, and his successors. So that it is not without good reason, that (at this instant) the very greatest houses of Germany, deriue their originall from the French: as is declared by Hermanus, Count of Nuear, in an Epistle which hee sent to the Emperor Charles the 5. on the the Annales of Pepin and Charlemaigne.

True it is, that the Gaules haue beene ouertaken by the Romans: but what people knew how to resist them; considering their their admirable order, and exact Military discipline? Iosephus, very fitly to this purpose, attributeth thereto all their great conquests and large extendure of the Romane Empire. So that after he hath demonstrated the forme of their Campe, their ordinary exercises for Armes, and a sumonary obseruation of all their behauiour, he concludeth. All these being well considered, wee neede make no doubt to say; that the possessions was much lesse then the possessors. Adding withall, that hee extended so farre in declaring all this, not as any commendation to the Romanes power, but rather as a comfort to the conquered.

Ioseph. in lib. 2. de Bel. Iudai.

The words of Iosephus concerning the Romanes.

Moreouer, of the Westerne Prouinces, France was the last conquered by them, whatsoeuer is else saide to the contrary. Whereas (on the other side) Spaine came among the first into their hands, in the time of the wars against the Carthagenians. France was that Country, that longest of all resisted, and against which (to speake no more then truth) their inuincible Armies, yea, they that were victorious throughout the whole world; became meerely edgelesse and blunted, as not able to beare off their blowes. All other Romane Captains vtterly lost their labour, Cæsar onely excepted. Which is no meane honor to the Gaules, to yeeld themselues vnder the yoke of so great a Prince: who is acknowledged to be the most wise and perfect Captaine that euer was. And yet for all that, France was not conquered at the first onset, neyther made surrender of her spoyles, without sweate and blood. That great Commander in warre, tooke intollerable paines, and trauelled for the space of ten yeares continually, with all the power and strength of the Romanes, which then held the more part of the wide world. And yet (euen then) he had not preuailed neither, if hee had not serued his turne with Frenchmen themselues, & made a conquest of France, by France. Diuisions and partialities, which were then on foot among them (an ordinary and fatall ruine to the most potent kingdomes) called him thether, wher finding all to bee diuided in diuers factions, ciuill warre kindled among them, allied with many, and fortefied with their troopes, as namely them of Authun and others; it was so much the more easier to be surprized by him, and in such an opportunity of aduantage.

France last conquered by the Romans.

None of the Romans could conquer France, but Ceasar.

Cæsar made a conquest of France, by France it self, and in a time when they were at diuision among themselues.

All which notwithanding, it is an admirable matter, and well worth the obseruation, that in the resistance made against him, by people so disioynted & perplexed: yet in ten whole yeares, the Gaules fought thirty ranged battailes, wherein, according to the account made by Appiã, there were slaine well neere eleuen hundred thousand able fighting men. And beside, himselfe testifieth in his Memories sufficiently, with what manner of people they had to deal: & they likewise could no way performe, without receiuing great losses, as there he feareth not to confesse, Appian in lib. 2. de bello ciuili, & in Celticis.

If wee had but his Ephemerides, or particular Iournall booke, we should see other matters of his owne confession; considering, that Ammianus Marcellinus, speaking of the conquest of the Gaules, saith: He pacified them, after many great losses on either side sustained in ten years war. And as touching his owne person, it is recorded, that in a certain encounter, he was releeued, (notwithstanding all his Greatnesse and goodly Armour) by a Gaule, who hauing remounted him vppon his owne horse, bare him away throgh all the throngs. But there came another Gaule, who brauely cryed to his companion, Cecos Cæsar in the ancient Gaulish language which is as much to say, as Let Cæsar passe, & this was the reason of his safe passage. Wherein they worthily declared, that it was honour enough to their generous mindes, to carry Cæsar safely away from danger, when they had him in their power, and could haue slaine him, Satis est prostrasse. The Grammatian Seruius citeth this example out of the Ephemerides or Iournals of Cæsar, which wee cannot come by in these dayes. In like manner, Cæsar knowing them wel, and hauing (on the other side) experimented the dulnes of the Easterne people, in the war which he had against * Pharnaces, King of Pontus, saide. Most happy was Pompey, that he had nothing to do with the resolute French, but with the faint-harted men of the East, & got the surname of Great at so cheape a Market. In briefe, the Gauls were neuer ioyned to the Romane Empire, by any power in the Romanes, but thorough their owne proper forces: as a great Captaine speaketh in Tacitus. Verè reputantibus Galliam suismet viribus concidisse.

And as King Agrippa declareth in Iosephus. It was not through want of courage, or any dull neglect, that they were ouercome: considering the Romanes themselues said, it was foureſcore yeares, before they could faſten hold in one ſmall Meridionall or Southerly Prouince of Gaule, & afterward fought ſo much againſt Cæſar: But rather it was by the frugall managing of their owne felicity, wherein they pacified both deſtiny and fortune: whereby they plainly ſaw, that the Romanes got the vppet hand rather by force thē otherwiſe, and (in a word) by the diuine permiſſion or prouidence. Nay, and that which is much more, after ſo long warre, againſt ſuch power, and ſo great a Captatne, yea, and after ſo many loſſes: yet notwithſtanding, Gaule fell not into the Romans hands, as being ſubiected, but rather as allied, and in farre better faſhion then all the other Prouinces.

Gaule not ſo much conquered, as louingly leagued.

De Bello Gal. co. lib. 8. in fi.

He that continued Cæſars Commentaries, ſaith: That while hee wintered in Belgia, he had a carefull eye, onely to maintain the people in amity, without giuing to any one either will or occaſion, to riſe or take themſelues to Armes. For that which hee moſt of all deſired, was, that vpon his departing, there might happen no occaſions to ſtay him: or if hee had cauſe to bring an Army thither againe, yet that he ſhould not bee troubled with any long warre, whereunto Gaule gaue liſtening with very good attention, when ſhe ſaw her ſelfe out of apparant danger. Wherfore, cauſing the Citties to come before him, with his beſt reſpect, and greateſt honour he embraced them, and gaue very goodly gifts to the principall and moſt apparant perſons: not impoſing on the reſt any charges, or extraordinary ſubſidies, wherby he contained them in peace, and the better diſpoſition to obedience throughout all Gaule. And ſo by this cunning, Gaule (at laſt) gaue place, and became mildely quieted. For the affability of Cæſar, and the courteſies he extended towards them, did more conquer them in one winter, then all his Forces, Legions and Armies could doe in ten yeares.

Gaule could endure no apparant danger.

One winters kindneſſe in Cæſar wonne more then all his Legions could do in ten yeares wars.

Ouer and beſide, the titles of Alliances, of Peace, and of friendly conference, are ſo frequent in the Romane Authors, euer where they ſpeake of Gaule; that it plainly teſtifieth on her behalfe, that ſhee was not conquered by Armes, but rather left at louely liberty, by friendly parlances and confederations. Which Ammianus Marcellinus himſelfe alſo confirmeth, for he ſaith, that Cæſar; After many loſſes on the one ſide & other ſuſtained, during a war of ten yeares continuance: in the ende (by eternall pactions and agreements) ioyned the Gaules to the Romane ſociety and alliance. We ſee alſo, that they left ſome people in Gaule wholly free, as (among other) the men of Auuergne; who termed themſelues as Noble as the Romans, and called them their brethren; the men of Authun, the Marſellians; them of Iionnois, Foreſts, and the round neighbouring Countries.

Gaule not conquered by Armes, but courteſie.

Marcel. in li. 15. Poſt de cernali belli mutua clades ſocietati noſtræ ſiderib⁹ iunxit æterna.

Now as concerning Subſidies & Contributions, a Romane Gouernour, named Cerealis, ſheweth plainly in Tacitus: That ſuch tribute was but for maintenance of the Legions, and for preſeruation of peace in the Prouinces; which could not bee continued without Armes nor Armes without wealth. As for the reſt (ſaith hee, ſpeaking to the Gaules) all is in common with vs, oftentimes you giue command to our legions, your ſelues alſo gouerne in the Prouinces, as others do in our Empire. By the ſelfe-ſame reaſon, that which bound them moſt to duty, was the entire amity of the Romanes to them. Cæſar made a great number of their Cittizens Romanes, and Auguſtus in like manner, though in more ſparing faſhion, with ſome reſtriction frō vulgarizing ſo great an honour of the City or Bourgeſhip of the Romanes. Afterward, the Emperour Claudius gaue the right of Senatours to the principall of the Gauliſh Lords. And in the ende, Galba, for the ſignale ſeruices which the Gaules had done to him and the Romane Empire againſt Nero: hee made them all Cittizens, without exception.

Nor was it without great reaſon, that they made ſuch great account of this Prouince: conſidering, what great aduantages it gaue vnto them. For, were it in reſpect of treaſure, rich Gaule furniſhed them with more reuenues; then (by vſing the common manner of ſaying) saying) all the rest of their Empire, as it is recorded by Velleyus Paterculus. Were it for leuying vndaunted Souldiers, and for such as they mustered from thence: therin consisted the maine strength of al their troopes. And that Cæsar knew well enough, and published it sufficiently abroad, as hauing made choise of them aboue all other, and (by their meanes only) came to possesse the Empire of the whole world. For ouer and beside what hath formerly beene said, concerning the wealthy treasures of France: the valiancy of the Gaules holdeth the most eminent place, by whose courage he was especially and principally serued, to gaine that greatnesse, whereunto hee had so long time aspired.

The victory which he wonne against great Pompey, ought to bee attributed to the valour & warlike vertue of the Gauls. And if he had not bin furnished with such men, valiant and strong, not onely against the enemy, but also to endure famine, and all other kindes of necessities euen to the feeding on bread made of grasse & roots; he had bin lost in his hopes, and vtterly defeated by the long & lingering delaies of his enemy. This was that which most of all amazed Pompey, who gaue expresse charge, that such bread should not bee seene in his Camp; for feare of disheartning his Souldiers, or driuing them into detestation of their paines, whē they considered, the sharpe extremities suffered by their enemies, with whom they dealt so cruelly, that they left them nothing to feed on, but euen as brutish beasts.

Moreouer, Cæsar hauing sent a small number of Gaules, for great succour to M. Crassus against the Parthians; these were the men, who (in that most vnhappy day for the Romans) performed most strange exploits of Armes, and shook the enemies victory very sharply. These were the men, in whom young Crassus reposed most confidence, as being the warriours, with whom he performed admirable actions of prowesse. For they receiued (with their bare hands) the sharpe points of the Parthians Pikes, and closing with them body to body, threw them to the ground, among their horses feete; where they lay all along stretched out, vnable to releeue themselues, onely through the massiy weight of their Armor. Many ther were beside, who forsaking their owne horses, crept vnder the bellies of thē belonging to their enemies, to pierce & stab them with the points of their Swords: which causing the horses to bound aloft, by extremity of the anguish they felte, trampled vnder their feete both their masters & enemies together, and so fell dead without any rescue.

The same Cæsar, prepared a complete Legion of Gaulish Souldiers, which hee called the Larke, and added it to the Romane Legions, and whereto (at length) he gaue the honour of Bourgeship. Nay, and that is much more, hee not knowing how he might worthily enough recompence the Gaules: made a great number of them Senatours, to the great discontenting of many Romanes. And as for the Cauallery or horsemen, wherin the Gauls euermore excelled all other Nations in warre: Cæsar had (almost) none other, but continually ready at his seruice ten thousand Gaulish horse, according as it is declared by Appian. These were the French horse, that affoorded so many great seruices to Cæsar: as well in Spaine against Affrinius & Petreius, Lieutenants to Pompey; as afterward in Affrica. Wher it is said, that in one fight, lesse then thirty Gaules in number, fought against two thousand Mauritanians, and droue them to flight.

His successors found themselues alwayes well serued, both with ordinary horse and foote of the Gaules. Tacitus maketh mention of a Cohort or Regimēt of the Sicambrians, which did many remarkable deeds, in the warre against the Thracian Mountaineers: Who were (saith he) prompt and hardy against dangers, and no lesse dreadfull for their Armes and order of marching in battaile aray. This I do the more willingly sette downe, because of those Gaulish Sicambrian Nation, the French are properly descended.

France alwayes fit them with men for the warres. The ſame Author ſaith in another place, that vnder the Emperors Arcadius & Honorius, about the time of the inſurrection and reuolt of Gildon, a great Army, compoſed (for the moſt part) of Gaules, was brought to ſuccour Greece, then rauaged and ſpoyled by the Gothes: and they performed there ſuch deeds of valour, as holpe the Country to recouer her right. So that being (for long time) wel entreated by the Romanes, partaking in the honours and adminiſtration of the Empire: it was no matter of maruaile, that their peace ſhould be of ſo long cõtinuance. One onely thing alſo was irkeſom & burdenous to thẽ, in regard wherof, they troubled the Romane Empire with ſome ſtirres and perturbations, the Gaules being naturally addicted to vertue and ſeuerity. And therefore they hated to be commanded by ſuch Emperors as were negligent, diſſolute, and quite giuen ouer to all vices: which made them deſpiſe ſubiection to ſuch as was Tiberus, Nero, Domitian, Commodus, Heliogabilus, Galien, and other ſuch like monſters of their names. They would endure none but vertuous Princes, and ſuch Gouernors were the fitteſt men to confirme and keepe them continually in peace.

Heereupon was it, that the Emperour Valerian, in a Letter of his ſaid; *That hee had made a certaine man, named Poſthumius, Gouernor of Gaule. Another Author, writing the life of the Emperor Carus, confeſſeth: That to command the Gauls, there needed an Emperour very conſtant and vertuous. So that being vnable to ſuffer the deteſtable vices of many Romane Emperors, they departed (at euery occaſion) in this reſpect frõ their obedience: whereby it may be iuſtly ſaid, that they continued alwayes free, and being not truely ſubiected, gaue their ſeruice to no other Emperors, but ſuch as themſelues reputed worthy. Vntill ſuch time, as vpon the declination and fall of this great Empire, by the inſatiable auarice of Romane Gouernors, and other inſupportable charges: they altogether fell off from them, and gaue ayde to their compatriots the French, and ſo wholly did roote out the Romanes name.

But to examine a point (heeretofore handled) ſomewhat more particularly, it cannot bee ſaide with any reaſon, that France was conquered by the Romanes before Spaine: neither that the Spaniards made any more reſiſtance, or continued longer time from ſubduing or ſubiection. For on the contrary, it appeareth, that the Carthagenians poſſeſſed themſelues (in few yeares) of a great part of Spaine: euen at ſuch time as the Romans fell likewiſe on it, and carried away their ſhare without any difficulty. Witnes the treaty of peace, made betweene the Romans & Haſdruball, chiefe Captaine for the Carthagenians, wherein it was couenanted, that the Riuer Iberus, now called Ebura, ſhould bee the bound of the Empire for theſe two people, and that the Saguntines, free people originally of Greece, who were betweene them both, ſhould confederate with the one and other.

* Sagunt, a City in Spain beyond Iberus and a mile from the Sea.

After this, it is ſufficiently knowne, that the Romanes had long time made warre againſt the Carthagenians in Spain, who gaue them there many valiant fights. During which while, no eſtate, or fewe, made mention off among the Spaniards; who ſtood but as ſpectators, in expectation of the yſſue, to ſee which of thoſe two people ſhould haue command ouer them. This was at the beginning of the ſecond Punicke warre, when the Scipioes (after they had ſpent eight yeares in war) were ſlaine by the Carthagenians. And afterward, Great Scipio, ſurnamed Affricanus, being ſent thither, after diuers encounters, and taking Townes from the Carthagenians: expulſed them wholy thence, & firſt of all made it a Romane Prouince, in the yeare of the Citie of Romes foundation CCCCCXLIII. All the buſines which he had with the Spaniards, was for ſome reuolts of particular people, whom he likewiſe as ſoone ſuppreſſed. So that very truely Ammianus Marcellinus hath ſaide: That all the Prouinces of firme Land in Spaine, were the firſt conquered, & made one Prouince by the Romanes.

All Hiſtorians agree together, reporting alſo, that in the yeare CCCCCLII. two Pretors were created at Rome to gouerne Spaine, which was then diuided in two parts, and termed Citerior & Vlterior, to wit, on this ſide, and beyond Ebura.

Tit. Liu. in li. 3

ra. The elder Cato was also sent thither, to qualifie the reuoltes of some people. When he had ouercome them, & made prouision, that no more rebellions might afterward happen: he sent his Letters & command to euery City in particular, to this effect, that they should cast down to the ground their wals and fortefications, & disposed the action so orderly, that his command was obeyed in the Cities, and he arriued ther at the same time. So they being verily perswaded in each City, that this command stretched but to that place onely: yeelded the more willingly, which otherwise they would not haue done. Whereupon ensued, that in one day, all their Townes were dismantled, and their wals raced. In regard of which successe, Cato made his vaunt; That hee had taken more Townes in Spaine, then there were daies.

Now, as concerning Gaul, the Romans neuer had footing there, but in the yeare IVCXXII. & in Prouence only: about an hundred years after that Spaine was wholly conquered. Nor had they there but a very small parcel, which was a nere neighbor to them: all Gaule being neuer made a Prouince, but by Cæsar. By what likelihood of truth can it thē be said, that Spain was brought vnder the power of the Romane Empire, after France? Neuertheless it is very true (as Strabo saith) that the difficulties which the Romans had in Spaine, to make it peaceable, grew onely through the reuolts of some particular Townes & people, and by the incursions of theeues gathered together in troopes, and these (of necessity) were to be chastised. So, making war, not in grosse, or with a body of iust Armes, but by peeces and parcels, one after another, in small courses and surprizals: the Romans had more trouble to finde out, then conquer them. Againe, although Spaine was held & cōmanded wholly by the Romanes, yet notwithstanding, there remained some people, dwelling in difficult, sharpe & mountainous places, as * Basques, & * Astures: who afterward, in the time of Augustus, were wholly vanquished, and added to the rest of Spaine. As also (about the same time hauing conquerd Aquitain) he made it a Prouince, as the three other of Gaul.

Moreouer, there cannot bee found so great a number of worthy Captaines, afforded by any country, like vnto France. As were among the ancient Bellouasians and Sigouasians, chiefe of the first & furtheſt-off expeditions among the Gaules: Brennus, that surprized Rome, and another Brennus, who afterward subdued the most part of Europe and Asia. Dumnorix, Diuiconus, Ambiorix, Dumnatius, Vercingetorix, Diuitiacus, and many more recorded by Cæsar. Strabo in Lib. 4.

Nor can there be desired a better, and more certaine testimony of valour, and generous nature in the French, then that which Strabo deliuereth in these words. All those people whom we terme Gaules, are Martiall, couragious, & ready (of thēselues) to fight: And yet notwithstanding, they are very simple, and no way wicked or euill inclined. Heereto he addeth. That they bring nothing to the fight but vertue and courage, without any craft, superchery, or brauing. And although (saith he) they are full of heat to fight; yet are they (for all that) capable to vnderstand reason, and easie to bee perswaded. Willing to vndertake the quarrell, for such as they see to be iniuriously wronged and offended.

And Cicero hearing that the gouernment of Transalpine Gaule should be giuen to M. Anthony; cryed out. Est enim opinio decreturum aliquem M. Anton. Galliam vltimam quam Plauius obtinet: Quid hoc est aliud, quam hosti arma largiri primum neruos belli pecuniam infinitam. Deinde equitatum quantum velit? Can any thing else be done heerein, but onely to thrust Armes into the hands of an enemy? First of all, infinite summes of money, which are the nerues and sinewes of warre: And next, as many men well horsed, as he wold haue with him. This passage is sufficient, whereby to conceiue and certainly obserue, the wealthy treasures of France, and the opinion held thereof.

Moreouer, the French haue bene reputed to surpasse all other Nations, in these two noble and warlike exercises, hunting, and ryding great horses. Hunting, which is nothing else but a liuely image of warre, and an assiduate meditation thereof, as Xenophon saith. Eginhard, the nursing-childe of Charles the Great, and his Secretary, writing his life, speaketh thus. *Exercebatur assidue equitādo ac venando quod illi gentilitium erat, quia vix vlla in terris natio inuenitur quæ in hac re Francis possit æquari. The history of the few resolued French on the day fought at Nicopolis.

But before I can finish this discourse, concerning the warlike vertue of the French. I cannot forbeare to say somewhat of that which they performed on the day of * Nicopolis against the Turkes: where a man may well say, that a small handfull of French Gentlemen, excelled (in prowesse) whatsoeuer wee reade in Histories, of all the braue exploits in war that euer were done. Not Leonides of the Greekes at the Thermopylæ, nor Cæditius of the Romanes in Sicily, is any way worthy comparison with them: the history followeth in this manner.

Charles the sixt reigning in France, the King of Hungaria sent Ambassadors vnto him, entreting that some succor might be affoorded him, against Baiazeth ỹ first, Emperor of the Turks, the most remarkable warrior that euer was of the house of the Ottomans. The King consenting thereto very gladly, many Lords & Gentlemen of France prepared themselues to be seene in this voyage, to the number of about a thousand or twelue hundred. Among others, there was the Conte d'Eu, Constable of France; the Conte de la Marche;

Marche; the Lord of Coucy; the Lords of Trimouille, and Iohn, Conte de Neuers, ſon to the Duke of Burgongne, who was chief Commander. When they were ioyned with the king of Hungariaes army, hauing paſt the riuer * Danubius, they bare away (in aſſault) the honor of diuers Townes: and at length came to lay ſiedge before the City of Nicopolis.

The greateſt riuer in Europe, riſing out of the hill Arnoba in Germany. In Illyricum it receiueth 60. other riuers into it, where it is cald Iſter and there is broadeſt.

VVhile the greater part of the Army beſiedged the City, Enguerrand Lord of Coucy, taking with him fiue hundred Lances: made vp into the Countrey, to ſeeke ſome enemies that they might fight withall, and it is credibly reported, that (verie nere vnto them) there was a troop of Turkes, of about twenty thouſand in number. Now, albeit this multitude exceeded their ſmall companie beyond all meaſure: yet notwithſtanding, they reſolued to grapple with them. And hauing firſt of all drawne them beyond a wood, wherein there was an ambuſcado; they came and charged them in the rere. The fight was (for all that) cruell, and of long continuance, wherein the French, although they were ſo few againſt ſo great a number; yet they did performe wonders that day. So that in the end, the Turkes being diſheartned, faintned extraordinarily, & more then fifteen thouſand lay ſlaine in the field.

500. hundred French Lances, ſet vpon 20000. Turkes & their ſucces

Some ſhort while after, Baiazeth being come with a dreadfull Armie, conſiſting of more then three hundred thouſand fighting men: they aduanced themſelues to deale with the enemies armie, being not worthy to be termed any number, becauſe they were (in all) but ſeauen hundred, when they beganne the fight. The French ſmall troops, made a goodly ſight to behold, being all well armed and appointed, in rich glittering and gorgeous Armors, wanting no coſt of golde and ſiluer, and brauely mounted on gallant horſes, moſt ſumptuouſly barbed & caparaſſoned; ſo that ſuch as ſaw them, might well haue tearmed them an Armie of Kings. But (beyond all the reſt) vvith what force, ardour and courage they fought, although they were meerely ſhut vp, and round railed or ringed in with innumerable enemies. At the firſt onſet, they wholly defeated and ouerthrew the auantgard and firſt battell of the Turke, beating them on ſtil before them, euen to the verie midſt of the bodie of the maine army, where was Baiazeth himſelfe.

A far vnindifferent army of Turkes, to meddle with ſo fewe of the French.

Many there were, who perfourming meer miracles of manhood in fight, cleft or hewed out their paſſage thorough the preaſe, and very thickeſt of all the Turkiſh Army, compelling them to make them way, both for going on and returning backe again, euen to two or three ſeuerall times of enforcement. And yet no one man among that poore ſmall troop, who ſeeing the vnauoydable danger of death, was deſirous to take hold on any aduantage, or ſhew ſo much as a countenance of retiring, albeit their enemies (gladly) offered them many meanes. All reſolued to looſe their liues, but yet the enemie bought them at very deere rate, filling the field with mountaines made of their dead bodies: euen till ſuch time as the fight hauing held a great deal of the day, the moſt part of the French lying dead on the ground, and the reſt (a very ſmall number) wearied vvith killing the Turks, and pierced through with wounds, being ouerwhelmed with multitudes, were (in the end) taken priſoners. But it was generally held for truth, that if the great body of the Hungarian army (beeing vvell-neere the number of an hundred thouſand able men) had ſeconded them, or vſed neuer ſo little reſiſtance, in making but a ſhew of withſtanding the enemie, to hinder the French from beeing ſo encloſed, (by any forwardneſſe in redeeming them, and not fearefully fly away on heaps thorough the valley, as the Hungarians moſt cowardly did, ſuffering themſelues to be murthred, without any offer of fight) the day had remained to the Chriſtians. And I dare ſpeake it, that the power of the Turkes, which afterwards ſo great enlarged it ſelfe (meerely thorow our diuiſions) had then bin vtterly ruined from the top to the bottome.

Then you plainely perceiue, that of this ſmall troope of reſolute Champions, the greater part of them lay dead in the field, hauing made a ſlaughter of infinite enemies, more by fifty times then they were, and fought to their lateſt drop of bloode; but verie few of them remayned priſoners. But on the next day, Baiazeth going himſelf in perſon, to view the fielde of battell, and take acknowledgement of the dead, when he found that for one French Baiazeth had but little ioy in his deare victory, desiring to deale no more with the French.

Frenchman slaine, whole heapes and piles of Turkes filled vp the field, and all his Army left in such pittifull condition, he tooke it so despitefully, and entred into such outragious choller, as beeing vnable to consider on his losse, or take any means for contentation, hee commanded a passage vnto death thorough the army, of all the prisoners, except about some twentie of the greatest Lords: as the Conte de Neuers thē Generall, and others; who being knowne, were saued and put to their ransomes. Baiazeth complaining on so sadde a victory, which cost him so deare, could not depart thence but very pensiuely: and in plain trueth, such another ouerthrow woulde absolutely haue confounded him altogether.

Concerning matters belonging to iustice

Plutarch in vit. Pomp.

This may seeme sufficient for the valiancie of the French. But som may obiect, that such warlike people, accustomed to liue among Armes and Martiall exercises, shold bee voluntary disdainers of matters appertaining to Iustice, acknowledging no other right then that of armes. Forbear (said Pompey) till to morrow, to alleadge your Lawes to vs, who haue our swords by our sides. This is quite contrary to the French, who are no way to be lesse commended for their iustice then for their valor and excellency in actions of armes, and haue euermore bene accounted to be true louers of Iustice. Agathias a Grecian authour, who liued more then a thousand yeares since, hath praysed and commended the French for their Iustice. Whereof (saith hee) they are verie desirous, as also great louers of their Country. He further addeth, That because they possesse a most assured estate, they haue (as their bases and support) many goodly principles engrauen in the hearts of their Kings and People. Why then let mee vndoubtedly tell yee, that among all other Nations, the Gaules & the French haue most highly cherished and loued Iustice, and haue alwayes religiously honoured it, yeelding themselues thereto, and making continuall exercise thereof, without any passion.

Agathias in l. 1.

The Freneh great louers of iustice.

And not to make repetition of an infinit number of goodly institutions, and diuers examples of their Iustice, it may well appeare by this notable custome, which both Greeke and other ancient authours haue obserued among them. To wit, that if any one haue slaine a Citizen or Bourgesse, he hath no other infliction but banishment; whereas, if hee commit the like offence on the person of a stranger, he is punnished with death: for the paine is augmented in consideration of the stranger, to whome the more easily the iniury may be offred, so much the more (they hold) that the offence which he hath done, ought to be seuerely punished and reuenged. It may be thought somwhat hard, that a straunger should be fauoured and defended, more then a Citizen. To cut off which difficulty, we see by the diuine law, ordained on the strangers behalfe, that he is so oftentimes repeated and defended, that a man must very carefully keepe himselfe from harming him, and that iustice must bee rendred him equal with a Citizen. And questionles it may be truly said, that (euen at this day) ther is not any country in the world, where a stranger is more humanely entertained, lesse offenced, and more defended in all right of iustice, then among the people of France.

A notable example of Iustice among the French. Stobeus.

A Stranger more fauored and defended then a Citizen by the law of God.

In like manner, wee finde by probable histories, that (very often times) Princes and straunge people haue referred their differences to the iustice of France, aswel of the Kings, as of the Parliaments. Among other, the reputation of their Iustice in King Dagobert, was spred so farre into strange Nations, that the Hungarians, the Sclauonians, and other people neighboring about, desired him to be the Iudge in their differences. And more, the Sclauonians said, that if euer he cam into their country, they would acknowledge & obey him, as if he were their King.

Strange princes & people haue referred cases in Controuersy to the Iustice of France. Suet. in lib. 3. cap. 22.

Furthermore; let it neuer be said or imagined, that barbarism at any time had entertainment among the Gauls. Continually they were most human, hauing milde and wel polished spirits by nature, & being aduantagiously shaped or fashioned for the study of al arts & Sciences: especialy they studied eloquence in such sort, that the elder Cato in his originals cited by Charisius, hath rendred this testimony of them. That they wer quick conceited & industrious principally in two things; in the Art military, & in wel speaking. The proof hereof apeared in that Hercules of Gaule, so much renowned by our forfathers, figured in such fashion, that from his mouth hung dangling downe at his tongue, manie small chaines of fine gold, wherewith he tied & bound the people by the eares, leading them whether so euer he pleased, & with their their owne good wills, free from al constraint. Declaring by this figure, what precious account they made of wel speaking, and what power wordes had: no lesse (but rather greater) then that of Armes, to subdue people, & cause them become obedient willingly.

Words of more power then weapons

Vnder the Romane Emperors, there was a combate of eloquence in the City of Lyons, fought in Greeke and Latine; wherein, such as were vanquished, gaue the prizes to their victors, and were constrained (besides) to write in their commendation. And as for such as performed no matter worth the esteeming, they were bound (by necessity) to wipe out what they had done with a Spundge, or with their owne tongues; except they better affected, to be either beaten vvith rods, or throwne headlong into the Riuer. Wherto may be referred that which Iuuenal saith.

I am enforced to extend my selfe somwhat further in this discourse, by making report of a few more testimonies; to ouerthrow the false conceiued opinion of some, who haue esteemed, that the people of France (in their first times) vvere not addicted to Sciences, erudition, nor the study of Letters, wherin they are very greatly deceiued. For on the contrary, it is plaine to be proued, that (as in all other thinges) so therein also they haue most singularly excelled, and taught the same to the Romans. He that first instructed the Art of eloquence or well-speaking in Rome, was one Lucius Plotius, a Gaule borne; vnder whom Cicero (beeing then but young) was some yeares vvith his Brother Quintus also. And about the same time, or not long after, another Gaul was highly renowned in Rome, named M. Antonius Gnipho, beeing endued with a mighty spirit of singular memory, and infinitely skilfull and eloquent, as wel in Greeke as in Latine, and verie liberall (whereseuer he came) to teach what he knew. So that for these goodly and commendable qualities, hee bare such sway in those times: as his house was much frequented by the very greatest Romaine Lords.

It cannot be denied also, but that the great Oratour Cicero went often thether when he was Prætor. But that which (aboue all other) may make him most Famous, was, in being Teacher to the great Dictator Cæsar himself. Surely, not without some especial prouidence therein, to the end, that this Prince might hold wholy from Gaule (not onely the encreasing and establishing of his Greatnesse) but also this honor, wherein (not a iot lesse) hee excelled, then in actions of armes. Gaule hath euer since kept her selfe in this reputation. Quintilian, vvho vvas a Spaniard, made great reckoning of the eloquence which was taught in Gaule, and about the declination of the Roman Empire, Symmachus Gouernour of Rome at that time, in one of his Epistles, sayeth; That if he would performe any worke woorthy of memory, he must go of necessitie, and dreine it out of the Gauliſh knowledge and elegancie. The same man also acknowledgeth, That whatsoeuer was in him, either of eloquent or polished speaking, ought the due thereof to the aire of France, where hee had learned them. And in another place hee saith, That Mount Helicon, sacred vnto the Muses, was transported from her owne place, into Frante.

A Gaule was schoolemaster for eloquence to Cicero and Great Cæsar.

The immortality of the ſoul taught by the Druydes.

They inſtructed and taught aboue all things elſe, that mens ſoules wer immortall: which is the foundation of all religion, and the very ſtrongeſt bond of human ſociety. They diſcourſed alſo on the ſtars, and of their courſe and motion: alſo of the greatneſſe of the world, the earth, the nature of things, the power of God; & gaue inſtruction in al theſe to their youth. This is auouched by Ammianus Marcellinus, Mela, and Strabo, who ſay, That the moſt of them held the world to be immortall. An opinion ſurely (after many great diſputes and alterations) found to be moſt true by the verie beſt Philoſophers and Diuines, framing a diſtinction thus.

their times, to consist in the multiplicitie of them.

This shal suffice to shew, that such men were not well informed, as haue written, that the French did not adict themselues to Sciences; considering, that they haue alwayes continued in the exercise of Letters and Learning. And for that purpose they had (from time to time) many famous Schooles, established for the enstruction of youth. Marseilles equalled Athens in learning; so that very oftentimes the Romaines sent their Sonnes to that Academy, rather then to Athens, as it is reported by Strabo, who wrote in the time of the Emperor Tiberius. We reade moreouer, that the Emperour Augustus, sent thither Iulius Antonius, the youngest sonne of his Sister, to study there. And Tacitus reporteth, that the probity, integrity, and knowledge of Iulius Agricola, his Father in Law, came by the nouriture & instruction, which he receiued at Marseilles in France.

About the same time, Austune also became famous for the study of letters and liberall Arts, whereof wee haue the testimony in Tacitus. And againe, after these publike schools, who were established by the Emperor Constantius, father to Constantine, who to that purpose sent thither the Orator Eumenius. There is a Law in the Code Theodosian, of the Emperours Valens, Gratian, and Valentinian, wherein is declared, that there were a great number of Townes in France, which florished by the excellency of Masters, Oratours, and Grammarians, in the learning both of Greeke and Latine. Among which towns also, were them of Bourdeaux; Tholouse, Narbona, and many other. Ausonius likewise speaking of that of Bourdeaux, sayth; That then issued from the hand of one onely Doctor, Nector Mineruius, a thousand Famous Aduocates or Councellors at law, twice as many Senatours or graue Statesmen.

These Fountaines of all erudition, haue not dryed vp in France vnder the reignes of their Kings, but rather haue encreased and abounded more and more, by multiplicity of Schooles, publikely established in many other Cities; wherto they since haue giuen the right of an incorporated body or vniuersity. And by this occasion, such Vniuersities, in fauour of the studie of Letters and Sciences so founded and erected, haue beene endowed and adorned by diuers Kinges, with goodly great priuiledges and particular fauours. Among which, that of Paris hath extraordinarily surpassed all other in the world. To her, as to the Queene of Learning, resortes the affluence of people from strange Nations, there to learne the Sciences, and especially holy Diuinity. This is as the Faire, Mart, or Market of the whole world, for the liberall Arts, and for instruction in all Languages. This is as a Nursing Orchard of good plants and ingenious spirits; in all vertue and faire erudition: from whence hath beene selected (like swarmes of Bees) learned men in infinit numbers, that haue disperssed themselues, and meerely peopled most parts of the earth. Also it hath beene the module and originall, whereby all other haue taken example, not onely for France it self, but likewise for all Europe.

Pope Innocent the third, made such estimation thereof, that from thence he selected all those men, whom hee intended to aduance to the Bishoppricks of Christendome, and other dignities in the Church. Beside, it appeareth by good & sufficient testimonies of other Vniuersities, for more then three hundred yeares since, that the studies of Paris haue beene the Foundation (in great measure) of the Church. Studium Parisiense esse fundamentum Ecclesiæ. And euermore it hath beene the cheefest in opposition against heresies, to combate and ouercom them, euen so soone as (at any time) they began to grow. Infinite victories and triumphs hath she crowned her selfe withal, in so famous a contention, whereof I spare to make any report; because they are no lesse carefully then elegantly set dovvne by the Lord Loysell, in his Tract of the Vniuersity of Paris. Wherein also hee hath most learnedly obserued, the true institution of that Vniuersity, against the vulgar Fables which haue beene noysed thereof. There are likewise many other Vniuersities, founded, and established in diuers Cities and Townes of France, as in Tholousa, Bourges, Orleance, Angiers, Poitiers, Cahors, Mont-pellier, Nymes, Caen, Nantes, Rheims, &c.

Strangers that haue learned their beſt knowledge in France.

I forbeare to ſpeake of thoſe ſtrangers, who by becomming there learned, haue honored their owne countries; thogh reſpiring firſt the ſweet ayre of France, and borrowed a beame from her bright ſplendour, to giue ſome luſter thereof to their places of birth. In breefe to ſpeake truely, it is as difficult a thing, to name all the famous perſons that haue flouriſhed in France, as it is eaſie for other people to make a ſhew of all ſuch as they haue had, which would riſe to a far inferior number. Moreouer, many great perſons (beeing ſtrangers there) hauing diligently ſurueyed the ſpirits of the French, haue found them by experienced iudgment, to be full of life, ſubtile, proper & prompt to all occaſions, cleare ſighted, and piercing into the Sciences; thinking it very conuenient that whereas ſome haue eſteemed the ancient Gaules to be light and mutable, they ſhould rather ſay, & very iuſtly, that they were tractable, apt and ready to performe any thing impoſed on them whatſoeuer.

The opinion of diuers worthy ſtrangers concerning the French.

Of this minde was Iulius Cæſar Scaliger, an Italian, a man moſt learned and iudicious, who ſpeaketh in this manner. Illud eſt comprimis aduertendū, non eſſe cum animorū mobilitate coniunctā fidei iacturam. Gallos enim vides ad omnia momenta vel euentuum vel diſciplinarū promptos, paratos, verſatiles: vt ſemel quicquam vel viſum vel auditum, illico apud eorum ingenia & deponat & amittat nouitatem, in eo ipſo penitus extēplo videntur nati atque educati. Qui animorum vigor igneus, maturaque celiritas nulli alij nationi data eſt à natura. Quoquò incubuere felicißime ſeſe dant, ocyßimè proficiunt gnauiter exercent: mercaturam, artes, arma, litteras, eruditione, ſubtilitatem, candorem, eloquentiam. Omnium tamen gentium atque nationū, fide ſunt maxime integra & conſtāti. It is a matter that well deſerueth to be noted or conſidered, that the defect of faith is not alwaies conioyned with the mobility and lightneſſe of ſpirit. That it muſt needs be ſo, I ſee that the French are prompt, ready, and tractable at all moments and occaſions, be it eyther for the diuerſity of accidents, or bee it for the Sciences: and that in ſuch ſort, as ſo ſoone as they haue ſeene or heard any thing, immediately it loſeth all nouelty with them, and carrieth no ſuch matter of newes in their mindes, for it ſeemeth as inſtantly bred and borne with them. This hot and fiery vigor of vnderſtanding, and this promptitude with maturity & iudgement, hath not bin giuen by nature to any other Nation. On whatſoeuer they purpoſe a reſolution, they apply thēſelues thereto very happily, profite therein moſt ſpeedily, and exerciſe it careſully: either Merchants, Artes, Armes, Letters, erudition, ſubtilty, affability, freedome, and eloquence, or any thing elſe. And yet notwithſtanding, among al nations, they are the moſt vpright, & intirely conſtant of their faith and word.

Scaliger his obſeruation concerning the French.

The French are naturally addicted to ſingular qualities.

Moreouer, as there is nothing that doth ſo much ciuilize and ſweeten manners thē the ſtudy of good letters, & to win knowledge in the Sciences, which do beget in our ſoules all humanity and courteſie, and expelleth all rudeneſſe in carriage: euen ſo is it very true, that there are none more gracious and humane, then the French, eſpecially towards ſtrangers. The mildnes that is inwardly, and lodged vp in a french mans heart, makes plaine outward ſhew and appearance in his countenance. In his forehead he carrieth a naturall franchiſe, and freedome in life and ciuill conuerſation: all laid downe euidently, without diſſembling any thing, or vſing any cunning or flattery. Good iudgement was made hereof by the emperour Iulian, who ſaid; He thought himſelfe moſt happy, to meet with ſuch good natur de men, ſo facile & fellowly, & yet (neuertheleſſe) without flattery.

It is a world of time ſince the Gauls had no mean reputation, for entertaining curteouſly, and liberally welcoming ſtrangers among them. Diodorus the Sicillian highly commended the courteſie of the Gauls in this point. And Tacitus hath written particularly of the Germans, that came from the Gaules, and had meerely learned it of them. And when the French name began firſt to appeare, Salianus of Marſeilles gaue them the vertue, to be kinde to ſtrangers. Aboue all, this people hath alwaies helde Religion in ſingular recommendation, as being § foūdation of vertue: & they haue continually bin deuoted to diuinity, euen when they had no true knowledge therof. Cæſar ſaith, Gallia admodū dedita religionibus. And Liuius deſcribing the ſiege of the Gauls at the Capitole, ſaith, that a man of the houſe of the Fabij, being caſt down frō

On the other side, saith S. Ierom, *Spaine sometime brought forth Geryon the dreadfull monster. Whē it came so to passe, that the schisme of the Donatists exalted it selfe, and many partialities, quarrels, and hatreds by particular persons were intermingled: the Bishops that were in the faction with Donatus, required of the Emperor Constantius, that Iudges might be sent from the Gauls, onely for their piety and learning. Whervpon the Emperor granted vnto them 3 Bishops, Rheticus of Austun, Maternus of Cologne, and Marianus of Arles: who went to Rome, and together with Pope Miltiades, hauing exactly lookt into the matter, decided the cause, and condemned (by their sentence) the error of the Donatists, as it is reported by Optatus, one of the Orthodox Bishops of Affrica, who hath left vs in writing the history of this schisme, & gaue his helpe to the suppression therof.

According to this purpose of ours, it may be very truely maintained, that Gaul, among the Prouinces most towards the West, did first receiue the Christian faith, next vnto Italy; being brought thether in the first birth and infancy of the Church. For ouer & beside the Apostle of France, S. Dionisius Areopagita, who is said to bee sent thither by S. Paul: it is certaine, that one named Crescentius, the scholler of S. Paul, did first of all preach the christian faith in Gaule, and there performed the office of a Bishop and Pastor: as is to be gathered from S. Paul himselfe, from Epiphanius, S. Clemens, S. Ierome, & Eusebius, who report, that he was sent thether by S. Peter, and that there he dyed. I set aside what our Annalists haue recounted of S. Peter and S. Phillip, that they came thether. But I may not omit what is said by Epiphanius; that S. Luke came into France, and there declared the faith of Iesus Christ.

All that can be imputed to the ancient Gaules, concerning the acte of religion, is, that they sacrificed men. But this manner of sacrifice was not particularly to the Gaules, they hauing dealt no otherwise therein, then was vsed (well neere) by all other people. The like is reported of the Scythians in generall, and Mela nameth thē to be the Essedones. The Carthagenians, whē there hapned among thē any plague or famine, or any other publike affliction, they made their recourse to this superstition, & ordinarily bloodied the Altars of their Hercules with humane sacrifices, yea they would sacrifice their owne children to Saturne. Strabo saith, that the Lusitanians, a people of Spaine, wold offer vp their prisoners in war. And Seuerus declareth, that the Massilians, a people of Greece, & well educated, would feed a man very immeasurably for some space of time, then they wold conduct him through their citty, charging him with accursed execrations & imprecations; and in the end they would sacrifice him, to expiate their publike offences, and to lay on him the penalty of all their sins. Among the Grecians it was very common, not onely during the Troyan warre, of Iphigenia, sacrificed at the the gate of Aulis; but likewise of Polixena, in the Land of Troye. Long time after, Themistocles (a little before the day of Salamina) by command of his diuinators, caused three noble Persians to be sacrificed. And about the same time, Xerxes, King of Persia, offered twelue men in sacrifice. Many examples more are there of the Grecians, declared more at large by Plutarke. What thinke ye then of the Romanes? Were not they addicted to the same superstition, and vsed the like sacrifices of humane oblations? Wee finde it faithfully set downe, that they sacrificed two Gaules, a man and a woman, to their Tutelary or houshold God. I cannot imagine what should be the reason, why they chose their offerings to be of that people, rather then of any other; if it were not in this respect, that they supposed they shold present a more acceptable sacrifice (in so doing) to the God of their Citty, then to offer any other people, whereby he might be offended, because once they had consumed Rome in cinders, and therfore they might bee iudged the more able (afterward) to ouerthrow the whole Empire.

Plutarke reporteth, that they caused some of the Gaules to be buried aliue, during the Consulship of Marcellus, by reason of a Gaulish warre which had happened to them, and whereof they stood in fearefull doubt. And that afterward, euen till his time, they would haue celebrated the like bloody anniuersaries; which might not be permitted (it may bee for the immanity) and all the world to see it. The like was put in practise at Rome, soone after the dismall day at Cannas: & the Emperor Domitian likewise sacrificed two: They had a Iupiter, surnamed Latialis, to whom they made offerings of human blood, and of the liues of men. This Tertullian saieth was ordinarily done in his time: and Lactantius and Eusebius, who liued soone after vnder the first Christian Emperours, do affirme as much.

The often & frequent spectacles, among the Gladiatores or Fencers, were they any thing else, but euen a cruel and bloody sacrifice of many men. Nay, which was most detestable, to cause them kill one another for other mens pleasure? They were not any small number of one or two, but ordinarily fiue hundred, a thousand, two thousand, and three thousand: and it hath bin obserued, that at such times, ten thousand haue bin thereto exposed. Let Cicero then and Plutarke ceasse to reproue the Gauls with this custome, seeing that they themselues, both Greeks & Romans, haue obserued the same. Nay, the Greeks did far worse, for not contenting themselues with such sacrifices, they would needs know what good meate it was to feede on humane flesh, and as Pliny hath left written, to taste of all the parts of a man. If it was ill done to sacrifice a man, how much more detestable was it then, to serue in his flesh for food to the table? As for Cicero, I pardon him very willingly, for that which he said in one of his pleadings of the Gauls: because it was to serue his own cause, and for the reproofe of witnesses, which made whatsoeuer he saide the lesse considerable. Contrariwise also, as himselfe hath written. He may soone deceiue him selfe, that thinkes out of mine Orations and Pleadings, to deriue any availeable authority of my opinion, or else a forme of testimony, by that which I haue said: Because (saith he) it was the cause that spake, and not I. And yet if wee obserue more neerely, what Cæsar hath said concerning this case, wee shall perceiue that the Gaules made glad sacrifices of malefactors, as thinking such an offring to be most agreeable to the gods, as (indeede) there could bee none more proper, then the iust punishment of wicked persons. And yet notwithstanding, sometimes they were constrayned to goe so farre as innocent folke, meerely for the defect of other: because this opinion was noted in the, that the Gods could not be pleased, for the life and safety of one man, but by offring to them the life of another.

Howsoeuer, they deserued herein no imputation of blame, because what they did, was by superstition, the excesse of true religion, not holding it for any errour, to offer to God what might bee most acceptable: which made them to present him with so noble a creature, the only perfect of all other, and so consecrated to him the most precious oblation of all oblations: wherin they are the lesse taxable for their custome (though indeed cruel) yet not proceeding so farre as other, as the Grecians, who fell voluntarily into Atheisme. Among Gods people, we see that Ieptah fel into the same error, vnder the shadow of a vow & deuotion: albeit I know very wel that the Hebrew Text hath no other carriage, but that he offered to God, no more but the virginity of his daughter onely, & that this is the opinion and interpretation of the most learned Rabines. I passe ouer the abhominable idolatries of the Iewes, to the Idoll Moloch, who practised the very same. Yet what hath beene said, might (perhaps) sauour of some signale and sensible apprehension, or presage, that man could not be saued, but by a man himselfe: And that one day, man should bee redeemed, and brought into his former condition, by the blood and passion of a man. This haue I set downe in their excuse, it being a zeale proceeding from religion, when as then they walked in darknes, destitute of any knowledge of the true God.

The Authors opinion of the Gaules superstition, & his excuse in their behalfe.

Now, forasmuch as I haue heeretofore indifferently vsed these words, Gaule and France, Frenchmen and Gaules, as being no other then one and the same thing, whereof some may conceit very strangely; I hold it conuenient, & sutable to our purpose, to deliuer a sufficient reason therefore. That which our Ancients had named Gaule or Celtica, was afterward designed by the name of France. Likewise, the Kings of France haue long time commanded, in all those parts which were tearmed the ancient bounds of Gaule, betweene the Rheine, the Alpes, the Pyreneans, and the Mediterranean and Ocean Seas. These were the ancient limits of France, which also by seasons, and vnder certaine Kings, haue extended themselues a great deal further. But if any parcell therof be at this day dismembred or cut off, that may not change the true appellation of things. Considering, that such distraction is nothing but the acte, the right alwaies remaines in his perfect integrity. And as for the French, it will be auouched, that they are one selfsame people with the Gaules, on whatsoeuer side search be made, and the truth set downe of their originall.

How ancient Gaule became afterward to be called France.

Confusion of actions may not alter matters of truth.

I may not stay my selfe heere, to fight with the false opinion of such, who thinking to make the Gaules themore honourable, would haue them to be descended from the Troyans, because it hath bin already done by others. But it is a point so cleare and apparant, that there is no man (now adayes) so silly versed in letters: but plainly knoweth, that they are altogether meere fables and fictions. There hath bin another opinion, and pursued by many, who imagineth the French to bee come foorth of Allemaigne or Germany. And according to this conceit, there shall be no place of distinguishing the French with the Gaules: because it is most true to say, that Germany hath beene peopled by her neighbor Gaule. So in making the French to come from thence into Gaule, is to returne them backe to the place where they receiued their originall. For it is to be credited, that Prouinces which are the most temperate, haue bin the first inhabited, & after that men are encreased in multitude, they then make their recourse to more remote places, which are of ruder quality, and more subiect to cold. Beside, Cæsar himselfe (long since) testified, that the Germanes or Allemaigns, called the Gaules their Brethren: for the similitude of their manners, and the customes of both these people, reported by our ancestors, may instantly make faith for this their fraternity.

That they should come out of Germany into Gaule.

That the French should be descended from the Troyans.

Others would fetch them from the Pannoniaes, as it is reported by S. Gregory of Tours. Now it is very certaine, that the Gaules did sometimes people both the Pannoniaes: especially at that time, as Brennus made warre in Macedon, and throughout all Greece. And the Geographers, as Stephanus, Arrianus, and Strabo, do nominate the Celtes among the people of Pannonia. There is yet another opinion, the trueſt and most certaine, and yet notwithstanding little enough knowne. For oftentimes (saith an ancient Writer) it commeth to passe, that the originall of great people is as much vnknowne, as that of our greatest Riuers. This is that which hath bin obserued by diuers passages of Sidonius Apollinaris, S. Gregory of Tours, and other neighbouring Authors, concerning the beginning of this Monarchy: that the French came from Sicambria, and that the Sicambrians are many times taken for the French.

Now we are to note, this Sicambria is not that Sicambria, which some haue vsually seated in Franconia: but it is described by auncient Geographers toward the North, wholly ioyning to the riuages of Rheine, as wel on the one side, as the other. But more principally towards the place, where that goodly streame falleth into the Sea: a place of very difficult accesse, by reason of the great Marishes thereabout. Suetonius maketh mention that the Emperor perour Augustus cauſed thoſe valiant Sicambrians to paſſe on further into the firme land of the Gaules, and namely, that he gaue them * Batauia to dwell in. This he did, ſome way to content them, and to hinder their courſes: as alſo to ſerue his owne turne with this warlike Nation, being vpon the extremities or vtmoſt parts of Gaule. And beſide, we reade in Tacitus, that there was daily at the Emperors ſeruice, a Sicambrian band or Cohort, highly eſteemed for their valiancy.

* Holland in low Germany

Corn. Tacit. in lib. 6. cap. 9.

Heereby we may know, that they are deſcended of the ſame country with the Gaules, and it is to bee credited, that theſe were the people onely, which neuer came into ſubiection of the Romane Empire, in the time of Cæſar: in regard of the difficult places, and badneſſe of the country which then they held. This Sicambrian people, knowne & renowned by the name of French onely, in the time of Galien, vnder Poſthumius, one of the thirty tyrants, about the yeare of our Lord, CCLXIX. could not keepe themſelues alwayes in their Northerly corner or angle of Gaule, ſuch as (at this day) Holland and part of Frieſland are: but they made their extendure into neighboring countries, & continually there tormented the Romanes in Gaule, after whoſe liberty they longed frō time to time. And part of them paſſing into Gaule among the Romanes, were there highly eſteemed, and came to vndertake the cheefeſt charges, as we may reade of many of them, in Ammianus Marcellinus.

The Sicabrians renowned by the name of French.

The Sicambrians long deſired the liberty of Gaul

Ammian. Marcel. in l. 14. cap. 7

Part of this people alſo, namely they that were tranſported by Auguſtus, continued (for long time) in obedience to the Empire, as appeareth by many examples, and Hiſtories ſet downe by diuers Hiſtorians, which I may not heere recite, becauſe (for the moſt part) they haue beene diligently collected by the Lord Fauchet, in his French Antiquities, where this true opinion is approued, by the paſſages of Zozimus, Ammianus Marcellinus, Procopius and Zonarus. At the fall of that great Empire, thoſe inuincible Sicambrians, Francs, or French, accuſtomed to make ordinary courſes into Gaule, perceiuing the inuaſion of Northerly people, as the Alanes, Vandales, Bourguignons, & Gothes; they could not endure, that their ancient country ſhold remaine any longer ſo ſubiected, neither by the tyranny of Romane Magiſtrates, nor by the inuaſions of barbarous people. Hereupon, taking apt occaſion, they proceed on further into the midſt of the Gaules; where they were receiued (in open armes) by their olde mother, and by the other Gaules, who ioyning with them, ſhooke off the yoke of the Romanes, & expulſed alſo the ſtrange Nations, y had ſo inſolently intruded on thē.

Antiquit. de D. Fauchet.

Zozimus, Procopius, and Zonarus.

The Sicambrians could not endure the ſlauery of their country.

From thence forward, both one & other named them Frenchmen, as being but one people by originall. Nor can it be conceiued, that the Sicambrian people ſhold be enemies to the Gaules, but rather called by thē as their fellowly brethren, to helpe in their enfranchizing, beeing receiued with the liking of euery one: as theſe places of S. Gregory of Tours do ſufficiently ſhew. Interea cum iam terror Francorum reſonaret in his partibus, & omnes eos, amore deſiderabili cuperent imperare, &c. Alſo in another place: Multi ex Gallijs habere Frācos dominos ſūmo deſiderio cupiebant. Moreouer, it is to be ſeen in many places of the hiſtories, written by the ſame S. Gregory, that the Gauls were neuer trod downe by the French; but adminiſtred in publike charges, & took part in their honors, not as a conquered people, but as companions, friends, and aſſociates, and as making but one people. In regard whereof, a man may vſe the names of French and Gauls, & France and Gaule, beeing but one and the ſame thing. And the country euermore inhabited by the ſame people originally, being neuer thence expulſed, nor ſubiected.

A country the moſt happy, the moſt fertile, the moſt abounding in all things, and the moſt agreeable with the world, & leaſt incōmodious. The people dwelling therein, the moſt martial; & warriors at al times, that the Sunne neuer beheld better. By others alſo commended, for all thoſe good and vertuous qualities, wherwith any humane ſpirit can be adorned, quicke, apt, & ready to whatſoeuer they apply thēſelues, with moderation, curteſie, and humanity, as none greater can be deſired. The happineſſe & felicity of this Land, together with ſo many commendable qualities of the people, haue bene publiſhed (in ſome meaſure) by the Poet Buchanan of Scotland, when at his returne from Portugall, coming backe into France, he made theſe verſes, which I thoght fit here to inſert, to ſerue for a concluſion of this diſcourſe.

CHAP. III.

Of the Maiesty, Dignity, and high Eminency of the Kings of France: And what infinite actions of Honour they haue done from time to time, to renowne the glory of that kingdome.

What it is that maketh the full felicity of any kingdome.

IT is not yet sufficient, neyther maketh it vp a perfect felicity, that France should bee filled with so much wealth and commodities, as the earth can any way yeeld: also that the people are so generous, endued with so many commendable qualities, beside, most humane and acceptable conuersation. If all do not correspond to this prosperity, and that the forme of her estate & good gouernment, is not the main height of all this happinesse. Wherein it may well be said, that France hath bene as graciously fauoured by heauen, as in al other things whatsoeuer. There hath neuer beene seene so many ciuill warres and factions, for change and alteration of the State, as hath often happened in many other Prouinces. After she had once tasted the Monarchall Gouernment of one only naturall Prince (which all the greatest Philosophers, such as were brought vp in free cities, haue confessed to be the best) she neuer found any change, neyther did it euer make offer of it selfe, or any way proposed.

The Monarchall gouernment of a naturall Prince.

France well may boast this in common, with a great part of the people of the world, that she is a Monarchall estate: but yet this is more particular to her, that she hath suffered no mutation for so many Ages; but hath beene inuiolably alwayes conserued in her owne Royall estate and gouernment. And it may as truly be said, that her Kings haue excelled as much aboue others in the world, as France it selfe hath gon beyond all other Lands. Then to come to the paint of her Kings, and of their Greatnesse and Excellency: it resulteth first of al, from that which hath beene discoursed heeretofore. Because there is no man, but will tearme that king potent, rich, and redoubtable, that commandeth ouer a country so fertile & well furnished: and he will also vouchsafe, that Kings commanding a people so vertuous and generous together, must needs be Paragons in generosity and courage, yea, & true models of all vertue. Moreouer, what other Kings can make their vaunt, to haue so goodly, so opulent, and so happy territories, and to command ouer such a people? In like manner, what Land can say, that it hath had like Kings, and so great in all respects, as they of France haue bin? This is in generall, and the touching of this point thus were sufficient, without need of any further inquisition; because it is euident to the eyes of all men, euen as what hath bin related in our former chap.

France neuer subiect to mutation in gouernment.

The happinesse of Kings in their gouernment.

But to discourse more particularly on their other prerogatiues. First, it is a matter most constant and certaine, that the Kings of France are Soueraigns in their State, holding their kingdom but of God onely, and by the Sword: this needs no other profe, because it is granted without contradiction. Alſo, they haue bene in this poſſeſſion, not onely for exceeding the memories of men, or for three hundred years a tearme more then ſufficient, for eſtabliſhing ſure and inuiolably a Soueraigne eſtate, as maintained Ieptah, chiefe of the Iſraelites againſt the Ammonites, but alſo for twelue hundred yeares. There needeth no other teſtimony then that of Pope Innocent the third, who ſpeaketh it expreſly in his Decretall, That the King of Fraunce acknowledged not any Soueraigne, in temporal occaſions.

Cap. Per venerabilem. Qui filii ſint legit.

This was it which made ſo ſuperfluous impertinent, inept, and idle, the diſputation ſo much canuazed amongſt the Doctors Imperialiſts, to witte; Whether the King of France were ſubiect to the Empire, or no, and whereabout the Doctors diſputing vainly, contraried themſelues, and ſufficiently ouerthrew their owne iudgements. Peter Belluga, an ancient Spaniſh Doctor, in his treatiſe of a Prince, & Oldradus an Italian Doctour (the cheefeſt of his time do maintaine; That the kingdome of France acknowledgeth not, either by acte or right, any Prince of the world.

Pet. Belluga. In ſpeculo Principium, tit. 4. n. 39

Oldradus in Conſilibus.

The Emperors themſelues alſo, haue auouched as much; declaring by diuers actes, That the King of France is Soueraigne, & that he depended not on them in any faſhion whatſoeuer; which will be more amply handled, in a place fitter for the purpoſe. To as ſilly effect was that, which Doctor Lopez Madera, a Spaniard hath written; That the Kings of France doe take their Title, by a conceſſion made vnto them by the Emperor Iuſtinian, according to the recitall of Procopius. But a man can ſet no ſure footing, on that which is ſaide by a ſubiect to the Empire. And beſide, ſoon after, Iuſtinian himſelfe could ſay; That he quitted whatſoeuer hee had pretended to the Gaules, becauſe he held not there any thing. And in other places, he ſpeaketh not of al the Gauls, but onely concerning them of Prouence, and the neighbouring Landes, which the Gothes held before, & which he pretended appertaining vnto him, by his conqueſt made of them. VVhich Lands, the Gothes hauing made ouer to the Kings of France, Iuſtinian approued the conceſſion, and on that conſideration, departed with all his rights and pretenſions.

Lopez Mader. In lib. Excellencias de Eſpagn. cap. 2.

The French do not ground their grants, as the ſame Lopez did for Spaine, on the grant which he pretended to be made by the Emperor Honorius, to the Gothe Alaricke. They deriue their title from higher place, and not from the Romaines: who had no other right, but an vniuſt inuaſion by Armes. For theſe are the Gauls, namely, ſuch as enfranchiſed themſelues from the Romanes, and that by meanes of the French, their auncient Columnes and Compatriots. And therefore it is apparantly ſeene, that they haue no way vſurped by nouelty, but rather haue regained their firſt condition and liberty, as being reduced to their primitiue nature. A matter very fauorable, and a reaſon moſt impertinent among the Ciuill Lawyers. In like manner, what was more iuſt then that which the Romanes caried away by force of Armes, and was taken again from them by the very ſame meanes? But this is infallible, that the Kings of France are Soueraignes, knowne to be ſuch, at all times and euery where, without any controuerſie, or friuolous contradiction.

L. Si vnus, 94. Pactus ne Peteres, D. de Pact.

It cannot bee ſo ſayde of many other Kings, and namely it hath called in queſtion the King of Spaine. For Pope Gregory maintaineth in his Regiſter, that Spaine is parcell of Saint Peters patrimony, and is to make prouiſion for his Lord: hauing therfore inueſted a certain Count or Earle of all that which he had conquered from the Moores. In conſequence whereof, by report of their own Spaniſh writers, Ramirus the firſt, King of Arragon, payed a tribute to the Popes: which his ſon Sanchio after continued to Pope Alexander the ſecond. And ſince this ſubiection to the Romane Church, as from feodataries, it hath beene acknowledged by other Kings.

VVe reade that Peter the ſecond, King of Arragon, beſide acknowledgement of feodality, ſubmitted & rendred his kingdome, by ordinary cenſuall (to Pope Innocent the third) of two hundred and fifty peeces of Arabian Golde, which had free courſe then, as appeareth by the Regiſters in the Vaticane, which were extracted and ouer-written by Ciacconius a Spaniſh author, who wrote the liues of the Popes, & by diuers hiſtories of Spaine.

Ciacconius in Regiſt. Vatani.

In like manner, the Realmes of Sardignia and Carſica doe depend vppon the holy See, and the inueſtiture of them rkept in the Vaticane, which was made by the Pope

Pope to Peter the third, King of Arragon. In consequence wherof afterward, Iaques of Arragon, did homage liege at Valencia, betweene the hands of the Legate, in the yeare, MCCCLIII.

I finde also, that Ferdinand and Alphonsus, Kings of Arragon, did make faith and homage, in the yeare MCCCCXLV. The Ilands of the Canaries, and Cape du Verd, are held in the same sort; and I reade, that Lewes of Spaine was inuested, and rēdred faith and hommage to the Pope, in the yeare MCCCXLIII. being charged to pay to the Apostolicall Chamber, four hundred Florins of gold; wherof Petrarch also maketh mention. And as for the East Indiaes and Peru, it is very certaine, that Pope Alexander the sixt, in making partage of that which was newly discouered, betweene the kings of Castile and Portugall: reserued expressely to himselfe, the full power and soueraignty, by consent of both the kings, whom afterward he constituted his vassails, in all acquests & conquests by them made, or that should bee made thence forward, as the Spaniards themselues haue written. In like case, pope Iulius the second, gaue to Ferdinand the fift, King of Arragon and of Castile, the kingdome of Granada, which hee had conquered from the Moores: with this charge, to hold it of the Roman Church, in faith and homage.

All these feodall acknowledgements and subiections of the estate of Spaine, as well in generall as in particular, are no matters of nouelty. For before them, and during the reigne of the Gothes: the kings alwayes payed tribute to the holy See, in acknowledgement of soueraignty: vntill that a tyrant named Vitiza, a little before the ruine made by the Sarrazins, refused to pay it. And afterward, by the generall inuasion of Spaine, hauing bin wholly discontinued; Pope Gregory the seuenth cōplained thereof in his Register, as is well obserued by the worthy Cardinall Baronius. Which may be the cause, that each particular king, beginning to strengthen himselfe against the oppression of the Sarrazins, would returne againe to the duty of this submission, and ancient subiection.

On the other side, it is found recorded, that the kingdom of Castile is in Fief to France. For Henry the second, King of Castile, submitting himselfe to Charls the fift, king of France, promised as well for himselfe, as for his successors, to be vassall; and to hold his kingdome of Castile, of the Kings of France, by a treaty in the yeare MCCCLXIX. which is kept in good forme in the Treasury of France. This king of Castile, being expulsed thēce by his Brother Don Peter, was at length re-establisshed there againe, by power frō the king of France, vnder conduct of that valiant knight, Bertrand de Guescline, Constable of France, notwithstanding all the effortes of the English, bandied to the contrary.

There is another notable quality, which is no meane aduantage vnto the Realme of France, in that it is, and euermore hath beene successiue hereditary, and not electiue. And like as by generall custome, in all succession in the Realme, death seizeth on the liuing: euen so this taketh place, & is obserued so much the more certainely, for succesion in the State. Not vnfitly compared to the golden branch in Virgill, which being pluckt away, another springeth vp instantly, so that there is neuer any defailance.

Vno auulso, non deficit alter.

Whence arose the common saying among the French; That the King neuer dyeth. Because that there is alwayes (naturally) another of the same kinde, who (without any controuersie or difficulty) succeedeth at the same instant in the others place. And when as France happeneth to be ouer-trauailed and pressed by potent enemies, euen to the losse of her King; yet it causeth no confusion or disorder, neither giueth any aduantage to the enemy, or can he (by such an accident) vsurpe vppon the State. It hath beene prooued (to the cost of some) like vnto a reuiuing Hydra, not to bee surmounted; or rather as a Phœnix, that reuiueth another out of her selfe. Also, that the Kings of France were truely bred of an immortall race, neuer parting from hence, to returne to the true place of their celestiall and diuine originall; but they left a successour, who (in the same moment) is made King, without any other formality.

But to render their succesion the more assured, & (therby) the kings immortall, it hath

Before I paſſe any further, I may heere tell you, that ſuch ſucceſſion in a kingdom hath not alwayes beene in Spaine. And there needeth no other proofe thereof, but the confeſſion or acknowledgement of Spaniſh Authors; and particularlie, of Lopez Madera, who wrote in the Spaniſh tongue, and yet but little for the dignitie of the Kings of Spaine. For we find, that the Kings were ther eſtabliſhed by election, not onely during the kingdom of the Gothes; but alſo, after that they were ruined, and in the inuaſion of the Sarazins. Pelagius, king of the Aſturians*, & (after him) many other his ſucceſſors, came by the very ſame meanes, as is exactly approued by Molina a Spaniſh Authour. the Kinges were electiue: but yet, that none were at any time elected, excepting that they were of the Family and Houſe-Royall.

The contrary appeareth, by the certaine ſequele of Hiſtories, and namely by the Councels of Toledo, who permitted, that the election ſhould be made indefinitely of all perſons; except of Slaues, ſtrangers, and others, that were not of the race of the Gothes. Wherein (it may be) an equiuocation is made, when as Lopez ſayth, De eadem gente: the interpretation beareth, Of the Family and Houſe-Royall, and not of the Nation of the Gothes, as the Councels vnderſtood it. Therein alſo were many conſtitutions, for the honour and conſeruation of ſuch as were of the race of the precedent Kings: it beeing a matter neceſſary to aſſure them in this manner, becauſe there were other Kinges of their houſe. For whom there needed no ſuch prouiſion, nor ſearch for ſuch aſſurances, if the Kings ſhould haue beene ſucceſsiue. But yet much more by the fift Councell of Toledo, there is denounced a curſe and excommunication agaynſt ſuch as ſhall come to the kingdom of the Goths otherwiſe then by election. As we read in Ritius, one of their owne Hiſtorians, that Bamba a labouring man was made king of Spaine by Pope Leo, and approued by the election of the people.

The difficulties and dangers in a state electiue.

Would we but a little consider the great difficulties and inconueniences, which are noted in an electiue estate, by reason of such forme of election, we shold the better know, what an aduantage, excellency, and prerogatiue France hath. In an estate electiue, the death of the Prince hapning, there is an Interregnum, during which time, it falles into * Anarchy, which causeth disorder, vnrulinesse, and confusion; whereon ensue infinite euils, murders, assassines, violences and thefts. As hath beene well obserued in those elections, made for the Kings of Thunis, & the Soldanes of Egypt by the Mammelukes. Nay, and hath sometimes happened at the election of Popes, in Sede vacante.

* People without a Prince.

The kings of Thunis, Soldanes of Egypt, and election of some Popes.

And which is yet farre worse, the Interregnum sometimes lasteth for many dayes, because, beside vnder-handed suites and made factions, there is an naturall inclination to dissention in men. As hath oft beene seene to happen in the Empire of the East, after it yeelded it selfe to be electiue: And in the Realmes of Hungary, Polonia, Bohemia, Denmarke, and Sweden. During these Interregnums, nothing happeneth but schismes, diuisions, and many menacings of diuers persons, which ordinarily do draw on ciuill warres, euery one coueting to haue a Prince of his partaking, or as he would haue it.

The Empire of the East becomming electiue, & the kingdomes of diuers countries beside.

It hath also beene obserued in the Empire of Germany, that many Emperors haue beene elected, vntill they haue had seuen or eight at a time, as after the death of the Emperour Fredericke the second. And there could no sufficient remedy be found, for the establishing of a Gouernour, that might haue commanded in the meane while; because about the election of that Gouernour, there grew on still the same inconueniences. And perhaps it might haue so fallen out, that the Gouernour being seized on the estate, would attend no other election, as some haue done heeretofore: finding but few men, that will render vp so great an engadgement, & a thing so attracting, he reputing himselfe iust in all things, if he can keepe such dignity from violation.

Contrarious election in the Empire of Germany.

Great estate and dignity is not easily parted withall.

Moreouer, it commeth so to passe sometimes, that such as haue the right to elect Princes, will deliuer foorth some apparances of credence to them; euen to haue them murdered and massacred, if they please them not, or else by corruption leaue them and elect some other. Hereof the Romane Empire can furnish vs with sufficient examples; and that it neuer was more calme, then when her Princes came to the Empire by succession. On the contrary, when the election was in the Soldiors hands, they set the Empire to sale, and filled all the State with rapines, thefts, murders, cruelties, and barbarous brutishnesse. When an Emperour pleased them not, were he the most vertuous man and the best Prince in the world; they would massacre him, without any difficulty, and establish another; as it befell to the good Emperor Pertinax, after whose murder, they caused it to bee published through the Citty, that the Empire was to be sold to the faireſt offerer.

The Romane Empire a woefull witnesse of her owne miseries and calamities.

The Emperour Pertinax murdered.

In like manner, they murdered Alexander Seuerus, one of the best and most vertuous Princes that euer was. And so they dealt with Probus, Tacitus, and many more, as may bee gathered by the sequell of Histories from time to time. Yet this is not all, each Legion and each Army made his Emperor all which (in the end) had their throtes cut, after cruell ciuill warres: the poore people enduring all this while, infinite miseries, and there are obserued (in that time) well neere thirty, among whom there was two women.

Alexander Seuerus, Probus, Tacitus, & many more Emperours murdered.

These inconueniences were ordinary (anciently) in the estate of Spaine. S. Gregory of Tours saith: Sumpserant Gotthi hanc detestabilem consuetudinem, vt si quis eis de regibus non placuisset, gladio eum adpeterent; & qui libuisset animo, hunc sibi statuerunt Regem. The Gothes had taken this detestable custome, that if any one of their Kings did not please them; they would murder him, and establish whosoeuer falleth into their fantasie, to be their King. This he wrote concerning Theudas, Theudegysiles, and Agilas. And in Germany, after that this order of election got footing there, there were eight or nine Emperors slain; as William of Holland, Raoull, Albert, Henry the the ſeuenth, Frederick the ſecond, and Lewes of Bauaria, &c. beſide them that haue ſhamefully bene expulſed from the Imperiall Throne. And of fifteene Sultanes that reigned in Egypt, ſeauen were murthered.

Seuē Sultans of Egipt murdered.

VVith theſe wee could ranke many equall, and equally worthy, growing onely through hatreds and diſcontentment: from whence haue proceeded diuiſions and ſeditions; ſo that the choiſe and preferring of one man, hath prooued the vtter contempt of another. And queſtionleſſe, it wil be very hard for him that hath beene refuſed, intirely to be obedient to him with whome hee hath conteſted for the royall authority, as his equal in houſe, reputation and merit.

Eminency brooketh no competitor.

Happy France, and truly happy, whereto God hath giuen the grace, to breathe but one acceptable libertie, vnder the ſweet command of thy naturall and ſucceſſiue Kings: which hath bene thy warrant from ruine, dangers, & deadly tempeſts, and hath kept thy State alwaies floriſhing, yea, in full ſtrength and vigor.

The felicity of France.

Amongſt other inconueniences that may be met within an elective eſtate, this is one: A Prince elective will neuer bee carefull of the ſtate, which he holdeth but by entreaty, or at other mens liking, but of his owne family. For knowing well, that he cannot leaue the kingdome to his children, he makes his profite of the publike purſſe, deriuing and turning it to his own particulars, by venditions and other alienations. According as Rodolfe of Habſpourg did, who comming to bee elected Emperour, by the fauour of his Maſter Elector, the Arch-Biſhop of Magunce; founded & built vp the houſe of Auſtria vpon the ruines of the Empire. Euen ſo farre, as to ſell at prices of mony, her freedomes and Seigneuries to Cities of Italy; as to Florence for ſix thouſand crowns, and to Luca for ten thouſand, and ſo to other in like manner. Which prooued to be the end of the kingdom and command of the Emperors in Italy: in regard whereof, he was highly blamed by all the Hiſtorians of thoſe times, and by ſuch as haue written euer ſince.

A note well worth the obſeruation.

Radolfe of of Habſpourg Emperor, & what great indignity he did to the empire.

I forbeare to ſpeake of many other Emperours, who practiſed in the ſame manner, and alienated the hereditary patrimony of the Empire, Cities, Townes, Territories, and Seigneuries, as well in Germany, as in Italy, and other places. And by this meanes, diuers Principalities eſtabliſhed, and great cities franchiſed, beare now no more but the bare name of ſoueraignty for the Empire. Alſo it is to bee credited, that a Prince doing what he can, will ouerthrow all, yet not topſie turuy: but will mingle (as one ſaith) heauen with earth, but he wil make his iſſue to ſucceed, ſo ſtrong and mighty is this paſſion. Few or none are found to follow the example of Moyſes, who knowing and acknowledging his ſonnes to bee incapable to command the people of Iſrael after him; rather choſe to eſtabliſh another, as preferring the weale publike, before affection or charity to his owne. It is recorded, that the Emperour Charles the fourth, promiſed an hundred thouſand crowns to each one of the Princes Electours, to haue his ſonne Wenceſlaus elected emperour; and being vnable to pay them, hee was conſtrained to giue ouer to them the ordinary reuennues of the empire in paiment.

The hereditary patrimony of the Empire alienated, and nothing but the bare name remaining.

The liberall promiſe of the Emperour Charles the 4.

The caſe is quite contrary in France, where the inheritance and patrimony of him that commeth to the crowne by ſucceſsion, accrueth and reuniteth it ſelfe (by the ſame meanes) to the crowne. In regard whereof, the Kings haue not two kindes of inheritances, the one particular, and the other publike: for all commeth of one and the ſame nature, & all is made publike. Wherein is diſcerned the full effect, of that which the emperour Antoninus Pius ſaid to his wife. Seeing (ſayeth he) that we are come to the Empire, wee haue loſt that which we had before.

No two kinds of inheritances in France comming to the crowne by the King.

Capitolinus in eius vita.

But although this kingdome bee ſucceſsiue in this manner, by the iuuiolable cuſtom of the country, rather thē by hereditary right: yet notwithſtanding, women, and the deſcendants of them in that kind, neuer haue beene, neither euer can be admitted, no not in the defect of Males. VVithout reaſon, ſome enemies to the French name, and enuious (to ſpeake truly) of this prerogatiue; would ſtriue to call in doubt the Salique Law, which reiecteth women from ſucceſsion in the kingdome, ſaying, that the originall therof is doubtfull and vncertaine. As if a man can deſire a better and more certain proofe, then the ſucceſſe and poſſeſsion of ſo many hundred yeares, ſince the ſet-led eſtabliſhment of that eſtate. That law hath beene engrauen, not in Marble or Copper, but in the hearts of Frenchmen and alwayes certainly kept.

Lopez Madera the Spaniard, ſeeing that the like could not be in Spaine, and that the dignity was much leſſe, to couer the defect, and bring ſome ſhadow for it, laboureth to prooue, by ſtretching out a long diſcourſe, that the ſucceſsion of women is very naturall. This carryeth good reaſon in matter of ſucceſſion for Patrimony in particulars. In which caſe (neuertheleſſe) we can ſhew, that the ſucceſſions by right (well neere of all people) hath alwayes bene referred to the Males: who are as firme pillars and Anchors of aſſurance to great Families. But in the ſucceſsion of a mighty eſtate or kingdom it were a mockery for the French to imagine, that the maintaining of womens ſucceſſion could be the better. There is verie great difference (ſayde the Emperour Adrian) betweene the ſearch of an heyre of my patrimony, and a ſucceſſor in an Empire.

Lopez Madera, in hiſt. Espagn. Lib. 3. cap. 7.

The wiſe ſaying of the Emperor Adrian.

Moreouer, it were ſuperfluous to goe ſeeke for the originall of this Salique law, and enquire any further, when or how it was made; becauſe it appeareth of a certaine vſe, and that it hath alwaies bin kept by the French. Law hath no force, if it be not by cuſtome, which is the very ſtrongeſt Law of all other. And it may well be ſayde, that it is a right of great authoritie, when it hath bene obſerued ſo ſtrictly: as there is no neede of reducing it to a law by writing.

Law hath no power but by cuſtome.

It is no written Law, but borne with them, neither haue they inuented it, but ſuckt it from nature her ſelfe, who gaue it them by inſtinct, & ſo inſtructed them: which not only the French, but moſt part of the people of the world, haue likewiſe moſt religiouſly obſerued. If we look vpon royalty and imitation of gouernment generall in the world, by the Soueraigne vnity, from the very firſt birth, that is to ſay, when the world tooke beginning, we ſhall find, that the firſt fathers of families gaue command in their houſes themſelus and not by their wiues, and that the male children ſucceeded them in the ſoueraignty of the Family, whereas the Daughters paſſed to another houſe, without hauing any part there.

The Salique Law bred and borne with the French.

A compariſon of the worlds firſt begining.

Whence came it, that all people (in the firſt ages) were gouerned by Kinges, (not of many Prouinces) but of a Cittie, or ſmall territory onely, which had bene before but the incloſure of a father of a Family? As is to be ſeene, as wel in holy Writ, as by the ancient hiſtories of each Countrey. That which great Ariſtotle ſo faithfully interpreted of nature, hee hath well acknowledged. In the beginning (ſaith hee) Townes and Cities were gouerned by Kings, as now adayes people and ſtrange Nations are. For they were compoſed of people, that liued vnder Royalty: each Family being gouerned by the moſt ancient. So women could not come to the Royaltie, neyther hold part in the ſucceſſion of particulars. Contrarywiſe, Fathers of the family receiued commodity by rich gifts and preſents which were giuen them, by ſuch as made requeſt for their daughtets: as wee reade in holye Writ, of the Father, Mother, and Brethren of Rebecca, the wife to Iſaac, and as (at this day) it is a common right among all ſtrange people, as well of the Eaſt, weſt, and South, where it is obſerued in the ſame ſort.

Ariſt in Politic lib. 1. cap. 2.

Gen. 24 53.

Ariſtotle reporteth, that the ancient Greeks did buy their wiues: whereof (as yet) we haue the teſtimony of Homer. But ſince the prime ſimplicity & good nature of men forſooke and gaue them ouer, iuſtice and peace withdrawing themſelues: while in this truly Iron Age) all began to grow more ſtrong, without any right or Iuſtice, and that ambition (a moſt peſtilent diſeaſe) ranne currant in the hearts of men: that goodly order became peruerted and ouerthrowne: when the moſt mightie, ſuch as the Scripture reporteth, as of Nimrod and others, of Ninus, Seſoſtris, Nebuchadonozar, and Cyrus, troubled the quietnes of their neighbours, and inuaded their lands. So, on the ruine of a great number of ſmall eſtates, mightie Empires and Monarchies grewe to bee grounded, and gaue commaund both in length and largeneſſe.

Ariſt. in Politic lib. 2.

The iniquitie of this Iron Age of the world, againſt the Primitiue Iuſtice that firſt florifhed.

In this inuaſion, confuſion, & ouerthrowing of kingdomes, as alſo particular and naturall Principalities, ſome alſo mounting vp againſt their Soueraignes; in ſted of naturall Royalty, brought eſtates to popularity or Oligarchy. Afterward in regard of theſe diſorders thus happening, the greater part of the people beeing not willing to liue ſo: became at length conſtray-strained to render thēselues to their own nature,& return to the good gouernment of kings,to enioy their former iustice. To the ende that the weakest might bee in as safe security as the strongest, and ỹ which pertained to euery priuate person, might peaceably be possessed, and defended by their kings,against the violence of neighbors:which were ỹ 2 principall functions, that incited wādring people to reunite & submit themselues to kings. Wherin Aristotle also hath placed the definitiō of royalty,to wit: As well to render Iustice, as to defend the subiects from inuasion of enemies. Such were the Iudges that gouerned the Estate of Israel,before the establishment of kings. Wherto is referred that which Herodotus said: That the Medes would haue * Deioces to bee their K.to the end to render Iustice. Be it then,that we regard the first originall and naturall institution of kings, or be it the establishment of great Monarchies: yet it is doubtles, that women neither could or cā be any participants. And as for the last institution of kings, for recourse of people,to the ende, they might be defended against violence, & to enioy Iustice: we plainly perceiue,this could neuer agree with the naturall disposition of women,because the vertue of pudicity reiecteth thē from those functions,of iudging people,& defending them by Armes. And if in popular and Oligarchall Common-weals,women haue alwayes bin barred from gouernment, and entermedling with the publike affaires: by much stronger reason then they ought to bee frō Royalty, in as much as that forme of State is more excellent then the other. It hath bin obserued throughout al the Monarchies, euer pursuing the right of nature. And during fabulous times, if ther be found a Semiramis among ỹ Assyrians; yet that breaketh not the rule. Considering the story it selfe saieth, that to bring her purpose to passe,she disguised herselfe in the habit of a man: and was taken, not for Semiramis, but for her Son Ninus. And therby it appeareth,that the Assyrians did not willingly endure the dominion of a woman, as Lopez Madera fondly supposeth. Contrariwise we reade, that that ỹ caused the ruine of their Monarchy,was,whē Sardanapalus(their last K.)imitating the manners, fashions,& behauior of women,offended men so much, that by a iust indignation, for so many men to bee subiect to such a woman,who had no more but the forme of a man; they reuolted from him, and constrayned him to kill himselfe.

Women then are not capable of succeeding in the kingdome of France,as we haue already approoued, that in ancient times (ordinarily) they were not. For out of the fabulous times, there is obserued onely a Queene of Saba,and a Cleopatra in Egipt,and so few beside; that their rarity declareth,how contrary a thing it is, violent,and extraordinary to nature. Since the declination of the race and Empire of Charlemaigne only,we haue seene in some parts of the West,where valour & virility hath failed or relaxed: soueraigne swords and scepters conuerted into distaffes, and by the succession of womē, many the like indignities haue met together in one body. This was that which raysed the houses of Spaine and of Austria, to the greatnes they hold: a kinde of encreasing vnknown before,in any other house or soueraignty, becaus there was no right at all.

When then the Spaniards demand of the French,the proofe and foundation of the Salique Law; it is fit for themselues to shew the original and beginning of the right for their feminine Crownes, seeing France hath kept the vse of Antiquity,& they haue faine to change among themselues. Which hath bin heretofore obserued and discoursed, by Seigneur Leschassier, in his Tract of the right of Nature: where he sheweth,that by the right of nature, women stand exempted from succession in the Realm of France. I remember the answer which Licurgus made to one,who discoursed,that the gouernment of many was the best forme of an Estate. Bring it first of all (quoth he) into thine own house. In like manner, to such as will maintaine the gouernment of women in kingdomes and great Empires, especially in France: a man may well say, let them begin that establishment in their owne houses. It is by good reason saide,that there is neyther beginning nor writing found for the Salique Law. It is a Law of nature, borne with men, and not written, as Aristotle saith: That whosoeuer is by right of nature,& by right of people,is not written at al.

Wherto I may adde moreouer,that it is the common right of inheritances,which ought by stronger reason to be obserued in Royalty, as being the laſt and moſt eminent title of inheritance, and whereon dependeth all the other. So then this right, ſo naturall, hath euermore beene exactly kept in the eſtate of France.

A connexion of the Lawes of the Salians with that of the Ripuarians.

Beſide, the ancient lawes of the Salians, will not permit, that any part of Salique land or inheritance (that is to ſay, of lands diſtributed to the French, in their entring to the Gaules) ſhall come into the hands of women: but willeth, that it bee wholly left to the males. The ſame is alſo ordained in the law of the French Ripuarians. If this then tooke place in the ſucceſſion of particulars, that the lands aſſigned vnto the French warriors, for recompence of their trauailes, and to ſerue for defence of the Country, ſhould not fall (as one ſaith) from the Lance to the Diſtaffe: by how much greater reaſon then ought we to eſteeme, that this ſhould be obſerued, in the eſtate and ſucceſſion of the kingdome of France, as the ſequell of her owne Hiſtories maketh knowne, that it hath bin at all times ſo held and practiſed there?

From the Lance to the Diſtaffe.

The great Louys or Chlouis had foure Sonnes, who by cuſtome (then) receiued and diuided his Monarchies equally. Childebert the eldeſt, was king of Paris; Chlothaire of Soiſſons; Chlodamiere of Orleance, and Thierry of Mets. Childebert had two Daughters, the one named Chrodeſinda, and the other Chrosberga, as appeareth by the Charter of exemption, of the Abbey of S. Germane des Prez, and by that which Fortunatus, Biſhop of Poictiers hath written in his Poems, who addeth, that King Charibert was Tutor to thoſe two daughters. Neuertheleſſe, neither of them ſucceeded in the kingdome of Childebert their Father: but without all further diſpute, it was Chlothaire their Vnkle, as hath in like manner bin obſerued by Agathias the Greeke. Afterward, Charibert the ſon of Chlouis, had three daughters alſo, without leauing any male-childe: the one was married to a king of Denmark; the ſecond named Berthefleda, of whom Fortunatus made an Epigram; and the third, called Chrodielda, entred Religion in the Abbey of S. Croſſe in Poictiers: ſo that none of theſe daughters ſucceeded their Father, but Sigebert, brother to the deceaſed king, & that without difficulty or controuerſie.

The three daughters of Charibert.

Now if there had bin any means or ſubiect to worke vpon, it is not to be thought, that the king of Denmark, who had married one of the daughters, could otherwiſe haue bin remoued. Or if he had bin impeached by power, at leaſt he would haue complained, & the authors of thoſe times could not forget to make mention of it. But they not making any account of the daughters, do report, that Sigebert ſucceeded his brother Charibert, according to the cuſtome of the Country. Gonthram, King of Bourgongne, brother to Charibert, had but one only daughter, named Clotilda. And yet notwithſtanding he inueſted and inſtituted his Nephew Childebert in the kingdome of Bourgongne, to enioy it after his death. It is not here to be obiected, that hee did it for any ill will he bare to his daughter, or becauſe hee would diſinherite her: For by an acte of accord or agreement, made with his Nephew Childebert, tranſcribed at large by S. Gregory of Tours, who liued in thoſe very times; he ſtipullated great Lands and Seigneuries for her, declaring well therin his fatherly affection; but becauſe the law of France hindered her ſucceeding in the Crowne, he aduantaged her otherwiſe as he found the beſt means to do. The ſame may be confirmd by the teſtimony of many ſtrangers, who do al agree in this point, that womē are not to ſucceed in the kingdome of France: the names of whom, as alſo their authorities, haue beene (for the moſt part) noted, and collected by a learned man of this time, in an Epiſtle which he hath written concerning this ſubiect.

And that which is more, Edward voluntarily did him homage, in regard of the Dutchy of Guyenne, and the acte of homage was deliberated and aduiſed by his councell of England.

Now as concerning that which hapned ſome while after, warre being moued betweene the two kings, for another cauſe and enmity excited among thē, that Edward tooke on him the Name and Armes of France: this was only done by the inuention of the Flemings, who ſaide, that they could not aide him, except he would qualifie on himſelfe, the name of King of France: becauſe they ſtoode bound by oath, not to beare Armes againſt the K. of France, on paine of paying two millions of Florins. So that in taking Armes for him againſt Philip de Valois, and to quit thēſelues of that payment; Edward gaue them a diſcharge and quittance, as being K. of France. And yet notwithſtanding, the K. of England made difficulty of vnderſtanding it, hauing attempted war vpon another ſubiect, as being Vicar of the Empire, and for recouering the towne of Cambray, which the King then held. But in the end, to haue the helpe of the Flemings, & their allies, who were moſt important vpon him: he was induced to take the title of king, & the Arms of France, as may more particularly be ſeene in the ſequell of the hiſtory ſet down by Froiſſard.

King Edward the third took on him the name of king, and quartred the Armes of France.

King Edward of England Vicar of the Empire.

daineth all by his owne will, doth what he would, without any reſtriction, and being no way anſwerable for any of his actions. This was the reaſon, that Ariſtotle elegãtly named ſuch an eſtate, by the name of παμβασιλεια, as one would ſay, Full and perfect Royalty. And wiſe Salomon ſpeaking of a true king indeed, ſaith; He will do whatſoeuer pleaſeth him. Where the word of the king is, there is power; and who ſhal ſay vnto him, What doſt thou? This is alſo of no meane importance for the good gouernment of an eſtate; be it to reſolue more certainly on the affaires; be it to keepe councels & deſignes ſecret; be it for facility, promptitude, and ſpeedines of execution. He that hath ſuch power, eſpetially in actions of war, as the two great warriours Alexander and Cæſar had, may ſway the Empire of the world. One of them being demanded, how in ſo ſhort a time, hee had made ſo many famous conqueſts: It was (quoth he) by neuer deferring occaſion, or vſing remiſſeneſſe. And the other was ſo prompt & ready, as many times he was at his iournies end with his Army, before any newes was heard of his comming. Yea, and in ſuch ſort, as enemies felt his fingers, before they tooke aduice for his comming. Nor can this be done, if a man depend vpon another, in any manner whatſoeuer, & thẽ his power is not abſolute. The Romanes tooke good acknowledgement hereof, being wont in their very greateſt affaires, & dangers of the eſtate, were it in peace or war, to create a Magiſtrate, whom they called Dictatour, with ſuch full power & abſolute authority. In breefe, for the gouernement of great eſtates, and likewiſe of great affaires, the account can neuer bee well rendred, except it be to one man only. Otherwiſe, a Prince, although a Soueraigne, can neuer ſay, as Metellus Numidicus, and as it was after vſed by king Lewes the 11. That if he thought his ſhirt knew his councell, he would teare it from his backe and burne it. He that is truly an abſolute king, may well vſe the aduice of his councell, in ſuch affaires as preſent themſelues: but in an arreſt and reſolue, what ſeems good to himſelfe. The excellency of that kingdome, as alſo of her kings, reſulteth yet from two other conſiderations. One is the long continuance of the eſtate: a certain proofe, as well of her good gouernment, as of the ſupreme and celeſtiall fauor. The other, is the antiquity of her race of kings: for to ſpeake truely, there is not any more worthy, no nor more generous blood in the world. Who can in all the kingdomes through the Vniuerſe, ſhew another the like eſtate, as firm and ſtable, as hath continued for 1200. yeares? Who can nominate ſuch a nobility & ancientnes of race, ſo fairely approued, and in ſo long ſucceſſion of ſo many kings. Since the year 440. according to moſt certaine Hiſtory. Meroneus planted the foundation of that Monarchy, and eſtabliſhed it to the Gaules: & euen to this inſtant, the eſtate hath bin alwaies maintained, and valiantly ſtood againſt all violent aſſaults. In ſuch ſort, as the more it hath bin attempted, yea, in very dangerous extremities; then found ſhe her ſelfe ſtrongeſt, and more flouriſhing then before. There is not any thing comparable to ſuch a ſucceſſion of kings, in al other Realmes, as it will be eaſily verified.

Moreouer, the nobleneſſe, dignity, and greatnes of that royall race, hath receiued no diminution by thoſe two changes, which hiſtorians haue there obſerued. Let not Lopez Madera alledge then, that ſuch changes hapned, becauſe France would not admit the regiment of women. For if we regard the ſide & line feminine, thogh the ſucceſſion be not therein; three races finde themſelues all vnited with the other. The ſecond of Pepin with the firſt, as ſome Chronicles of thoſe times do proue. And that of the Capets which is the third, and reigneth at this preſent happily with the ſecond, as M. Guillaume de Nangis hath deduced the Genealogy. The which Pope Innocent the 4. in his Decratale, ſpeaking of king Phillip Auguſtus, full well acknowledged, when he auouched that king to be deſcended of the race of Charlemaigne.

But beſide this, there are other faithfull Authors, who do declare, that the ſecond race is ioynd to the firſt, by the males ſide, prooving from father to ſonne, that Pepin was deſcended in direct line by the males, of Chlogion, K. of the French, before Meroneus, as iſſued from Albericus, one of the ſonnes of Chlogion. And as for the third race, the true originall thereof, was in that noble and ſo ancient houſe of Saxony, & of great Vuitichind, king of the Saxons, who made himſelfe Chriſtian with his people, & came to dwell in France, in the time of Charlemaigne. He was deſcended of Siguardus,

And by this mariage of Hugh the Great, was born Hugh Capet, eſtabliſhed king by the Nobility of France, through default in the legitimate line of Charlemaigne, in the year VCCCCLXXXVII. Next hereunto, there commeth alſo to our conſideration, the admirable and heroyicall vertues of the kings of France, which hath mounted their glory vp vnto heauen, & made them known through al the Cantons of the earth. But to forbeare the moſt ancient warriours, the affright & tertour of the Romanes, Aſcaricus, Gaiſa, Marcomir, Sunno, Mellaubodes, and Chlagion: what a warrior was Meroneus, the founder of that Monarchy in Gaule? This was the man, who (in deſpight of the Romanes, and ſuch a mingle-mangle of barbarous people, ſcattered and diſperſed by the Gaules) planted there his Standards, and made himſelfe abſolute Lord of one part. And as for Attila, king of the Hunnes, that cauſed himſelf to be cal'd, The ſcourge of God: he came to rauage France, as hee had done all other Prouinces where hee had paſt. The wiſe Aetius, Gouernour to what then remained of the Romanes in Gaule, was perſwaded, that he was not able, nor all the barbarous people releagued with him, to endure the furious and fearefull ſhock, of that huge thunderbolt of war. But made his recourſe to the vertue of the French, and to their great Meroneus, to fight againſt the furious entrance of the Huns. Wherin he had good ſucces, for the pride of Attila was ſoone rebated on the Cathalanian plaines, by great Meroneus, who put to the edge of the ſword, that dreaded maſſe and number of enemies.

Alas, there is no roome here, in a work of no larger circumference, to recount the goodly deeds, and actes heroyicall, well deſeruing eternall memory, of al the kings that haue raigned in France? for many great volumes can hardly containe them. So high an aſcending ſubiect, deſerued to meete with ſuch Writers, as can as worthily ſet down in writing, what theſe kings did boldly and vertuouſly performe. Beſide, the aboundance of matter, and dignity of the ſubiect, would affoord them ſcarſity of ground, and trouble them with a thouſand difficulties. It is a ſubiect much more great, then the wars and encounters of petty Townes and Villages in Greece, bandied the one againſt the other: which neuertheles, by the learning & eloquence of ſuch, as haue attempted to write thereof, are become ſo much celebrated, and thought worthy of immortality. But Frenchmen, who haue eſtabliſhed this Monarchy, contenting themſelues with the glory and honour of well doing, care little for any pride of the Pen, addicting themſelues rather, to execute high & hardy enterprizes, thē to ſet down in writing thoſe of others, much leſſe of themſelues.

This labour ouer-little to containe the famous actions of the Kings of France.

The Greek wars not comparable with them of the French.

Neuertheleſſe, though deſtitute of ſuch exquiſite meanes, whereby to mount to immortality: yet it hath ſo well ſalne out, that all their faire actions haue not bin vterly buried, nor forgotten. But in ſtead of a worthy Hiſtoria, admiration hath thruſt into the mouthes of all people, to know and ſpeake of them; deliuering it ſo from hand to hand, euen to ſuch as dwell in the remoteſt Climates, familiarly acquainting them with their manners. And indeede, there are to be found more teſtimonies of French vertue, in the Hiſtories, Memories, and Annals of ſtrangers, then in their owne. I will therefore leaue that labour to others, that can better acquit theſelues therof, if I touch any thing, it ſhall bee but in my paſſage along, and onely to make a light demonſtration.

Admiration (in ſtead of a fitting hiſtori-an) hath made the French generally famous through out the world

It hath bin obſerued for an ancient ſaying: That all the good kings might be encloſed within the Beazill or Collet of a ſmall king. But this ſaying cannot hold in France, ſ hath euermore met with good kings, moſt excel-excellent and most vertuous: hauing bin alwayes happy therein, as in all other things. I will call then vnto you diuine spirits, & generous soules, who haue somtime swayed that Monarchy; to the ende, that being put on by your inspiration, I may, if not worthily sing your merits, yet (at least) figure foorth to life some part of them.

Next to Great Meroneus, who first established himselfe in France, repulsed the Hunnes, and ouercame King Attila, the horrour and the whippe of the world, account is to be made of that Chlouis or Louis, who possessed himselfe throughly of the Gaules, and vtterly exterminated the Romanes name. This was the quayler of the Romanes and Germanes, and he that expulsed so quickly the Gothes beyond the Pyrennean Mountaines, and made them thinke, that hardly could they get ground enough to flie away vpon, or where to hide themselues from his victorious arm. The Gothes hauing offended him many times, and broken all agreements made: this Prince vndertooke war against them, to chastise them, and purge the Gaules of such a people, as eagerly followed the errour of Arrius, and laboured to plant it euery yeare.

Chlouis or Louys that droue the Romanes quite out of Gaule, & made the Gothes to flie beyond the Pyrennean Mountains.

When as the two Armies were met together, somewhat neere to Poictiers, the battaile was giuen, wherein the Gothes were wholly ruined, and driuen away in rout. Historians do adde heereto, that the King of the Gothes, being named Alarick, was met withall in the fight by King Chlouis, and fighting hand to hand, hee smote him downe dead to the ground. This is the selfe-same Prince, who (first of all the French) embraced Christian Religion, whereof both he and his successors were alwaies afterward true protectors and defenders. He was the most redoubted of all the kings in the world, and of whom the Emperour Anastasius, Theodorick the Ostrogothe, and the Vuisigothes of Spaine made no meane account, were it in admiration of his vertue, or were it for feare, they thought themselues very happy, to haue peace and friendship with him, seeking it by diuersity of Ambassadors, & by plenty of most exquisite guifts.

The Emperor Anastasius.

His Sonnes Childebert, Chlothaire, Chlodamire, and Thierry, as heires to his crowne, and likewise to his valour and piety, made themselues admirable & dreadfull to strangers. Childebert, induced thereto, by horrible persecutions inflicted on the Orthodoxe Christians, as also by the bad and vnworthy vsage offered to his Sister, by Almarick her husband, King of the Vuisigothes in Spaine, who seuerely maintained the Arrian heresie: passed with his Army into Spaine, quailed & ouercame the powers of the Gothes, wonne diuers Citties by assault, and at length took Tolledo, cheefe of all, ruinating it in ranged battaile, where also was slaine Almaricke their king; returning triumphantly into France, hauing added to his Empire, the very greatest part of Spaine. Afterward the three Brethren together, wholy ouerthrew the estate of the Bourguignons. And soone after, the emperour Iustinian, making warre on the Gothes of Italy, the Gothes made recourse to Theodebert, king of Mets, and youngest Sonne to Chlouis, who defended them for a good space of time, giuing such proofe to the Greekes, of vertue in the French, that Iustinian was constraind to compound with the french, as Historians (on his own side) do testifie.

In this first race, there was also Chlothaire, who by his victorious arms, wholly subdued Germany, and vanquished the vnconquerable Saxons. On a day, the two Armies being somewhat neere each to other, and the Riuer Visurgis running betweene them, this Chlothaire beeing on horse-backe and well armed; espied Bertoaldus, Duke of the Saxons, in like furnishment on the Riuers other side. Alone & without atteding for any other troops, suddenly he crossed ouer the Riuer, to encounter and fight with his enemy; who betaking himselfe to flight, he pursued after with all possible speed, and hauing ouertooke him, fought with him, and left him dead on the ground. So returning victorious backe againe, bearing his enemies head in his hand, he found his people much offended, because they had neglected to follow him. He left Dagobert his Sonne to be his Successor, a worthy heire both to his estate and valour, as also excelling in piety and deuotion, as many Churches richly founded and builded by him can well testifie.

Chlothaire subdued all Germany and the Saxons.

Hauing finished the first race, wee come to the second, wherein let vs consider first of all, the cheefe man thereof,

Charles

Charles Martell, Prince of the French; whose name remaineth engrauen (perpetually) in memorie of all the people of Europe, for beeing their conseruator, in warranting them from the certaine yoake and seruitude of the Sarazins. It was then when the Arabian Sarazens (holding all Affrica) passed into Spaine with very smal troopes: where finding but slender resistance, the Spaniards and Gothes beqeathing themselues, as ingulfed in all pleasures and delights, and no way addicted to the exercise of Armes, became immediately Masters of all Spaine. This victory and conquest drew on thither Millions of Moores and Sarrazins, and in so great number, that Spaine being no longer able of comprehending them, they made account of passing further on, euen to run thorow all Europe, and quite to exterminate Christian Religion.

Roderic. Ximenes Archiep. Toled. hist. lib. 3. cap. 21.

Into France they entred with a most dreadfull Army, sacking and spoyling all that they met with, and passed on so farre as Tours, seeming, as if there were no force or power great enough, that could resist or stay the course of their conquests. All people and Christian Princes, were full of feare and terror, and (in a worde) Europe had vterly beene vndone: if this Charles Martell had not then bene present neere or before the City of Tours, making there a barre of his body and French forces. Hauing giuen them battell with so few French as then were with him: hee ouercame and meerely hewed them in pieces, to the number of three hundred, threescore, and fifteene thousand Sarrazins. After this, being aduertised that there were yet other great troopes, towards Narbona and Auignion; hee vvent thither to finde them, & in another daies good successe, wholly ouercame them, & left not a man liuing. So that it appeareth by iust records, that there were slaine in all, seuen or eight hundred thousand: in regard whereof, the sir-name of Martell was giuen him. Thus did he dissipate this dangerous tempest, wherewith all Christendome was threatned, and ready to be confounded.

This also gaue good ease to the Spaniards, who were scattered in Spaine, fled & hidden in the Asturian mountains. So that he might wel be named, & in good right, the Buckler, Hammer, sharpe sworde and Rampier of Christendome. But for him, Europe had now bin the seate of Calyffes and Miramolines. In stead of adoration giuen to the true God, the name of prophane Mahomet, and his execrable Alcoran should haue bene here preached. The Saxons, who were Pagans then, and not capable, but to giue offence to a peaceable king, by their reuolts and wonted seditions; could they haue bin any hindrance? The Germanes, diuided into many small Principalities, and gouerned (for the most part) by the kings of France, could they haue resisted? In Italy there were but the Lombards, who in the space of almost two hundred yeares, could not became Masters of all Italy, neyther conquer any more but a part, which their first king Albonine obtained at a clap, euen when they first entred. The rest was so miserably tormented, by the courses and piracies of the Sarrazins: as the poore inhabitants knew not where to hide themselues. The Empire of Constantinople remained, hauing worke enough to do, to keepe herselfe within her owne small bounds and limits: beeing pursued by the Arabes and Mahometanes of the East. Questionlesse, the Christian name had bene extinct, had it not pleased God to serue himselfe with the victorious arme, and courage inuincible of this French Prince, to conserue his faithfull seruants to glorify his name.

This was the same Prince, of whom it was said; That hee affected rather to command Kings, then to bee a King himselfe; which was engrauen on his Toombe in these tearmes.

Non vult Regnare, sed Regibus imperat ipse.

Thus imitated by the Virgil of France.

This was Great Martel, Prince of the Frēch,
Not King in name, but a Master of Kings.

Much more to be esteemed heerein, then he that saide, Hee affected rather to command them that had Golde, then to haue any himselfe. Because the passion and feruour which is borne to honor, and which seateth it selfe willingly in the souls of the most generous; is much more quaint, tickling and violent, then is the desire and thirst after riches. The reputation and valour of this great Martel protector of Christen-

Christendome) beeing such, the Church hauing no other prop nor succour, euery one fixing their eyes on him; Pope Gregory the third sent him the chaines of Saint Peter, and the keyes of the Sepulcher, committing himselfe and the whole Romane Church into his protection, to be warranted, not onely against inuasion of Sarrazens, but also against the continual courses of the Lombards, wherewith hee had beene afflicted beyond all extreamitie.

Pepin, the son of Charles Martell.

Pepin, King of France, son to Charles Martell, wonne not a iot lesse glory by his haughty deeds of Armes. This was hee that danted the Aquitanians, and them of Bauaria, ouercomming them in diuers battailes, and likewise the reuolted Saxons. Soone after, being called for succor by Pope Stephen, to defend the Romane Church (vexed more then euer) and oppressed by Astolpho, King of the Lombards, he went with all diligence, & constrained Astolpho (who felt his power not equall to his) to flye, and shut himselfe vp in Pauia his Capitall City, where hee besiedged him, and could not raise his siege vntill hee hadde made an aduantageable composition for the Pope, with whom he left many French souldiers for his further assurance. This composition being afterward broken by the perfidie of Astolpho, Pepin returned thither againe, and besieged him the second time; compelling him to surrender the Exarquate of Rauenna, and many other places, which he gaue vp to the Romanes Church. And returning home into France, hee found there the Ambassadors of Constantine, Emperor of Constantinople, who bringing him many goodly presents, came onely to request his alliance.

Aymon. contin in lib. 4. cap. 63

The Lieutenancie of the Empire.

But what can we speake of more admiration, then his sonne Charles, to whome (by good right, and for his high deserts) the whole Vniuerse, by one consent, gaue the sir-name of Great? Hee attempted, maintained, conducted, and brought to end, ten or twelue seuerall warres, all of most great importance & difficulties in all kindes; as well in regard of the places, as for the great multitude and strength of the enemies, against whome hee was to deale. First, against the Aquitenians and Basques or Gascoigns, a mermailous strong people; yet after many ouerthrowes, hee ranged them vnder his obedience.

Charlemaign or Charls the Great, sonne to King Pepin

Next, another warre against the Lombards, who hauing violated the Articles of peace, which had beene couenanted with them by King Pepin, Father to his Charles: they infested and tormented the Romane Church, without the least breathing or respit. Which was the reason that this Prince, as pious and iust, as valiant, vndertooke (according to the ordinary vse of the French Kings) the defence of the holy See, ouercomming & ruinating the Lombards from the toppe to the bottome. He also besieged Didier their king, tooke, and led him captiue into Fraunce, where ended the kingdome of the Lombards in Italy, and whereby he augmented and enlarged his owne estate. Thus hee purchased rest to the Pope, and beside enriched the Romane Church, giuing it no meane part of his Conquests, and encreasing the patrimony of S. Peter.

His warre against the Lombards, & bringing their King prisoner into France.

Hee attempted warre also against the Sarrazins, passed into Spain to fight with them, where he foyled them in many encounters, enforcing them to hide themselues in Towns, which he besiedged and wonne away from them, so that he conquered a great part of Spaine, chasing the Sarazins thence, and continued warre alwayes ther afterward against them, which gaue no small ease vnto the Spaniardes, who were mightily oppressed and ouerburdened before.

His warre against the Sarazins in Spaine.

Then he made an expedition into Italy, against the reuolted Lombards and Italians. Many the like into Germany, against the Bauarians, the Danes, Bohemians, Sclauonians, and Vuinides, all warlike people, and whom hee conquered. Also against the Hunnes, an vndaunted people, after they had gotten habitation in Pannonia, vnder the conduct of Attila their King: yet he vanquished them, and hewd them in peeces in many foughte battailes, plucking out of their throats the spoiles of Europe, which they had enioyed and triumphed ouer for so many yeares. And there he found such wealth and aboundance of riches, as the very simplest souldiour in the Camp, was wonderfully rich for euer after.

Furthermore, he had no meane medling with the Saxons, against whom hee had warre for the space of three and thirty yeares: they being a people that could neuer neuer liue nor abide in quiet, reuolting inceſſantly, eſpecially when they knew this Prince to be farre off from them, & troubled in ſome other places. Hee added to his owne eſtate Gaſcoiugny, a great part of Spaine, Saxony, and the Pannoniaes; reſtraining ſo powerfully the ordinary courſes of the Sarrazines, as all Europe lyued quietly vnder his reigne. Beſide, hee was ſo redoubted, loued, and admired altogither by forraigne Kings, that Aaron, Calyffe of the Eaſt, who held (well-neere) all Aſia, and was feared by all the greateſt Kings: ſought for his friendſhip, and ſent him rare preſents at diuers times, auouching him to be the moſt woorthy King in the whole world. And although this Calyffe was rude and harſh vnto Chriſtians, that dwelt in his countries; yet notwithſtanding, he forbare to perſecute them, in conſideration of Charlemaigne, to whom he gaue the City of Ieruſalem, by ſending him the keyes thereof, as alſo them of the holy Sepulcher.

Aaron the great Calyffe of the Eaſt.

The Emperours of Conſtantinople alſo did ſo eſteeme, loue, and honor him, that oftentimes they ſent him rich giftes by their Ambaſſadours, dreading nothing more, then to haue any contending in warre againſt him. In like manner, Alphonſus King of Gallicia, and of the Aſturiaes, would call himſelfe no other, but with this qualification towardes Great Charles, His humble and faithfull Subiect, wholly to him; Proprius ſuus in Latine, as Eginhard hath recorded.

He was loued and feared by the Emperors of Conſtantinople.

But what can be thought more admirable, or tearmed to bee a matter more rare, then in a Prince that was ſo ſtout a warriour, all other ciuill vertues and moſt humane, ſhould haue an equall meeting together? Singular clemency did euermore accompany his victorious arme. The ſame Eginhard reporteth, that hee could not be enforced to choller, by any occaſion whatſoeuer. Nay, he would neuer yeeld, that one of them which had attempted againſt his life and State, ſhould be put to death, but onely was contented with their ſafe keeping. In his victory againſt the Lombards, hee did not onely pardon Paulus Warnefridus, Deacon of Aquileia; but alſo kept him neere about his perſon, greatly honouring and gratifying him, for the eſteeme of his eruditi-on and knowledge.

Eginhard in Ann. lib. 3. cap. 9

This Lombard was vnworthy of ſo great grace, in conſpiring afterward with other Rebels, and vſing treaſon againſt his King and Benefactor. VVho neuertheles, after he had diſcouered the conſpiracy, & ſurmounted all that the reuolts could do, againe he pardoned this Paulus Warnifridus, being no way willing, that he ſhould be punniſhed for his perfidie and rebellion. Onely he commanded his retirement, and baniſhed him (for a while) to a certaine place. Afterward hee brake the bounds of his baniſhment, and fledde to Ragaiſius, Duke of Beneuento, to excite him alſo to reuolt. An occaſion, whereby the king was councelled, greeuouſly to punniſh both the one and other for this double treaſon. Yet the good Prince would lend no eare thereto, but ſaued & pardoned both their liues: onely he charged Paulus Warnefridus, to write the Hiſtory of the Lombards, the continuation of Europe, and ſome other works.

Good nature in a Prince may be too much abuſed by Traitors.

This was not only a light puniſhment, but honourable alſo to him that had the charge thereof: wherein, beſide a moſt ſingular example of clemency, appeared an admirable affection vnto learning, for that onely reſpect, to loue and honor the man, who had ſo often falne into treaſon. Such was the loue & great account which he made of learning; and himſelfe, albeit liuing in an age vngracious enough, & full of barbariſme, yet did hee ſpeake Latine elegantly, and his mother tongue ſo readily, euen with naturall eloquence and admirable perſwaſion: hee vnderſtoode Greeke alſo, but ſpake it hardly. Beſide, he was well ſeene in all the Sciences, hauing Alcuinus to bee his Schoole-maſter. All dinner while, hee cauſed one to diſcourſe, or reade ancient Hiſtories: wherein he tooke no meane pleaſure, but moulded thereafter the forme of his owne life.

A mercifull iniunction by a wronged Prince.

No leſſe was he to bee commended for his iuſtice, carefull for rendring it to his ſubiects with all ſincerity: himſelfe taking knowledge of ſuch cauſes as concerned any difficulty, vndertaking the defence and protection of VViddowes, Orphanes, and other miſerable people, to warrant them againſt all oppreſſions of the mighty. Hauing alſo eſtabliſhed many good Lawes and Ordinances, for the rooting vp of vices, and furtherance of iuſtice.

His Iuſtice & vprightneſſe to his ſubiects ſtice. In regard of his piety and ſingulare deuotion, hee made ſufficient apparance thereof, as remaineth witneſſed to this day in ſtrange Countreys, by his wealthy foundation of Churches and Monaſteries. He was ordinarily preſent at ſolemn prayers in the Church, and at all Canonicall houres, euen in the night time. Great care had hee, that diuine ſeruice ſhould be honourably celebrated, & the Churches well ſerued, deſpending great ſummes of money, to haue them fitted and furniſhed with all conuenient rich Ornaments, and matters to them belonging.

Hee cauſed fiue Councels to be called & helde, for the good of the Church.

Moreouer, he was ſomewhat prouident and curious, that the church ſhould be beautified and ſhining, by the probity, integritie, and ſanctitie, expreſſed in the liues of the Miniſters, and Eccleſiaſticall perſons to them appertayning. Being alwayes heerein ſo carefull, and for eſtabliſhment of the better order, that hee cauſed fiue Councelles to bee called and holden, and collecting the Decrees of them, made thē to be publiſhed & obſerued: holding nothing in more great recommendation, then to ſee the Church honoured, and flouriſhing in all holines. He was liberall vnto all men, eſpeciallie to the poore, as well of his owne Kingdome, whom hee mercifully releeued: as alſo in ſtraunge countreyes, whereto hee ſent rich Almes; alwayes coueting frendſhippe with the Eaſterne Kinges, to aſſwage the perſecutions of poore Chriſtians.

Charlemaign could neuer be tempted by a thought of Ambition.

But aboue all the reſt, one thing ſeemeth very ſtrange, that Ambition could neuer gette footing in the ſoule of this Prince, although it had beene, and is, a frequent and ordinary diſeaſe, in the very greateſt courages, and moſt generous ſpirits. For, although hee was crowned Emperor of the Eaſt at Rome, by Pope Leo the third, vppon the cries and acclamations of the Roman people, who both deſired and elected him: yet let mee tell ye, it was ſo farre from any ſearch or proceeding thereto in him, as hee knew nothing thereof, neither euer gaue his conſent thereto. For Eginhard aſſureth, hauing heard himſelfe to confirme it, that if hee had knowne the purpoſe of the Pope and people; he would not haue gone into the Church on Chriſtmaſſe day, in the yeare VCCC. when that acclamation, election, and corronation was performed. It was a thing ſo much againſt his minde, and whereof hee made ſuch ſlender reckoning. Hee dyed at the age of threeſcore and eleuen yeares, hauing reigned ſeuen and forty yeares. And, at his height of humane felicity, hee left his Sonne Lewes his ſucceſſor, and heyre to his vertues, who for his exceeding great mildeneſſe and meekeneſſe, deſerued the ſur-name of Pious, or the Debonnaire.

Eginhard in Antiq. l. 5. c. 10.

The death of Charlemaign

In his yong yeares, his Father made him King of Aquitaine, where he carryed himſelfe in ſuch ſort, gouerning ſo wiſely and with ſuch diſcretion, that ſuch prudence and vertue was highly admyred, eſpecially in thoſe tender yeeres. Himſelfe rendred iuſtice to his ſubiectes, attending thereon three dayes in euery weeke. Hee vſed great iudgement for well chooſing men of worth and merite, to vndergoe places of important charge, as Officers and Magiſtrates. Hee eaſed the people ſo much as poſsibly hee could, in taking away harde Tributes and Subſidyes, and moderating others, euen in the mildeſt manner.

Charles the Debonnaire ſucceeded his Father Charlemaigne.

And yet notwithſtanding, hee was a good Warrior, not onely in defending & ſafe keeping his owne Frontiers: but alſo proceeding very farre into Spain, to make warre vpon the inuading Sarazins, whom he foyled in many battels, encounters, & beſiedgings of Citties conquered by him, hauing maintained and enlarged the lāds of his Father Charlemaigne, which he had wonne in Spaine. So that by his Vertues, wiſe carriage and deportment, hee gaue a wonderfull contentment to his Father. Hee ſucceeded him in the kingdome of Frāce, and in the Empire of the Eaſt. He continued warre againſt the Sarrazins in Spaine, & weakned them in ſuch ſort, that he gaue good means to the Spaniſh chriſtians, to defend themſelues againſt them and to extend their territories farther off. Marineus Siculus, who wrote the hiſtorie of Spain, declareth the expeditions of this French Emperour, reporting moreouer, that he impoſed a tribute on the people, which were conquered and ſubiected by him in Spaine: where he was cald in the dayes of this Author Romanſanos.

Charles was alſo a worthie warriour, conquering the Sarrazins in Spaine.

Marineus Siculus, in lib. 3.

Romanſanos.

He conſerued in greatnes the Empire of of the West towards Germany, and valiantly imbarred the courses of the Northerly people, from their manifold inuasions. And neuer could any defect or vice be noted in him: but that he was too good, too humane and debonnaire. His piety, zeale, and deuotion towards God and his Church was such, as neuer in any man was obserued greater. Forty dayes before his decease, hee tooke no other foode, but the blessed Communion onely, which he receiued with wonderful humility, and extraordinary contrition: continuing alwayes in prayer, or causing to be sung in his presence and hearing the Ecclesiasticall offices.

His zeale and deuotion to God and his Church.

Come we now to the third race, the cheefe whereof was Hugh Capet, yssued from the house of Saxony; who happily reigned, and wisely gouerned his Kingdome, with much piety and iustice. His Sonne Robert, with like piety and integrity of life, loued Learning, and was so earnestly addicted thereto, that hee himselfe composed sundry Books: and among the rest, he wrote many goodly & pious Hymns, which were receiued, and are yet (at this present) sung in the Church. Of him it is thus credibly reported, ỳ beeing (at a certain time) mockt by an ignorant Duke, because hee sung in the Church among Ecclesiasticall persons, hee made him this answer: That he better affected to see a King learned, then an Asse Crowned, making his allusion vnto the Duke, who ware his Dukall Crowne on that solemn day.

The 3. race of kings in France the first being Hugh Capet, of Saxony.

A worthy answer of a iudicious King.

Hee was very pittifull, and a great Almoner on the poores behalfe; so that when hee tooke his owne repast, great troopes of poore people were admitted to be about him, whom hee would suffer freely to come neere him, and gaue vnto them that foode which was set there before him, & many other things that they stood in neede of. Nor was hee a iotte lesse liberall to Churches, in causing many to be builded, founded, and endowing them bountifully, as also re-establishing and enriching others. There was no want in him likewise of all other royall vertues, maintaining and conseruing his estate very wel, and making the people happy, that were vnder his obedience.

His loue and charity to the poore, and erection of Churches.

I am feigne to passe ouer others, to come to King Lewes the sixt, sirnamed Le Gros, a true imitator of his Aunce stours vertues. He imployed all his life time, to containe his people in peace and quyetnesse, and (according to the dutie of a good King) to shield them from oppression of the greatest & most potent Earles and Barons of France, who stood then vpon very peremptory tearmes. Which made him to attempt diuers wars againſt them vpon that occasion, and oftentimes expose his life to dangers, preferring the well-fare of his people, before all other considerations whatsoeuer, and so he wel witnessed from time to time.

K. Lewes the sixt, sirnamed the Grosse or big.

After he had chastised and raunged all such as had reuolted, flying from him vpon the like occasions, and was become feared, respected, and obeyed of all the Rebels, as also beloued of all his subiects, the Emperor Henry the fift, being departed from Germany with a mighty & dreadfull Army, to ouer-run him and his country, he went to meet him nere to Rhemes, hauing but a handfull of men with him. But he so affrighted the Emperor Henrie, and all the potent Army with him, that fearing the valour and inuincible arme of the French, whose courage will giue way to nothing whatsoeuer: he thought it farre better for him to quit the place, & get him gone, then to hazard his estate against so valiant a King, though hee vvas attended but with so small a troope. And so this Emperor made his retreate, at the very noyse of the Kings comming, whose name (indeed) was very dreadfull.

The Emperor Henry the fift goeth with a great army against Lewes Le Grosse, & retired thence without striking a blow.

This Prince also excelled in Piety and Religion, vertues proper to the Kinges of France: being the true props, supports, and Bulwarkes to the Church. For we reade, that in his time, Pope Paschall the second came into France for refuge, and to consult with the Gallicane church, concerning those differences which he hadde with the Emperor. And afterwardes, the Popes Calixtus the second, Honorius the second, and Innocentius the second, being tormented and expulsed by the Emperors of Germany, and brought to great misery, yet succoured in that kingdome, their ordinary retreat and refuge. Hee entertained them honourably, assisting them with riches, respecting them worthily & royally. In the end, hauing succoured them to his vtmost power, he tooke pains to pacify those discords and contentions.

Vertues proper to the Kings of France.

Some-

Something more I may adde concerning his death, as it is ſet downe by Suggerus, Abbot of Saint Denis, his principall friend, and an eye-witneſſe thereof. Feeling the end of his life approching, & the holy Euchariſt being brought to him, he aroſe out of his bed to meete it, falling downe on his knees, and receiuing it with great deuotion. Hauing before taken order for al his affaires, and made both profeſſion of his faith, and confeſſion of his ſinnes, in the hearing of all there preſent. Afterward, being taken foorth of his bed again, & laid vpon aſhes diſperſed abroad he gaue vp the ghoſt.

Sugger. Abbat. S. Dioniſ. in Mort. Ludoni Groſſi.

His Sonne Lewes the ſeuenth, called, The Youthfull, was a true reſembler of his Father, hauing ioyned piety and valiancy together. By the counſell of S. Bernard, he made a voyage into Paleſtine to helpe it with a puiſſant Army, againſt the inuaſion of the Turkes. And hauing obtained many great victories againſt the enemies of the Chriſtian Faith, he returned home to his Kingdome, preſſed by the diſcommodities of Famine, where-with his Armie was very ſore afflicted, thorough the diſloyalty of the Emperor of Conſtantinople.

Lewes the 7. ſucceedeth his Father Lewes le gros

VVho can ſufficiently admire the valor and good guidance of Phillip Auguſtus, who (by good right) alſo carried the ſurname of Conqueror? At the age of foureteene yeares, he tooke into his hand the reines of the State, and in that tender age performed all exploites and actions, not onely of valiancy, but alſo of a great and perfect Captaine; watching & ſpending whole nights, to execute and accompliſh his enterprizes. By which meanes, hee out-ſtept his enemies, tooke Towns and ſtrong places, where himſelfe would bee ſeene in perſon at the ſcalado, yea, and at the affault at the breake of day, inſtead of addicting himſelfe to pleaſures, whereto his youth might rather haue induced him He ſo vanquiſhed his enemies, and chaſtiſed rebels in ſo tender yeares, as if hee had bin another Alexander.

Philip Auguſtus, ſur-namd the Conqueror, came to the Crown at 14. yeares of age.

Afterwards, the Engliſh being prouoked againſt him, gaue the better and more worthy ſubiect to his victories: for he conquered and tooke from them all that they held in France, weakning them in diuers battailes, and famous encounters. Alſo this Conqueror, incited by the ſame piety of his Anceſtors, made a voyage to the Holy Land; where he fought diuers times againſt the Turkes and Sarazins, and carryed many triumphes from them. Beeing returned home to France, he wonne that great day of Bouines, neere vnto Tournay, which I will touch a little more largely in this place, it being ſcarſely known, though (indeed) it was moſt ſignale and famous. For this king fought in that battel, againſt the forces of the Emperour Otho the fift, the King of England, the Earles of Flanders, Henault, and Bologne, all coniured againſt his eſtate.

The Engliſh incited to armes, againſt Philip Auguſtus.

The great day of Bouins neere to Tournay.

Thoſe Earles being reuoked and leagued with the King of England, had likewiſe cauſed the emperor Otho the fifte, to come into Fraunce, with a very great and puiſſant army of Germanes and Saxons. VVith them were ioyned the Forces of Flanders, Henault, and other French ſubiects and vaſſals, aſſociated with the Earl of Bologne. The King went on before with his Army, and met the enemy ſomewhat neere to Tournay, where he had Lodged him aloft in a place for his beſt aduãtage: which the King hauing well perceiued, & that he was fruſtrate of all meanes for coming at them on that ſide, reſolued to fetch a further courſe about, and to aſſaile them on the other ſide.

The maner of the buſineſſe proceeding betweene the Emperor and confederates, againſt the K. of France.

Being withdrawne to effect this intent, the Emperor Otho taking it for a flight, did cauſe his army to march on with ſpeed to ouertake the King, who was encamped in a village called Bouines. There he had intelligence how the enemy was come very neere, and the noyſe of theyr armes gaue apparance, that they would fall in hande preſently with them, and charge the rereguard: all which notwithſtanding, before hee would doe any thing elſe, hee entred firſt into a Church, and there ſayde his Prayers.

Afterward, being armed, hee mounted on horſe-backe, giuing order for the Armies readineſſe, riding thorough the rankes, for the better diſpoſition of his people; yet nothing at all was done that day. On the morrow morning, hauing againe ranged his Army in battaile array, hee gaue his people a Kingly encouragement, by breefely acquainting them with theſe circumſtances: That they were to fight with one, who was an enemy vnto God and Men, come to lend a ſtrong hand hand to Rebels, leading an army that had no other wages then ſacriledges, ſpoiles of the Churches goods, and the blood & teares of the poore. Therfore they were to conſider, that God had brought them thither, to puniſh their iuſt deſeruings; & had choſen the French for the inſtrument of his iuſtice. Hee further aduiſed his ſoldiers, that they ſhould not labor to buckler the bodyes one of another: but euerie man to do for himſelfe the beſt he could, without any eye or reſpect to his friend and companion.

The King of France firſt marcheth his armie againſt the enemy.

Hauing animated them with ſuch or the like ſpeeches, he cauſed his Army firſt to march on, aſſayling and ſharply ſetting on that of the enemy. The French Chevaliers, after they had broken their Lances, came to handy-blowes, fighting with all the heate and valour could be deuiſed: throwing themſelues into the middeſt of the maine battell, piercing and paſsing through the thickeſt battalions, hewing in peeces, and ouerthrowing all that durſt meete them. Great was the reſiſtance, & wonderfull deeds of Armes perfourmed on either ſide. The King was alwaies the moſt forward man, ruſhing into the greateſt throngs; and where the fight was fierceſt, to ſuccour his people. Hee found himſelfe enuironed with a huge battalion of enemies, where hee ſharpely layed about him on all ſides, and cleared his paſſage ſtill as he rode on. But in the end, his horſe being ſlaine between his legges fell downe vppon him; yet he was quickly remounted againe by a French knight, called Sir Peter de Triſtan, who gaue him his owne horſe.

The Kinges horſe ſlaine vnder him, & he remounted by Sir Peter de Triſtan.

Now charged hee the enemy more fiercely then before, his ſtrength & courage being redoubled at the indignation of his fall, nor ceaſed he with his French Lords, who neerely followed him, vntill he came to the very midſt, where the Emperor Otho was, he being then very liuely aſſayled.

The Emperor enforced to turn his back.

Heere did he meet with many French Knights, who being on foot, ſome tooke hold on his bridle, others hung about the neck and maine of his horſe to ſtay him, which compelled him to turne his backe. But the Count Reignald de Bologne, hee would not budge a foote from the fielde of battell, but continued there & his followers valiantly fighting, euen to all extremities, willing (by no means) to yeeld himſelfe, till in the end, his horſe beeing ſlaine vnder him, and hee ſore wounded, his throate threatned to bee cut by a Villaine, he yeelded himſelfe to Lorde Guarin, a Knight of Saint Iohns of Ieruſalem, and elected byſhop of Senlis, one of the principall Captains for the King, ſaying, I had rather yeeld my ſelfe, and be iudged by the King and his Peeres, then to dye vnworthily by the hand of a ſlaue.

The noble wordes of Count Reignald of Bologne.

So the fielde of battaile remained vnto the King, as alſo the victorie full & wholly, all the enemies being broken and ſcattered, a great part of them ſlaine, and very many taken priſoners, euen of the chiefeſt men. The King would permit none to purſue the Emperor, who fledde with the Count of Brabant, and many Germans further off then two or three Leagues. Among the priſoners, was Ferrand Earle of Henaulte, Nephew to the Queen, Counteſſe of Flanders, and Daughter vnto the King of Portugall. Shee being a medler with Magicall Sciences, would needes conſult with her Diuiners, concerning the ſucceſſe of this Battaile, and it vvas tolde her, That the King ſhould be layde on the ground, without any Sepulcher: And that Ferrand Earle of Henaulte, her Coſine, ſhould enter Paris in Triumph. All vvhich was true, but farre off from her interpretation.

The Counteſſe of Flanders deceiued by her Wizards.

It is alſo faithfully reported, that the King before the fight, in preſence of all his Earles, Barons, and Lords (knowing full well that ſome were tottering and vncertaine, as beeing not thorowly affected to him) tooke the Crowne from off his head, and ſet it vppon an Altar, ſtanding by him, ſaying in this manner. If there bee any man heere amongſt yee, that thinkes more capeably and worthily of himſelfe, then this day to fight for libertie, beeing in ſuch danger, both to the Honour and Renowne of France: let him willingly leaue and forſake this Crowne, and that man (whatſoeuer hee bee) let him boldly put this Crowne vpon his head. Whereat all of them ſtanding amazed, and being mooued with admiration and enflamed affections, threw themſelues before his feete, ſaying; That they were all his humble ſeruants, and that they would euery one of them dye with him that day, rather then be commanded by any other.

Most honorable wordes of the King, before hee went to the fight.

Another victory won the same day against the English.

The selfe-same day of this great victory, Monsieur Lewes de France, eldest Son to the King; wonne another against the English, in the Country of Anion, at La Roche du Mayne, against the King, called Iohn without Land. For this double victory, obtayned both in one day, the King rendred thanks to God: and desiring that some marke might remayn for a Trophee thereof to all posterity, hee caused an Abbey to be builded neere to Senlis, which (in that respect) he named, The Abbey of Victory, and endowed it with great reuennues.

Lewes the 8. Sonne & Successor to Philip Augustus.

I can hardly stay at Lewes the eight, Son to this King, and Successor in his vertues, wherein he seconded him liuing, and partaked in many of his expeditions and enterprizes. But reigning so short a time after his Father; I must come to the King, called S. Lewes, whose piety, religion, and sanctity of life, hath sufficiently commended him to all men, & acknowledged him by quality, worthy the name of Saint. But that which is to bee reckoned as a matter most rare, is, that he excelled no lesse in all other vertues, both Military & Politique. He brought about many warres, wherein still he had a finger, and performed worthy exploits of Armes: beeing most valiant of his person, & a very wise Capraine.

Lewes the 9 sirnamed S. Lewes, a religious king & a worthy Soldiour.

Hee toyled and droue in disorder a great Army, wherein was the King of England, and the Counts de la Marche, and de Lusignan, at Taillebourg, on the Riuer Charante in Poictu. Where hauing gotten before, with very fewe people, to winne a Bridge, long time he endured all the stratagems of the enemies Army, which was in number a hundred to one: yet hee performed so much by his valiancy, that his Army had leysure for theyr passage, whereby the enemies were defeated, a great number slaine, many taken prisoners, some say foure thousand, and the rest were dispersed and driuen to flight.

The victory at Taillebourg on the Riuer Charante in Poictu.

No where can be found more famous deeds of Armes, or any actions more generous then his kingly expeditions against the Turkes and Sarrazines, where he wonne the best in many foughten battailes, hazarding his owne person, and exposing himselfe to all dangers, euen in the cheefest heate of fight, running where he saw the enemy strongest, and his owne followers in any distresse. So that wheresoeuer he went, hee made all to giue him way, none beeing able to withstand him; but gaue place to the greatnesse of his courage, and strength of his powerfull arme. The Lord of Ioinuille, an eye-witnesse thereof, speaking of one day among others, vsed these very words.

His famous expedition against the Turkes and Sarrazins.

And bee you very certaine, that that day the King perfourmed most high deedes of Armes, more then euer I saw in all the Battailes whereat I haue beene present. And one saide after the Battaile, that if it had not bene for his person, wee had all beene vtterly lost and slaine that day: And surely, I can no otherwise imagine, but at the very instant, his vertue and strength was doubled on him by the grace of God. For hee feared not a iote to thrust himselfe into the dangers and perils of the battaile: and where he saw his people in any distresse, there he laide most about him to helpe them, deliuering so many blowes with his Sword and Battle-Axe, as none of the Turkes durst come neere him. The Lord of Courtnay, and Messire Iohn de Salony reported to me, that they saw sixe Turks (the same day) preparing towards the King, and hadde forcibly laide hold on the bridle of his Horse, intending to leade him away. But the vertuous Prince, seeing the danger wherein hee was, strooe with all his might, and (in meere height of courage) laide such loading strokes vppon the Turkes which ledde him, so that hee alone freed himselfe from them.

Le Sieur de Ioinuille in the 29. Chapter of his Booke.

Sixe Turkes seized on the Kings Horse, and yet he freed himselfe from them all.

In another place the same Lord relateth, that the king vnderstanding how the Earl of Anion his Brother was engirt & hemd in with enemies, yea, and in such extremity, as hee had no meanes to get out from them; he gallowped immediately to rescue him. And (saith he) without tarrying for any man, gaue the Spurs to his horse, his Sword in his hand, & rushed mainly into the battaile; charging the Turkes and Sarrazins heauily, vntill he came to the place where his Brother was. But at his arriuall, God knowes what paines he tooke, and how many worthy deedes of Armes hee did: for it is most certaine, that where hee saw the greatest danger and preasse, there hee bestowed himselfe without any feare. So that by his admirable prowesse, he brought his Brother out of danger, and droue the Sarrazines to flight, chasing them quite out of their owne Hoast or Army.

In the 32. Chapter of his Booke. How the king rescued his Brother the Earle of Anion.

Another

Another day, ſpeaking how the King was ready to aſſaile the enemy, & exhorted his followers to all forwardneſſe; His Helmet (ſayth he) was richly gilded, and in his hand he held a ſword of Germanie, readily drawne. But let me tell yee, that I neuer ſaw a more goodly man then he was, for hee appeared aboue all the reſt, by the height of his head and ſhoulder: and it is a thing hardly to be credited, how chearefully all the Soldiours were encouraged to the battaile, when they but looked on the King in that manner. So that many Knightes, without attending for the King, mingled themſelues amongeſt the Turkes, and there aſſayled them couragiouſly. The King vvould alwayes be the formoſt, and when he came neere to the Turkes, the battaile beganne ſo fiercely, as it vvas a matter marꝛuellous to behold. And that verie day, there were far more woorthy actions of Armes performed, as well on the one ſide, as the other, as neuer had beene obſerued in all the voyages beyond the Seas. For no man drew a Dart, an Arrow, nor other Artillery: but all of them fought manfully, hand to hand, all pel-mell, one with another, onely by ſtroakes of Swords and Battle Axes. Further hee addeth; That the King did more then meruayles in fighting, and vvould alwayes bee in the verie ſtrongeſt of the Battaile.

In the 29. chapter of his Booke.

A very manly reſolution in fight.

After the rout and flight of the Turks, at his deſcent and taking of Damieta, and after the three great battailes in Egypt, betweene the Channels of Nilus, where he obtained full victory: if famine, and a certaine ſtrange diſeaſe (extraordinarily contagious) had not ſalne amongſt his people: it had bene Doomeſday vnto the Turkes and Sarrazins, and doubtles, they had bene quite exterminated, both out of Egypt, and the Holy Land. The Infidels ſo admired the vertue of this Prince, that although he was contrary to them in Religion, and their very ſeuere perſecutor, yet after the death of their Soldan, it was offered to him, and they would haue elected him to be their Lord. And they had done it, as beeing a matter already reſolued on among them: but that ſome labored to alter this deliberation, by alledging him to be the firmeſt, fierceſt, and moſt determinate Chriſtian that euer they did know. And they ſaid among themſelues; That if their Mahomet had ſuffered them to feele ſo many miſchiefes as his God hadde let him (being a King) to taſte: they would neuer more haue adored or beleeued in him. And yet (neuertheleſſe) ſome amongſt them, onely by the example, and good Life of this holye King, receiued the Chriſtian Faith.

Damieta won from the Infidels, and three great battails fought in Egypt.

The King of France elected to be Soldan of Egypt.

In chap 33. of his Booke.

Moreouer, he ordained ſo well for the ſtate and policy of his Kingdome: that his ſubiects (beeing before mightily oppreſſed) liued in perfect peace and quietnes. He vſed great wiſedome and prouidence in all his affayres, hauing thereby quenched and qualified many troubles and commotions in his kingdome: and by taking away the cauſes thereof, conſtrained the Duke of Bretaigne to acknowledge him, and render ſuch ſatisfaction as himſelfe deſired. With very much iudgement alſo he pacified the differences with the Engliſh, and induced the king of England to ſuch friendlineſſe, as he becam his Liegeman by faith, and one of the Barons of France: ſo that hee left not any war to his ſucceſſors, which cauſed them to enioy ſo long a peace.

A King carefull for his kingdome, as well in his abſence, as preſeance.

Aboue all other things, he loued Iuſtice eſpecially, and was verie carefull thereof in himſelfe; correcting (by his owne example, and holye Ordinances) ſuch Vices and Abuſes as reigned among his Subiects. Hee was ſuch a Louer of trueth, that (as the Lord of Ionuille ſaith) He was neuer knowne to falſify his Word. For, it was reported vnto him, That the Sarrazines, in receyuing his Ranſome, were diſcontented with tenne thouſand pounds, he cauſed more to bee giuen to them.

No meane commendations in ſogreat a perſon, whoſe life was a precious example to all his people.

In chapter 19 of his Booke.

Neuer could any feare or miſ-fortune diſfurniſh him of reaſon; but euer-more he was thankfull to God in all his aduerſities. When he ſaw his army in danger, by no meanes in the world, or for ſafetie of his owne perſon, would hee part from it; but would alwayes abide by his people, and endure (with them) the lateſt hazards and euents of fortune. Neuer ſhould hee make an end, ỳ would recount the deeds (well deſeruing immortality) of this good King. It ſhall ſuffice then to ſay, as the ſame Lord of Ionuille reports of his time. The common people called him true Father; the Nobility, iuſt Prince, and preſeruer of the Lawes; France, her King of Truth; and the Church, her Tutor and defender from oppreſſion.

In chapter 16 of his Booke.

Philip the 3. succeeded his father S. Lewes, who deceased in Affrica at the city of Thunis.

In the same Schoole was bred and norished Philip the third, to whom the good ly examples, and profitable instructions of this good King his Father, serued as an absolute pattern and excellent institution, which he vnderstoode so well, and made profit of in such sort, as, although he got not so great a name, yet notwithstanding, he was the most worthy heyre of his Fathers vertues. And albeit S. Lewes dyed at the siedge of Thunis in Affrica, making warre the second time against the Infidels; yet this young Prince gaue so good assurance to the Armie, much danted by the death of the King; that hee bare away many famous victories from his enemies, although they exceeded his strength in huge multitudes. In the end, he constraind the king of Thunis, to come humbly, and entreate for peace: rendering himselfe, and his Vnckle Charles king of Sicily tributaries to him.

Afterwards, returning home towards France, he passed thorow Italy, where he was entertained with such fauour and applauses by all the inhabitants, as the most part came and entreated him, that hee would take the command ouer them, desiring (aboue all things else) to be gouerned by so good a King, so louing and respectiue of his people. Beeing returned into his owne kingdome, he maintayned it in peace a long time; vntill being molleSted by the King of Arragon, and the Count de Foix, hee vndertooke Armes. Heereupon he entred into Spaine, where hauing made war very happily, by assault he tooke many places reputed impregnable, conquered a great part of the kingdome of Arragon, ouerthrew the Arragonians in diuers encounters, and slew their King, so returning home-ward with Triumphall victory, he died at Parpignan.

Guliel. de Nangis, in Philippo tertio.

K. Philip entred Spaine, with an army, and killed the K. of Arragon

But one thing may not bee omitted, that this king most oftentimes did weare sackcloath, and a shirt of haire, liuing so holily, and vsing such abstinence, that the Authors of those times were enforced to confesse, that he rather resembled a good Religious man, then a King. Yet was hee a great Prince, & knew well enough how to gouerne his kingdome.

Charles the 5 surnamed the Wise.

Charles the fift, deserueth also to be set in this ranke of choyse men, being surnamed of his time, the Wise. Onely by his councell and good aduice, without stirring from his Chamber, he reconquered whatsoeuer his Predecessors had lost, by the Armies of the English. His prouident and well tempered wisedom, did diuers times rebate the keene edged sword of valiant Edward the Prince of Wales, and disappointed many of his forwarde purposes; so that, notwithstanding his high spirit, and well ordered Armies, he gained very little from him, nor yet the King of England his Father, but what they wonne one day, they lost againe in another.

Charles the 7 much molleSted by the armies of the English.

Heere also I cannot omit Charles the seuenth, who comming to the Crowne, his kingdome (for the most part) was in the power of the English: but yet recouered it myraculously, as not onely hee regained what he had lost, but also (as some say) all that the Englishmen did hold in France, wishing them to rest contented with their owne Island. And heere methinkes it is very strange, what all Historians haue reported of those times, that this king, being toyled & wearied by the long warres of the English, to him much vnprofitable, and lesse pleasing: should yet be excited by a poore Maide, dwelling in a village of Lorraine, named Ioane d'Arc. For she being brought before him, & being of great resolution, made him manie faire remonstrances, whereby to entice and kindle his courage, for the recouerie of his kingdome, and expulsion of his enimies, which surely could not bee but by miracle. And it cannot be denied but that there was a Genius in this Maide, far surpasing the natural and ordinary condition of her sexe. And so much the more strange, because she serued as a Captaine, conducted the Armies, and fought verie valiantly, when as occasion serued.

Otherwise called Ioane the Pucelle of France.

Non hac sine numine diuum eueniunt.

Charles the 8 son & successor to Charles the 7.

Consider we also Charles the eight, his yongest son, who hauing past into Italy, to reconquer that which the Arragonians vsurped from his predecessours, filled all the Citties and Townes of Italy (at his arriuall, with no meane terror of his armes, none being found thet durst make heade against him. Euery Citty submittted to him, and set open their gates, in meer affection and respect, both to the vertue of the French, and dread of their name; Others thers for feare, not beeing able to conteſt with them. So that in leſſe then fiue moneths, he made himſelfe Maſter of all Italy, Geneway, Florence, Piſa, Sienna and* Liburnia being all in his power. He reconquered the whole kingdom of Naples, and expelled them of Arragon, who had vniuſtly vſurped there.

*The country Croatia, betweene Iſtria, and Dalmatia

The Great Turke Baiazeth the ſecond, feared nothing more then to meddle with him; & queſtionles, he would haue gon to aſſault him in Conſtantinople, wherein hee had ſhut vp himſelfe in meere feare, if vrgent occaſions had not called him backe to France, making ful account to returne thither againe afterward, to attempt that great and honourable expedition againſt the Turkes, whereunto hee was induced and called on all ſides, & for diuers good conſiderations. At his comming back for France, two maine impediments preſented themſelves to him, as well in regarde of difficult waies and mountaines, where (of neceſsity) hee was to paſſe his Artillery: as for daunger of enemies in ſuch places, where they might worke vpon aduantage many wayes; his army beeing alſo much afflicted with famine.

His intended voiage againſt Baiazeth the ſecond.

Beſide all this, a league was made againſt him, by the Venetians, the Duke of Millaine, and other Potentates, who had leuied an army of 40000. men, to cut him off quite: but yet hee ſurmounted all theſe difficulties, and paſſed through the daungers without any loſſe. The Armie of 40000. men was encamped on the Plaine of Fornoue, where it was moſt requiſit for the King to paſſe, they purpoſing to lock him vppe in this paſſage, to the end, that they might conſume his army, with Famine, neceſſity, and miſerie, amongſt the Mountaines where he was. The king with 7000 able fighting men onely, affronted this great army, gaue them battell, paſſed ouer the bellies of all them that hindered his way; and there was ſlaine about foure thouſand of them, the reſt beeing driuen to rout, or ſeized with feare, he ſuſtaining but very little loſſe, about thirtie French ſlaine, and ſome threeſcore Varlets. So not onely he reſcued his army, which hee led in ſafety with all his traine, baggage, Artillery, and carriages; but alſo fought ſucceſſefully, and hadde the victory ouer his enemies, which was a much more honourable Retreate, then that of tenne thouſand, ſo highly renowned by the Greekes.

The Venetians, the Duke of Millaine, & other Princes leagued againſt King Charles, and yet were foyled.

A very ſmall loſſe on the Kings ſide againſt ſo great an Army.

An example of rare vertue is recorded of him. At the ſurprizall of a certaine place in Italy, a young Maid (of moſt exquiſite beauty) flying from his Soldiours, who woulde haue violated her honour: came and threw her ſelfe at his feete, deſiring him earneſtly, to defend her from the force and outrage of his ſouldiers. As indeed he did; but yet himſelfe fel into an amorous affection toward her, & hauing her priuate in his Chamber, with full intent to accompliſh his pleaſure, the Maid all drowned in tears, humbly deſired him on our knees, ſupplicating and adiuring him in the name of the bleſſed Virgin, the vntoucht mother of the worlds Sauiour, whoſe picture ſhe ſaw hanging by his bed that hee would take pitty on her, and not compell her to that, for ſafety wherof ſhe had eſcaped from his rauiſhing Soldiers, and put her ſelfe wholly into his handes. The King became mooued in ſuch ſort, that being tranſported with loue and paſſion, and in the braue gallantry of his youth, he made a Kingly conqueſt of him ſelfe, and bedewing his cheeks with tears, as beeing much aſhamed at his immodeſt offer, he would not touch her in any vnciuill or vnchaſte faſhion, but gaue her moſt honourable freedome, with a verie liberall Dowrie to her matriage, ſetting alſo at liberty both her Parents and Kindred, that were then (at that inſtant) his priſoners.

A briefe hiſtory, declaring admirable vertue in this King.

Where vertue and honor is truly innated, luſt hath the leſſe power to preuaile.

Surely, this was an acte verie ſtrange and almoſt myraculous, if wee conſider him to bee a King, in the very vigour & flower of his youth, victorious: yet neerely touched with the loue of a Mayden, excelling, and no way inferiour vnto any in Beautie, and hauing her wholly in his priuate power. His great wiſedome, ſingular iudgement, and infinite goodneſſe heerein appeared; and beeing a familiar Prince, hee would oftentimes ſay to his Fauourites; That hee had made choyſe of them, and loued them more then any other, becauſe he was perſwaded of their honeſtie, and might ſafely truſt them. Onely, he ſtill feared one fault in them, that they would ſuffer him to bee taxed with Auarice, in beeing eaſily ſollicited and tempted for acceſſe: in regard of the credite they hadde with him; and his owne facility, in granting what they asked. But if afterwards, any ſuch matter came to his knowledge, they vtterly loſt his fauour for euer: for he often entreated them, to continue in the true profeſſion of honour, the onely meanes to keep and preſerue his good opinion of them.

King Charles his ſpeeches to his fauorits

A worthy and Royall minde in a King.

The ſame King alſo vſed to ſay, I could wiſh, that my Court were a Mirror for all my other Subiectes, to maintaine and continue them in doing well. The ſweete ſmelling fauour of this renown, attracted the ſouls of ſtrangers vnto his loue and liking. So that by very iuſt reaſon, the ſur-name might bee accommodated to this good Prince, of The louer and delight of Men: as it was attributed vnto the Emperor Titus.

Lewes the 12 ſucceeded Charls in the kingdome of France.

His ſucceſſor Lewes the twelfth, made himſelfe likewiſe as famous, by his Conqueſts of Italy. In the beginning of his reigne, he attempted warre againſt Lodouico Sforza, who vſurped the Dukedome of Millaine, which belonged to him. In leſſe ſpace then a Moneth, he conquered all Lombardie, and expulſed Sforza, who making a re-entry afterward, and cauſing the people to reuolt; the King went thither in perſon; where, after hee had vanquiſhed Sforza (whom hee ſent priſoner into France) he reconquered Millain, and receyued the moſt part of the Potentates Citties, and Common-weales of Italy, which ran (on heapes) to yeelde their obeyſance to him.

The ſucceſſe of his wars in Italy, and the kingdome of Naples.

From thence he ſent an Armie to the kingdome of Naples, which had reuolted after the departure of King Charles the 8. Then Fredericke, King of Arragon, ſeeing he could not reſiſt him, and being offended at the perfidie of the Spaniards, whō he had called to his ayde, and who (neuertheleſſe) would poſſeſſe themſelues of all: he ſubmitted himſelfe into the handes of the King, who vſed him royally, and gratified him with the Dukedome of Aniou, beſide thirty thouſand Crownes of rent. Heere (me thinkes) I ſhould not endure the malignity of Paulus Iouius, who hath ſet downe, that the King gaue nothing to Fredericke, and that he dyed miſerably in France. Afterward, warre was alwaies continued at Naples againſt the Spaniardes, where were performed many goodly exploits, famous combates of enemy to enimy, charges, skirmiſhes, encounters, aſſaults, and ſallies: and where the French had many victories, & the iſſue of all had ſucceeded happily, if the enemie had not diuers times abuſed the King, vnder colour of treaties of peace, appointments, and arreſts. He beleeuing their plighted faith and ſlender aſſurances, was ſomtime the more ſlacke in ſuccouring his people; ſo that their perfidious dealing, rayſed a Million of enemies, leagued and coniured againſt this King, who found himſelfe aſſayled on al ſides. And yet notwithſtanding, he went away with honour, hauing aſtoniſhed and filled with terror, all them that were thus bandyed againſt him.

Paulus Iouius taxed with vntrueth.

War continued againſt the Spaniardes at Naples.

The warre he made againſt the Venetians

He made warre vpon the Venetians, in regard of that which they had detained & vſurped, during thoſe wars. He entred into their countries, and with a ſmall troop, & in a place of no aduantage, in the Guiaradada neere to Agnadell, he gaue battel to Bartholmew d' Aluiana, Generall for the Venetians, and wonne the victory: there being ſlaine aboue eight thouſand of the enemy, many taken priſoners, & the very cheeſeſt Commander himſelfe.

Two memorable ſayings of the King on the day of battell.

Concerning that dayes ſeruice, two memorable ſayings of his are recorded. The one was at his arriuall there, when it had bin told him, that the enemy had taken vp Agnadell, and he came too late to haue any lodging there, hee returned this reply, I will lodge vpon their belly, or they ſhall lodge on mine. The other, was at his being ſo neere the enemies Artillery, as it might very eaſily play vpon the place; he was aduiſed to walke wanderingly, for feare he ſhould thereby be offended, hee made anſwer; Neuer was King of Fraunce ſmitten by a Cannons bullet: And he that is afraid (quoth hee) let him come and ſtand behinde me.

Places in Lombardie, belonging to the Venetians ſeized by the King.

Vpon the ſucceſſe of this victory, thoſe places in Lombardie, which appertained to the Venetians, were ſeized and made vſe of by this King: but afterwardes, they were manfully recouered by the Confederates, with whom Ferdinand, King of Caſtile, was a partaker, quite contrary to the contractes (not long before) paſſed by him vnto the French King. But the Lordes of Trimouille, of Chaumont, Trivulce, and other woorthy French Captaines, reſcued them backe againe ſo powerfully, that they continued alwayes Warriors. In the end, was giuen the battaile taile of Rauenna, where the French vanquished a puissant Army of Italians and Spaniards ioyned together. And an entire victory had ensued on the taking of Rauenna; but that they lost their cheefe Captaine Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, & Nephew to the king, who was slaine by pursuing (ouer-earnestly) the enemies, broken and flying in confusion.

The great battaile at Rauēna, wherof we shall haue occasion to speake more heereafter.

The excellency of this good king consisted not onely in greatnesse of courage and valiancy; but likewise in all other vertues. Aboue all, he was most highly commendable, for loue to his people, to whō (notwithstanding all his other serious affaires) he was a Royall ease and comfort: so that this famous name was desertfully giuen him: Father of his people, and a good King.

Frances the first, successor to Lewes the twelfth.

He had as his Successor, Great Frances the first, a Prince as valiant as euer the other had bin, and who in his very youth, and at the beginning of his raigne: ouercame the vnconquerable Nation of the Switzers, on the hot and dreadfull day at Marignano, an enterprize, which had neuer before, or at any time since, succeeded to any other King. A most remarkable thing in this battaile, was, that so young a Prince continued seuen & twenty houres in Armes, without receiuing any sustenance, and spent one whole night in the fielde of battaile, without lying downe or a nod of sleepe.

Of this battell also we will speake heereafter.

He contended with the Emperor Charls the 5.

This was the man that made head against the great Emperour Charles the 5. who neuer met with a keener enemy, nor that more disappointed his designes, or euery way more hindred him. And yet notwithstanding, it is hardly to be credited, with what honor, magnificence publikely, and courtesie in particular, hee entertained in his kingdome this Emperor, his principall aduersary. And although he with-held some of his estate vniustly, yet would he not demaund any reason for it, when he might well haue done it, hauing him in his owne power: but kept inuiolably the faith he had giuen him; and moreouer, gaue him all the contentment he could desire.

An admirable disposition in a king.

To speake no more then truth, hee was naturally generous & Royall, which euidently declared, that hee had no other ambition, then to excell all other men in vertue and well doing. He shall (for euer) liue commended to posterity, for the loue which he bare to Learning, and to learned men: whom hee sought for euery where, entertained, honoured, and gratified in all kindes. By which means, he filled France with learning and erudition in all Sciences: but especially the Vniuersity of Paris, which neuer was so flourishing, as in his reigne. So that (by good right) he was sir-named, The Father of Learning.

King Frances an entire louer of learning.

Wee may confesse as much of his Sonne Henry the second, a Prince truely generous and valiant: who continued warre against the Emperor Charles the 5. hauing sustained all his efforts, and stood continually opposite to his greatest enterprizes. But not long after, Charles the fift withdrew himselfe into a Monastery, fearing (as some supposed) the vertue and fortune of this young Prince, leauing the reignes of his Germane Empire, to Ferdinand of Austria, being his brother, and the kingdome of Spaine to Philip the second: who soone after made warre vpon the Pope, Paule the fourth, and then this King sent succour to his Holinesse, defended him, & reconquered the places which the King of Spaine had taken from him. And in the end, by his entremise, the Pope and the King of Spaine were accorded & reconciled.

Henry the second, Sonne & Successor to King Frances.

Charles 5. emperor entreth into a Monastery.

Occasion now carrieth me, to speake of Great Henry the fourth, miracle of the world: who gaue place (in nothing) to the vertue of his Predecessours, nor to the glory of all the greatest Princes and Monarches that euer were, if he did not surpasse them. But my Pen is too feeble, to take so high a flight, it is a subiect ouerworthy, which ought to bee reserued for the choysest spirits of this age, or of posterity, if any man conceiue themselues capable to vndertake it. For there hath bin some, the very best and skilfullest writers, who being thereto zealously affected, began to attempt the labour: but were constrained to giue ouer and leaue it, beeing ouercome with the immense greatnesse of so many high and admirable actions, acknowledging and confessing, that they could not set downe any thing, to equall or come neere so famous merit.

King Henry the fourth, Father to the king now reigning.

What hand can worthily describe so many wonne battailes, so many Cities and Townes taken (without losing any one)

He was reputed to be one of the worthieſt Soldiors in all the world.

one) ſo many fights and diuerſity of encounters? Who can figure him, ſhining in his glittering Armes, in the fierceſt and hotteſt brunts of ſo many ſharpe onſets, combates, ranged battailes, aſſaults, ſiedges, and ſurprizals, making himſelfe way whereſoeuer he went? A true Commander and Captaine, for councell and conduct; a moſt valiant Souldiour, to giue example for effect and execution. Finding all France troubled, the people mooued and diuided in parts, by the deuices and factions of ſtrangers, all Europe (to ſpeake truely) bandied & coniured againſt him, in very deplorable affayres; he yet gotte the vpper hand of all, diſſipated all ſtorms and tempeſts, ſaued and preſerued France frō that ruine, which euery one ſuppoſed certaine. All the enterprizes of his enemies, ſerued but as matter for his Trophees. Looke how many enemies, ſee ſo many Triumphs, and as many Laurels in his Helmet, to make his vertue the more illuſtrious, and fill the ſoules of his owne people and ſtrangers, with terror, amazement, and admiration, ſuch as cannot bee ſufficiently ſpoken off.

He ſaued France from an expected and hoped for ruine.

He guided all his intentions with ſuch wiſedome, and executed them with ſo high a courage, that they could haue no other yſſue but happineſſe: and it plainly appeared, that his vertue led Fortune by the hand: making truely knowne the ancient ſaying; That the wiſe man diſpoſeth of Fortune; and on the contrary; It is to ſlender purpoſe, to impute that to accident, which prooues to be a mans owne error. Neuer did any Prince finde an eſtate ſo confuſed and hurried; and neuer could any reduce it to more peaceable calmnes, thē he did meerely by his vertue, he not only danted his enemies, but (of enemies) they became his principall friends: A ſoueraign degree, & the ſole perfectiō of a great Stateſman, according to Plato. His valiancy, height of coutage, and addreſſe to actions of Armes were ſuch, as admited no compariſon therewith: matchleſſe clemency euen towards ſuch as were his moſt determinate enemies. No acte of cruelty, neyther of reuenge, in the very fierceſt fury of warre: neuer was his ſword ſeene vnſheathed, but in the hot extremity of fights. His ſingular prudence, appeared not onely in the managing of war, and when hee was therein very ſeriouſly employed; but alſo in affayres of peace, whē he gaue himſelfe wholly for the good and quiet of his people, ſhewing at all times, and in al places, that he was an admirable, good and wiſe king, exquiſitely enabled with all perfections. Qualities in ſuch ſort incompatible by nature, as ſince the beginning of the world, they could hardly meet in any one man: in regard whereof, it hath bene ſometime ſaid & deſired, that two ſhould be taken to make one of.

Two ancient worthy ſayings.

Plato in lib. 3. De Legib.

No cruelty obſerued in him towards his greateſt enemies.

In breefe, all things were ſo great and gracefull in him, as ſcarſely could any one ſpirit comprehend them: ſo that (to ſpeak truely) the beſt that men could do, was to ſit downe, and admire them with ſilence. This was the man, whom not only France acknowledged, & adored as her Conſeruator: but likewiſe on whom the whole world caſt an eye, as the true Arbitrator, Author, and Moderator of her quietnes. His right to the crown yeelded him to be the cheefeſt king: but his owne vertues made him confeſſed, to be the moſt worthy among all other Princes.

Henry the fourth accounted to be the man of men.

In that then which is ſaid to be the dignity of the French kings, for their rare vertues and great merits; no other people are thought to equall or come neere thē. There are certaine vertues, which are termed heroycall or diuine, becauſe they ſurpaſſe that which is common in men, or of humane vnderſtanding, euen as an exceſſe and hyperbole of vertue. So in Homer, Priamus being deſirous to commend the vertue of his Son Hector, ſaid; He ſeemed to be iſſued not of a mortall man, but rather of ſome God. In like manner the Lacedemonians, when they admired any rare or excellent vertue in any one, they would ſay, That he was a diuine man. Such great perſonages haue beene noted among our Ancients, whoſe vertues were ſo extraordinary: that their extraction was attributed to the Gods, as Alexander the great, and Scipio Affricanus: and the very ſame heroycall vertues haue beene carractred in the ſoules of French Kings, euen as being proper and particular to them.

Concerning vertues diuine and heroycall.

Homer in Ilia. ad. Lib. 5.

It is a matter as common, as naturall, for a man to take Armes in his owne defence, or for his owne priuate profite, and to reuenge his vniuſt wrongs and iniuries. But a man to arme himſelfe for another that is offenced, to reuenge his cauſe in zeale of Iuſtice, without any any other hope, and to re-eſtabliſh him where he had bin formerly expulſed; queſtionleſſe is a carracter of vertue truely heroycall, and ſweetly ſauouring of the diuinity; which euermore hath beene naturall to the French. Strabo ſaith; That they would willingly grow into choller, and vndertake Armes; for ſuch as they ſaw to be vniuſtly wronged, and manifeſt ſhames done vnto them.

Strabo in lib. 4.

The Kings of France haue beene accounted admirable for Iuſtice, and by an extraordinary affection in them thereto: they haue taken care and paines, to exerciſe and render it in their owne perſons, declaring themſelues alwayes equitable Iudges, not onely betweene particulars, but alſo in theyr owne proper cauſes, whē in a doubtfull caſe, they haue layde the iudgement on themſelues, rather then to iniury any other. The Kings of France euer did ſo, as well when they rendred Iuſtice in theyr owne perſon, as by theyr Soueraigne Courts, and commendation of very ancient Iuſtice.

The Iuſtice of the kings of France.

This report and praiſe of their Iuſtice is very ancient, for Agathias the Greeke Hiſtorian admireth them herein, and ſeemed to ſay with great iudgment, or rather by a Propheticall ſpirit: That liuing ſo, & carrying themſelues in the like behauiour to their actions; hee was not able to coniecture otherwiſe, but that their Eſtate would be alwayes ſtable, inuincible, & impregnable from enemies; being ſuſtained with ſo ſound baſes and foundations, as Iuſtice and the deſire of Honour are. Among them moſt recent, Baldus, a famous Italian Doctor, about the yeare MCCCL. maketh eſpeciall reckoning of the Kings of France: which (for moſt certaine) long time they deliuered in theyr owne perſon.

Agathias Greec. in lib. 1.

Iuſtice & Honour are two good Pillars for a man to build on.

But the multitude of affayres encreaſing, and they vnable to bee abſent, from rendring Iuſtice to particular perſons, except the State ſhould receiue ſome endamagement, diſtraites, either by the war, or other important charges of the kingdome; they were feigne to eſtabliſh Parliaments to that effect, and therefore appointed ordinary and ſedentary Officers. Before that time, the Eſtates made theyr meeting but foure times euery yeare, termed in the ancient Annaliſts Conuentus Generales: wherein aſſiſted the principall Lords of France, and Officers of the Crowne, as well to diſcerne and aduiſe, in what was to be done for the generall Eſtate, as to decide the greateſt and moſt notable differences, happening betweene particulars.

The first beginning of Parliaments in France.

Hauing then decreed and reſolued on theyr ordinary Parliament at Paris, there was the appointed place for rendring ſoueraigne Iuſtice: ſo that the arreſts and iudgements there concluded, were as if they had beene pronounced by the Kings owne mouth, and thereupon inſcribed & entitled in his Name. They were likewiſe verefied and publiſhed, as alſo Regiſtred by Letters of eſpeciall prouiſion, in the Offices and Dignities of the Crown, with ſolemne & publike reception of the greater part.

The place for Parliaments appointed at Paris.

It is alſo auouched, (that oftentimes) Lords and Princes, being ſtrangers, ſubmitted theyr differences to the iudgment of that Court, in regard of the great opinion they held of their Iuſtice. The Emperor Frederick the ſecond, referred himſelfe vnto the Parliament of the King of France; in the debate and contention betweene him, & Pope Innocent the fourth, concerning the kingdome of Naples, in the yeare MCCXLIIII. The Earles of Nemures, in the yeare MCCCXII. diſputed there the cauſe of his Earldome, againſt Charles de Valois, Brother to Philip le Bel, & won the day. Likewiſe the Prince of Tarente, in the yeare MCCCXX. gained there a ſuite againſt the Duke of Bourgongne, concerning the charges & expences layde out, for the conqueſt and recouery of Conſtantinople.

Differences of Princes being ſtrangers, decided by the Parliament of Paris, and worthily ended to their contentments.

In the yeare MCCCXLII. the Duke of Lorraine, and Guy de Chaſtillon debated there their partages. In like manner the Daulphine, and the Count of Sauoye, hauing proceſſe together, entreted for their Iudges the Court of Parliament, in the yeare MCCCXC. The kings of Spaine made ſuch account of Iuſtice in the kings of France, and integrity of theyr Parliament, that they ſent their ſuites to be conſidered there. The kings of Caſtile and Portugall, hauing made peace together in the yeare MCCCCIII. ſent theyr difference to the Parliament, to be there verifyed, for the more ſolid and ſound aſſurance: and there it was fully confirmed at their requeſt, and publiſhed at the open doores.

The Kings of Spaine eſteemed the Iuſtice of the Kings & Parliament of France.

We

The familiarity and manſuetude of the Kings of France in talking with their ſubiects plaine and openly.

We may alſo account among the fauours and prerogatiues of the Kings of France, as an eſpeciall marke of their greatneſſe and Maieſty: one thing which is found in few of the Kings & Monarchs of other Nations. Which is, that they themſelues doe ordinarily conferre with their ſubiects, ſuffering themſelues to bee ſeene daily, not onely in publike, but alſo in particular, vſing priuacy, granting eaſie acceſſe to any one: and yet notwithſtanding, they are not a iote the leſſe reuerenced, obeyed, honoured, and reſpected, nay, rather much more then ſome other kings, who by artificiall trickes and myſteries, ſeeke to haue themſelues honoured of their people. Neyther doth this facility in communication, and friendly familiarity, beget any contempt towards them, or diminiſh the leaſt part of theyr Maieſty: but rather maketh an addition thereto, cauſing them to bee the more eſteemed, in venerable and moſt happy manner.

The ſubiect-like affection of the French to their kings and Princes.

This is that which attracteth, & (moſt of all) winneth the hearts of the French, rendring themſelues wholly affectionate, yea, vowed and deuote to theyr Prince; whom they loue, feare, and honour altogether, euen with an entire and cordiall affection, and not by any force or conſtraint. A matter truely as admirable, as rare, and which the Lord Suriano an honourable Venetian, and other ſtrangers hauing well obſerued, ſtand not a little amazed thereat, it appearing (naturally) almoſt impoſſible & incompatible. Wherin it is no eaſie matter to ſay, which is the greateſt honour and aduantage, eyther to ſuch kings, or to theyr ſubiects: but bee it howſoeuer, it is a great happineſſe both to the one and other.

In lib. 1. Delle cauſe delle grandezze della Città.

Moſt part of the kings in this world, at all times haue ſought many exteriour meanes, by different habites, extraordinary faſhions, crafts, ſecrets, and diuerſity of inuentions, to maintaine their Maieſty, to make themſelues feared and reſpected by theyr ſubiects, and yet notwithſtanding, could not compaſſe it. The ancient Deioces, beeing elected king by the Medes, frõ a particular man as hee was before, changed into all manner of behauiour. Hee would build a great magnificent Caſtle, enuironed with many walles, the very ſight wherof procured amazement. There would he ſhut vppe himſelfe, cloathed in garments of no vſuall wearing, neuer ſhewing himſelfe to the people, but very ſildome and rarely: deliuering Iuſtice by written papers, & by interpoſed perſons, and likewiſe all his anſwers, expeditions, and affayres, euen as if they came from an Oracle.

Of the Deioces elected Kings of the Medes.

The Kings among the Perſians.

The kings of the Perſians did vſually weare a Tiaras on theyr heads, a Diadem or royall Head-band, all gliſtering with Pearles and precious ſtones, cauſing thẽſelues to bee adored by ſuch as ſhall ſee them. And now adayes, moſt part of the Kings and Lords in diuers countryes, obſerue the very ſame order. The great Duke of Moſcouia will neuer be ſeene, but cloathed with a rich Sacerdotall habite, vnder a precious Pauillian, accompanied with a ſmall choyſe number of his Domeſtiques, ſo ſumptuouſly apparelled, as one would ſay, they were an aſſembly of Gods. The great king of the Abyſſines, or Æthiopians, is neuer ſeene at all, he ſpeaketh to Ambaſſadours, with a Curtaine drawne betweene them, no other ſight haue they of him. But when he pleaſeth to ſhew himſelfe, hee weares a Crowne richly faſhioned, exalted or rayſed very curiouſly, a garment all of beaten gold, thickly beautified with precious ſtones; hauing his face couered with a veyle of Taffata, for feare leſte any ſhould ſee his face. It is alſo a rare, and no accuſtomed fauour, when he lifts the Taffata neuer ſo little, that any part of his viſage may bee ſeene.

The great Duke of Moſcouia.

The king of the Abyſſines and Ethiopians.

The king of China.

The king of China neuer commeth abroad, but keeps himſelfe continually encloſed in a Pallace, round engirt with very ſtrong fortifications, and cauſeth his very Pictures to be adored.

The great Seigneur of the Turkes.

The great Seigneur of the Turkes is neuer ſeene, but in a habite wholly different from any other, both for the faſhion, as alſo the vnſpeakable riches on him: he dazeleth the eyes of all ſuch as looke on him, in regard of the glorious ſtones ſhining on his head, and cauſeth himſelfe to bee ſerued with ſuch Maieſty, reſpect, & ceremonies, as is moſt wonderfull.

The King of Monomatapa.

The king of Monomatapa, is not ſerued but by men on their knees. There are other, who cauſe themſelues to be ſerued with ſtrange faſhions, and very ſeruile ſubmiſſions: ſhewing themſelues ſildome or neuer, and ſpeake not a word, but but it is accounted as an especiall fauour.

The kings of France sutea ble to their subiects.

But the Kings of France haue no medling with these apparences, and exquisite cunning, whereby to support theyr greatnesse, authority, and Royall dignity: because they differ in nothing (for the most part) neyther in habites, food and fashions, from their subiects, maintaining thēselues without any subtilty. And the more they are seene, the more are they honoured, and not only honoured, but also loued of the French: as being borne to reigne, carrying Maiesty in theyr Fronts naturally, which maketh them venerable, rauisheth the people with obedience to them, and crowneth them with continuall respect. And although it is no matter rare or difficult for the French, to see their King, becausse it is so ordinary and common to them: yet as learned Budeus hath discreetly obserued, the people runne on heapes, when they heare that the King passeth to any place, reputing it as a happinesse, to haue so fauourable a sight of him.

Budeus in lib 1. cap.7.

To this great and immensē loue of the French towards theyr naturall Prince, may well be attributed the long continuance of that Monarchy, one of her other excellences, that hath subsisted twelue hūdred yeares, which few kingdomes else can say beside. And that which is most admirable of all, is, that the kings haue bin of the same race and extraction, without any change but twice, & yet in changing, still it came to proximity and kindred, as we haue already declared. One thing also maketh it commendable, that it neuer bare command of a strange Prince, nor so much as desired it: but alwayes hath bin gouerned by her naturall Princes, originaries, and of the most noble blood, not onely in Europe, but in all the rest of the world.

The kingdom France hath continued 1200. yeares.

Natural born Princes, originaries and successiue.

Learned Onuphrius, a famous Italian, obserued it as a matter worth maruaile, saying, that in no other Estate, can be obserued the like felicity. I will set downe his owne words. Mirum illud obseruandum est, quod cum nulla gens vnquam fuit, quæ aut externos Principes non admiserit, aut assumptos interdum non expulerit, sæpe etiam per summum scelus non occiderit, solis Francis peculiare hoc est ac proprium, nullos vnquam exteros Reges pati, suos autem vsque adeo amare & colére, vt pro eorum dignitate & Maiestate tuenda non opes tantum sed vitam profundere soleant. Hinc euenisse credendum est, vt per mille & ducentorum fere annorum internallum non nisi ex tribus familijs Reges orti sint. Wee must account (saith he) that this is meruailous, albeit there hardly hath bin any other Nation, but hath receiued strange Kings, and after reccipte of them, hath expelled them againe, yea, many times massacred them, through some extreme mischiefe. Yet notwithstanding, it is proper and particular to the French, to haue endured no Kings strangers, and therefore haue so loued and reuerenced their Princes, that they not onely imployed all their goods and meanes, but likewise laide downe their liues, for the defence of their Dignity and Maiesty. And this may be thought to be the cause, that for the space of about twelue hundred yeares, there hath beene but three families, from whence haue proceeded all their Kings.

CHAP. IIII.

A Funerall Oration, written vpon the most vnnaturall and vntimely death of Great Henry the fourth, Father to the King now reigning.

THE Egiptians, hauing sufficiently tasted the fauours of Harpocrotes theyr God; did consecrate the Peach-Tree vnto him, in thankfull retribution of his infinite benefits. The leaues of this Tree are shaped like to tongues, and the fruite doth carry a resemblance of hearts: whereby they would ſeeme to ſay, that their hearts ſhould thence-forward ſerue that Harpocrotes, and theyr tongues be continually buſied in celebrating his prayſes. O France! wilt thou bee leſſe thankfull then thoſe people? So many choiſe benefits receiued frō the cheefeſt of thy Monarchs, can they well eſcape thy memory, or glide into the depth of bottomleſſe obliuion? No, no, wee will not onely conſecrate the Peach-tree vnto him, but our hearts and tongues ioyntly together, becauſe this is the beſt offering, remaining in our power to giue him.

The greateſt loſſe that euer France ſuſtained.

Telemachus, the youngeſt Son of Vlyſſes, ſporting himſelfe (on a day) childe-like vpon the Sea-ſhore, by accident fell into the water: but a Dolphin happily came, who receiuing him vpon his backe, did ſet him ſafe and dry vpon the land againe. The Father, not knowing how to expreſſe his gratitude to the Fiſh, that quickly was carried farre off from him by the nimble waues; to auoyd the foule blemiſh of vnthankfulneſſe, cauſed all his Gates to bee painted with Dolphins, engraued them vpon his Sword, yea, hee honoured his Seale with a Dolphins Image.

The ſtrange eſcape of Telemachus, preſerued from drowning by a Dolphine.

Henry, great Henry, a moſt Chriſtian, Potent, and Royall King, ſuccourd France in a Sea of ſeditions & dreadfull tumults, and like a gracious Dolphin, receiued her on his ſhoulders, and ſet her vp in ſafety, euen on the ſhore of a moſt happy peace, whereof as yet ſhee enioyeth the benefit. His name ſhall not onely bee written on our Gates and Walles, but his greatnes, his victories, his mildneſſe and paternall bounties, ſhall bee engrauen on an euerduring Piramede of thankfull acknowledgement, neuer to depart out of our memories. Our eyes, hitherto buſied in teares, granting no liberty to our ſighing hearts, to let our mouthes memorize his Trophees, and tell the world his countles Triumphs; we do now begin to open thē, and now wee would breake the doores of ſome ſad Funerall diſcourſe, in remembrance of his great Maieſty, and excelling vertues.

A familiar alluſion to the vertues of Royal Henry.

If Caliſthenes durſt make refuſall to Alexander, who commanded him to commend the Macedonians, alledging for his excuſe, that their vertues were ſo well knowne, and their merits ſo great, as hee ſhould not gaine the leaſt honour or reputation (whatſoeuer) thereby. How dare I then appeare in publike, and in this common habite of mourning, to commend the eldeſt Sonne of the Church, the Father and Patrone of Soldiours; eſpecially in theſe dull times, when that diuine fire of Eloquence, ſometime ſtolne from the Gods by * Tantalus, ſeemes to haue taken her returne to heauen, from whence ſhe came at the firſt.

Herodot. in Terp. ſub.

* Sonne to Iupiter and Plota.

There are now no Ciceroes, not a Demoſthenes to be found, no, nor an Hortenſius. And albeit they were all aliue againe, to ioyne their beſt abilities together in well ſpeaking; yet could they not ſpeake in ſuch ſort of that famous Prince, but their elegancy would fall farre ſhort, and infinite goodly things would nere come neere them, which are no more then due to his happy memory. If then I ſpeake, it is but by appointment, and as feeling a certaine combate within me, between baſhfulneſſe and nature. Baſhfulneſſe taxing me with ſhame, to be ſilent when the whol world cries and complaines; aſhamed alſo, that I cannot ioyne my ſighes & teares to yours. Nature likewiſe tels me, that by an indiſſoluable obligation, I ought to render this duty and ſeruice, to the eternall memory of my King, my Lord & my Prince. This then may ſerue for my diſcharge. The * Epizephyrian Locrences, in former times, not hauing the commodity to performe any ſolemne ſacrifice to Hercules, according to their vow (becauſe there were not any Oxen, Sheepe, or other Beaſts for oblation left in their City, through the length of a greeuous peſtilence, which had conſumed them all) when their Elders aduiſed them to take Cowcumbers, Mellons, and ſome other kindes of fruites, fitting them with ſhort ſtickes in forme of feete, and then calling them Oxen, Sheepe, and ſuch like Beaſts, they threw them into the fire, & ſo made their ſacrifices. Among their neighbours, there was not any but commended their inuention, and gaue cheerefull applauſe vnto this acte of theirs.

No eloquēce ſufficient to expreſſe his high deſeruings.

If I haue not wherewith (worthily) to anſwer the admirable vertues of that Monarch; let me accuſe my neceſſity, and giue you what I can, which (I hope) will be acceptable to you. Or elſe (if you better affect it) I will imitate thoſe Sauages of Florida, who reputing the Sunne to be their

If I cannot touch (dazeled with his beams) the Sun of so bright a Maiesty, or my tongue shal this day seem dumbe, in the infinity of his glory: I will yet essay by signes, and shew some-what that way, when other helpes fayle me.

Cæsars funerall Oration for his daughter Iulia.

Concerning the rest, my aime hath no other end, then that of Cæsar, in the Funerall Oration he made for his Daughter Iulia: Vt adstantes admonerentur quanta iactura ex illa morte facta esset: That the bystanders might bee admonished, how great a losse ensued by her death. For what losse can be greater thẽ ours? A losse which neuer had his like, a losse springing out of our iniquities, which made vs altogether vnworthy to enioy so great, so happy and so dreaded a Prince.

2 Reg. 1. 19. 21

O desiderabilis terra Israel! in excelsis tuis vulneratus est. Quomodo ceciderunt potẽtes? Quomodo abiectus est Clypeus fortium? Thus did Dauid bemone the death of Saul, King of Israel. Thus was a King extolled by a King, being filled with the spirit of Prophesie. Thus did the annointed of God streame forth his teares, in A Funerall Oration for A Prince, slaine vpon the mountaines of Gilboa, which he wished might (for euer) continue barren like Rocks, listen the effect of his diuine maledictions. Nec ros, nec pluuia descendat super vos, quia proiectus est Clypeus fortiũ. Let neither dew nor raine descend vpon yee; because there the shield of the mighty is cast downe. Behold, how he would haue some sad and lamentable monument to remain there, answerable to an acte so sad & dismall. Monuments ought to agree in resemblance with the things which they signify. What thing could be more horrible then the murder of an Israelite Prince? The Monument then ought to bee euery way as yrkesome and horrible.

2 Reg. 1. 21.

What ought the nature of Monuments to be.

Blacke, best befitteth Funerall pompe

In Funerall pompes, we vse to goe in blacke garments. Dewes doe make the Mountaines verdant, and raine drunk vp by the Vallies, enammels thẽ with a thousand flowers, and giues them such a garment of greene, as is both faire to see, and maruailous pleasing. Therefore Dauid would haue nothing to grow vpon Gilboa; but thornes and brambles, that so (among rude Rockes) nothing might appeare but rough thorny passages: to the ende, that such places might bee condemned, as of deeds of horror and darknesse; so likewise to sterility, and wofull perpetuall deuastation. But are not dewes the gift of God? Doth not raine come from the hand of him that is almighty? Thẽ, not to receiue these, is a dreadfull malediction. It should seeme then, that Dauid inuoked the wrath of heauen vpon that Gilboa, the land being subiect to many curses, for the sinnes that were there committed. Let neyther dew nor raine descend vpon yee, because the shield of the mighty is there cast downe.

Dewes and raines are the blessings of Heauen.

Alasse, what greater Shield of strength, more generous and mighty, then Great Henry the fourth? Henry, the Rampier of his people, the Shield of his Souldiers, & the Buckler that defended the heads and hearts of his Princes? He couered them against all their enemies attempts and encounters. Hee serued as an Armour of proofe to the French Monarchy, vnder which defence they continually raunged themselues, yea, the Seigneurs and Principalities of many strangers, sheltred thẽselues vnder that Sunny Banck. Therfore of him may now be said, as somtimes was of Dauid: The Lord sought him a man after his owne heart, and commanded him to bee a Gouernour ouer his people. For if Dauid declared himselfe couragious, in the greatest heate of Alarmes and fights; Henry, great Henry, hath not hee beene (euery where) a true Mars, and a true thunderbolt of warre? If Dauid were still crowned with victory, because his clemency was acceptable to the God of Armies, & therefore elected him among thousands, to bee the Ruler of his people: then may we say, that (after his fights) neuer was found a kinder Prince then great Henry the fourth, to whom this Elogium rightly appertained. Qui in aciete conspexit superatus est, qui in pace nihil timuit: Euermore a Conquerour, both in warre and peace, deriuing his victories no lesse from loue, then from power. Vnder which (as Ennodius spake in the Panegyrique of Thierry, King of the Gothes) Vidimus euentus optimos de aduersitate generari, so may wee say; That out of greatest extremities,

No better Shield of defence to any kingdome, then a truely generous King.

we haue beheld the birth of higheſt and faireſt fortunes.

For in conquering the Rampiers of our Cities, at the very ſame time he won our hearts alſo, and (by a ſoueraigne amplitude of kindneſſe) ſweetly inſinuated himſelfe into all our ſoules, that behelde him ſo brightly ſhining in Armes. So that ſaying was verefied in him, which Agapetus ſpake to the Emperour Iuſtinian. Imperium exornauit ſuperiores Imperatores, tu vero præſtantiſſime illud illuſtre reddidiſti: That which Empires (in former times) gaue to their Emperours; thou thy ſelfe (O great Prince) haſt giuen to thine, to wit, luſter and ſplendour. Thou didſt finde it full of quarrels, ſeditions, and tumults, thy vnciuill ſubiects made mad (by what new Circes I know not) becam enemies to thy crown. But by the right hand of God, & ſtrength of thy martiall arme, thou didſt diſplant their Fortreſſes, peopled with Spaniards, expelling both the one and other; and from the limits of thy French Empire, thou didſt exterminate that proud Bellona, that (without all pitty) did cruelly labour to teare her in peeces, and quite deuoure her.

Agapetus in Articulis de recte adminiſtrando Imperio.

The hand of heauen euer ſupporteth the right of true kings.

Oh what a goodly day was that, when we beheld bright victory to deſcend vpon his head, euen glorious and celeſtiall victory, holding in her hand a thouſand Laurels, diſperſing them in the fields of ſo many faire Prouinces? Victory was figured by the Romans, with a gracious countenance, and two great wings diſplayed on her ſhoulders. The Athenians made a mockery thereat, and portraied their victory quite contrary, without wings or any feathers, to the ende, ſhe ſhould neuer flye from them, but alwayes keepe within the girdle of their Citty walles. Victory (Companion to the merits of this great Prince) was of the Athenian nature. In former times ſhe had bene full of inconſtancy, firſt on one ſide, then on another, neuer long continuing in any one Prouince. But at length, ſhe ſeated herſelfe on the Louure of this onely Mars, where (firſt of all) ſhe threw off her wings, neuer to ſtart thence all the time of his Reigne. This was ſhe, that not only made him beloued of his owne people: but ſo feared & reuerenced of ſtrangers beſide, that they had and held him alwaies in admiration.

The ſucceſſefull iſſue of his long troubleſome wars.

Victory that accompanied Great Henry.

Pliny tels vs, that there is found in Affrica a certaine precious ſtone, called Liparis, which hath ſo faire a looke, that all eyes are at a ſtand to gaze vpon it. Hunters ther haue no need of ſculking hounds for their game, or any Arrowes to kill it, becauſe this ſtone, laide open in the midſt of any field, all wilde beaſts (getting but a glimps thereof) gather together about it, and as amorous of the ſtones beauty, doe nothing elſe but looke vpon it. Our Monarch, our great Monarch, was as a Liparis in the midſt of his French world, the Germane, Italian, Spaniard, Engliſh, Swethen, yea, the very Turkes, were all drawne hither by the fame of his vertues, & renown of his Armes, euery one ſtood at gaze to behold him, not any one but wiſhed his preſence, each one loued & admired him, as a new miracle, or prodigy of valour and greatneſſe in the world. In ſo much, that his preſence ſerued not onely as an ornamament to this State: but it was alſo here as an horne of abundance, out of which, al kindes of goodneſſe that could flow from a ſacred peace, were in a moſt plentifull affluence deriued from him. The poyſons of diſſentions could heere no more produce their Gangrenats; the high vnderſtanding of the King was too preſent an Antidote. And as the dryed body of a Baſiliske, hung with a golden thred in the midſt of Apollos Temple (ſaith Geſner) kept it alwayes cleane, reſtraining (by an hidden vertue) Spiders from working cobwebs along the pillars and walles: Euen ſo great Henry, liuing in our France, kept it cleane from all the inſolences of enemies, and ſuffered no ſtrange Spiders to come weaue their webs of diſcord within his Prouinces. So auaileable to this Monarchy was his long experience & promptitude, that he held the affaires (in eyther condition) both of church and commonwealth, in an vpright ſway of pollicy, were it in peace or warre. And ſo profitable did this people finde their ſubiection & obedience to him, that in all & quite through the body of France, they reuerenced him as their Lord, their Paſtor, and Father.

His care of the Church and Common wealth.

Doe you not know the great vnity which Nature hath planted betweene the Pinnothere and the Pinna? Haue yee not read of the benefit enſuing to them both, by their mutuall concord & intelligence? France hath beene as the Pinna, and the King her Pinnothere. The Pinna is that great great kinde of Cockle, which we vse to call a Naker or Scallop. The Pinnothere is a little creature, in the kinde of a Crabbe or Creuise, that continually stands as a Porter, awayting the opening of the Cockle; which he keeps still wide gaping, vntill such time as he perceiueth some prey to enter, which may be beneficall to them both. For then hee pricks or bytes the Cockle, and shee shutting her shell, they then feede both friendly together. And neuer (without this admonition) doth the Naker shut her shell, nor euer (without the liking of this her Gouernor) will shee admit any strange creature to come neere her.

A strange cõformity betweene the Naker or Scallop, and the Creuise or Crab.

Euen so France, referring herselfe to the managing of the King her Pinnothere, and neuer receiuing any impression but his; she liued with that foode which was apt and naturall for her, and by this reason, she neuer felt in any of her parts and members, those intemperate vile diseases, that heeretofore bred her so many warres and troubles. A great misfortune is it thẽ, when such a precious Iewell is taken from foorth the midst of our Temple, whẽ such a Master and Gouernour is carried away from his people. O decus Israelis in excelsis tuis vulneratus est. O France, the honor of Israel, glory of the Militant church! O Paris, the very faireſt among the Gauls, or in the world, Metropolitane of the goodliest state in Christendome: thou hast seene him wounded in thy streetes, slaine in thy bosome, and parricided inhumanely in excelsis tuis, in thy places most frequented. O vnspeakable mishap! Quomodo proiectus est Clypeus fortium? How is the shield of the mighty cast downe?

The comparison alluded to the Realm of France.

* Timanthes, a most famous Painter among the Grecians, being desirous to portrait a Soldior ful of courage, sprightly in valour, and as fiery as Mars: gaue him all the grace that Arte could deuise vpon his cloth. But afterward, setting it before his doore to bee seene, hee caused foure Trumpets to sound before the Picture, that the person might appeare the more furious and dreadfull. O deare people, if I could worthily, and (according to true life) represent before your eyes, the prouidence, wisedome, and happines of councell, that remained in this Prince; I should then set before ye (one after another) euen all the great and serious assemblies, of the cheefest Heads and Captains of war, and of all other states wherein hee presided. Then shold you see him not like a silly * Nestor by Agamemnon, but Agamemnon himselfe, and (in him) a million of Nestors. If you would see his vigillancy, & the care he had of his State affairs; I should then set before yee (in grosse) the Ambassadors of the greatest Princes, the Courtiers and Postillions flying from all parts, their packets open, their Secretaries standing by, & that magnificent King in the midst, spending many nights together, for the conseruation of them, that soundly slept in their beds at ease. If you would haue a picture from mee, of his mildenesse & clemency; then must I paint a thousand potent enemies, not humbled at his presence, or crouding to his feete, but seated in safety by him, at one and the same Table, in one and the same Caroch, yea, in one and the same bed.

* A most excellent Painter, liuing in the time of Parrhasius of Ephesus.

In breefe, if it were in me to shew you his valour & Non-pareill courage; I shold thẽ here instantly set before ye so ranged battailes, with their Squadrons of armed horse, and Regiments of foote, their Pikes aptly placed, the flame and smoak smouldring from Canons, the noyse of Drums, the sound of Trumpets, and at the maine of euery battailion, this king encouraging his followers to the fight; and then himselfe to giue the onset, & (like a true Mars) beating downe his enemies about him. Then would you say, that you saw a God armed, the terror of the world, the honour of valiancy; euen where Cæsars and Alexanders might well crowd in, there to learn warlike lessons of him. But oh insignall disaster! he being dead: Quomodo ceciderunt potentes? Proiectus est Clypeus fortium? How are the mighty ouerthrowne? And the Shield of the very strongest cast downe?

Both theſe were ioyned together in our Prince. What legerity was that, when in leſſe then two Moneths, like to a flaſh of lightening, hee made himſelfe ſeene through the Prouinces of Picardy, Normandy, Champaine, le Perche, Anion, and Maine? Trayling after him a weighty Army, great ſtore of weapons, Canons, Chariots, and great aboundance of other Artillery. O good God! in how ſhort a time did hee winne more thē 160 Leagues of ground, and ſubiected vnto him (euen in paſſing along) fifteene or ſixteene ſtrong Towns. In diuers other places, what power and magnanimity did appeare in him, euen in his very greateſt difficulties, withdrawing the lighted fires from all the parts of his kingdome. There did he ſhew himſelfe like to another Hercules, being foulded in the skin of his conſtancy and high valour, his moſt tedious trauailes (which ſeemed to him but as Dwarffes and Pigmeis) hee ſtrangled and cruſht them all, euen as if they had beene ſo many Mice or Muſhrumes, that haue no vertue or reſiſtance whatſoeuer. Wherfore O France, we may well ſay of thee, as it was ſometime ſpoken of the people of Iſrael. Nunc Rex graditur ante vos, & pugnabit bella veſtra. Thou haſt now a King that walketh before thee. He ſpared not himſelfe in marching before thee, and this was the man, ordained to terminate the fights and battailes.

1 Reg. 12, 2.

Oh, how many meruailes do I behold, meeting in him all together. Let vs take him in his originall. Albeit he deſcended frō the loynes of the moſt happy S. Lewes, by a long extended Genealogy, wherein there is not any but Kings: yet had he nothing (in his kinde) more abiect and contemptible, then to be ſhut vp in the Pyrenean Dens or Grottes, badly followed by his owne, threatned and purſued by externe accidents, throwne out of his Cradle, and the armes of his Nurſſe, into the Fordge of Mars; wrapt vp in partiality of opinions, which held a high ſayle in his time, and yet doth the like in many places of this Realme. They that fed his hopes, to preuaile thereby, deceiued him: others that thought (by ſuch inſtruments) to ouerthrow him, did the higher exalt him. And perforce muſt I (in this caſe) without looking on the pointes of his conſcience, commend his morall vertues.

King Henry deſcended frō the holy S. Lewes.

Some troubles atteding the courſe of his life.

Achilles, the ſonne of Aeacus, who was to conclude the Troyans greatneſſe, & to ouerthrow their * Illium from the top to the bottome, was long time hid vnder the garment of a woman, among the daughters of Lycomedes. And our great Henry (who was to be a terror to Spain) the prop and ſupport of our French Commonweale, was (in his yonger yeares) euen as hidden vnder the habite of a poore & diſinherited Prince, in the ſolitude of the Bearniſh Lands and Mountaines. But yet notwithſtanding, God had (euen then) deſtined him to be a ſubiect of his wonders, yea, to the cheefeſt dignities, & very greateſt powers of this Land. God I ſay, the great God of hoſts, Per quē Reges regnant, & hath his hands ful of crowns, & beſtoweth them where himſelfe beſt pleaſeth.

* Troy was called Illium of Ilus, who enlarged it greatly.

Reade what Iob ſpeaks of the Oſtrich, & there ſhall you ſee this Prince naturally, euen accordingas deſcription is ther made of her. That Bird (being depriued of wiſedome & loue) without couering her egs, leaues them in the duſt, and ſo loſeth all remembrance of them. The world would be quite bereft of Oſtriches, if God did not play the part of a mother, and by the beames of his bright ſhining Sun, make the duſt warme about the egges, and ſo cauſe the yong to be hatched, to maruaylous fayre and goodly forme. In like manner, our great Henry, was not he forſaken? Left in the duſt of diſfauour, and neglected all the time of his childhood? God had a care of him, notwithſtāding, as purpoſing to make him an Atlas, for the ſupport of his Church, and defence of this State. So that by beholding him ſo much abaſed in his beginning, and afterward ſo highly highly exalted: we haue great reaſon to ſay with the ſame Iob, Lampas contempta ad tempus ſtatutum. A Lambe, whereof no account at all was made; yet ordained for honour, and to be honoured at the time appointed. God would bring him by the paths of aduerſity, to the higheſt place of proſperity, and made his trauailes ſeeme as Mallets, to harden him for ſuch paynes as hee was to endure, for the re-eſtabliſhment of peace and vnity, in all the diuided Prouinces of France.

In euery eſtate, afflictions do make the greateſt perſons, where contrariwiſe, in the midſt of higheſt proſperites (as ſtanding vpon an ouer-ſlippery place) oftentimes they ſooneſt loſe themſelues. We may deduct an example heereof, from a Glaſſe, vpon whoſe Chriſtall, Flies can get no footing (ſaith Plutarch) & yet ſtand firmely on the borderings about it, becauſe they are more rough and apprehenſiue.

And from the ſame ground, it ſeemeth that Homer fetcht his Moly, the rootes whereof were blacke, but it bare fruite of moſt fine gold. So the life of this French Atlas, did ſhew it ſelfe (euery where) to be very blacke in the bud, and wholly obſcured with aduerſity: but the reſt thereof (euen to his vntimely ending) carryed three Flourets of true gold, in an Azure field of heauenly beauty. Afflictions in him, ſerued as an apt ſubiect to * Polycletus and Miron, whereby to mould, carue & forme the true ſhape of Vertue; which was the very fayreſt and moſt goodly Statue, that euer could (by Arte) be imagined.

Let vs inſtantly conceite that happy houre, when wee beheld heauens prouidence to call him from Bearne, and the Bankes of * Garona, and (with goodly Enſignes) to ſhew him the Loire. He being (not long before) ſharply purſued, was then ſought for in the Grottes, many royall Armies (euen then) truſting to his arme: but ſent for (ſoone after) by the K. his brother, Henry the third, whom hee would not forſake at a time of need. Then was it, when France couered ouer with rebellions and Armies againſt her ſelfe, was conſtrained (more then euer before) to approue the ſpirit, wiſedome, and hand of him, who quickly became her Halcyon, to appeaſe and calme thoſe furious tempeſts.

The blowes began at Tours and at Blois, but within few daies the fiery furie of thoſe Souldiers proceeded through Beauſſe, euen to the engirting of Paris: where the execrable and bloody parricide committed on the perſon of the king, opened him the doore to the whole State. The Princes and French Nobility, both proclaimed and acknowledged him to be their king. Meane while, the troubles encreaſing, and the Armies rent (as it were) in many peeces, beheld him (neere hand) as ſoone ſhut vp in Dieppe. But like the Steele that ſtrikes on the Flint, to extort thence the liuely ſparkes of fire: euen ſo, the neerer a warriour is purſued, the more ſplendour is added to his glory.

There liueth a certaine monſter in the Sea, vulgarly called the Scia or Sawe of the Sea, in regard of a horne he hath, ſeruing him in ſtead of a ſnoute, carrying no meane reſemblance with a Sawe. This creature, meeting with a Ship vnder full ſayle, by diuers times of attempting, doth grow angry thereat, and ſeemeth to make open warre againſt it. He paſſeth and repaſſeth many times vnderneath it, imploying his horne (with his vttermoſt ſtrength) to ſawe, as he thinks, and cut in twaine the keele of the Ship. But in vaine doth he torment himſelfe, for ſo long hee vſeth the teeth or razors of his ſnout, till beating himſelfe out of breath in the conflict: at length hee floates on the water with his belly vpward, remaining at the mercy and laughter of the Pilote.

And what great act (I pray ye) did ſo many Armies, as quite couered the plaines of France? They imployed all their endeuour and weapons in vaine, hoping to ſawe in ſunder and diuide this State. After all their malicious wraſtling with this Soueraigne holy Ship, did they not become ennerued and broken in pieces, by the power of this great King her Pilote? Wherefore wee may well ſay, as Velleius Paterculus ſaid of Cato. Virtuti quam ſimillimus, & per omnia ingenio Dijs quam hominibus propior; qui non recte fecit vt facere videretur, ſed quia aliter facere non poterat.

that I fight (would he oftentimes say) but to maintayne the liberty of my Subiects, and preserue my Crowne. And euen so did God fauour his designes, and laide at his feete (myraculously) an infinite number of Trophees. Heere Arques made her most signale surrender. There Yurie published his high fortune. Dijon, Fontaine-Francoise, S. Helena, and the Molets engirt his browes with a thousand Laurels. And for the higher pitch of his honours, the vanquished themselues did (euen then) reioyce at his prosperity and victories. He fought not in one place only at a time but like to a second * Briarius, with an hundred hands, and by his Lieutenants, hee smote as many places together. So that posterity reading his heroycall actions, not onely will make doubt to beleeue thē all, but rather grossely receiue, or repute them for fables.

I will leaue them to our Histories, & to tell ye, that his clemency appearing aboue his other vertues; did make him vniuersally both beloued and admired. O good God! how ready was he alwayes in helpe and subuention to the oppressed? How diligent, in finding out for our diseases, both soueraigne, peculiar, & conuenable remedies? When I cast mine eyes on the gastly Theater of our France, me-thinkes I doe there behold that terrible fight betweene Brutus and the * Xanthians, the very cheefest Inhabitants of Lycia, when they (being besiedged, the fire getting mischeeuously into the crannies of their walles, threatning their neighbors houses, and the whole Citty together with a generall deuastation) in a desperate rage and fury, threw on fresh Faggots, made of dryed Reedes, the more to nourish and augment the flame, whereas Brutus (being their enemy) employed the vttermost endeuour, both of himselfe & all his Soldiors, to slake and qvench it. He sate on horse-backe, full of compassion, essaying by all possible meanes, to take some good order; and turning him round about, hee held out his hands to the vnhappy Inhabitants, desiring them to spare their owne Citty, and to saue themselues.

How many of our blinded French (desperately madded in our last wars) did the very like? What intended those Armes, and hostile preparations in the greater number, but onely the ruine of themselues, and the whole State together? And what was laboured (on the contrary part) by this great King our Brutus? Nothing else, but to preserue his people, aud stifle the fires, furiously flaming in the foure corners of his kingdome; yea, to keepe his people from destroying themselues. This was euer (doubtlesse) the full butt and aime of all his warres, during which time, and euen in the very fiercest broyles, hee was heard to cry aloud in the thickest throngs: O Frenchmen, Frenchmen, saue your selues. And the blood of them, although they were in Armes against him, hee did value at a dearer rate then his owne. An acte truely generous, and which (afterwards) made him so much admired, that they who refused to accept him as their Lord; threw themselues at his feete, and (in endeared loue) called him their gracious Tutor and Father.

A great honour in a king to preserue his people frō spoyling themselues.

Let Paris (onely) stand as a witnesse of my words, which was seene (almost) without Subburbs, without Pallace, with out Vniuersity, or any other Ornament whatsoeuer. The Field of the slothfull man, and the Vineyard of the mis-vnderstanding foole, described by Salomon in his Prouerbs; Which were all ouergrowne with Thornes and Nettles, and their Hedges broken downe, might be compared with it. Our buildings beautified with Porphiry and Marble; his Royall goodly places; his Louures; his Tuilleries; his new Bridges; his Arsenall; the streetes newly reedefied, and adorned with so many new deuices of Silke and Tapistry; the new foundations of publike Readings: these are as so many Trumpets, to publish the loue and vigilancy of this King. Very true is it then, that his life, so obscured and trauersed in the beginning, did well resemble a fire, which in the making, and before it attaineth to any light, doth cast foorth very grosse and thicke smokes: but being fully kindled, it yeeldeth a bright flame, & giueth no meane delight to the beholder. We haue seene his originall to be dimly obscured and darkened with the clouds of enuy. Afterward wee beheld him, not like Iobes despised Lampe, but shining as the Sunne in brightest splendour.

If Emperours haue done any good to the Apoſtolicall See, what deuotion can compare with that of our Kings? Clouis, the firſt Crown-bearer among ſo many kings, offered a Diadem of ineſtimable value, called Regnam, vpon the Altar of S. Peter: the which Diadem, according as ſome of our Hiſtorians haue written, ſerued for the Tiaras to the holy Fathers preſiding in the Church. What ſhall I ſay of Charles Martell, who receiued from Gregory the third, the keyes of the Sepulcher, and the Chaines wherewith S. Peter was bound? was not this done, as acknoledging him the Churches Protector, and yeelding him an honourable ſummination, for defending that holy Toombe, and excellent prerogatiues therto belonging, againſt the fury and inuaſions of the Lombardes? Againſt whom, this Prince began to arme himſelfe, when at the very firſt report of his preparation, the Lombard yeelded, and ſubmitted himſelfe to the holy See.

I cannot let ſleepe in ſilence, the piety of king Pepin, who went twice ouer the Alpes, to check the inſolences of the ſaid Lombardes, againſt Stephen, then ſitting in the ſacred ſeate. There remaineth (yet to this day) an ancient inſcription, engrauen vpon one of the Towers of Rauenna; Pipinus-plus primus amplificandæ Eccleſiæ viam aperuit, &c. Deliuering teſtimony to all Chriſtendome, of that Princes gift and liberality to the Church. Charlemaigne, Philip Auguſtus, *S. VVhereof matter ſufficient is giuen to our Hiſtorians, to make their volumes the more cõpleate, and to Innocentius the third, a worthy ſubiect of writing, in an Epiſtle which he directed Archiepiſcis & Epiſcopis per Galliam conſtitutis, Exaltatio regni Francorum eſt ſedis Apoſtolicæ ſublimatio. And if that execrable and diuelliſh murderer, had not impeached the courſe of the great deſignes, and holy intentions of this King (O France, for whom thou now ſo iuſtly lamenteſt) he had ſhaken the Scepter of the Turke, and we might well haue hoped, to haue ſeene our faire Lillies gliſter in the Church of the Eaſterne Empire, & once more to haue made the true God worſhipped in Paleſtine.

Then, O vnhappy Realme of France, redouble thy ſorrowes, and reuiue the ſourſe of thy teares, as often as thou ſhalt rememremember the death of this Prince. A Prince? yea, thy Shield, and the Shield of the mighty, proditoriously ouerthrowne in the Capitall of his Prouinces. Oh that I could (in this case) according to the māner of a Pegasus, strike with one foote into a fountaine of eloquence, or that the Muses and the Graces meeting together, would giue new motion, or rather new life to my languishing Oration, that I might reach to the point first proposed to my selfe, which was, either to lay open before you the praises of my King, or to let you see his life and heroycall vertues, and how much we are al interessed in his losse. These two attempts were very great, and if I feele my selfe to shrinke vnder the weight of the first, I must needs fall flat thē with the charge of the second. Because the wretchednesse of a priuation can neuer be really vnderstood, but by knowing the excellency of the thing whereof we are depriued; so said (long agoe) a learned Philosopher.

The worth of a Iewell is neuer truely valued till it is lost.

For as a Player of Comedies, may easily bring foorth vpon his Stage, a man of goodly shew, in shape of Hercules, couered with a Lyons skinne, and bearing a long great Club on his shoulder, but yet made light and hollow within, and al this dreadfull appearance, comes nothing neere the vertues and incomparable strength of the true Alcides: Euen so an Oratour may easily produce some grosse description of great Henry, that most inuincible Prince, giuing him golden Armour, mounted on a gallant Courser, attended with Drums and Trumpets, in middest of a confusion of armed men, a thorny wood of Pikes and Lances about him, and as the last ornament of renown, writing with an Eagles quill (yet lagging weary with circkling the world) to make knowne to the two Poles, the admirable battailes wonne by this Monarch, and all this nothing indeed to great Henry the 4. This were no other then a meere phantasma, becaus his inwarde man, with his principall vertues, remained still hidden the viuacities of his spirit, the heates of his generous courage, and that true countenance of Maiesty, which carried on his brow the loue of his subiects, and terrour of his enemies: these are things that strike dumbe all tongues, and are not any way to be declared. The interest and the damage then, which the whole world endureth by his death, can neuer be sufficiently declared. Euery man by himselfe (from the least to the greatest) may frame out his owne discourse, and finde himselfe immeasurably offended: yet all this is nothing else, but as if each man should point with his finger at his owne heart, and no iudgment to be made, whose paine is the most greeuous?

Resemblances differ frō the true substances.

The inward vertues of a man are his true glory.

Sysaganbis, the Mother of Darius, her Neeces and other Persian Ladies wept more extremely for the death of Alexander (saith the History) then did the Greeks and other Macedonians. For he was the common bond of peace, and hee being broken, they found themselues (among all them which he had left) the very weakest, furthest off from succour, and most subiect to the iniuries of warre. Without all question, our sorrow hath bin common through the whole State, for this vnhappy accident, falne vpon the common and publike head. Our Princes pierced throgh with greefe, haue (to the whole world) sufficiently witnessed their affections. But great men stand safest on the boord, the lesser serue as poore Pawnes, & they haue the greatest cause to complaine. That great chaine or bond of peace, which vnited together so many kindes of spirits, is broken in the midst; yet peace and vnity (God be thanked for it) doth still remaine among vs.

Plutarc. in vit. Alexander.

Common afflictions doe not so neerely touch great men, as they do the meaner sort.

As an Arrow shot from a good strong arme, flyeth farre through the ayre, not in regard of his owne proper or naturall wings, but by the Archers vertue who (in the loose) gaue it the vigor of aduantage; euen so our peace as yet continueth by that strength and vertue, which the high vnderstanding and credite of our deceassed king gaue vnto her. If we war against abuses, if vices may be cut off, and vertues replanted; wherefore should not this strong bond be new knit againe? But if they encrease, as they do, look then (deare people) for your danger to be neere. The mighty can daily maintaine themselues; but the weake and feeble, they altogether vndergoe the worst, especially when disorders continue.

In this case, the body of a Commonwealth, and that of a beast do carry some resemblance. For as the members (which are sound) doe not finde themselues so subiect to rheumes or defluctions, but so soone ſoone as they preſent themſelues, do ſend them to the diſeaſed parts: Euen ſo, in a body politike, thoſe great ouerflowinges that engender diſcords, do not ſo neerely touch the ſtrongeſt in the State. Noble men, as being more robuſt & powerfull, know how to hurle ſuch annoyances behinde them, and then their weight fals vpon the vulgar, who are compoſed of ſlendereſt reſiſtance. Who ſeeth not then that the principall intereſt is ours? It is vpon vs that this blow is falne. That fatall knife hath ript open our breſts, and hath ſluced forth our bloode, euen ſo farre as the very furtheſt Nations; who wholy affrighted at ſo damnable an attentate, haue teſtified, that this diſaſter was in common to them, communicating likewiſe in our ſighes and teares.

The murther of a king is no mean motiue of griefe to al neighbouring Nations.

But now wee ſacrifice ouer much vnto griefe, O France! thou muſt giue a breathing time to thy ſorrowes; thy great Henry yet liueth, God hath not left him after ſo many victories; he hath rather ſnatcht him from beneath the armes of a temporal peace, to lodge him in his euerlaſting reſt, & made him change the Scutcheon of his Lillies for an eternal Diademe, the floures whereof are without number and value, and the glory void of any date or limitation. This life hath nothing in propriety; what any man holds here, it is but as a depoſt or pawne, it is but for a ſhort vſance, and a preſent of ſlender continuance. Spuma gracilis, quæ aprocella diſpergitur, ſaith the wiſe man: Fumus qui à vento diffuſus eſt. It is a highway common to kings & ſubiects alike; to the haughty, and to the humble. Omne capax mouet vrna nomen. Death (notwithſtanding he is familiar to vs) yet in his paſſage along, if he hit his foot againſt a ſhepheards cottage only, or if a poore labouring man meet with his ſickle, theſe are blowes that mooue no terror. But contrariwiſe, when he ſmites the greateſt into the bottom of a tomb, when he ſhiuers Crownes in peeces, and breaks royal Scepters with a touch of his Biere, this is that which moueth aſtoniſhment in men; this is that wherin they ſee themſelues, euen as in the cleereſt Chryſtall, beſt repreſenting to the life, the defects of their fraile and wretched nature.

No man in this life hath any certaintie of his abiding

A worthy example for all Atheiſtes to take warning by.

They that haue contemned God al their life time, may take example by Entelidas, loſt in the loue of his owne peculiar excellencies: who afterward becomming a knight of Athens, tooke a Graſhopper in the fields of Egrettum, wherby he learned and came to acknowledgment of his lifes ſhortnes. Wherupon, he builded a houſe of piety, in contempt of himſelfe; wherein bequeathing all his hopes to God only, hee founded life and ſaluation for his ſoule. For, as a goodly Roſe in rainy weather (being prickt with a pinne) will ſend forth a maruellous pleaſing ſauour: euen ſo, al the degrees of a great State, beeing prickt in the death of their K. by the intolerable piercing thornes of bemoning, do then ſend vp to heauen the moſt ſweete Odors of infinite prayers, whereby they procure Diuine bleſſinges to deſcend downe vppon their heads.

All degrees in a State are wounded by the death of their King.

This is alſo the benefite, which (among our teares and laments) we ought to ſeeke for in our loſſe, becauſe euen therin God himſelf hath giuen vs matter, whereby to comfort our ſelues. Set before your conceits, that great deluge of waters, which (in the time of Noah) drowned the whole world. Neuer did heauen before, or ſince, deliuer ſo great a ſign of anger againſt the ſins of men. And yet notwithſtanding, among all the billows and floating of dead bodies aloft on the waters: the height or top of an oliue tree did ſhew it ſelf, wherof the Doue brogh̄t a preſentation to the good old man, as a ſymbol of grace, carrying an aſſured teſtimony, that the ouerflow ſhould ſoone ceaſe, & the Ark be deliuered from all perils whatſoeuer.

In the midſt of moſt violēt extremities, God is then readieſt with his diuine helpes.

The Iſle of Delphos was ſomtime moſt wretched, and yeelded it ſelf to the greedy appetite of the waſting billowes of the ſea; till Apollo was borne there, who made it immoueable, and conſtantly confirmed it againſt all tempeſts. O France! if heeretofore thou haſt bin beaten with ſtormes and the rude windes of diſcord, agitated by the flux and refluxe of ſome vnhappie partialities, what needeſt thou nowe to feare, Cum Rex tuus filius eſt Nobilium? Thy totterings are already paſt, and I ſee thee (for euer) ſetled in the Bay of a moſt bleſſed peace, euen in the armes of thy King, ſo Noble in extraction both by Father and Mother. Vertue and Nobilitie are the beſt pillars to ſupport a kingdome.

In elder times, the Graces were figured holding handes together, teaching men thereby, that a benefit receiued with one hand, ought immediately to be requited with the other: But Kings are ouer-great to attend the returne of ſuch benefites, as they poure out vpon their people. And as for vs, wee are not able to acknowledge them, which haue beene receiued from our good Prince; except in ſeruing him loyally both with hearts and hands, as becommeth moſt faithfull & obedient ſubiects. If that the hand (to our great greefe) hence-forward can do nothing; yet let the heart (as being more powerfull) continue that office, in waiting, vntill it ſhal pleaſe the heauenly Maieſty, to make vs bleſſedly ſee him againe, in the Celeſtiall repoſe of his glory.

CHAP. V.

The Battell of Rauenna:
Which was fought in Italy, in Anno, 1512. betweene Gaſton du Foix, Duke of Namures, Generall for Lewes the xij. King of Fraunce, on the one party: and Raymond de Cardonna, Viceroy of Naples, Generall for the King of Spaine, and Pope Iulio, on the other.

THE Generall of the French Army in Italy, being named Gaſton du Foix, for Lewes K. of France, againſt the Pope and King of Spaine, beeing giuen to vnderſtand that the oppoſit powers for the Pope and Spaniard were marching onward (according to a former paſſed promiſe) for giuing aſsiſtance vnto Marco Antonio of Cardonna, who was beſiedged by him in the Cittie of Rauenna; miſdoubting ſome ſodaine irruption in his politike enemy, brake vp the ſiedge, making a retreate for the ſpace of ſome three miles from Rauenna, as it were to meete with the leagued army. That night they made a bridge ouer the riuer of Roueo, and leuelled the higheſt banks equall with the Riuer, for the eaſier paſſage of the Souldiers in all places. Afterward the 11. day of Aprill, beeing then Eaſter day, the Germane foote ſouldiers made their paſſage ouer this made Bridge of the Riuer: but the ſouldiers appointed for the vaw-ward and middle battell, they went thorow the Foord. As for the rere-ward, being led by Don Iuo de Alegres, and conſiſting of foure hundred bolde reſolued men, they remained ſtill on the riuer bank towardes Rauenna, for better aſſiſting the maine army when neede required, and curbing the Garriſon of Rauenna, if they ſhould preſume to ſally foorth. But for keeping a Bridge (formerly made vppon Montano) hee left a valiant Gentleman, named Paris Scot, with a thouſand foote vnder his charge.

The Authour doth not ſet down the reaſon that v[illegible]d this battaile.

The paſſage of his people ouer the riuer

All things being ordered in this maner, his battailes were raunged in this order. The vant-gard, that had the great Artillery before them, conſiſting of 700. horſe, beſide

In what manner he ordred and ranged his ſeuerall battailes, in expectation of the enemie beſide Germane foote, led by the Duke of Ferrara, and the Seneſchall of Normandy; this power was placed on the bank of the riuer, beeing then on the right hand, whereby the foot troopes flanked the left wing of the horſe. Somewhat nere to the vantgard, the foot appointed for the mid battalion, being partly Gaſcoignes, and the reſt of other Prouinces in France, tooke their charge, and Don Iuo de Alegres was their Commander. Further remote from the Riuer banke, the reregarde had theyr place, being in number fiue thouſād foot and all Italians, vnder the conduct of Frederico de Bozzolo: and this battel was flanked by all the Archers mounted on horſbacke, and other light horſemen, amounting to three thouſand.

The Councel of Piſa leuyed forces againſt the Pope.

Theſe battailes were not ordered to rere one another, but in the ſhape of a Creſſant or halfe Moon, and directly behinde them were marſhalled ſix hundred well appointed horſe; conducted by Seigneur de la Palice, and the Cardinall Sanſeuerino, Legate for the Councell of Piſa, who bent their intentions againſt the Pope. He was a man of no meane conſtitution, full of heate and courage, armed Cap a pie in faire bright glittering Armor, and meeter (in deede) for the office of a Commander in field, then to ſupply the place of a Cardinall. As for Gaſton du Foix, ayming onely at honour and victory, he would not betake himſelfe to anie particular charge in the Campe; but ſelecting ſom thirty choiſe Gentlemen, ſuch as he thought fit to ſhare with him in his beſt fortune of the day; wandered at liberty, as to bee prouident in all places, and for the readier helpe, where neede ſhould require.

Gaſton du Foix, a man of eſpeciall note from all the reſt.

He was the man of beſt marke amongſt them all, not onely in regard of his ſplendant Armes, but likewiſe for his ſprightly countenance, dreadfull carriage, & reſolution no way to be daunted. Hauing ranged his battalions into ſuch due form, as nothing wanted but the ſignal for fight aduancing himſelfe on the bay of the Riuer, where beſt he might haue attention, and animate his army with boldeſt ſpirit, more eloquently then Souldier-like (as ſome ſuppoſe, thus he ſpake.

The Oration of Gaſton du Foix, before the fight, to his whole Armie.

Mr Fellow-Souldiers, the thing which you haue ſo long coueted & deſired, to wit; to encounter the enemy in an open champaign grou̅d: behold how Fortune hath this day bleſt yee withall, as not forgetting her former Motherly care of ye, in many a famous and well-won victory. See what a gracious opportunity is heere preſented to ye, ſuch as precedent times, nor memory of man hath euer acknowledged, victory houering ouer your heades, embracing ye within the very winges of her bounty, not onely for * Rauenna it ſelf, fully and meerely proſtrated to your power: but likewiſe all the Townes and Citties of * Romania, though but ſlender attributes of recompence to your high deſerts, yet as an earneſt of her further intended fauour vnto ye. For, finding Italy naked and emptie, not a man left to ſtand or encounter with ye: what ſhall hinder your marching on to Rome it ſelfe? Seeme as if (euen now) you ſaw your entrance into it; and conſider withall, the boundleſſe wealth of that gripple and greedie Court (for many ages together) haled & violently torne, euen out of the bowelles of poore abuſed people, and iuſtly ordained now, to be at your mercie as pillage and ſpoile. Proud Ornaments, Siluer, Gold, precious Stones, all in heapes, and numberleſſe ſummes, beſide moſt rich and ſumptuous priſoners, you may already plead full poſſeſſion of, the wide world ſtanding amazed at your fortunes. And Rome thus being yours, Naples lies fairely before ye, inuiting ye to com thether with the ſame ſucceſſe, and there to reuenge your manifold iniuries.

When I conſider your valour, fortune, & famous victories, woon within the compaſſe of ſo few dayes; when your manly lookes, and more then manly actions, do quicken my memory, that there is hardly one among yee, but hath made good proofe of his courage, by apparant and pregnant teſtimony of his great ſpirit: there is not any obiection whatſoeuer, to foreſtall the aſſured felicitie of victorie. What are our enemies, but the verie ſame Spaniards, that (meerely vpon our coming) fled fled by night out of *Bologna? Nay more, they are the same white-liuer'd men, that (not many daies since) escaped our swordes by base running away, sculking within the wals of Imola and Fauentza, or the neighbouring mountains. They are a nation that neuer durst fight with our armies in the Neapolitan kingdom, in any place of indifferencie or easie accesse, but euermore vpon aduantage, beeing supplied with munitions, riuers, and ditches, as relying more on close hid ambushes & treacheries, then on any iot of manhood or valor.

*An ancient City by the Adriatick ſea
*A very ſpacious & fruitfull countrey.

*A Towne of Campania in Italy.

*A City in Italy cald sometime Forum Cornely.

And yet let mee further tell yt concerning these Spaniards, that they are not those tried and ancient wel-skild seruitors in the Neapolitane wars, but meere fresh-water souldiers, vtterly without skill or experience, neuer fighting against other weapons of resistance, but Bowes, Arrowes, & the blunted Launces of the Moores. And yet notwithstanding, by that timorous people, weake in body, worse in spirit, wanting knowledge in armes and military actions, they were (with great shame) ouerthrowne the last year in the Isle of Gerba. And there this very man, Don Pedro de Nauarro, one of so great note & name amog them, that by taking himselfe to his heeles, hee deliuered a notorious testimony of the difference betweene the beating downe wals with shot and powder, & fighting with true fortitude & hardment. See, how they are shut vp within a ditch, made this last night, euen in meere trembling feare, & how their foot are couered with a rampier, consisting of Carriages & hooked waggons, as meaning to try the battel with those childish instruments, & not with the Marrow, Muscles, and Arteries of men, or with the chearfull viuacity of spirit. Make no doubt (deare hearts) but our great Ordenance shal driue them out of their holes, and beate them to the open field: where they shall plainly perceiue, that the power of the French, the courage of the Germanes, and vnconquerable resolution of the Italians, doth go far beyond the cunning subtilties of the Spaniards. The greatest obscuring of our glory, is that we ouermatch them in nũber being (very neere) twice as many as they. Neuertheles, seeing fortune hath bin so bountifull to vs, it were indiscretion not to make vse of so happy a benefit, which will rather be imputed to temerity and improuidence in them, then to any cowardly aduantage in vs. Nor doth courage or valour incite them on, but the authority of Fabritio de Colonna, in his rash promise made to Marco Antonio; or rather the iustice of heauen hath thus prouoked them, to the end, that the pride and vnspeakable heynous actions of Iulio, that false and counterfet Pope, as also the deceitfull treacheries of the King of Arragon, may haue condigne and worthy punishment.

But why waste I time in so many words? Or why should this victory be so long kept from ye, by circumstantial speeches in a skilesse Oration, vtterly needlesse for souldiers of vndanted spirit? March on then, my valiant fellowes in armes, with full assurance, that this day I shal giue the whol Empire of Italy to my King, & the wealthy spoyle among you all. I, your Captaine and Commander, will bee present with you in euery place; and, as I euer haue done, so this day more especially wil I oppose my life vnto al perils, rather then a man of ye shall miscarry. Nay, I shall repute my self for the most fortunate Captain that euer was seeing that by this dayes victory, I shall not onely make my soldiers most glorious, but the richest of all other Armies, within the compasse of three hundred yeares.

Nauarro was Generall of the Spanish footmen, a man of great skil in vndermining.

This Oration ended, and the aire eccho-ing the noise of Drums & Trumpets, the Spaniards espying the French past the riuer, in this maner they ranged their battailes. The vantgard, consisting of 800. horse, and conducted by Don Fabritio de Colonna, stood placed along the banke of the riuer, wherto was added 600. foot on the right hand. Likewise along the Riuer, stood the middle battel of 600. horse, being flanked with 4000. foot, the Viceroy being the Leader therof, & with him the Marquesse of Paluda, as also Iohn de Medici, legat to the Pope. Moreouer, along the same riuer bank stood the rereward, conducted by Carualal a Spaniard; & in that battell were 4000. horse, and 4000. foot. Al the light horsmen (whose General was Danalos, Marques of Pescara, a very yong Gentleman, but of exceeding great hope guarded the right side of the foot behind, for succoring any part that fainted. The great Ordenance was placed in the front of the horse, & Don Pedro de Nauarro General of the Spanish foote, accompanied with 500. horse, had not any place of certainty, but had planted at the ditch in the front of the foot, 30. waggons, like to the crooked Chariots vsed in ancient time. Whereon he had placed field pieces, and very long Boares speares, for easier sustaining the furious feaze and charge of the French.

How the battalions of the Spaniards were ranged in the field.

Both sides stand in expectation of battell.

In this order they expected the assault & charge of their enemies strong army, with in the munitiō of the ditch, but this councel, as it profited nothing in the end; so in the very beginning it appeared to be pernitious. For it was the mind of Fabritio de Colonna, to inuade the enemies, so soon as they began to come ouer the Riuer; as thinking it more commodious to incounter with one only part of the enemies, thē to abide in the camp, defenced but with a single ditch. But when Don Pedro de Nauarro (whose councel the Viceroy followed as Oracles) repugned this aduice: it was decreed (though nothing prouidently) that they should be suffered to passe ouer the riuer. The French being com within 200. paces of the ditch, stayed; perceyuing that their enemies, kept themselues within their camp, not stirring any further least they should giue their enemies such aduantage, as themselues desired to haue.

Much harme done by the great Ordenance on eyther side.

For more then two houres, both the armies were thus at a stand, but no meane store of shot came from the great Ordenance all that while on either side, whereby the French foote endured great detriment. For Nauarro had planted his artillery in such a place, as he might at his pleasure hurt them; but the Duke of Ferrara made great hast, & brought his Artillery in the rere of the army, to another wing of the French, where the archers on horsback were planted, which wing, in regard that the army stood in the form of a cressent, was (welneere) on the rere of the enemies; from whence he beganne cruelly to flank their sides, especialy of the horse, for the Spanish foot being brought by Nauarro, into a low place along the rampier of the riuer, & (by his command) laid flat on the ground, could no way be iniuried by the shot. Fabritio called out aloud, and vrged the Viceroy by messengers often sent to begin the battel, before they were torn in pieces by the great Ordnance. But Nauarro being guided by peruerse ambition would not agree therto. For, in regard he had promised himselfe victory, only thorow the valor of the Spanish foot, yea, & although al the rest of the army wer slain, yet he imagined, that his glory would bee the more augmented, the more ỳ harmes were heaped on the rest of the army.

The wilfull obstinacie of Don Pedro de Nauarro.

By this time, the men of armes and light horse, had endured so great a slaughter, as it could be no longer born: and as a most miserable & dreadful spectacle, here horses, there men from off those horses, fell down dead, and heads & arms being torn from the rest of the body, were seen flying aloft in the aire, whereat Fabritio beganne thus to exclaime. And must we all (quoth he) dy here shamefully, by the wilful peruerses of one Marano? Must this army be vtterly lost, and not one enemy slaine by vs? Where are our so many Trophees ouer the French? Must the honor of Spaine and Italy perish, for one only Nauarro?* No sooner had he spoken these words, but without staying for the signal, or any command frō the Viceroy, he droue his horsmen ouer the ditch whom the rest of the horse following, Nauarro was forced presently to giue the signal to his Regiment, & they rising with violent fury, encountred the Germanes, who were by this time come verie neere them. So the battels being met pelmel on all sides together, it was wonderful to behold; & surely this battel was the greatest that euer Italy had seene in many yeares: becausse that at Tarro was hardly any thing elsse, but a strong encounter of horse. And the battels in the kingdom of Naples were rather disorderings of array, or rash attempts, thē deseruedly to be termed battels. And at Giaradaedda, the smallest part of the Venetians power had fought: but heere two potent armies fought with harts firmly combined, either to vanquish or dy. Being enflamed, not only by perill, glory, and hope; but also mutuall hatred, which ỳ seuerall nations bare each other. In the encounter of the German foot with the Spaniards two Colonels of great fame the one named Iacob Emser, a German, & Zamudo a Spaniard, fought as if it had bin by way of challenge, before the fronts of the battailes: in which fight, the Spaniard killing his enemie, became the conqueror. The horsemen of the Confederates, were not compareable to them of France; beside that day they had bene so endamaged, and meerely torne by the great Ordenance, that they were thereby made farre inferiour. So that, after they had a while sustayned the force of their enemies, rather by stoutnes of stomacke, then strength of body, and Alegres sending for Palice with the rereward, and the thousand foote also left at Montona; they were charged on all sides. Beside,

This battel of Rauenna was termed the most terrible and dreadfull battell.

Fabritio

Fabritio de Colonna fighting very valiantly, had bin taken by the Duke of Ferraraes Soldiers. Wherefore, seeing themselues no longer able to hold out against the enemies fury, & enstructed also by the example of their Captaines, turned their backs likewise. For the Viceroy and Caruaiall, neuer tarrying the vttermost triall of valour in their Souldiers, fled; leading away with thē the rereward, almost whole and vntoucht. With them also fled Antonio de Leua, a man (as then) of mean condition; but afterward being exercised in all degrees of martiall seruices, became a very famous Generall.

The flight of the Viceroy and Caruaial, and Antonio de Leua.

Now all the light horsemen were ouerthrowne, and Pescara their Captaine, welltring in blood & wounds, was taken also, and so was the Marquesse of Paluda, who brought the second battail into the fight, through a field of ditches, bushes, & bryars, which much disordered the aray. Beside, the field was couered wholly (as it were) with the mangled bodies of men & horses, which proued no small hinderance to them. But yet the Spanish foote being forsaken of the horsemen, fought with incredible fiercenes. And although they had bin somwhat repulsed, at their first encoūtring with the Germanes, by reason of the strong ranks of Pikes: yet after they came within the reach of their Swords, many of the Spaniards (being couered with their Targets) got between the legs of the Germanes, wounding them in those disarmed parts with their Daggers, and so committing a very great slaughter among them, atrayned (almost) to the midst of the battaile. Among whom the Gascoigne foot, hauing won the way betweene the Riuer and the Rampier, had sharply charged the Italian foote, who although they had sustained great losse by the Ordenance playing hotly vpon them, yet they had vtterly expelled them, if Alegres had not giuen a fresh and violent charge on them with his horsemen, & with greater force thē good fortune. For when he saw his Son Viuerroes slaine in his sight, and almost at the very first encounter, he, vnwilling to suruiue, after a losse so great and greeuous; ranne in with his horse, euen among the thickest of his enemies, and fighting like a most valiant Captaine, after hee had slaine many, was slaine himselfe.

The Italian foote, when they could no longer hold out against so great a multitude, began to shrink: but part of the Spaniards comming to their succor, they kept stil in the battaile, and the German foote, oppressed by the other part of the Spaniards, could scatsely stand vp any longer. But now, all the Spanish troopes of horse being put to flight, Gaston du Foix, with a great multitude of his horsemē, set freshly on the Spaniards, and they, retiring rather, then driuen out of the field, marching in good array, and in no part broken, took the way lying betweene the Riuer & the high banck, going in an equall pace, with their Front very thicke of men, and repelling the French with the strength therof, began to retire, and orderly depart out of the field. Which Nauarro beholding, was more desirous of death then life: & therefore not departing out of the battaile, was takē prisoner. But high-minded du Foix, not brooking to see the Spanish foote march thus away safely, & (Victors-like) with their whole rankes vnbroken, perceiuing also, that the victory was imperfect, vnlesse they were broken as well as the rest; in a vehement fury, he charged on their rere with a troop of horse. But he beeing immediately enclosed in among mong them, and throwne off from his horse, or (as others say) oppressed with the flundering of his owne horse, was slaine with a Pike thrust into his side. And doubtlesse, if they ought to wish for death (according as common opinion is) that haue attained to the highest degree of felicity: then assuredly, the death of this noble Gentlemen was most vnfortunate, hauing gotten so glorious & eminent a victory. He dyed a very yong man, hauing now won (among all mē) immortall fame, because within the space of 3 Moneths, (being a Generall, almost before he was a Soldier) with incredible celerity & good successe, he had gotten so many glorious victories. The Lord Lautrech (his Cousin german) hauing receiued twēty greeuous wounds, lay beside him, well neere dead; but being carried to Ferrara, was saued, by the diligent care and cure of good Chyrurgions. Thus through the death of noble Du Foix, the Spanish foote were suffered to march away without impeachmēt. The rest of the Army was put to flight, all the bag and baggage taken, together with their Ensigns & Ordenance: as also the Popes Legate, Iohn de Medicis, Fabricio de Colonna, Nauarro, the Marquesse of Paluda, Bitonto and Pescara, and manie other Princes, the cheefe of the Nobilitie, and men of best name among the Spaniardes and Neapolitans. The number of them that were slaine in this battell, is altogether vncertaine, yet among the variety of many reports, most do affirme, that (on both sides) there were slaine ten thousand at the least, whereof the third part vvere French, and the rest made vp among their enemies. But without all controuersie, the losse on the victors side was farre the greater, by reason of the death of Du Foix, Alegres, and many of the French Nobility, as also of Iacob Emser, and other the valianteſt Captaines of the German foot, to whose valour and manhood this victory (bought with such a deere effusion of blood) was chiefly attributed.

The number of men that were slain on both sides.

Moreouer, many Captains of the Gascoignes and Piccards (which Nations lost that day all their glory amõg the French) were slaine with Mounsieur Molard: but the death of Du Foix surpassed all other losses, with whom the courage, strength, life, and fiercenes of that army was vtterly extinguished. The greatest part of the vanquished, that escaped from the battel, fled to * Cesena, & from thence to further places: neither did the Viceroy stay any where, vntill he came to Ancona, whether he brought but very few of his followers. For, the Duke of Vrbine, not onely rayſed vp the Countrimen against them, but also sent souldiers to doe the like in Pesaro; onely they escaped safe, that passed thorough the Florentines Dominions.

And although after this battell, the victor Army tooke and sacked Rauenna, yet within very short time after, when the couetous Treasurer of Normandie (to saue charges) had dismissed the Italian Soldiers; and part of the men of Armes vvere returned for France, and the Emperor had reuoked the Germanes: they were (by a new Army of Switzers that came in the Popes ayde, and with whom also ioyned the Venetians) quite dispossessed of the whole Dukedome of Millaine, and all that euer the French King had beside in Italy.

CHAP. VI.

What they were whom the world tearmed by the name of the Sibillaes; Of their Propheſies: but more principally of those things which they spake concerning Christian Religion.

THe History of the Sibils, is generally held to be very certaine, because euery one (almost) knoweth, that they foretold and propheſied many things. Neuertheleſſe, to know when, whence and what they were, what they did, & at what times they wrote and propheſied, is most familiar to him that hath read ancient and authenticall bookes. It made me therefore the more willing, to make a Collection of their history, and so much the rather, because it is a matter of no meane maruel, to contemplate the gift of Propheſy, which God gaue to those women in diuers manners. But particularly to propheſie of the comming of Christ, of his life, of his passion, and other great mysteries of our holy faith: these we do purpose to speake of briefly, to the end, ỳ the Ethnicke Pagan may not any way excuse himself (althogh he will reade but his owne bookes onely) no more then the Iew in reading his, and will not accept nor beleeue our faith. I write this the rather, because (by common consent) those bookes were receyued among all the Gentiles, and the Sibillaes credited, especially by the Romanes, who in all theyr affayres and neceſſities had stil their recourse to the Sibilline bookes, and tooke their best and most serious counsels from them.

All Historians, both Greeke & Latine haue written of them: our intent then shal best fit it selfe, without selecting so great a number, to make choise of the cheefest, the better to auoide prolixity, & set them down in some orderly maner. Diodorus Siculus, Pliny, Solinus, Seruius, Martianus Capellus, Lactantius Firmianus, Elianus, Suidas Strabo, Marcus Varro, Virgil, with the soundest part of al the Poets. The first was of Persica, named Samberta, of whom Nicanor maketh great mention, euen he that wrot the actions of great Alexander. Others say, that shee was of Chaldea, & others, that she was a Ieweſſe, borne in a town seated nere to the red sea, called Noa. Her father was named Berosus and her mother Erimantha: she composed 24. bookes in verse, wherein she recounted wonderful things, concerning the coming of Christ, his life, and miracles. But yet they were vnder concealement, and deliuered with an artificiall obscuritie, which was not to be vnderstoode of euerie one: whereto al the other Sibillaes conformed themselues. So that Lactantius Firmianus without particularizing any one of them, describeth their particular Prophesies of Christ Saint Augustine maketh a summary of some things, which this woman and the rest said of Christ, and (among other) these very wordes.

Lact. Fir. in diuin. instit. lib. 4

The prophesie of Sibilla Persica, concerning christ

He shall be taken by the wicked handes of vnbeleeuers, and they shall giue him blows on the face with their sacrilegious hands, & spet on him with their foul polluted mouths: And he shall giue them his shoulders, suffering thē to be whipped, and he holding his peace, without speaking any word, they shall thereby not know whence his words came. He shall likewise be crowned with thorns, giuing him gall to eat, & vinegar to drink. Behold what feasting they shal make for him: so that thou blind and ignorant people, thou shalt not know thy God, conuersing among men. But shalt crown him with thornes, prouiding for him vinegar & gall. Again, the veile of the Temple shall be rent, & the plaine bright day at noone, shall be like night, obscured or darkened for the space of three houres. And when he hath bin in hel, he shal returne to life, and rise againe.

These words are so pregnant, that they are the very proper tearmes of the Euangelists writing on Christ, and the verie same that the Prophets propheſied, especially Esay, whereunto our holy Church giueth absolute beleefe. Beside, these Propheſies of the Sibillaes, are deriued frō the writings of Lactantius, S. Augustine, and Cicero, from Marcus Varro, & other Authors of the Gentiles, who dyed before the birth of Christ, as Lactantius approueth. And say moreouer (of thēselues) that they said, That he shall raise the dead; The lame & impotent shall walke and runne soundly; the deafe shall heare; the blind shall see; the dumbe shall speake plainly. A little farther is added, With fiue loaues & two fishes, hee shall feede fiue thousand men in the wilderneſſe: and that which remaineth, shal serue for satisfaction to the hope of manie. Thus farre for the first Sibilla.

Her words agreeth with the Prophets and Euangelists.

Lact. Firm. in diuin Instit. lib 4. cap. 15.

2. Sibilla Libica Euripid. in Pro. Lam.

The second, they say, was a Natiue of Libia, and therefore named Sibilla Libica. Of her is large mention by Euripides in his Prologue called Lamia.

3. Sibilla Delphica, called also Themis, Chrisippus in Lib diuin Plin. in l. 7. c. 9.

The third named her selfe Themis, and was sirnamed Delphica, in regard that she was borne at Delphos. Of her speaketh Chrisippus, in his booke of Diuination: & this woman (according to Pliny) the Romans made a Statue vnto, and shee liued before the destruction of Troy: so that Homer hath set downe in his workes, manie verses concerning her. Diodorus Siculus saith, that she was called Daphne, and was daughter to Tiresias, and that the Argiues hauing subdued Thebes, they sent her to Delphos, where afterward shee became a Prophetesse in the oracle of Apollo; so that (according to his relation) in that respect she was called Delphica.

Diodor. Sicul. in lib. 4 cap 14.

4. Sibilla Cumæa, or Italiana.

The fourth was named Cumæa, or Italiana, & not Cumana Amalthea, of whom we shall haue cause to speake anon. She was a natiue of Cimeria, a City of Campania, neere to Cuma. Her learned and iudicious Propheſies, are written by Neuyus in the Punicke Bookes, and by Pisonius in his Annales, and referred by Lactantius, and by Virgil in his Eglogue, which beginneth Sicelides musæ, &c.

5. Sibilla Erythræa.

The fift was that so famously remēbred Sibilla Erythræa, who so clearly (by Gods assistance) propheſied the greater part of our Religion. Vvherefore as Lactantius sayeth; In times long since, those Gentiles reputed it as folly, & a defect of braine, to talke of the Sibillaes verſes: becauſe they vnderſtood not how it might bee, that a virgin ſhould haue a childe; and other ſupernaturall things which they wrote, beeing declared in Bookes of ancient Hiſtorians and Poets. Appollodorus writeth of this Sibilla, that the Greekes going to beſiege Troy, ſhee propheſied to them that Troy ſhould be deſtroyed. Wherfore, all thoſe that ſpeake of her, make her more ancient then the deſtruction of Troy: yet Euſebius maketh her more nouell, for hee woulde haue her liue at ſuch time as Romulus lyued in Rome. And Strabo ſaith, that ſhe liued in the time of Alexander the Great. The Verſes of this Sibilla Erythræa, are recited by Euſebius; the firſt words whereof, being traduced into our language, are thus: Ieſus Chriſt, Son of God, the Sauiour: which is a moſt admirable thing to think on. The conſideration of thoſe verſes, and their further addition, are ſet downe by S. Auguſtine, in his 18. Booke of the City of God, deliuering it in theſe expreſſe words.

The propheſies of Sibilla Erythræa.

The earth ſhall ſweate, a ſigne of iudgement; from Heauen ſhall come a King, who ſhall be King for euer: and further, known in humane fleſh, to the end, that by his preſence he ſhall iudge the world. By which meanes, the incredulous, as well as the faithfull ſhall ſee God with their eyes, exalted amõg his Saints. And in the end of the world, the ſouls of men ſhall appeare in their owne fleſh, and hee ſhall iudge them himſelfe, when the rotunditie of the inculted earth, ſhall be full of clods of duſt and graſſe. Men ſhall caſt away Idols and Images, and all their Iewels and riches. He ſhal penetrate the inferiour parts, and breake the gates of the dareſt hell. Then ſhall fayre and cleare light be giuen to the Saints, & the flame of eternal fire ſhall burne the Wicked. All ſecrets ſhall be diſcouered, euery man ſhal be knowne of his companion: and GOD ſhall diſcouer the Conſciences and hearts of all. There ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth, and the Sunne and the Starres ſhal bee darkned; the heauens ſhal breake, and the Moone loſe her light; the mountains ſhal be humbled, and the valleyes made equal with the hilles. There ſhall not be any thing in the world that ſhalbe higher or lower one thẽ another: mountaines and valleyes ſhall be euen and plain, & all things ſhall finiſh. The earth ſhall be dryed, and conuerted to duſt, Wels, ſprings, and riuers ſhall burne, and with the ſame fire ſhal the earth, ſea, and ayre, be burned alſo. Then from heauen ſhall ſound a Trumpet, with a dreadfull and horrible ſound, and the earth in opening, ſhall diſcouer the darkeneſſe and confuſion of hell, and the paines & torments of the miſerable damned.

Theſe things, and many more beſide, are ſpoken of this Sibilla in thoſe Verſes, declaring clearly Chriſt God incarnate, with the laſt iudgement, and reſurrection of the dead. Now theſe things, before they came to paſſe, were no way intelligible; & that was the reaſon, why the Ethnickes and Gentiles might holde them to be follies and mockeries. In like manner, this Sibilla Erythræa, knowing well that which ſhould happen, concerning her owne ſelfe, ſpake theſe words: They vvill repute me for a blind & mocking propheteſſe. Neuertheleſſe, when thoſe things vvhich I ſpeak ſhal be accompliſhed and verified, they will remember me, and no more tearme me a lyar, but a Prophetes of the Great God.

Sibil. Erythræa her propheſie of her ſelfe.

The Romans had great ſtore of the verſes written by this Sibilla Erythræa, whereof Feneſtella ſpeaketh more at large, and ſaieth; That by a decree of the Senate, they ſent Ambaſſadors vnto her, in regard of her Propheſies: and that they brought backe great ſtore of her verſes, which they laid vp in the Capitoll, with them which they had before. She was borne in Erythræa in Ionia, a Prouince of the leſſer Aſia, and abutting vpon Caria: this I relate the rather, becauſe there are found many other Cities to be of that name; as one in Lybia, another in Bœtta, another in Locris, and another in the Iſle of Cyprus. But that ſhee was of that Erythræa in Ionia, Strabo is my Author, and ſaith, That it hath a Port on the ſea, neere to a Mountaine.

Feneſtel. in lib. 3 de For.

*A City in Aſia neere vnto Chios.

Strabo in lib. 4.

Another Sibilla, being the ſixte, was borne in a place named Phiton, in the Iſle of Samos, which is in the Ægæum ſea, nere to Thrace: or elſe in the other Iſle of Samos in the ſame ſea, and oppoſite againſt Epheſus, for which cauſe, ſhee was called Sibilla Samia, of whom further mention is made by Eratoſtenes.

6. Sibilla ſamia Eratoſtenes.

The ſeauenth in order, is Sibilla Cumana, named Amalthæa; others call her Demophila; and Suidas tearmeth her Hierophyla. Shee was called Cumana, becauſe ſhee dwelt and propheſied in the Citie, of Cuma in Italy, a Prouince of Campania, neere vnto * Baiæ. Of this woman man writeth Dionisius Halicarnasseus, Solinus, Aulus Gellius, and Serutus. This Sibilla brought to sell to Tarquinius, the proud King of Rome, nine seueral books; neuertheless, Suidas saith, that it was to Tarquinius Priscus. For which Books, she demanded three hundred peeces of gold, monie then of great value: but because the price seemed excessiue to the king, he would not buy them. Whereupon, she burned three of them in his presence, and yet demanded the same summe for the six that remained. Then the King thought her motion to be more impertinent then the former, and seemed to mocke her: whereupon she burned three more of the sixe, and told him, that she had but three left of the nine, and yet he should giue her as much for those three, as if hee had bought them all. The King being amazed at this her confident determination, and conceiuing (by good aduice) that those Bookes must needs containe some extraordinary great mysteries; bought the three at that price, which formerly she demanded for them all, and those Bookes were placed in the Capitoll, where they were held in soueraigne reuerence & veneration.

7. Sibilla Cumana.

*A pleaſant City in Campania on the Seaſia.

Nine Books brought to Tarquinius Superbus to be sold, by this Sibilla Cumana.

Plin. in lib. 9. cap. 4.

Pliny saith, that she had but 3 Bookes in all, and that she burned two of them, & yet would haue as much for that one, as for all the three. But it sufficeth, that those Books were kept in great reputation, with them that the Romanes had of the other Sibillaes. For as Marcus Varro reporteth from Lactantius; the Romanes bestowed great cost and paines, in searching all Cities and Townes of Greece, Asia, and Italy, and brought to Rome all the Verses & Prophesies, that could bee recouered of the Sibillaes; especially those of Sibilla Erythræa, for the care and safe keeping of which Bookes, fifteene men were particularly appointed, and none other but they might touch them. Festella sayeth, that when the Capitoll was burnt, the Senate sent againe, to entreate Sibilla Erythræa, to helpe them in those Bookes. In which respect it is to bee presumed, that they had not at Rome the Bookes of Sibilla Cumana onely, but likewise al the rest. And that Sibilla, whereof Virgill maketh mention in the beginning of his 6 Book, who kept herselfe at Cuma, where (he sayeth) Æneas tooke shipping; must needs be the other Cumæa, whereof we haue already spoken. For it can be no way likely; that Virgil should suppose a Sibilla, at such time as Aeneas entred into Italy, nor that she liued till the fist King of Rome. Beside, Seruius interprets the same passage, saying. Or else it must needs be, that shee who sold the Bookes, was named Cumana, although it was not her name, and yet notwithstanding, she dyed in that Citty.

Virgil. in Aen. lib. 6.

Seruius in lib. 3 cap. 9.

The eight Sibilla, is said to be a natiue in the Territory of Troy, in a place named Marmisa, and this woman is reputed to be very ancient. For * Heraclides Ponticus saieth, that she liued in the time of Solon the Philosopher, and of the great King Cyrus.

8 Sibilla Hellespontia.

* Hee was scholler to Plato and Aristotle.

The ninth Sibilla, diuers Authors doe report to be of the Country of Phrygia, and that shee propheſied in the Citty of Ancyra; of which name were two Cities, one in Phrygia, and the other in Galatia.

9 Sibilla Phrygia.

The tenth Sibilla, named herselfe Albunea, and was borne in the Citty of * Tibur, which standing sixteene miles distant from from Rome, shee therfore was tearmed Sibilla Tiburtina.

10 Sibilla Tiburtina.
* A Citty of the Sabines 16 miles from Rome.

Now, all these Sibillaes left many Bookes and Verses, wherein they propheſied of things that were to come, & principally of the fortunes of Rome, were they good or bad: so that in all important affaires, the Romanes would diligently search, and turne ouer the leaues of the Sibilline Bookes, and order their gouernment wholly by them. And in the same manner, as when wee would haue our speeches credited, we vse to say, this is Gospell: so would they say, these are the words of Sibilla; such was their credite & account among them. And for this cause Iuuenall said,

The Romans respect of the Sibilline Bookes.

Credite me vobis folium recitare Sibillæ.

Iuuenall. Virgil. in Aenid. lib. 6.

Heereupon some said, that the Sibillaes gaue their answeres, written vpon leaues of Trees, as Virgill witnesseth in his sixt Booke. Cicero speaketh of those Sibillaes with great reuerence, saying: As wee haue formerly done, euen so from the capitall Letters of their Verses, we may deriue, great, good, and gracious sentences.

Cicero in Diuinat. lib 2.

Among many other things, they haue spoken much of Christian Religion, concerning the birth, life, and death of Iesus Christ, as we haue already declared. Sibilla billa Delphica ſaid, The Prophet ſhall be borne of a Virgin, without any fleſhly copulation. Another ſaid: Hee that is to come, ſhall come, and ſhall reigne in pouerty, concealing his Soueraignty, and ſhall come from the wombe of a Virgin. And Ioſephus (although he was a Iew by race and profeſſion) ſpeaking of the Tower of Babylon, hath theſe words. Sibilla well remembred it, when ſhe ſaid thus. At ſuch as men hauing but one Language, ſome of them ſhall build a very high Tower, as if thereby they would mount vp to Heauen: God ſhal (euen then) ſend great windes to deſtroy it, and diuers Languages ſhall happen among the workmen, and therefore is the Tower named Babylon.

The acknowledgment of the Sibillaes writings.

Theſe things, and others ſuch like, were written by the Sibillaes, and acknowledged both by Chriſtians, Iewes, and Gentiles, which the Gentiles (for their ſinnes) ſcarſely vnderſtood. But it fell out well for chriſtians afterward, into whoſe hands theſe Bookes came, as Lactanſius, Euſebius, S. Auguſtine: the knowledge of which Bookes, or the leaſt part of their Propheſies greatly confirmed the Chriſtian, and quite confounded the Pagane and Gentile. There is report made of ſome other, who were alſo named Sibillaes, becauſe they were reputed to be Diuinereſſes and Propheteſſes: as Caſſandra, the daughter of King Priamus, and Campuſia Celophania, the daughter of Calcas, and Manta Theſſalonica, daughter to Tireſias the Thebane; neuertheleſſe, Hiſtorians ſpeake onely but of theſe ten.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the ſeuen Maruailes and Wonders of the World; what they were; alſo in what ſeuerall parts and places of the World they are remembred to bee by graueſt Writers.

Some difference made about the 7 wonders

SVch as haue read ancient Hiſtorians, Orators, and Poets, do finde, that they make mention in many of their Books, of 7 Meruailes or Wonders of the World, and that they were in diuers places. All they that haue written, do conſent to ſix, but concerning the ſeuenth, there are variable opinions, and likewiſe a great difference, in placing one before another. Notwithſtanding, I purpoſe to ſpeake firſt of the walles of Babylon, which are rancked in the number of theſe Wonders, & vpon good reaſon, becauſe the greatneſſe of the place, as alſo the ſcituation thereof, ſeemeth incredible.

The firſt wonder of the world.

In our former Volume, and in the Chapter of the diuerſity of Languages, wee haue ſufficiently declared, that they were founded in the ſame place, whereas Nimrod builded the Tower of Babel, and whereof the Citty tooke name. Concerning thoſe walles, according to the ſoundeſt opinions, namely Iuſtine, and alſo as Trogus Pompeius ſaith, they were founded by the famous Queene Semiramis, Mother to Ninus. Diodorus Siculus, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Paulus Oroſius doe maintaine the ſame, with the greater part of our Gentile Authors. Neuertheles, S. Auguſtine, and Ioſephus in his Antiquities ſay, that they were builded by Nimrod, aſſiſted by the proud Gyants then liuing. But bee it, that the foundation or reparation of them was done by Semiramis; it is ſufficient, that they were greatly ennobled by her.

A reference to the firſt volume of this worke.

The ſcituation of the City was with a Plaine on the one ſide, and on the other ran the Riuer of Euphrates. The modell & figure of this Citty, was in a quadrangle, and the walles wonderfully high, as alſo wrought with maruailous cunning. The matter was of ſtone, ioyned with Lime & Ciment, growing in the Mines of that Country; but eſpecially in the great Lake of Iudea, where ſometime ſtood Sodome & Gomorrha, named Aſphaltida, which yeeldeth ſuch a kinde of ſlime or mud, as bindeth like Pitch or Glue, the very ſtrongeſt that is to be found. Hiſtorians do diſagree about the height and largenes of the circuit, which might happen, through the diuerſity of the meaſures they then vſed. Pliny ſaith, that the circuit of thoſe walles was threeſcore thouſand paces, ſo that one of the ſquares was fifteene thouſand. He alſo ſaith, that they were two hundred foote in height, which foote exceeded by three fingers breadth, the meaſure of the Romane foote: and the thickneſſe was fifty foote of the ſame meaſure, which was (indeed) a matter very admirable.

that they were so broad and wide, as sixe Chariots might easily be trained in front together, without offending one another. The Bridges, the Mounts, the Towers, & the Gardens, Semiramis caused to bee made, which were works of great astonishment. It is credibly set downe in Records, that shee kept daily at this worke, three hundred thousand mē, out of all the kingdomes which were subiect to her. Quintus Curtius addeth thereto eight Stades more in length, and saith, that they were an hundred cubites high: but Paulus Orosius saith, that they were 480 Stades in length, which amount (taking six score & fiue paces in euery Stade) to threescore thousand paces, as Pliny said. Strabo saith and affirmeth, that they contained three hundred, eighty fiue Stades, and also that they were so broad, as the former named Chariots might in that manner goe on them, and yet not hurt or hinder one another, in their passing along together.

Three hūdred thousand men set on worke daily.

Paul Orosius in lib. 2.

Strabo in lib. 16.

Moreouer, Authors doe report marualous things, of Gardens made vppon the Arches and Towres, wherein grew Trees of vnmeasurable height. Iulius Solinus confirmes the same with Pliny. Some among the Authors do auouch, that the walles without, were engirt with Ditches full of water, as large and deepe as an indifferent wide Riuer. In this Citty there were an hundred Gates of mettall, very admirable. And for conclusion, all that is written of the greatnesse and height of the walles, may well be credited, because (in truth) this Citty was the proudest in the whole world, and long time held the vniuersall Monarchy, which is an especiall argument of her greatnesse. And the same is also described by Aristotle, when he saith: That being once taken with enemies, they that dwelt at the one end or side of the City, had no aduertisement thereof, till three whole daies space after.

The second place of the worlds wonders, we giue to the Colossus of the Sun, which was at Rhodes. It was a Statue or Figure of a man, offered by the Gentiles, and dedicated to the Sunne, and some say to Iupiter. It was made of mettall, of an incredible greatnesse, and in height also like a huge Tower: so that it could hardly be imagined, how it was made and raised in that manner. Pliny, who discourseth on all things, saith, that it contained three score and ten cubites in height, and although at the making of it, there were many good workmen continually labouring; yet were they twelue years before it could be perfected, and it cost three hundred Talents. He that vndertooke the workmanship thereof, was named Cares, an Indian by birth, and Scholler to * Lysippus.

* A notable Caruer of Sicyon.

This Statue was so immeasurably great, as it seemed, that the earth could not any longer sustaine it, because according to Pliny and Paulus Orosius, it stood not aboue sixe and fifty yeares: at the end of which time it fell, by reason of a great quaking and trembling of the earth. After which fall, and namely in the time of Pliny, many went to see it as a thing to wonder at. For, saith he, there were few men found, that could embrace the great fingers of this Statue: so that the very least of his fingers, was greater then any other Statues, how great soeuer. And yet he speaketh of an hundred other Colosses of meaner stature, which were also at Rhodes. But that is nothing to our purpose, except some one be desirous to say, that in regard of this great one, and the other lesser, the Rhodians thereon were called Colossenses or Colossians. But that opinion is not approued by Erasmus, for he saith; That those Colossians to whom S. Paul wrote, were people of a Citty in Phrygia, named * Colossa.

Returning then againe to our wonderfull Colossus, I say that it lay there ruined a very long time, euen till the dayes of Pope Martin the first, which was in the yeare sixe hundred, when the Infidels, and the Soldane of Egypt their Captaine, came vpon the Rhodians, and according as Platina writeth in the life of Pope Martin, and Antonius Sabellicus, in the third part of his Booke: they carried away that which they found of the reliques of this Colossus, and they finde nine hundred Camels to be loden with the mettall. Of other Colosses that were at Rhodes, and in other places, nothing so great, we purpose not to speake, because our present aime is at the seuen Wonders of the world onely.

In the third place, wee determine the Piramides of Egypt, and vndoubtedly, if that be true which Historians haue written of them, they are things deseruing admiration.

The third wonder of the world.

The Piramids of Egypt.

miration. Theſe Piramids were certaine buildings, which began beneathe in quadrangle forme, and ſo roſe vp (in a diminiſhing manner) a huge height, in the ſhape of a painted Diamond. And yet notwithſtanding, they were of ſuch greatneſſe and taulneſſe, conſiſting of ſuch and ſo many ſtones, as alſo wrought with ſuch perfection, as it is no eaſie matter to deſcribe them, neyther to winne credible opinion of them. And yet (me-thinks) things ſo ſufficiently authorized, by Authors both Chriſtians and Gentiles, men well eſteemed and approued; their credence is not raſhly to be ſlighted or denied. Theſe Piramids then are as very high towers, finiſhing in a ſpire or ſharp point, and the etimology of the word commeth of Pyr in Greeke, as much to ſay, as fire, becauſe it ſeemeth, that the height commeth to leſſen and fayle, like as a flame of fire doth.

The Etimologie of the word Piramid.

Among all other Piramids, Hiſtorians make particular mention of 3 which were in Egypt, betweene the Citty of Memphis, which is now the Cayro, and the Iſle that maketh or createth Nilus, named Delta, one of which is ranked among the ſeuen wonders. For it is ſaid, that to the making thereof, there were continually imployed three hundred and threeſcore thouſand men, and the work laſted twenty whole yeares. Many do affirme it, and particularly Pliny in ſpeaking more amply, alledging twelue authors for his warrant, as Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Pomponius Mela, Herodotus, Ammianus Marcellinus, and many more, whereof ſome ſay, that the foundation and ground-work of this Piramid, couered and contained eyght dayes iourney of ground: others ſay ſeauen, and moſt agree on ſixe, and as many (little more or leſſe) in the height. Pliny ſaith, that each quadrangle or ſquare contained 883 foote in bredth. The ſtones were of Marble, brought out of Arabia, and Pomponius Mela maintaineth, that the moſt part of them were thirty foote in largeneſſe. Whereby may be gathered, that ſo many thouſand men muſt needs be buſied, ſome in cutting and ſquaring thoſe ſtones, others in bringing and carrying them, and other in laying them, beſide the mighty multitudes, imployed for fetching them ſo far off, and about other neceſſary occaſions.

The bredth of euery ſquare.

Three hundred & threeſcore thouſand men imployed dayly, twenty yeares ſpace.

Of the other Piramids the like is ſpoken, at leaſt of the other two fore-named, one whereof was made by the vanity of the Kings of Egypt, who were the very richeſt in all the world: as well by the fruitfulneſſe of the earth, as in regard alſo, that no man poſſeſſed any thing in proper, but onely the King. Beſide, after ſuch time as Ioſeph the Sonne of Iacob, aduiſed Pharaoh, to preſerue the Corne in ſeuen yeares abundance, as prouiſion for the time of famine: during which ſpace, by meanes of that Corne, he had all the Lands of his people. Thus you ſee how the Kings became rich, and were ſerued by their ſubiects, euen as if they had bene their ſlaues. And Hiſtorians doe faithfully report, that the Kings cauſed thoſe Piramids to bee builded, onely to feed their people that labored about the, and becauſe they ſhould leaue no wealth to their ſucceſſors. For they affected rather, to diſpenſe in this manner with their people, then that any of their heyres ſhould attaine the meanes to exceed the deceaſſed by their goods and money.

The Kings of Egypt the richeſt of the world.

The reaſon of building thoſe Piramids.

I finde it recorded alſo, that thoſe Piramids ſerued for Sepulchers to theyr Kings. And whoſoeuer doth well conſider the multitude of hebrew people that ſerued in Egypt, and by whom the Kings made their Citties and Fortreſſes to bee builded, will not be much amazed heereat, in regard that it is very certaine, that ſixe hundred thouſand men on foote, beſide a great multitude of women & ſmall children, departed out of that ſeruitude, and that all of them were imployed, and ſerued in thoſe wonderfull works. Wherby it is no meruaile at all, that ſuch buildings ſhould be made; for good Authors do auouch, that in Rootes, Garlike, and Onions, to ſuſtaine the multitude of workers, there were diſpenſed 18 hundred Talents, which at the rate (now adayes vſed) is a million and foure-ſcore thouſand Crownes. Diodorus ſaith, that round about it, and a large compaſſe alſo ſomewhat farre off, there was not to bee ſeene the very ſmalleſt ſtone, neyther apparence that any man had trodden there, nor any ſigne of a foundation; but onely Sand, as ſmall as the fineſt Salt. Whereby it ſeemed, as if that Piramid had beene planted there by Gods owne hand, or to haue growne ſo naturally, and the top appeared red to touch heauen.

If we ſet aſide thoſe ancient Bookes, we ſhal yet finde teſtimonies of our owne times. Peter Martyr of Millaine, a very learned man, who was Ambaſſadour for the Kings Catholique, Don Ferdinand, & Dame Iſabell, to the Soldane of Egypt, in the yeare 1501. wrote a Booke of what he had ſeene and done in his Ambaſſage. There he declareth, (as he did the like by word of mouth) that hee had ſeene thoſe Piramids, & agreeth with that which thoſe ancient Authours had written of them. Particularly, he ſpeaketh of two ſeene by him, which were of incredible height, and ſaith, that he meaſured the ſquare of one, finding it to be 315. paces, ſo that it contained about thirteen hundred in circuit, and on each ſide very huge ſtones made vp the buildings. Moreouer he ſaith, that certaine men in his company, aſcended vp one of them, with very great labour, & long ſpace of time, and they declared to him, that on the toppe of all (as we vſe to ſay) there was one ſtone wholly of it ſelfe, ſo great, as thirty men might eaſily ſtand vpon it. And when they were aboue, they ſaid, they ſeemed as if they had loſt their ſight, and onely with looking downward, and tooke themſelues to bee in a Cloud, ſuch was the extremity of height, their braines being much troubled, and turned vpſide-downe. So that (ſaith hee) there neede no doubt at all be made, concerning the great number of people employed, and the expences ſpoken of, in doing thoſe works.

THe fourth Meruaile or VVonder, was the Mauſolaa. Artemiſia was wife to Mauſolus, King of Caria, a Prouince in the greater Aſia. This woman (according to Aulus Gellius, and other hiſtorians) ſo dearely affected her husband, as it was generally recorded for a moſt notable example. Her husband the king dying firſt, ſhe lamented his death with teares and complaints, more then were of ordinary cuſtome. Needs would ſhe erect a Toombe or Sepulcher for him, anſwerable to the extraordinary loue ſhee bare him; and ſuch (indeede) it prooued to be, that it was recorded among the ſeuen wonders of the world. The ſtone of the whole conſtructure, was of a moſt excellent Marble, conſiſting of foure hundred and eleuen foote in circuite about, and fiue and twenty cubites in height: it had alſo about it, ſixe and twenty Colombs of admirable ſtone, and likewiſe of as famous ſculpture.

The fourth Wonder of the world. Mauſolus Toomb. Aulus Gellius in Noct. Attic. 10.

The building was open on all ſides, with Arches of ſeuenty three foote in wideneſſe: and it was framed by the hands of the moſt exquiſite workmen then to be found. The part towards the Eaſt, was made & engrauen by Scopas; that on the North, by Briax; the South ſide by Timotheus, and that on the Weſt, by Leochares. The perfection of the work was ſuch, and that on the whole body ſo ſumptuous & beautifull, as partly it was therefore called Mauſolaa, and in regard alſo of the king, for whom it was made: ſo that euen to this verye day, when any Toombes of ſuch ſuperficiall Arte are made, they are called Mauſolas. Of theſe things mention is made by Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Herodotus: Strabo alſo remembreth them, ſo doth Aulus Gellius, and many other hiſtorians. It is found written, that Artemiſia, after the death of her husband, liued in continuall teares and mourning, and that ſhe dyed before the worke could bee fully finiſhed: hauing drunke the bones of her husband, beate into powder, which ſhe burned and buried in her owne body, that it might be the Sepulcher for his.

What famous workmē made the Toombe, ſuch as the world as then had not their like.

THE fift Edifice of theſe VVonders, was the Temple of Diana, whom the Gentiles adored as a Goddeſſe, and it was builded in the Citty of Epheſus in Aſia, in the Prouince of Ionia. Of this Temple, great ſpeech was made throughout the world: ſo that one named Democritus, wrote a particular Booke thereof. Pliny writing of this Temple, ſaith that the Amazones cauſed it to bee builded, and that it contained foure hundred and fiue and twenty foote in length, and two hundred and twenty in largeneſſe. The worke was ſo admirably arteficiall, that it had 220 yeates to the perfecting. It was built in a Lake, to preuent the peril of earthquakes; and it is ſaid withall, that on the foundation was laide great ſtore of coale-duſt, & wooll thereupon, the better to make firm and ſure the moiſt and marſhy place. It had an hundred and ſeuen Colombs or Pillars of moſt excellent Marble, & each of them was made by all the Kings of Aſia:

sia: thirty seuen of them were of most curious cunning and sculpture, and all the other of the choyfest Marble.

The principall Masters of this worke, according to Pliny, was Dresiphon: but beleeuing Strabo, it was Archiphron. Notwithstanding, this diuersity of opinion is sufferable, considering, what length of time the businesse lasted: and therefore there must needs be more then one Master, especially for so many performances & varieties, in the diuersity of such times and intelligence. Solinus and Pomponius Mela say, that the Amazones builded & dedicated this Temple: and yet Solinus affirmeth, that when the mighty King Xerxes went to the conquest of Greece, & that he burned all the Temples; yet hee reserued this onely still standing. All Historians do consent with one accord, that the Pillars of this Temple supported the planked seeling of wood, the most excellently wrought that could be deuised, and that this whole couering was of Cedar, and all the doores and wainscotted works were of Cipres.

Yet afteeward, a villaine seeing this solemne and soueraigne building, conceiued a lewd desire to burne it, as (indeed) he did. And being taken for the fact, confessed, that he did it to no other ende, but to leaue a famous renowne of his deed to the world. Wherefore Valerius Maximus, in his titles of desire of renowne, and Aulus Gellius affirmeth also, that it was prohibited (vnder greeuous penalty) that any man should doe so much as write his name, because he should vtterly lose the fame and renowne, which he so earnestly affected. Yet all this serued to slender purpose, for Solinus and Strabo both say, that he was named Herostratus, and that of him came vp the vsuall Prouerbe, that when any man would striue to be famous for some vicious deed; people would cõmonly say; This is the renowne of Herostratus.

The fame of Herostratus.

To speake yet of some other memorable matters to this purpose, it deserueth some respect to remember, that the very same day as the Temple was burning, Alexander the Great was borne, the Conquerour of all Asia; heereof are Authors, Plutarch in the life of Alexander, and Cicero, in his second booke of the Gods nature, where he speaketh it in two places, and likewise in his booke of diuination. Further he saith, that while the Temple burned, the Sages prognosticated the destruction of all Asia; euen as afterward it was ouercome by Alexander. Some do write, that this Temple was built againe afterward, in much more great and excellent manner then before, and that the Master of the worke was named Democrates.

The 6 Wonder of the world. The Image of Iupiter Olimpus.

THE sixt Wonder, was the Idoll or Image of Iupiter Olympus, which was in his Temple in Achaia, betweene the Cities of Elis and Pisa: and the place was named Olympus, as also the Temple, in regard of Iupiter Olympus, of whom write both Strabo and Pomponius Mela. They maintaine, that this Statue or Image, which stood in the Temple, was much renowned, as well for arteficiall perfection and admirable workmanship, as also for the greatnesse thereof. It was made of Porphiry, some say of Iuory, and by the hand of Phidias, the most excellent Caruer and Engrauer for Imagery (in Gold or Iuory) that euer was; albeit Pliny nameth diuers other. Strabo saith, that the excellency thereof consisted in the greatnes, and yet the matter which made it more admirable, was in being wrought of Porphiry, knit and vnited together of infinite small peeces.

Strabo in lib. 8. Pomponius Mela in lib. 2.

Plin. lib. 35. & 36.

Some say, that Phidias was taxed with one onely imperfection, to wit, that hee had not proportioned the Image to the capacity of the Temple, because hee had made it sitting, and so great, as when due consideration was made, what the height thereof would haue bene, if he had made him standing vpright on his feet, the temple had no way bene able to haue contained him.

Neuertheless, the renowne of this Image did most highly illustrate the place, and made the Temple more knowne, then otherwise it would haue bene, although it was formerly held in great esteeme, by reason that in the very same place, were kept the sports and wrastlings called Olympian. And thence it came, that the yeares were counted by Olympiades, which they made from fiue years to fiue years: which pastimes were first instituted by Hercules, and afterward being left off, they were againe re-established by Aemanius, but (according cording to ſome Authours) by Sphiron, foure or fiue yeares after the deſtruction of Troy, eſpecially according to Euſebius, and then began the yeare of the firſt Olympiade.

The ſeuenth Wonder of the World. The Tower of Pharos.

NOw concerning the ſeuenth VVonder, ſome ſay, that it was a Tower which ſtood in the Iſle of Pharos, neere to the Citty of Alexandria in Egypt. Pharos was a ſmall Iſland, long and narrow, ſeated on the coaſt of Egypt, ouer againſt the mouth of Nilus, which in former time (according to Pomponius Mela and Pliny) was wholly (as it were) engirt with firme Land, and afterward in the times of theſe Authors, the Sea imbraced this firm land, excepting onely a Bridge, whereby men went from the one place to the other. In the firme land is the great Citty of Alexandria, builded by Alexander the Great; which Citty was afterward a Colony of Iulius Cæſar. In this Iſle (named Pharos, after the name of a great Pilot, which belonged to Menelaus, and was there buried) the Kings of Egypt erected a Tower of Marble, maruailous in height and cunning workmanſhip, vpon a Mountain enuironed with water: the arteficiall performance of which Tower was ſuch, that it coſt 800. Talents, which value foure hundred and foureſcore thouſand Crownes, after the computation of Budæus. And it was built for no other purpoſe, but to ſet vp (in the night time) a lighted fire thereon, Beacon-wiſe, to guide and direct ſuch Ships as came to take landing there: and this Tower, according to the greateſt opinions, was erected by King * Ptolomæus Philadelphus, and the Maſter Architect that made it, was named Siſtratus, which is confirmed to vs by Pliny.

Iul Cæſ. in comment. lib.4.

Cæſar in his Commentaries, highly praiſeth the height and workmanſhip of this Tower; and ſaith, that it was alſo called Pharos, as taking name of the Iſland. As much ſaith Ammianus Marcellinus, declaring the hiſtory of this Tower. Alſo Solinus in his Polyhiſtor, in the ende of his 34 Chapter ſaith, that all the Towers which were afterward made, and for the like occaſion, each of them was named Pharos, after the name of this, as was the Pharos of Meſſina, and in other places. And I am of the minde, that the kindled fires or lights, which are ordinarily carried in Ships, as guides to other in the night, vpon this occaſion are called Pharoſes.

Solin.in cap.34

Thus this Tower is the laſt of the wonders, although (by diuers) it is not named in their number, but in ſtead thereof, the hanging gardens of Babylon are reckoned, wherof we haue already ſpoken. Lactantius Firmianus confirmeth it, and ſaith, that theſe gardens were vpon Arches & Towers, yet ſheluing downward, admirable for great Trees in no meane abundance, and great ſtore of Fountains: the forme of this building is amply deſcribed by Diodorus Siculus. Cælius Rhodiginus, diſcourſing on the ſeuen VVonders of the world, doth not inſert this Tower of Pharos; but the Obeliſque of Semiramis, which was made after the ſame ſtructure and forme of a Piramid, for it began ſo in a quadrangle, and finiſhed vpward in a point, and there was no difference betweene an Obeliske and a Piramid; but that the Obeliske was all of one entire peece, and therefore of no ſuch height as the Piramids. I finde it written, that ſome of them haue bin great, like Towers, and of a very goodly ſtone. There is one now at Rome, nam'd a Needle, which was brought out of Egypt; and it is admirable, to ſee the greatnes therof, as alſo to iudge how it was brought thither. Concerning the Obeliske of Semiramis, wherof Cælius reporteth, and nameth it in the number of the 7 VVonders: he findeth it credibly auouched, that it was an 150. foot in height, and 24 foote ſquare in a quadrangle, ſo that the whole circuite was 90 foote, and this Stone was ſo taken whole, out of the Mountaines of Armenia, & by the command of Semiramis, brought into Chaldean Babylon. But in truth, when due conſideration is made, how it ſhould bee taken out of the Quarry, brought thence, and erected vp on end: it might appeare a matter incredible, if Antiquity had not yeelded things as ſtrange, and certified to vs by Authors, well deſeruing beleefe, yea, and of other great Obelisks, made by the kings of Egypt. Pliny deſcribeth how they are fetcht foorth of their Quarries. Of the Piramids, Obelisks, Statues, & Coloſſes, mention is made by Polyphius, in ſ beginning of his Booke, cald Hypne-rotomachia. Therefore I need not to make any further relation of them, fearing I haue offended already, by preſuming ouer-farre vpon your patience, in what hath bin ſaid, concerning theſe 7 VVonders of the world.

CHAP. VIII. The Oration of Antipater, the Father to Herod, which he made before Cæsar, standing accused, for following Pompeies part.

THE ARGVMENT.

After that Pompey had bin vanquished by Cæsar, he was massacred in Egipt, by them whose liues he had sometime saued. Antigonus the Iew, aspiring to the Royalty, accused (before Cæsar) Antipater the Idumæan, to haue serued and fauoured Pompey in his enterprizes. And that he had done no matter of seruice in Egipt, which could bee interpreted for Cæsar; but rather for the succour of Mithridates, and to couer his fault committed in following Pompey. But Antipater, for the better apparance of his good seruices, renting off his garments, shewed what wounds he had receiued in the seruice of Cæsar, and suddenly accompanied this scarry testimony, with these words ensuing.

The effect of the accusation obiected by Antigonus against Antipater.

BEhold heere assured and certaine witnesses, of my hatred against Cæsar, these wounds so apparant, and which are shining markes of my soules conceptions, to speak & defend the poore accused criminall. I offer to thee (Lord Cæsar) these wounds, as pledges of that affection which lies hidden in my heart, and wherof I make you a liberall present. These are the gages of my faith, and this is an obligation written in my heart, and which wil remaine engrauen heere all my life time. If you will not please to credite my fellowes in Armes, nor to listen to thē of my Nation; let it be demanded of mine enemies, and know from them, for whose sake I haue receiued all these wounds. And what is the reason that I am thus pursued? but becausе I haue bin noted loyally affected, in offering you my faithfull seruice.

Wounds are a Soldiours speaking witnesses, when himselfe is silent.

A Soldiour stands obliged to follow his Generall.

I vnderstand and perceiue, that mine enemy reprocheth me with friendship to Pompey, and fixeth before his owne eyes, that I haue fauoured his cause. I confesse (Lord Cæsar) I confesse, that I haue bin a friend, not to men, but to the Romane name: and that neuer my desires were elsewhere addicted, nor my duty & diligence any way applyed, but onely in doing my most humble seruice to the Senate and people of Rome. I haue then born Armes, not for a Romane, neither for his particular profite, but for the seruice of all. And let the case be admitted, that Pompey was acceptable to me, that I carried his cause, and maintained his quarrell; wherein am I therefore to be blamed? Hee was long time (before) my friend, that hee had war with you, or any discord grew betweene him and Cæsar. Moreouer (my Lord) he was your Kinseman, and you were his Father in law. He being in Iudea, there was not any particular affection (whatsoeuer) that made me follow him: for I assisted him, as being Generall of the Roman Army. And yet notwithstanding, I neuer hazarded my selfe so far for him, neither did he euer finde such kinde knowledge of affection in me; as (for his sake) to take so many wounds, as I haue receiued in seruing you. It is for you that I gaue the pledges of death, and for whom I became an enemy to mine owne body, exposing it to the Darts, Arrowes, and Weapons of your enemies.

A free and most honourable confession.

The Coward cannot iudge of blowes, nor the disloyall, of faithfulnesse.

But is it any matter of amazement, if a slaue, nurssed vp in seruitude, do not know what wounds are, nor the hazards happening in warre? Or should it offend any man, if a disloyall fugitiue should be ignorant what the worth of faith is, and what honesty remaines among good minded men? Who can reproue me, but this my perpetuall enemy and yours, for fayling in loue and affection to the people of Rome? I am astonished, how Antigonus should be so hardy, as daring to blame or accuse any man before the Romans, against whō it is his custome to make war; and that he should be so impudent, to make complaint before them, as if his Realme were snatcht or rauisht from him. If it were so, yet his power should not bee exercised for his greatnesse or aduancement: but onely to seize on you, to assaile the Romane Legions, & to practise vengeance against you for his father and brother. It much amazeth me, that such a wretch, & so vnthankfull as he is, feareth not the throne of the Romane Emperour, but dare (euen there) oppose and pursue innocents: without remembring, that a Kinseman of his, and a companion in the crime, hath there beene punished for fellony, treason, and reuolt.

THE EFFECT.

Reason appearing (in Cæsars iudgement) to be vpon Antipaters side, he iudged also for him, and gaue him the gouernment of Iudea. By this meanes hee opened him the way, to giue the Iewish kingdome to the children of the said Antipater, and disseized them that were of the blood Royall, and of the true seed of Dauid.

CHAP. IX. The Oration of Herod to his Martiall troopes, being vpon the point of fighting with the Arabes.

THE ARGVMENT.

Fond prodegies and superstitious opinions conceiued in mens braines, make them cowards to warlike attempts.

HErod seeing that his Army stood like men amazed, as fearing a disaduantageable successe of the warre, through (I know not what) superstitious conceite, grounded vpon prodegies, and tremblings of the earth, which at that time had happened, and in regard whereof, his Souldiers shewed themselues very vnwilling to fight against the Arabes: Hee laboured by this Oration to perswade them, that all such things are naturall, exhorting them, not to leaue the victory to their enemies, for any distrust in them; and these were his words.

THE forces of the enemy hauing bin enfeebled and abated by many of our aduantageable encounters, ful of fortune to vs, and transporting them with furious despaire, yea, making them to massacre our Legates and Ambassadors: I cannot chuse but meruaile, how you should be thus affrighted without any occasion. At leastwise, it were reasonable and dreadlesse, without some good foundation, to preferre accidentall occasions to any euident successe, when men are assured of their owne vertue and forwardnesse. We haue had some encountring with the enemy, where the Arabes did not turne their backes vpon vs, & yet dealt but fraudulently (as they can well do) not to vanquish, but to delay vs from the victory: which matters, as they ought to encourage ye to the fight; so you should withall consider, that as you haue felt (I know not what) weakning of hart, by some earthquakes hapning, they shold be no terrors at all to vs, no more then to thē, who stand with vs to endure this war.

An Army vsing fraud and deceit, seeke no meanes of conquering, but to delay the victory from his enemy.

And if we would but respect, on whom the damage of this persecution is falne, you should perceiue, that it is vpon the Arabes, constraining them to keepe themselues in the field, because they should be still before them, that far go beyond them in courage and valiancy. For I see, that they distrust their owne strength & manhood, and yet taking heart, on the hopefull ruine of our troopes, they will needs aduenture to endure the war. But alasse, that is a feeble hope, which proceedeth not from his owne proper vertue and valour, but rather dependeth vpon others misery: insomuch, as there is nothing more fraile nor mutable, then are felicities and aduersities hapning to men. For the estate & condition of humane occasions, whatsoeuer ouerthrowes they chāce to feele, relieth vpon a very little time, & as felicity is neuer durable; euen so aduersity can neuer bee perpetuall, and a man continueth no longer miserable, then hee had a precedent time to bee fortunate. And of all these I can giue you a goodly and most manifest example.

The vncertainty of mens felicities and aduersities.

In the first fights, wee had the victory ouer the Arabes, but war taking his course and altering the lot and fortune thereof; we were vanquished by them whom (not long before) wee surmounted and ouerthrew. Which therefore yeeldeth reason to beleeue, that we shall againe conquer them which vanquished vs: considering, that presumption is alwayes guided by indiscretion and want of fore-sight, wheras aduised feare armeth men with prouidence, to fit themselues for following successes, and thereby to learne duty and diligence. It neuer is otherwise in the state of felicity, but that boldnesse and temerity are equall companions, and want of discretion in Souldiers, neuer tarries for the wise aduice & councell of their Captaines; in briefe, they rush into the warre, without their leaue or commission. But I see that you are iudiciously fearefull, which makes mee to hold the victory so much the more assured. Courage then (deare friends and companions) take hart and hardiment, by aduancing the glorious and ancient magnanimity of the Iewes your Predecessours.

Presumption maketh a man improuident, but discreete feare maketh him wise.

Ordinary and naturall occasions should neuer breed dismay in Soldiors.

And let not the mouings of insensible things, breed any terrour in you, neither carry any conceite, that earthquakes can be any argument or presage, of any other disaster or mishap, then what hath already happened. For the Elements haue their defects as well as we, and no other harme or danger is to be doubted, then what ensueth to themselues: considering, that neither tremb'ings of the earth, nor mortality of creatures are but their owne iniuries, and signifie no other perill or preiudice at all.

And yet we should not feare to suffer matter of greefe, in regard that (already) we haue endured most afflicting and insupportable greeuances: he that hath punished vs, will bee appeased, and become againe as milde vnto vs, as if hee had not chastised vs. For what can we expect from him, after this irksome pestilence, but only his holy fauour and mercy, seeing for two offences, he hath bin pleased to afflict and punish vs? For the rest, as concerning that which belongeth to this war, all is in his entire condition; because the plague hath ended them that were not in the Campe, and our victory hath taken them from the enemy. euē those men that were the cheefest for his battailes. If our Flocks or Heards of Cattell are dead, the enemy hath had a losse of much better things, being bereft both of wit and sence, when (contrary to all right and equity) he slew our Ambassadors. The Arabes haue broken the law common to all Nations: for no people are so cruell and barbarous, but Ambassadors ought to be inuiolably respected of them.

Ambassadors ought to be respected of the people, how barbarous so euer.

Let them therefore expect from God, a iust vengeance for such crimes, to chastise their euill doing; for the sinnes of our aduersaries are of such importance, as there is not any law, be it humane or diuine, that will leaue them vnpunished. Let vs go forth then, yea, let vs go to fight; not to get their spoiles, or conquer their lands; but for the glory of God, and the defence of his honour. Let not the loue of your wiues and children spur ye on to the war; but only the diuine fauor, which you know to be present with you. So going on this manner to the fight, our desires shall not be thereby effected, but our obedience to God, for doing vengeance on them, whom the Law forbiddeth any man to touch. Beside, Ambassadors are they, who (among the furies of armed enemies) onely mediate peace, & such men are neuer numbred or ranked with aduersaries; because their blood being shedde, cryeth incessantly for iust vengeance in our soules. Haste wee then in going to the fight, in regard that God is hee, which offereth himselfe to reuenge our friends slaine. The very murdred Ambassadours will fight for vs more furiously, and better then our selues: and ringed round with a squadron of Angels, let vs on to the battaile, and vtter confusion of our enemies.

Ambassadors are neuer accounted or ranked among other enemies

THE EFFECT.

By these words of the Generall, the Iewish Soldiors recouered heart, and seeking occasion to affront the enemy, at length assayled them with such fury; as the Arabes were enforced to fight, and had a great losse of men. Beside, such as fled, retired into the Mountaines; except a part of them, which yeelded themselues to the Iewes. The rest, affecting rather to die like honest men, then submit themselues basely; fell to handy blowes againe, where they were slaine and hewd in peeces, yet not without leauing sufficient testimony to the Iewes, of their valor.

CHAP. X. The Oration of Herod before Augustus Cæsar, who had conceiued anger against him, because he had taken part, and followed Marke Anthony.

THE ARGVMENT.

AVgustus Cæsar, hauing vanquished Marke Anthony in Egipt, it seemeth he was aduised, that except he chastised Herod also, he was not fully possessed of the victory. Herod tasting the euill affection of this Prince, went to him to Rhodes, where presenting himselfe, and vsing the generosity of an inuincible spirit, he declared to Augustus; that if he did not helpe Anthony it was not through want of any good will, but because he had no meanes to do it. Affecting much rather, to confesse that he had beene an enemy to Cæsar, then shew himselfe ingratefull to his friend. And although he presented himselfe before him, without a kingly Crowne on his head, and cloathed like a man that had no dignity: yet his words expressed the Maiesty of a great Prince, and these were they.

Diuers hard measures wer offered to Herod, which made him rather goe to Augustus, thē he to send for him.

I Confesse (O mighty Monarch Augustus) that I haue beene a loyall companion to Marke Anthony in his affayres, as to the man, from whom I receiued the kingdome of Iudea. And I will not deny, but that I was very highly beholding to him, as I would more plainely haue expressed by Armes, if the enuy of Cleopatra had not giuen mee hinderance, and if the Arabes had not broken my designes and enterprizes. For which cause, and constrained by such necessities, I came not against you (in his assistance) with weapons in my hand: because I had no desire at all to forgoe my deare friend, and much lesse was I affraid to enter battaile against you in his behalfe; but onely in this respect, that I was busied in defending mine owne Countries. And albeit that I assisted him not personally in the battaile, yet Anthony found mee not vnthankfull to him; for I furnished him with men and victuals, for the succouring and refreshing of his Army, and I am well assured (Great Augustus) that you would not haue thought me ingratefull to Mark Anthony, if you had beene in the battaile at Actium.

A benefit receiued, doth so oblige a true harted friend, as no feare can keepe him from confessing it.

You see Sir, that I hide not my selfe, fearing more to be reputed ingratefull on your aduersaries behalfe, then doubting that any one should imagine me your enemy. I make more account of your iudgement, then of all the successe of warre: because before you, the merits of vertue are not in any perill, in regard you know how to purchase honor, and punish mis-behauiours and vices. Consider (gentle Prince) that as I neuer forsooke Anthony, so long as Fortune spake fairely to him: euen so, all disasters, and dead as he is, cannot yet make mee to forget and leaue him. You haue vanquished (O Cæsar) you haue vanquished Marke Anthony, by power, and by a great number of your Legions; you haue surmounted him by the wisedome of your Councels: the strength of the Empire hath cast him downe, from which hee was farre gone, and whereof he made not any reckoning; your vertues haue ouerthrowne him, or rather he hath beene ruined by his owne vices. For an Egyptian woman charmed and enchanted him; the delights of Egypt made him too soft and delicate, yea, he was wholly effeminately drowned in the Alexandrian luxuries. In briefe, hee hath beene conquered, because he better affected to be cast downe with Cleopatra, then to conquer without her: and so to be deiected by a woman, was more greeuous and insupportable to his friends, then euer it could be to his enemies.

There is nothing comparable to the entire affection of one mã to another; it goeth far beyond the loue of women.

I aduised him, to vntwine himselfe from that wretched woman, and to bee the death of a beast so dangerous; I promised him succour in his affaires, and forces to preuaile by in his flight; yea, I offered to beare him company in this warre. But the miserable man, was so doating on the beauties of that woman, and meerely enchanted by Cleopatra, as hee is brought to be iust nothing, by reason that he wold not beleeue me. I confesse (Great Cæsar) that I am also conquered with him, but yet my offence is not so great, for although Cleopatra quite quailed, and made a dishonourable prey of poore Anthony; yet she had not the like power ouer mee? And as hee would not abandon that barbarous wanton woman, euen so could not I forgoe my great friend in his aduersities. It was hee that did sette a Royall Crowne on my head, neuertheless, I would not bee so bold to appeare in your presence, with the ornaments I receyued from so loyall a friend, fearing to offend you by those fauours which he did to me: & yet, although I haue left off my known liueries of dignity, I haue not lost a iote of my greatnesse in courage. You may iudge therefore as it shall seeme best to your selfe; for whatsoeuer sentence you pronounce on me, yet I am sure to carry this reputation with me, and to my no meane contentment; that I was good and perfect in mine affections; that I left not my friend in life nor death, and neyther good or bad fortune had power to ouerthrow me,

Monstrous is the misery, when a man leaues a loyall friend, and leanes to the base allurements of a lasciuious woman.

If Princes would banish flatterers frõ being about them, their Maiesty wold shine with the more glorious splendour.

CHAP. XI. The magnanimous answer of Augustus to Herod, confirming him in his dignity. Whereby is demonstrated, that a Prince ought rather to affect truth spoken by his friend, then feigned flattery, comming from the mouth of a dissembling counterfeit. And therefore Augustus perceiuing how freely Herod had spoken to him, confessing himselfe rather his enemy, then ingratefull towards Mark Anthony, and taking delight in his libertie of speech, as proceeding from a generous and royall heart; returned him this answer following.

HEauen protect thee Herod, and enioy at this inſtant (better then euer before) the honour of thy Kingdome. For we enuy not thy vertues, neither doth it diſpelaſe vs, that thou ſhouldſt be ſuch a man as thou art: but rather it is to vs moſt high contentment. And truely, thou art well worthy to rule & command, ſeeing thou haſt ſo loyally kept thy faith giuen to a man onely, and being put in diſtreſſe, and aſſayled with aduerſities; yet thou art not aſhamed to confeſſe thy ſelfe the friend to Marke Anthony, and ſuch as thou waſt to him in his proſperity, ſuch diddeſt thou continue ſtill to him when his fortune fell contrary. Now, albeit I haue conquered Anthony, yet I neuer thought to ouercome thee: for thy friendſhip remaining ſo entire, placeth thee in ranke with them that haue wonne the victory. Which is the reaſon, that I no leſſe wiſh thee for my friend, then I praiſe and commend thy ſtedfaſt loyalty, becauſe no changes of Fortune, haue power to alter thy minde and deſires.

He is a true friend indeed that continueth alwayes one and the ſame in all conditions.

Thou neuer didſt abandon Anthony, but it was he that eſtranged himſelfe from thee: for he better affected to follow the councels of Cleopatra, then them of ſo deare and true a friend as Herod. The ignorance of Anthony, is the reaſon of my winning thee: for hee made choyſe of a pernicious and fooliſh woman, and reiected a moſt worthy loyall friend. And yet it is no matter of meruaile, that Anthony ſhould be vanquiſhed by Cleopatra, and keepe himſelfe wholly with her: ſeeing that being victorious, yet hee would needs become a voluntary ſlaue. Could you account it ſtrange, that Cleopatra ſhould turne Anthony from your councelles, ſeeing ſhe could ſeparate him from me, and of being my fellow-Companion in the Empire, cauſe him to become my mortall enemy? Seeing therefore, that with mee you haue loſt Marke Anthony; with mee I purpoſe you ſhall liue and raigne.

When men become effeminately minded, all manly councell is hatefull to them.

And truſt me, your commendable and inſigne enterprize deſerueth great recompence, and is worthy (by vs) to bee highly guerdonned: conſidering, that while wee were buſied in the late paſſed warres, you haue ouercome and ſubiected the Barbarians, although they ſeemed to be vnconquerable. For we reputed them to bee our enemies, and ſo we do make account of all thoſe that are aduerſe to the Iewiſh Nation, and ſuch as moleſt them, muſt know that they make warre with vs. You haue therefore fought for vs, and for vs you haue wonne the victory; in which reſpect, we permit you to reigne, and grant you the kingdome which you poſſeſſe: Commanding, that by our donation it ſhall be confirmed to you, and eſtabliſhed durable, your merite being not little, becauſe you haue made no diminution thereof. Alſo in further recompence, I will deale in ſuch ſort with you, as you ſhall haue no cauſe to wiſh for the preſence of Marke Anthony: eſteeming it altogether vnbeſeeming vs, if hauing (while hee liued) ouercome him in warre, being now dead, we ſhould not go beyond him in acknowledgement and friendſhip.

A notable ſigne of a vertuous and well vnderſtanding Prince.

THE EFFECT.

Cæſar and Herod hauing thus diſcourſed together, Auguſtus, to ſhew what account he made of this great Warriour Herod: did ſet a Royall Crowne vpon his head, and confirmed him in his authority, with hope to enlarge the limits of his kingdome. As likewiſe hee did afterward, hauing obſerued, how Herod acknowledged the benefits of his Maieſty, when as he furniſhed and refreſhed him with water and victualles, at ſuch time as a great dearth and ſcarſity was in the Romane Army. From whence Cæſar being returned, hee gaue Townes and Caſtles on the Sea to Herod, and accepted him as one of his beſt friends, which he had in the Eaſt.

CHAP. XII. The Oration of Herod to the Iewes, vpon the partage or diuiding of his Seigneuries, to be made to his children.

THE ARGVMENT.

LIke as Herod was happy in his warlike enterprizes, ſo did bad fortune follow him in the domeſticke affaires of his houſe, for hauing children of diuers beds, the humors alſo of

When Princes encline their eares to flat erers, their Courts shall neuer want quarrels and contentions.

of them being as diuers: caused the Palace Royall to bee dayly filled with quarrels and defiances, according as flatterers were heard, and fauoured by Herod. Now, the matters grew so farre, that the King and one of his sonnes, named Antipater (who was his eldest) must go to Rome to declare their greeuances; where Antipater behaued himselfe so well, that he wonne the Emperor, and qualified the anger of his Father, who receiued him into grace againe. Neuertheless, Cæsar ordained, that children should be obedient to their fathers, & that it should be lawfull for Fathers, to declare him for King (after his decease) that stoode best in his liking; because Antipater had accused his yonger brethren, being issued of blood Royall on all sides, euen as well as he was borne: Herod not being as then in authority, but aspiring to the Crowne. So soone as the king was returned from Rome, he caused an assembly of the people of Ierusalem, to whom he declared what he had done in this voyage, using these very Words.

Contention, quarrell, and disobedience in children, are no meane motiues of griefe to their parents.

NOT without great occasion, and that very beneficiall to my selfe (you Hebrew Citizens) did I make my voyage vnto Rome, to the end that Cæsar might iudge, concerning the quarrell betweene me and my children. To him I went, because my selfe knew not how, neither would I take vpon me to censure a cause, wherein I might easily fayle, by being transported with choller: & therefore he that gaue me the Kingdome, I thought fittest to ordaine, concerning the succession, and to bestow it on such a one of my sonnes, whom he should conceiue to be the worthiest. Now, among so many benefites as I receiued from him, this he added to them, that in a great difficulty, he did so facilitate the matter, that he gaue me my sonne againe, whom I had well-nere lost, and accorded the brethren together, vpon the difference growing betweene them, touching succession in the kingdome. You see mee then returned, farre richer then before I went; for I haue learned to be a better Father, then formerly I haue beene; and my children also are tutor'd to beare themselues in better manner to me, and all this hath happened through the grace and mildnes of Great Augustus. For, he hath appointed, that the appenage of my sonnes, and their succession in the kingdome, shall depend vpon mine owne will; to the end, that the prerogatiue and aduancement of which of them soeuer it be, shal not breed any pride or presuming in anie one of them. Hee hath permitted me, to choose such a successor as I will haue, to wit, he that shall be the most obedient to me, and giueth the greatest honor to his Father.

Obedience is an excellent lesson, when it shall teach a man howe to haue a Kingdome.

Now, concerning my selfe (O you my louing Citizens of Ierusalem) I wil follow heerein the iudgment of Cæsar, who freeing my younger sonnes from the accusation laide vpon them; hath made them equall to the eldest in hope, that (one day) they may succeede after me. In which respect, this very day, I make and declare them Kings all three together, the eldest hauing the priuiledge, in regard of his age, and the other because of their Nobility in blood. I would not haue you moued at the number of Princes, considering that the greatnesse and magnificence of the kingdome, sufficeth to maintaine and furnish effectually a far greater number, although there were no more aduantages. First of all, I make God the Iudge of this my aduice and ordinance; & next, I would haue you to be witnesses and testifiers thereof; to the end, that you may honor them according to right, & equally them that Cæsar hath accorded, and whom my selfe (being their father) do establish and appoint vnto you as Princes. To whom also you may doe such honor, as shall not exceede the bounds of reason in ouer-much esteeming them; and yet in no lesse fashion then belongeth to them. For too much honour puffes vp the heart with presumption, and neglect or contempt causeth rage and choller. Wherefore, I would haue that dutie done vnto them, as appertaineth to the merits deliuered from them: for you cannot giue so much content to him, who is honoured aboue his deserts, as you doe harme to him, to whome dutie is denied vndeseruedly. Oftentimes, it commeth so to passe, that both the one and other are offended, in regard it is meer flattery, which occasioneth the indiscreete sentence of preference.

Too much honouring a man, maketh him insolent, and contempt is the meanes to make him mad.

Beside, let me further say freely to you, that Honor done to children, is the greater glory to their Father.

that I am the common father to them all three, and you know well enough, that honor done to the Children, redoundeth the more to the Fathers glory. Notwithstanding, if there be any, that shall flatteringly honor my sonnes beyond reason, they make themselues guilty of treason to them: because they shal proue Authours of the recidiuation and rebellion, for the which we fell at first into difference. In making too much esteeme of our youth, is to giue it too free a heart and head, and boldnesse in attempting beyond capacity: yet let no man thinke, that I am enuious of the aduancement and glorie of mine owne Children. No; heauen is my witnesse, how I rather wish their power meane and stinted, whereby wee may the better liue in peace; then in growing ouer-great, to swell vp their hearts as high, and thereby spend the rest of our dayes in troubles and seditions. For, that which is established by pride and inuasion, hath but small and slender continuance, and slippeth away sodainly, but that which is possessed with loue and gracious liking, it hath as good and successefull enduring.

What Pride buildeth, Presumption ouer throweth.

I will therefore bee carefull in taking order, that my Kindred and Friends may bee the pledges of peace and concord for euer hereafter, betweene mee and my Sonnes; by whose exhortations and admonitions, they will bee mooued to loue and cherrish one another. For, as an euill purpose makes a deep wound in the heart of him that heares it tolde him: euen so, much more are they corrupted, who are made drunke by them that dayly frequent it, and whose soules are continually infected by so foule a plague; so that the contagion spreades it selfe ouer all them, that then are about, or come into their company.

A wicked intention woundeth the heart deeply of him to whom it is reuealed.

Although a man be (by nature) very courteous and peaceable; yet, let a Lake or Poole be neuer so calme and stil, when impetuous windes throwe their churlish blastes vpon it, it will swell, and shewe a discontented countenance. In the very same manner, are the mildest Natures of men madded, and quite peruerted by the meanes of lewd and wicked Counsellers. In breefe, it is on mee that all my Subiects must fixe their expectation, and there assuredly settle their confidence; for whatsoeuer aduancement happeneth to my Sonnes; yet so it is, that I will not lose a iote of mine authority and power. And when all is saide, there is not a Captaine or soldier, but will expresse more reuerence to the father of Conductors and Generals, then to them that command ouer the whole Army.

It is my selfe alone, without any other, that will bee the discharge of al, and will onely recompence them, who hauing done their dutie vnto mee, shall acknowledge what seruices they haue done to my Sonnes. If I finde dutie performed without peruerting; no doubt but deserued recompence will follow thereon; but deceite and cogging shall finde such reward, and so surely paide him, that he will vtterly lose all the fruite of his labor, and that which he fawned for by knauish flattery.

Deceite doth most commonly deceiue his owne master, & Flatterers are the falsest knaues that can be.

Now, as concerning you (my good and deere Sonnes) fasten your first regard vppon the common bond of nature, which vniteth bruite beastes together, and causeth their alliance to keepe such a mutuall agreement: as there is not any beast so vntractable, but with the perill of his life, hee will striue and labour to defend his young ones from danger. Carry honour and reuerence to Cæsar, who hath reconciled you together; and next, haue regard of mee, and of the Honour which is due vnto mee; who had much rather pray yee to doe so, then to command it to be done, albeit you know that it still remaineth in my power to Command.

Continue in the bond which you haue knit together; you are brethren, I would not haue you breake that vnion, neyther to be the occasion of disioynting that for which ye were borne. I shall giue you Habites, Attendants, and Royal honors, but much more precious is that whereto I exhort ye, inuiolable amity, beeing vnited together in one and the same will, If you declare such mutual affection, your authoritie will bee the more acceptable vnto mee: but amity fayling, you dart your malice thorow my heart, and thorow the very soule of Kingly Gouernement.

Authoritie without amity is vile & hurtfull.

Therefore, vntill I haue made proofe of this your Vertue, yee shall enioy no Kingdome, but the Royall Title onely: if if you loue your father, the effect of name will follow, in the meane while, approue among your ſelues, how and what affection I beare vnto you. You ſhall enioy al that is goodly and pleaſing in the dignitie Royall, as Princes of the blood: but concerning the charges of the Empire, and troubleſome burthen of State-affayres, they ſhall lye vppon me, though it were better to cumber many, then one onely. By this meanes, it ſhall bee very profitable for you, to accommodate your ſelues to that which I haue deſired: becauſe I loue the glorie which ſhould ſtill ſhine in you, and which I truly account to be mine owne.

THE EFFECT.

Herod hauing deliuered all theſe ſpeeches, and greatly comforted his ſons, howſoeuer ſome reioyced thereat, as not diſcerning ſo far off, that which was hidden vnder theſe words: yet the better ſort felt themſelues offended. For they perceiued, that this equallity ſerued but for a ſparke, to kindle the concealed fire in the breſts of the brethren, who could not indure any aduantages, how litle ſoeuer, eſpecially, hauing all but one and the ſame prerogatiue. So that this proued to be the cauſe of ruine to one another, as alſo of diſtruſt and extreme cruelty in King Herod.

CHAP. XIII.

The Battaile of Riotta or Nouara, vvhich vvas fought in the Dukedome of Millaine, betweene Iohn Trivulzi; and the Lord of Trimouille, Generals for Lewes the xij. King of France, on the one ſide, and Maximillian Sforza, Duke of Millaine, accompanied vvith the Switzers, on the other, in the yeare 1513.

The kings for me: loſſe of Millaine, was the occaſion of this warre.

LEwes King of Fraunce, the twelth of that name, ill digeſting the loſſe of Millaine, and ſom other diſgraces formerly receiued, made his election of two ſpeciall Captaines, wel experienced in martiall affaires, and alſo of no meane authority; the Lords Trivulzi and Trimouille, to paſſe the Alps, and enter Italy. A further choiſe was likewiſe made, for the more happy ſucceſſe in this attempt, of Robert de la March, whom hee ſent for out of the Countrey of Luca, and his blacke Regiment of Germans, by ſome termed Allemaignes, as alſo the Lord Lewes Beaumont, who came from the Frontiers of Nauarre, and brought vvith him thoſe ſeueral bands of Gaſcoignes, that had before ſerued Seigneur de la Palice at Panipelona, when they fought againſt the Spaniards. Some few Enſignes of foot (but of very choice men) were intermingled with them; for ſuch Gentlemen as ſerued not with horſe, held it no diſgrace, thus to be imployed on foote, and went vnto it with chearefull alacrity. Al which power beeing very aptly appointed, and furniſhed with great Ordenance vnto theyr owne good liking, they haſted away with ſpeed for Italy.

Of what ſeuerall bands the French Army conſiſted.

On the contrary ſide, the Duke of Millaine, named Maximillian Sforza, vnderſtanding this French preparation made for him; he was not negligent in his owne occaſions: but mooued the Switzers to reviſite Lombardy, as in ſome former expeditions they had done, and to Friend him with their manly aſſiſtance, in which motion he purchaſed no deniall. The Ammans, or they that beare the Office of Maiors, in the Cantons of Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald, as lying nereſt vnto Italy, with their warlike powers, were the firſt that paſſed ouer the Alpes: beeing ſeconded or followed by the like bands of Glaris, Zug, Lucerna, Schaffouſe, Zurich, and Berne, and theſe made vp another martiall company. The third and laſt conſort, conſiſted of fiue thouſand foot, conducted by Altoſaxo, a moſt expert and forward captaine. But Maximillian became ſomewhat diſcouraged, by an vnexpected reuolt of Sacranora Viſconti, that did keepe a ſwarme of deſperate fellowes about him in Millaine, all errant vnthriftes, though leaning to Nobility, and others beſide; and therefore ioyned with the firſt company of Switzers, going to Nouara, expecting there (yet free from priuy awaits and and treachery) when the reſt of the Switzers ſhould come.

The French Army cometh before Nouara.

Before the Towne of Nouara, came the French Forces, yet hearing that the ſecond ſupply of Switzers were ſomwhat neere, and that Altoſaxo was at Galarita; they retreated to Riotta, which was about ſome twenty Furlonges from Nouara, hard by the Riuer of Mara. No ſooner were the ſecond Conuoy of Switzers entred the Towne, and had theyr Mornings refection; but the Captaines called for a conſultation, for concluding vppon matters fitteſt to be done: whereuppon, Caraffe, Amman of Zurich, offering the firſt motion of ſpeech, began in this manner.

The Oration of Caraffe, Amman of Zurich.

This he ſpake in the hearing of the whole Company.

VAliant, and inuincible ſpirited Brethren, let not the attempt which you haue reſoluedly cõcluded on, coole through want of courage, or corruptly loſe it ſelfe, in needleſſe attending for Altoſaxo, & ſuch as come with him. For it hath euer bene knowne, that the ſureſt and happieſt way to fortunate ſucceſſe, is to ſtifle delay with ſpeedy expedition; and ſo we ſhall finde it, if wee haue the prouidence to purſue it: Nor neede we, whoſe corage and conſtancy ſtand equally kiſſing each other, liſten to any other recreant word, but onely braue and ſpeedy expedition: leſt the day ſhining now fairely for vs, cloud it ſelfe in our lingering, and ſo we loſe our glorious expectation. Occaſion is yet offered vs, and we may take hold on his happy fore-locke; for, it is not number, but Nobleneſſe of minde that giues honor to the actions yſſue. A handfull is enow for a heaped multitude, and while hope holds them, that Altoſaxo is our Load-ſtarre, and we dare doe nothing till he ſhine out with vs, they may be deceiued in their idle ſuppoſition, & we more then maſters of ſo good aduantage. Let therfore their erroneous conceit, lead vs the way to true diſcipline, for a ſodaine and vnexpected onſet, ſtrikes terror in an enemies ſoule, and followes him bothwith flight and ſlaughter. Let their ouerweening pride vſher them, and take we hold on this happy and beneficial councel: which guides ye to vndoubted victory, if with dreadleſſe harts you ply & purſue it.

By friuolous ſuppoſition in an enemy, he is ſooneſt taken tardy.

No ſooner had Caraffa come vnto his ſpeeches period, but all the Captains and Enſignes conſented to him, and a graue conſultation grew immediately, for beſt proceeding in their purpoſe. Hereupon, refection and reſt was generally commãded; and after the ſecond watch, preſent repaire vnto their Colours; where before day-dawning they ſhould bee acquainted with other inſtructions. Imagine heere (as well you may) that euery minde ſate muſing with ſerious conceite, what iſſue the intended fight would ſort vnto; & by this time the Sun was ſet. But now liſten to a wonder, and truly no leſſe in mine opinion. The Dogges which the French had brought to field with them, quite leauing their Campe, all in a troope together entred Nouara, and the Switzers Centinels, with ſuch as walked the round, or kept the Corps du Guard; the dogs fawning on thẽ one after another, euen as if they were already become their Maſters, or ſhortly ſhould; laide downe their eares, wagged their tailes in louing manner, and licked their hands.

Diligence is the conducter to happy ſucceſſe.

A very ſtrãge and admirable accident.

But the Switzers, not intending to haue their priuate cogitations diſcouered, cunningly gaue order, that in euerie part of the City, now at one place, then at another, Drums ſhould ſtill be beaten; that if any ſcouts or ſpies tooke notice of them, they ſhould the eaſier bee perſwaded of their ſodaine comming foorth, as alſo to continue their enemies in Armour ſtill; they hauing all the day before bin ſo prepared, and on horſeback. Thus they ſhaped their outward deſſeignes, while theyr cloſer determinations aimd at other ends, as to ſtrengthen their bodies with food & reſt, and to win another daies reſpit more for their better conteſtation in trial of honor. And let me tell yee, that the Lawes are ſo ſtrict and ſeuere among the Switzers, that if any ſhal dare (in publike view of the Armie) to do any thing cowardly, or with feare, ſhamefull & vnfitting men of valour; he is immediately ſlaine by his following fellow, ſo that the greater feare confounds the leſſe, and begets an honorable death, in ſtead of that which is otherwiſe attended on; with nothing but infamy.

Men can neuer be too cunning for an inuading enemy.

The

The Switzers were carefull for losing the lest opportunity.

The Army consisting of about 9000. foote, made choise of a thousand Horsse beside, men of well tryed and vndaunted valour, to take the charge of eight Faulcons, and to keepe with Maximillian and his Horsse (which indeede were but few, yet of the cheefe Nobility:) while the rest did throw themselues into two battailes, and silently, without beating any Drum, marched towards the enemy two seuerall wayes.

Now Trivulzi, being reputed for a wise and well experienced Captaine, suspected nothing lesse, then that a fewe tyred foote, and also before Altosaxo came; would venture out vpon a stronger power, or hazard any the least fortune of battaile. But vnderstanding that the Enemy was within sight, he cals vppe Trimouille and the other Captaines, giuing order for placing the Ordenance, the signals for fight to be giuen, and what hee knew by discipline or experience, to wait vpon the need of danger.

Opportunitie taken in war, is alwaies attended with fortunate successe.

Such was the shortnesse of time, and the courage of the foe so mounted for fight, that the French scarsely had leisure to bridle their horses, & arm their heads: for they had stood most part of the day & night in Armes, expecting stil what shold be commanded, and at last (though very late) newes comming, that all was whist and quiet at Nouara, had got into theyr Cabines to rest. But the Light-horsse being sooner ready then they looked for, yssueth forth in time conuenient, making a long Wing to the left handwarde, and met the thousand Switzers as they vvere marching on. And they, for more safely shunning the great Ordenance, which played vpon them tempestuously, fetcht a small compas about towards the Riuer of Mora, with intent to passe a Bridge, & so set on the enemies tents in the rere. So marching in a broad way towards the Riuer, they were hotly rent and torne with the Ordenance, and mightily pressed also with the light horsse.

A noble & valiant resolution in Duke Maximillian.

But then Mottina, whose corage could not be quailed, changed his former resolution, and entreated Duke Maximillian, (being then in great daunger, by reason that the Epirotes insulted round about him) to leaue the fight, and returne to the Citty instantly, that so the warres mayne head might be kept, which lay open vnto the tiranny of chances, and there to await the successe of expected victory. Maximillian made an honourable refusall; for such was the constancy of his courage, as he would endure all common accidents of Fortune, rather then be blurd with the least disgrace.

Heereupon, two vnder Captains, and two Ancients seized his horse by the bridle, and renting the Crest from off his Helmet, threw an olde cloake about him to hide his Armes, and forcing him (whether he would or no) led him out of the field with a troope of Horsse, and so conducted him to the Citty, to stand cleare from danger, while they endured the brunt of the day. Afterward Mottina rallied his swaying battell, which (by this time) hadde lost three of their Faulcons; then retiring the wounded into the midst of the battell, and beating back the ouerforward Epirotes, slew there Alexio Bosigna, a noble Grecian Captaine, and so defeated them vtterly.

Alexio Bosigna a Grecian Captain slain

Then rushing into the enemies camp, where the drudges and stragglers beeing slaine, and the soldiers of that station disordered; the carriage and baggage were surprized. But some little vvhile before Mottina had thus preuailed, another company, that tooke a longer iourny through the Corne-fieldes, then growne vp, and receyuing little harme by the Ordenance, had made a fresh charge on the Enemies side.

In what manner the French power were ordered for the fight.

The French forces were ordered into three battallions, Trimouille and De la March hauing the leading of the winges, and Trivulzi the middle Regiment, or maine battayle. As for the Launcequenets Battallion, they had got themselues within a ditch, and betweene the battailes of the Horsse, because their Trench, being a new and somewhat admirable kinde of Workemanship, deuised by Robert de la March, to hemme them in against the chances of warre: vpon so sodaine a comming of the enemy, coulde not by any meanes bee set vp and pitcht. The Switzers bringing their Battailes about towards the right hand, and vppon this squadron of the Germaines or Allemaignes, very couragiously turned to them; perceyuing that victory vvould soone bee wonne, hauing once defeated the cheefest force of the Enemies Armie.

Which

Which the French Captains beholding, gaue preſent order to diſcharge theyr great Ordenance vppon them, breaking through the rankes, with mighty ſlaughter, the Horſſe alſo comming hotely on them on the left ſide. The Ammans of Berne and Zug were ſlaine in this confuſion, which nothing diſmayed their ſouldiers courage, nor their owne vnauoydable perill, and wofull hauocke of theyr Fellowes about them; but chearfully animating themſelues, and wheeling round into a ring, propelled the Horſſe very valiantly, and (as before they had concluded) ſuddenly getting ouer the ditch, ſet vpon the Allemaignes couragiouſly. Now began a fierce and bloody fight, no noiſe or words ſpoken on either ſide; but onely a diſmall claſhing of Weapons and armor, and the ſoft ſighes of ſuch as fell downe dead, giuing their lateſt adiew vnto the world.

The Ammans of Zug and Berne ſlain, & yet the ſouldiers not a iotte diſcouraged.

The Allemaignes, that they might reuenge the ſlaughter of their country-men the yeare before at Pauia; and now (by new renowne) redeeme their glorie loſt fourteene yeares paſt at Bruderholtz, on the confines of Baſile, fought very fiercely. And the Switzers that they might yet (one day) deſtroy their olde and peculiar enemies, fellowes that had runne out of Germany, and (in reproach to the Emperour) ſerued the French King; were not a iot behinde them, either in ſtrength, or feruency of courage.

Where both ſides contend for honour, great muſt the violence of the fight be.

Now, while the Switzers and Allemaigns fought thus at the puſh of pike, Newes came to Trivulzi and Trimouille, that the bagge and baggage were taken; thoſe that were appointed for keeping the campe alſo ſlaine, beſide tumult and ſlaughter in euery place. Which report ſo daunted the Frēch, that a great part of their horſe (euery man being careful for his luggage) ran (without any command) to ouercom it againe.

In another quarter alſo, & at the ſame inſtant almoſt) the third company or battallion of the Switzers, ſhewd themſelues at the front of the French, which Battallion (while the French hadde (in vaine) diſcharged their Ordenance into a VVood ſtanding before them, in regard that the Switzers (to deceiue the enemy) had politikely left a few of the drudges amongſt the trees, as making a ſhew of ambuſhed armed men) had cloſely crept along by a ſide way, by little and little ſtoopings downe, and trayling their Pikes vpon the ground after them.

A ſtratagem of the Switzers to beguil the French.

Now, ſo great was their contempt of the bullets flying about them, and the charge ſo dreadfull, that the French and Nauarrine foote (their Captaine Beamont being ſlaine) two bands alſo of Genewayes and Salucians defeated, and theyr Ordenance taken, and turned vpon their backs that fled; the Allemaignes now beeing almoſt quite deſtroyed, their Tents taken, the enemy ouerthrowing all, and largely Lords of the field; betweene ſhame and feare turned their backes. VVhen all men were thus diſmayed, the Captaines yet continued fearleſſe (conſidering the fearfulneſſe of their preſent eſtate) and went rallieing the diſordered rankes, and turning themſelues vnto the cryes of theyr Companions, made them to abide and fight.

Lewes Lord Beamont ſlain

The vnder Officers and Ancients, entreated them for to exempt all feare, the Lancequenets bare the brunt of the battell, and the fight began to be repaired in all places. But the horſmen, nothing moued with their Captaines encouraging words, ſhamefully fled. For the Switzers although their Captaine Mottina was ſlaine by a piece of Ordenance; yet, hauing gotten the Campe, ſet fiercely and bloodily on the left ſide of the Horſſe, & likewiſe on the right, and then on theyr backes came a greater power with terrible Pikes, to the no little terror of the diſordered horſe.

Mottina Captaine of the Switzers ſlain

In repairing the field, there perriſhed Montfalcon, Captaine to the Duke of Albanies company of horſe, and Coriolano Trivulzi, a young Gentleman of ſingular hope. But, the Allemaignes loſing halfe their men, two Enſignes, and their Generall Floranges very greeuouſly hurt, had fought moſt conſtantly a long while together: but perceiuing nowe the Horſſe to forſake them, the foote in euery quarter to bee defeated, and the great Ordenance taken, accounting flight to be very ſhameful, yet voide of ſecuritie; ſet the points of their weapons vpright, according to their vſuall manner, and yeelded, ſeeking mercy of the victor enemy. In this tempeſt of affliction and confuſion, Robert de la Marche, Lord of Cædan, ſhotte through Montfalcon and Coriolano and Trivulzi ſlaine.

The Allemaignes yeilded to the enemies mercy thorough with deadly ſorrow, beholding his two ſonnes, the Lords Floranges and Gemeſe) engirt by the enemy, and meerly in deſperate daunger of life: vvith a troope of Horſſe, boldly brake into the middeſt of the enemies battell, and they lying among the mangled bodyes halfe dead, pittifully embrued with their owne blood and woundes, laying them ouerthwart the neckes of two Horſſes; to his no little prayſe, both for manly proweſſe and fatherly pittie, woorthily brought them thence, preſeruing theyr liues for future renowne, and in a farre more fortunate field.

The louing care of a Father to his ſonnes.

Thus the Switzers, fighting in three ſeuerall Squadrons or Companies, within the compaſſe of an houre and a halfe, or thereabout. perfected a moſt memorable famous battayle, and vveightie warre.

Diſcipline obſerued among the Switzers.

And although their enemies lay ſlaine before theyr faces, ſtored with goodlie and rich Furniture, which was able to allure them: yet would they make no ſeyſure on the ſpoyle, but kept within care of their Countrey Diſcipline, which permits not to take any armed man priſoner in the battaile, neither to follow him that flyeth.

This made them to ſtand ſtill a great part of the day, as doubting leaſt the French, prouoked eyther by pollicie in their Captaines, or their owne ſhame; ſhould retreate backe againe, and take them at aduantage in deſpoyling the dead. But this feare was much more diſcreete then needefull, becauſe the Enemy kept on ſtill in flight, and Trivulzi galloping too and fro, confounded with extremity of duſt and hoarſeneſſe in crying to them, was vtterly vnable, eyther by foule or faire perſwaſions, or the commanding Authoritie of a Generall, to ſtay the Enſignes or the Horſſe, that throwing away their Lances, ſtroue with greateſt eagerneſſe, who ſhould bee foremoſt.

When confuſion is in an army, perſwaſions prauaile little.

It is reported, that the whole troops of French Horſſe might haue beene vtterly ouerthrowne and ſpoyled in theyr flight, if Duke Maximillian had made an oppoſition but with two hundred light Horſſe: for there was not a French-man that carried a Lance beyonde Seſithes, ſuch was their heate and haſt to be gone. And yet within a ſhort while after, Stivia Sabello, and Corradino Cribelly, with certaine light Horſſe, purſued them vnto the Towne of Trecato: but the Contadines and Peazants, flocking amaine out of the Fieldes and Hamlets to the ſpoile, made a moſt cruell ſlaughter where anie bootie was to be had, at hedges, ditches, and all other places, that hindered the tired French in their flight.

The ſame day the Switzers, gathering together the ſlaine bodyes of their countreymen, carryed them on their ſhoulders into the Cittie, to giue them the lateſt honour of buriall. Amongſt them, were ſlaine a thouſand and three hundered, ſeauen hundred beeing torne vvith the great pieces of Ordenance, and almoſt as many were wounded, but of the French were ſlaine eight thouſand of all degrees.

The loſſe ſuſtained on both ſides.

Duke Maximillian, not a little ioyfull of ſuch fortunate ſucceſſe, ſummoned the Souldiors together, and ioy ſo confounding ſpeech, as he was ſcarſe able to vtter a worde; which appeared by the teares trickling downe his cheekes, gaue them all moſt hearty thankes; and, as a gift of inſtant benefite and pleaſure, all the Victualles then taken, beſide the Ordenance and generall ſpoyle, hee frankely beſtowed vppon them. As for the admirable Trench, wherein conſiſted ſuch vndoubted hope of Victorie, inuented by a warlike witte, brought ouer the Alpes vvith much labour, and great charge: that being taken from the enemy, was ſet vp in a publique place, for a future Monument of that victorie: and this deceyued the Allemaignes moſt, that they holde it vtterly needleſſe to erect their Trenche that day, which lay ſtill in the Waggons, becauſe ſucceſſe ſeemed then to frowne on the enemy.

The gratitude of Duke Maximillian Sforza towards his ſoldiers.

Vppon Conference had afterwardes with Trimouille at Bologna, concerning all theſe matters; he did not friuoloufly impute the fault vnto Trivulzi, for not encamping on his owne grounds (as Trimouille had perſwaded him) in regard of ſpoyling the Graſſe, which then at that time was ready to bee mowne. But Trivulzi, as a man neuer conquered before, yet diſputing on ſeuerall euents happning in the battaile, threwe the maine errour on aduerſe fate, which too much enuyed

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the force of ſudden Chances and vnexpected Euents, for the diſſipation as well of mans power, as of his pollicy: And of the hazards and doubtfull euents of Battailes, and other enterprizes of Warre.

The euents of war moſt doubtfull.

ALthough the ſucceſſe of mens affayrs is moſt vncertaine, variable, & ſubiect to infinit chances and hazards; yet in nothing ſo much as in matters, wherein mans power is moſt ſeene, to wit, in matters of warre, whereof the euents are ſo doubtfull and dangerous, that (as Iaſon ſaide to Epimanondas) He is not wiſe that doth not feare them. And therefore it is reported of Phocion, a moſt excellent Captaine of the Athenians, that although hee was choſen fiue and forty times Generall of their armies; yet hee himſelfe did euer perſwade thē to peace, as fearing the ſucceſſe of warre. And Hannibal hauing bene for 16 yeares victorious in Italy, and forced at the length to defend his owne country, which was Carthage (where Scipio the Romane had already ouerthrowne two great armies of the Carthagenians, and was ready alſo to preſent him battaile) he doubted ſo much the euent thereof, that crauing conference with Scipio, he ſought to perſwade him to peace, repreſenting vnto him the hazard of warre, and aduiſing him to conſider in the proſperous courſe of his victories, not onely what had hapned to other men, but alſo what might enſue to himſelfe, & that to make peace was in his own hands, but if he came once to the battaile, the victory ſhould bee in the hands of God. And laſtly, that Nuſquam minus quam in bello euentus reſpondent. The euents of things do no where leſſe anſwer the expectation of men, then in warre.

Thus ſpake Hannibal, who may alſo well ſerue for an example of his owne admonitions. For though he had bin many yeares together, the ſcourge of the Romanes, and the moſt famous and renowned Captaine then liuing, yea, and was (as it were) growne old with victories in forreigne Countries, euen before the very gates of Rome; yet was hee at length vterly ouerthrowne by a Romane, a young man, inferiour to him in reputation, experience, and forces, and in that battaile which moſt imported him, and wherein (by the iudgement of all men) he imployed all the endeuour, military arte and skil he had, or which could bee required in a moſt prudent and valiant Captaine.

The ouerthrow of Hānibal by a yong Romane Ibid.

This change and decay of fortune in war, may be exemplified in many others, as famous Captaines as euer were; as in the worthy Iudas Machabeus; Cyrus, king of Perſia; Pyrrhus, king of Epyrus; Marcellus; Pompeius Magnus; Marcus Antonius, Competitor of Auguſtus Caeſar; the Emperour Conſtantius; and Heraclius; Belizarius; Edward the third, King of England; our famous Countriman, Iohn Talbot, the firſt Earle of Shrewsbury, whoſe name is yet terrible to the French; the great Earle of Warwicke, in the time of Edward the fourth; Charles, Duke of Bourgongne; Nicholo Pricimico; Lewes the 12. king of France; and now laſtly (in our memory) the Emperour Charles the fift. All which (with many other whom I omit for breuities ſake) hauing by many notable victories got the fame and renowne of moſt famous Captaines, were eyther at laſt diſgraciouſly killed, or elſe receyued ſome great ouerthrowes, or had (at leaſt) ſome notorious decay of their former and wonted proſperous ſucceſſe.

The chance & decay of fortune in warre exemplified in many famous Captaines. Maccab. l. 1 c. 5. Iuſtin. in lib. 1. Plutarch. Polydor Virg. Phil. Comin. Guicciardin. Pedro Mexia. Surius.

The conſideration heereof, had mooued diuers moſt valiant Captaines, to auoide the aduenture of battaile as much as might be, and rather ſeek to ouercome their enemies by ſtratagems, practiſes, and delayes: as Q. Fabius Maximus, who (by ſuch meanes) diſtreſſed Hannibal, much more then others could do by main battailes. And therefore Ennius the Poet ſaide of him; Cunctando reſtituit rem; He repaired the State of the Romanes by delayes. And it is alſo written of the valiant valiant Franciscus Sforza Duke of Millaine, that he would neuer ioyne battaile with an enemy, but when hee could not otherwise choose.

Philip Commin. cap. 17, 26, & 125.

And Lewes the eleuenth, K. of France (who was no lesse valourous in war, then prudent in peace) feared nothing more, as Philip de Commines testifieth, then the hazard of warre; and especially of a battaile, which by all meanes possible hee sought to auoid. Insomuch, that when any enemie entered France; hee procured to make peace or truce with him, whatsoeuer it cost him. As appeared when Edward the fourth King of England was ther with a strong Armie, to whom he gaue a great summe of ready money, and granted to pay him a tribute of fiftie thousand Crownes a yeare, besides diuers pensions to his Councellors, and other hard conditions; rather then hee would hazard a battell with him, knowing the casualtie thereof, and that as Commineus saith, Vne bataille perdu a mauuaise queue; A battaile lost hath an ill taile or consequence. For, it redoubleth the hope and courage of the Victors; it astonisheth and discourageth the vanquished; it shaketh the fidelity of subiects, it ministreth matter and opportunity of conspiracie to malecontents, of reuolt to Townes, and of alienation to confederates, who commonly sway with the good successe. And for this cause, not onely King Lewes the eleuenth, but also other wise Princes haue vsed, when an enemy hath bin ready to enter their countries: to dismantle all the Townes in his way that were not tenable, and to fortifie and make strong the rest, retyring thither all the Cattle and prouision of the countrey, and destroying all the Corne vppon the ground, thereby to consume him with Famine, long siedges, and all kindes of delayes whatsoeuer, rather then seek to ouerthrow it by a maine battail. This was very prudently practised by Frances the first, King of France, at such time as the Emperor Charles determined to enter into Prouence, with a great and puissant army: insomuch, that when K. Frances vnderstoode, that the people of the Countrey resisted the destruction of theyr Corne, and other commodities; he straight way sent his armie to destroy it. Whereby the Emperour finding all Townes fortified, and no prouision abroad was left them, were forced (after hee had besiedged Marseilles some certaine moneths) to retire himselfe for lack of victuals.

Martin du Bellay. The pretentions which Frances the 1 K. of France, vsed against the inuasion of Charls the Emperor.

And this I haue thought good to signifie by the way, for that Phillip de Commines, and Martin du Bellay (both of them notable Historiographers, and Councellers, the first to Lewes 11. and the other to Frances the first) do greatly approue this manner of proceeding in these Princes, and propose it for a rule of state to al such Kings & Princes, as, beeing in possession their Kingdomes and States, are inuaded by Forreiners; though for those that inuade and seeke to conquer, Phillip de Commines, thinketh it meete and conuenient to seeke battaile, to make short worke, by reason of the difficulty to bee succoured, and of the infinite dangers & inconueniences, which happē by delayes to an armie of strangers in forraine countreyes. Besides, hee that inuadeth and seeketh to conquer, commonly aduentureth no more but his present armie, and that in hope to gaine a Crowne, whereas the Prince in possession, aduentureth his whole state against nothing, and a state is lost (many times) with the losse of a battaile at home, if the victory bee well followed.

Philip commin. cap. 29 The inuader ought to seek battel, & why.

But nowe let vs returne to speake of sodaine Chances, and to touch some particularities, thereby to shew very manifestly and euidently, the weakenesse of mans wit and power, and the casualty of warlike attempts.

The diuers casualties of warlike attempts.

Let vs first and formost consider, by howe many accidents the mightiest armies are many times quite dispersed and dissipated, and the greatest enterprizes ouerthrowne: as sometimes it falleth out by the death of some one man, sometimes by the dissention of Leaders and Captaines amongst themselues, sometimes by the mutiny of souldiers, sometimes by meanes of a Tempest or vnseasonable weather; sometimes agayne by plagues, or other diseases in the Campe; and sometimes againe (as Guicchiardine noteth in his second Booke) by a commandement eyther not well vnderstood, or ill executed; by a little temeritie or disorder, which may chaunce to happen by some vaine worde or speech, euen of the meanest Souldiour. And last of all (saith hee) by infinite chances which happen at vnawares, vnpossible to bee foreseene and preuented, by the wit or counsell of any Captaine.

Heereto I also adde out of Comminæus, that be the counsell neuer so well taken, and the plot neuer so well layed: yet it is neuer or seldome executed in the fielde, as it is ordayned in the Chamber. And that sometimes, by the least motions or occasions that may bee, the victorie is wonne or lost: Which (saith hee) is a great Mystery, whereby Kingdomes and States do rise or fall. And heereuppon, the selfe-same Authour groundeth two Conclusions, no lesse piously then wisely. The one, that no humane wit is able (of it selfe) sufficiently to gouerne an Army of men: and the other, that God reserueth to himselfe the successe of battels and disposeth of his victory at his wil and pleasure.

Phil. Com. in c. 5 Plots are seldome or neuer executed in the field, as they are ordained in the chamber.

Idem Ibid.

This will be made cleare by examples, by the which, I will first of all shewe the force of sodaine chances in battaile, and other enterprizes of Warre. And after that all victorie proceedeth from the prouidence and hand of God, and not from the power and pollicie of mortall man. As concerning the first, we see many and sundry times, that great designements are broken, and potent armies dissolued by accidents, without any force or stroke of the Enemie. When Lewes the Emperour (called Lewes of Bauaria) was in Italy, with a great and puissant armie, and readie to besiege Florence, vpon the confidence he had in the valor and assistance of Castruccio of Pisa, whom the Florentines feared more then any man liuing; it chanced that the sayde Castruccio dyed: whereuppon, the Emperor broke his designement, and returned into Germanie with his army.

Pedro Mexia, in Lodouico Bauaro.

Also, in the time of the great Schisme which was holden betwixt Vrbane, the sixte Pope of that name, and Clement the false Pope, who was called Clement the seuenth, and liued in Auignion; Lewes Duke of Anjou, Vnckle vnto Charles the sixt, King of France, went into Italy with an huge armie, wherein hee hadde aboue thirtie thousand Horsse, partly to deliuer Ioane, Queene of Naples, (who was besiedged by Charles Durazzo, Nephew vnto Lewes King of Hungaria) and partly to depose Pope Vrbane, in fauour of Clement. When he had already entered into Italy, and began to make warre in the Territorie of Bologna (which belonged to the Church) and was likely in al mens opinion (by reason of his great forces) to obtaine his desire in all he pretended; he sodainly fell sicke and dyed; whereuppon, all that mightie and inuincible army, dispersed and dissolued it self; and euery man returned from whence he came.

Paul. Emil. in Carolo 6.

Lewes Duke of Anjou, his death in Italy.

The like hath chanced diuers times, by some great plague and mortalitie in armes, as in that of the Christians, which beganne in Thunis in Affrica, vnder the conduct and commaund of Lewes, the ninth, King of France: which armie was so molested with pestilence, that it vvas forced for to rise from the siedge at such time, euen when the Towne was brought to extremitie, and must needs haue rendred it selfe within few daies.

Paul Emil. in Lodouico nono

Furthermore, such is the force of sodaine feares which fall vpon men, sometimes by meere chance, without anie iust cause, that the greatest armies are vtterly ouerthrowne thereby. And no maruel seeing no man is so valiant, but that hee may bee seized and transported with a sodaine feare. And therefore the Lacedemonians, before they went forth to fight, were woont to sacrifice to the Muses, to obtaine their assistance, against the fierce and furious assaults of sodaine passions. VVhich taking reason many times at vnawares, and (as it were) at an aduantage, doe so oppresse it, that they bereaue a man of all iudgement and discourse for a time, and no pasion more then feare. VVhereof I my selfe saw a notable experience, in a most valiant Spanish Captaine in France, which happened in the time of a League, who going out of his Garrison, with certaine Troopes vppon an occasion, and meeting with the Enemy by chance, where hee least suspected, tooke such a fright thereat, that he ranne home with might and maine, and tolde vs (for I was ther at the same instãt time) that all the Souldiers were cut in peeces, and that hee himselfe escaped very hardly. Neuertheless, within fiue or sixe houres after, they all returned home safe, and not so much as any one man hurt, though they came scattering one after anoanother, for they all fledde as well as he, and the rather by his example. Which would haue vtterly disgraced him, if in very many occasions (before) hee had not got the reputation of one of the most valiant men of his Nation, in which respect it was rather wondered at in him, then blamed.

Rome surprized by Arnulphus the Emperor throgh a sodain feare Sigon. de Regno Italico. An. 896

But to shewe the like effect of sodaine feare in whole Armies, vpon diuers accidents. When Arnulphus the Emperor besiedged Rome, it chanced, that a Hare (being started by some of the Camp) ran towardes the Citie, and that a great number of the souldiers pursued her with very great rowt and cryes, which the Romains seeing from the Towne, and conceyuing that the enemy meant to giue some furious and violent assault thereto, were surprized with such a feare, that they abandoned the wals and Rampiers, and the enemie espying, and taking the opportunity thereof, scaled the walles, and tooke the Towne.

Also, when Sigismond, King of Hungaria, (who was afterward Emperour) gaue battell to an Army of the Turkes, neere to Nicopolis, and was assisted with exceeding great numbers of the French, and of diuers other Nations, the French Horsse being in the vantgard, and seeing themselues (after a while) hardly oppresst, alighted from their Horsses to fight on foote. But their Horsses beeing loose, ranne all backe toward the campe, which the Hungarians and others that were in the rere perceiuing, and imagining that the Horsse-men were slaine; tooke such a fright therewith, that they ranne away, whereby the Turkes got a notable Victorie, with great slaughter of the christians, especially of the French, who wer almost all slaine.

The Christiãs ouerthrowne by the Soldan through a sodaine feare. Paul. Emil. in Philippo secundo. Nauclerus in Chron.

Also at Ptolomais in Ægypt, which the Christians besieged two yeares together, the Soldane, who came with an armie to succour it, gaue them an ouerthrowe by the like chance; of a Horse, which beeing let loose, ranne backe to the Campe. For whereas diuers souldiers called one vnto another to stay him, many ranne out of their rankes (to take him) with such disorder, that they seemed to those that vvere behinde, and some-what farre off, to run away; whereuppon, a great part of the Christian Army began to flye. And this happened at such a time, as the Soldane with his Soldiers (being put to the worse) were running out of the field: who seeing the Christians flye, called backe his men, charged them afresh, and got the Victorie.

Charles Duke of Bourgogne, besiedging Grauson, & vnderstanding that the Switzers came to succour it, went to meete them, to giue them battaile. The Souldiers of the vantgard, as they wer marching, meaning for to take a better way, retired a little backe. The rereward seeing the same, imagined that they fled, and began themselues to flye, whereupon the rest also did the like; and (in conclusion) the Duke and all ran away, abandoning their artillery and Campe, to the spoile of the Switzers, who were exceedingly enriched thereby, and yet slew only but seuen men, for all the rest saued themselues by flight. Thus much concerning sodaine feares, whereto I will adde a few more examples of other accidents.

And the armies being so nere together, that they were ready to Charge one another, Mascezill beganne to make motions of peace; & receiuing some hard and crosse language of one that bare an Ensigne, stroke him vppon the same arme that helde it, wherewith the Ensigne fell, and diuers others that followed, seeing it, and conceiuing that he which bare it had yeelded it, went in great hast, and yeelded themselues. VVhereuppon, Gildo fled away with a great part of the armie, and the rest surrendred themselues to Mascezill.

Also in the battell of Cirignola, in the Kingdome of Naples, betwixt the Spaniardes and the French, a worde spoken by the Count of Nemount, (who vvas then Generall of the French) beeing misconstrued by his Souldiers, was a very great cause of their ouerthrow. For, the battell being already begnnne, and the Count finding withall, that he could not passe a cerain Ditch (ouer which he had thought to haue ledde some part of his Armie, to charge the Spaniardes on the other side, cryed vnto the Souldiers that followed him, Backe, backe; meaning to lead them another way. But they not knowing the cauſe, vnderſtood that he bad them flye, which they all began to doe: and others (ſeeing the ſame) followd their example. It chanced alſo at the ſame time, that the Count was ſlaine; whereupon the whole Army of the French ranne away, and lefte the fielde and victorie to the Spaniards.

Battell loſt by a little diſorder.

Againe, whoſoeuer hath reade any thing of the ancient warres, or hath any experience in theſe our times; cannot be ignorant, what confuſion may bee bred in a battaile, by a little diſorder growing vppon ſome ſodaine accident; whereby Armies (many times) are cauſes of theyr owne ouerthrow. As it chanced to Hanniball in his laſt battaile with Scipio, wherin his owne Elephants turning backe vppon his Horſſe-men, ſo brake & diſordered them, that the Romans taking aduantage thereof, did eaſily put them all vnto flight.

The battell of Yury in Frãce in Anno 1590

The like to this, hath happened ſometimes in this our age, and namely, a few yeares paſt in France, in the yeare of our Lord, 1590. in the battaile of Yury, betweene the King of France, Henrie the fourth, and the Duke de Mayne, then Generall for the League. In which Battaile, the Horſſemen of the League, flying backe vpon their owne foote, brake them in ſuch ſort, that theyr Enemie entring withall eaſily defeated them.

The victory in battels dependeth ſomtime vpon winde & weather aſwel by land as ſea.

Laſtly, to ſhew euidently the force of chance in warre, is there any thing more vncertaine or vnconſtant then winde and weather? And yet neuertheleſſe, thereupon (many times) dependeth the ſucceſſe of battailes, and other warlike attempts; eſpecially by ſea, where the winde & weather do predominate, and check al the power of men. For, who is ignorant, that be the Nauie neuer ſo potent, it can neyther goe out of the harbour, nor arriue where it ſhould to encounter the enemie, if winde and weather be not fauourable? Which is alſo as neceſſary and importãt for obtaining victory in a conflict by ſea, wherein, the firſt aduantage that an expert Sea-man ſeeketh to get of his Enemie, is to winne the winde of him: which winde alſo changing (ſometimes) during the Conflict, doth giue both the aduantage and victory to the enemy. As it fell out in the Battaile of Lepanto, which happened betweene the Chriſtians and the Turkes, wherein the Winde beeing firſt fauourable vnto the Turkes, ſodainly changed, and draue all the ſmoake of the Artillerie and ſmall ſhot vpon them, whereby they were ſo blinded, that they were very eaſily and ſpeedily ouerthrowne.

The battell of Lepanto, betweene the Chriſtians & the Turkes. Surius in Commentar. 1571.

And thus it chanceth in like manner in battailes vppon Land; and therefore wiſe Captaines ſeeke not onely to haue the Sunne, but alſo the winde on theyr backes: for, it often falleth out, that a ſtorme of Haile or Raine in the face of an enemy, or a violent winde, driuing either the duſt, or the ſmoake of ſhot and Artillerie vpon it, giueth the victory to the enemie. As in the famous battaile at Cannas, when Hanniball ouerthrew the Romaines, and ſlew foure thouſand foote, and ſeuen and twenty hundred horſe, and tooke three thouſand and three hundred priſoners. He had the winde in his fauor, which being in his backe, and withall ſo violent, that it draue the duſt into the Romaines eyes, and did greatly facilitate his victory.

The great victory of Hanniball at Cannas. Tit. Liuius in Dec. 3 lib. 2.

The like, or rather a farre greater victory, got Scipio Aſiaticus againſt Antiochus, King of Syria, whom hee put vnto flight, and ſlew fiue thouſand foote, and foure thouſand horſe, with the loſſe only of three hundred forty nine men, by the helpe of a foggy miſt, and a ſhowre of raine. For the miſt was ſo thicke, that the huge Army of Antiochus could not one part of it ſee another: whereas it wrought no ſuch effect in the ſmall Army of the Romaines. And againe, the raine ſo weakned the Bowes and Slinges of Antiochus his Souldiers, that they ſerued to little or no purpoſe: whereas the Romaines vſing onely Swordes and Darts, receyued no damage thereby. And to come neerer to our time, wee reade that Adolphus the Emperour was ſlaine, and his vvhole armie cleane ouerthrowne and vanquiſhed by Albertus, by reaſon that the Sun vvas in their faces.

Alſo, amongſt ſome other cauſes of the loſſe of the great Battaile of Ghiaradadda, betweene the Venetians, and the French, Guicchiardine obſerueth, that a certain ſhowre of raine; which fel euen as as they were fighting, made the ground so slippery vpon a sudden, that the foote of the Venetians could not hold their footing, to defend themselues against the French Horse. By which meanes they were easily broken, and the greater part of them slaine.

How little confidence is to be had in the pollicy or power of man for the good successe of a battaile.

Thus then we see, how great a sway chance beareth in battailes and enterprizes of warre, and consequently, how little confidence is to bee reposed in the witte, pollicy, power, and endeuour of men, for the good successe thereof. VVhich dependeth vpon infinit accidents, chancing so diuersly (according to the difference of persons, times, places, and circumstances) that neyther the wisedome of any Generall can foresee them, nor any diligence, dexterity, or industry of Souldiers preuent them, though al should concurre in the highest degree. For be the Soldiers neuer so obedient, dexterious, & diligent, and the Captaine neuer so wise and valiant; yet what assurance is there of good successe, when a sudden danger shall so dismay both Captaine and Soldiers, that neyther the one shall know what to command, nor the other how to obey; when an erronious conceite of some few, or bad example of some one, or a word mistaken, or a blast of winde, or a shewer of raine, and innumerable other accidents, not possible to be fore-seene or remedied, shall giue the victory to the weaker, yea, to those that are (in a manner) vanquished before? Therefore I will thus conclude this Chapter, that the successe of Battailes, and all warlike attempts, dependeth wholly on the will and secret iudgements of God.

How our Ancients and reuerend Predecessors, punished such in former times, as durst do any dishonour to their Mistresses.

The Authors reason for this Chapter heere set dowe.

IVVas the more willing to insert this Chapter, to the ende that the youth of our times may know and vnderstand, in what veneration and regard, our Ancients held the honour of Ladyes, Gentlewomen, and Mistresses, and not without very great reason. For it is a notorious treason, & high point of dishonesty, that he who abideth as a seruant in a house, should entermeddle in seeking to purchase the loue of his Mistresse: nay, and that which is worse, to obtaine the cheefest point of al. In the compassing or contriuing whereof, he maketh the husband infamous, doth iniurie to the wife, scandalizeth neighbourhood, and ouerthroweth himselfe.

Plut. in lib. Matr. cap. 9.

Plutarch, in his Booke of Mariage writeth, that the Licaonians had a law, that if any stranger were found to conferre in secret with the Mistresse of their lodging, they had their tongues cut out of their mouthes; and if they presumed any further, then it was the losse of their liues. Iulius Cæsar caused one of his Captaines to be beheaded, becausse he had dishonored the Mistresse of the house where hee was lodged: without attending any excuse he could or should make, and without any complaint vrged by the husband.

Macrobius writeth in his Saturnales, that such persons were reputed infamous among the Romanes, as should giue any commendations of the Mistresse of a Family, eyther in regard of her beauty, modest behauiour, or any other seemely quality. For such praises they reputed, to giue euident notice of more priuate knowledge, and such knowledge vrged speech, and speech being the discloser of the hart, would afterward grow to the shamefull acte. In the like manner Aulus Gellius recordeth, that the same punishment was inflicted on him that dishonored his Mistresse, as to him that corrupted a vestall virgin: which penalty was, to haue his body cut in foure parts, or else to bee stoned to death aliue.

Concerning diuers kindes of Salutation, vſed among our Ancients, when they met together.

THE maner that our Elders obſerued in their Salutations one to another, was very diuers, and each one according to their Countries vſe.

The Idumæans. The Idumæans at their meetings, vſed to ſpeake theſe words: The Lord bee with you.

The Hebrues. The true Hebrues, ſaluting each other, ſaid; God ſaue you my Brother.

The Philoſophers. The Philoſophers were wont to ſay; Goe in a good houre.

The Thebanes. The Thebanes ſaid; God giue you health.

The Romans. The Romanes ſalutations were as if they they would ſay; God ſend or giue you good fortune.

The Sicillians. The Sicillians ſaid; God keepe you.

The Carthagenians. The Carthagenians did not vſe any ſalutations by ſpeeches at their meetings, but as a ſigne of loue and friendlines, they would kiſſe their right hands each together, and then kiſſe one another.

The Moores. The Moores likewiſe at their meetings, would kiſſe the right ſhoulder of one another: and when they tooke leaue for their departing, then they would kis each others knee.

The Italians. In Italy, they haue three ſeuerall kindes of ſalutations for a whole day. In the morning they ſay, Dio vi dia il buono giorno; God giue you a good morrow: At midnoon, Dio vi dia ſalute; God giue you health. And at euening they ſay, Buona ſera, Good eeuen. They ſay alſo many times, Mi raccommando, I commend me to yee. And after two or three houres of night is paſt, then they ſay, Dio vi dia la buona notte; God giue you the goodneſſe of the night. Sometime alſo they are accuſtomed to ſay, Iddio vi contenti, God content ye.

The Valentians. In the kingdome of Valentia in Spaine, when men meete together, they ſalute each other in this manner; Gentle Sir, you are well come. And at the departing, the one ſaith, God remaine with you: and the other replyeth, Goe in a good houre.

The Cathalognians. In Cathalognia, ſuch perſons as chance to meete together, ſalute one another thus; You are very well arriued heere Sir.

The Caſtillians. In Caſtile ſome vſe to ſay, God keepe you: others, God be with you. And when they leaue each other, the one ſaith, God conduct you: and the other anſwereth, The bleſſed Angels beare you company. Some alſo vſe to ſay; With your good grace and fauour. And others, Adieu Sir. In the Court ſome vſe to ſay, I kiſſe the hands of your mercy. And ſome other, I kiſſe the feet of your Honour or Worſhip. Which Courting ſalutations are altogether vaine, and (for the moſt part) deliuered with feigning and diſſimulation. For many offer to kiſſe the hands and feete of one another, that would much rather cut them off, thē any way kiſſe them, deſiring indeed to ſee each others vtter ruine. And certainly (me-thinks) that men of worth, authority, and reſpect, ought not to vſe any ſuch ſalutations; becauſe to kiſſe the feet, hath bin accounted a matter of great dignity, and appertaining to the Pope onely. And to kiſſe the hand, is a gracious fauour afoorded by Kings and Princes, to ſuch Subiects as they thinke worthy of ſuch grace.

Court Salutations.

The vanity of Court ſalutations.

But without gadding after ſo many kindes of vanities, and diuerſity of idle words, it is a matter meete and reaſonable, that wee who are Chriſtians, ſhould imitate Ieſus Chriſt our Lord and Sauiour, ſaluting one another, with ſuch words as he ſaluted his Diſciples, ſaying; Peace be with you. Our Redeemer enſtructed vs alſo, to ſalute houſes at our entring into them, ſaying; Peace be in this houſe.

How Chriſtians ſhould ſalure one another.

Epaminondas ſaid, that vntill the age of thirty yeares, we ſhould ſalute men thus: You are very well come hither, for all this while it appeareth, that they are but come into the world. From thirty vp to fifty, then to ſalute thus; Well bee yee; becauſe that then they know what maner of thing the world is. And from fifty deſcending downe againe, to ſay, Goe in a good and bleſſed houre. For then it appeareth, that they are beginning to take leaue of the world, and that as they had an entring into it, ſo there muſt needs be a departing from it.

An excellent obſeruation of the famous Epaminondas

CHAP. XVII.

What a commendable thing it is to pardon iniuries, especially in Princes and great Lords.

An excellent question mooued to Cæsar, and by him as worthily answered.

IT hath euermore bene a praise-worthy thing, to pardon iniuries and offences: which Princes and great Lords should neuer be vnmindfull of, but continually to remember the words, which Iulius Cæsar spake to Manilius. Who (on a time) demanding of him, what that was which being performed by him, he therby thought to receiue the greatest glory, and in remembrance whereof hee ought most to reioyce? VVhereto he thus answered. By the immortall Gods I sweare to thee Manilius, that I neuer thought my selfe to haue merited glory, for any other thing whatsoeuer in this life, nor any other else so much to reioyce me; then in pardoning such as had iniuried me, and rewarding them that did me seruice. VVords vndoubtedly worthy of praise, pleasing to heare, notable to reade, and necessary to be followed. For althogh Iulius Cæsar beleeued as a Pagane, yet his works sauoured of a good Christian: and we miserable men, beleeuing all as Christians, yet our works come farre short of such beleefe, through the tentations of our corrupt flesh. Because humane wretchednesse is grown to such an encreasing in these cases, that many would pardon the iniuries of their enemies; and yet notwithstanding, dare not do it for feare of men: who vnderstanding, that such a man is willing to forgiue his enemy, presently vse to say; that hee rather doth it through weaknesse and cowardise, then in any respect of charity.

CHAP. XVIII.

From whence (at the first) came the title or name of King, and also of Emperour.

OVR reuerend Fore-fathers, according to the diuersity of Nations, called their Princes by diuers names. The Egiptians called their cheefest Lords and Rulers, Pharaohs: The Bythians, Ptolomeis: The Parthians, Arsacides: The Albanes, Syluies: The Sicillians, Tyrants: And the Argiues, Kings. Heere we are to vnderstand, that long since in former times, to be a King, was not any dignity, but an office onely: as euen now (among vs) is a Gouernour of the Common-wealth.

Diuersity of Nations caused diuersity of tytles giuē to their Princes.

Plutarch, in his Bookes of Common-wealth, saith, that at the beginning, al such as gouerned, were called Tyrants: but afterward, all those that gouerned badly, were tearmed Tyrants, and such as ruled well were styled Kings, as a different note from them. For as the King maintained common vtility, and preferred the safety of the Commonwealth, before his owne respects and commodities; so the Tyrant referred his dominion to his cupidity and profite, alledging his will onely, as the sole reason of all his vniust commands. The King fed the flock, and the Tyrant deuoured it: the one obeyed lawes, & the other commanded aboue them, and also would breake them when himselfe pleased: this man was equall, the other vniust; the one obtayned the kingdome by vertue, and therein conserued it; the other vsurped it by power, and so by power held it.

The diffrence of the words Tyrant and King, and the seuerall manner of their gouerning in the Common-wealth.

From the beginning of the foundation of Rome, the Romanes created Kings, to bee gouerned and defended by them: neuertheless, they afterward found such kinde of gouernment to be so bad, as they would endure no more but seuen Kings. And after they had banished perpetually the Tarquins for their tyranny, cleansed or purged the Citty, and slaine their offerings: they made a solemne oath, for them, their children, and successors, neuer more to create any Kings, eyther to gouerne Rome or them. But forasmuch as the Romane Common-wealth, had formerly receiued great benefits by their Kings, as by Numa Pompillius, and that their Kings only had the charge of sacred things: they resolued to keepe the name of King perpetually in their Citty, to the end, it should not appeare, that with the expulsion of the Kings, they derogated from diuine Religion and Seruice.

be chosen, who (for the times to come) should beare the name of the Sacrificing King, to be cheefe Priest, and Superintendent in hallowed things, and exempted from going to warre. The first man that had this honour in Rome, was Manius Papirius, a Patrician, a louer of peace & quietnesse: who was high Priest in the Temple of Iupiter, and called King.

Now, as concerning the name of Emperour, at the first it was not giuen by the Romanes, to such as held any soueraigne power; but onely to their Captaines and Generals, who had effected some worthy acte or enterprize in warre. And no other man was called Emperour, but onely the Colonell of the army, because hee gaue command there. Nam Imperator dictus est ab imperando; For Imperator or Emperour is deriued of commanding: which office was held but for a limited time, and that being past, it was deliuered ouer to another.

But after the battaile of Pharsalia in Thessalie, wherein Cæsar vanquished Pompey: the entire gouernment of the Roman Common-wealth, beeing fallen into the hands of the Dictator Cæsar, he coueting to make the authority and soueraigne power, to be proper and hereditary, wold not take on him the title of King (albeit he was so in effect) because that name was hatefull to the people. And they being desirous to please him, granted that he should be named Emperour, a name acceptable to all) especially to Souldiers, and which was onely but the fift dignity of the Senate. For the first was the Sacrificing Priest, whom they called King: The second, the Dictator: The third, the Consull: The fourth, the Tribune of the people: and the fift, the Emperour.

There was also diuers other degrees of State, as the Censor, the Prætor, the Proconsull, the Questor, the Edilis, and other of order and ranke, whereof shall need no question heere. By this meanes then, Iulius Cæsar hauing gotten to be perpetuall Dictator, all such as succeeded him in the gouernment of the Romanes, were also called by the name of Emperours, and Cæsars likewise by his sir-name, which was giuen him Ab Elephante cæso. As afterwards of Augustus, the Emperours which came in succession to him, vsed also to name them-selues euery man Augustus.

CHAP. XIX.

What was the reason, and vpon what occasion, Kings in ancient times were created & established: And of the Dignity Royall.

FOR two principall causes, Kings were at first anciently established: One, to the end they should preserue common iustice and equity, by which bond humane society is maintayned, and without which the lesser would be oppressed by the greater, all things being done by power, and no right obserued. The other, because they should defend the goods and safety of their Cittizens from enemies. The necessities of life assembled men among themselues, and conioyned them by a naturall society: which hath beene caused by mutuall succours, support, and offices fitting mankinde. The beginning of this society, was reason and speech, whereby wee are differing from all brutish creatures. Reason cauled many and infinite artes to bee inuented, and speech (which is the interpreter of the spirit) learned, enstructed, & communicated them, not onely by this mutuall coniunction; but also hath stored the life of man with many commodities.

Two reasons for the establishing of Kings.

The beginning of humane society.

The first and cheefest, was the coniunction and coupling of man with woman, whereof was made one house, wherein all things were to thē in common, & thence ensued plurality of houses. For Brothers, Sisters, and Cosins contracting mariage together at the beginning, and could not afterward (by multiplicity of their children) be contained all in one house, they went to dwell in other houses. So of one house at the first, came Borroughs and Villages, euen as Colonies of kindred. Finally, from Borroughs & Villages were deriued Cities, and becomming to bee peopled, were enclosed with walles, confirmed with lawes, and enstructed with sciences: for without all these, they could not be preserued from the conspiracies of men, and therefore were to bee ruled by some one, and couetousnesse of reigning is so great, that all would command, and none obey, or yeeld reuerence.

The first coniunction of man and woman, & what ensued theron yea,& before they will set foorth to Sea, fore-seeing future perils, make their recourse to a good Pilot, in whom they repose their trust and safety: Euen so as requisite is it, to giue the gouernment of a Citty, to such a one as may well conduct the common-wealth, and render iustice and right to euery man. For where there is no Gouernor (saith Ecclesiastes) the people are scattered. All things which consist on a certaine order, should be referred to one head or cheefe. Which we may obserue in some brutish creatures; as in Bees, who obserue a forme or image of a common-wealth among them. This world it selfe (the parts whereof are conioyned among themselues, by admirable order and arteficial workmanship) would fayle and come to nothing, if it were not gouerned by the power of God. Therefore such as cannot endure the dominion of many, will submit themselues to the regiment of one; in whom, for opinion of wisedome and goodnesse, they may safely repose their trust. Not onely then to the Medes (saith Herodotus) but also to all other people, Kings (vertuously enclined) were established for the administration of Iustice.

Of one house at the first followed the peopling of Townes and Villages.

Ecclef.7,9.

Herdot.in l. 4.

In elder times, kingdomes came not to the Sonnes of Kings, but was giuen to such a one, whom they thought would wisely and religiously maintaine the foundation of the Common-wealth, by concord and iustice. In those olde dayes, a King gouerned in euery Citty, and after other Townes became annexed to the principality and dominion of one: Kings had beginning to gouerne ouer diuers people, and thence ensued, that according to the names of Kings, the Regions were so called, which the Romanes tearmed Prouinces. Moreouer, euery King should excell one another in iustice and power; to the end, that he may the better vnite his people by equitye, and defend the Common-wealth from enemies. And by good right it may be sayd, that Royall Maiestie ought not only to be decorated with Armes: but ought also to be armed with lawes, that at all times, both of warre and peace, he may both manfully and vprightly gouerne.

The world would perish if the power of God did not gouerne it

The first beginning of Royall and Kingly Iurisdiction.

Royall Maiesty ought to be armed with good Lawes.

Now, speaking of this Royall dignitie, doubtlesse it is so great and holy, that Kings being protectors and defenders of societies among men, do therein imitate the prouidence of God: the office and action of whom, is to rule and gouerne all things, & therefore by good right, they may be tearmed Vicars and Ministers of the almighty and soueraign Rector of the whole world, and he himselfe hath called them Gods. Plato reputed a kindome among mortall men, to be a diuine and soueraigne goodnesse; because it came neere to the diuine nature, and power celestiall. How farre then some do surpasse each other in many things, so a King doth excell al other men in dignity and honor, not humane but diuine.

Kings imitate the prouidēce and goodnes of God.

Porus, a King among the Indians, being taken prisoner in battaile, when Alexander demanded of him, after what manner he would be vsed; Like a King, quoth he. Againe he vrged the same demand, & still he returned the same answer. For (quoth hee) all is comprized vnder the word King. The name of King was of so great veneration among Nations, that the Indians and Persians adored their Kings as a diuine image, and helde it for their highest and cheefest happinesse, to haue at any time but a sight of them. Poets renowned Iupiter by the name of king, more then any other title. And in ancient times, Kings did not onely gouerne the common-wealth; but also had the charge and super-intendency of Ceremonies & Sacrifices. Kings then are sacred, considering that the Hebrewes with one and the same oyle, annointed both their Kings & high Priests.

Let vs see and obserue, how one kinde of reason, and the like of vnderstanding, do gouerne in man like a Queene. Let vs consider the other works of nature, which by a wonderfull kinde of concord, restrained and combined together, depend only vpon one. So that if things which imitate nature, are the most perfect and excellent, then questionlesse, Monarchy is most absolute and entire, farre aboue Aristocratie, Democratie, Oligarchy, or Laocratie, yea, all other kindes of gouernment, where eyther many persons, or few, or the people themselues do rule and command. And like as it is a very hard matter, to finde many men good and honest, rather then one onely: so is it more hard, that the manners of one man shold be so soone corrupted, as of many. So that Things imitating nature, are the most perfect and excellent.

The world to be gouerned by one man onely.

that if the whole world were gouerned by one man, there would not bee ſo many differences, manners, cuſtomes, nor diuerſities of religion, nor ſo many warres, offences, and ſlaughters. But when Cities are vnder the ſway and power of many, they are then ouer-toyled with troubles, ſeditions, and diſſentions, by reaſon of inordinate willes and affections in the greateſt: who licence themſelues to all euill, beeing partiall and diſcordant one towards another. Whereof God ſaid by the mouth of his Prophet; Many Paſtours haue ruined my Vine.

To ſerue and attend vpon the command of many, is no meane ſlauery

Let me demaund one queſtion, is it not much more ſeruile and ſlauiſh, to attend on the willes of many, then of one onely. Nay, are not the couetous deſires of one man ſooner to be ſatisfied, then of many? you cannot chuſe but grant it, and I craue no better iudgement. For as it is neyther good nor neceſſary, that in one houſe there ſhould be many fathers of the Family: euen ſo is it neyther ſecure nor profitable, that the Common-wealth ſhould bee gouerned by the authority of many. Whereof Licurgus gaue good aſſurance, when ſome one required, that Democratie ſhould bee eſtabliſhed in Sparta, hee returned this anſwer; Begin it then in thine owne houſe firſt.

The power & prerogatiue of a King by his Lieutenants.

Yet very true it is, that one man onely, how great or ſmall ſoeuer in power & prerogatiue, cannot (of himſelfe) prouide for all occaſions, and in all places: but he may by his Lieutenants (as God by the miniſtery of his Angels) exerciſe his authority throughout all his Lands vnder his obedience, as hauing the eye of his minde euery where, for contayning his Subiects in quietneſſe, and cauſing iuſtice to be adminiſtred vnto them. I ſay then, as a concluſion to this Chapter, that wee ought to liue, in and vnder the vnity of theſe foure things; Of one God; Of one King; Of one faith; And of one Law.

CHAP. I.

The Preface or induction of the Author

BEcause amongest those Commonweales of Freedome, gouerned by a certain number of Lords, many haue held opinion, that (at this present time) the Commonwealth of the Switzers is the cheefest, next vnto that of Venice: I haue many times questioned with diuers people, that were no Switzers, how, and after what manner this Common-wealth was first established & gouerned. For they did highly maruaile. that so many people, hauing but little, should ally and encrease themselues in so short while, euen as enclosed within a defensiue wall or circuite, and continue firmely knit together in peace, for such a large and long expence of yeeres.

The common wealth of the Athenians.

The Common-wealth of the Athenians, excelling all the rest in Greece, was assembled and selected of many people, and from many places, not only into one countrey, but also within one & the same city. As for the Commonwealth of the Achaians, composed of twelue towns or cities, it did not last long, nor prosper: but after it continued in some dignitie, vnder Aratus and Philopoemen, soone afterward it was subdued by the Romaines, because she abused her owne liberty. After the death of Iosbua, the Common-wealth of Israel, exposed (thorow her owne fault) to pillage and violence of enemies, was many times protected and defended by Iudges and valiant persons, which God had raised vp for that purpose: but at the last, the twelue Tribes, as beeing glutted or surfetted with their own liberty, made choise of a King out of their own motion

The common wealth of Israel.

In the time of our Ancestors, by the intermedling and solicitation of the Emperour Frederick, the Townes of Suaba* v. nited themselues together, and (by that meanes) were esteemed inuincible: but hauing rashly attempted (and by badde conduct) war against the Switzers, the former confederation lost much of the latter. Which afterward, it seemed she recouered againe, when the confederates expulsed the Duke of Wirtemberg, and ruinated all the Castles of Suaba, detained by diuers theeues and robbers. So that soon after the time of their league was expired they became so strange one to another, that they who before were their friendes and allies, were reputed by them as theyr greatest enemies, and ioyned themselues with those that had most molested them; by which meanes, in verie few yeares this league was vtterly lost and vanished.

*By some termed Pomerania.

All Switzerland is no other but one Commonwealth, & the reason therof.

Now albeit there are many people, & a great number of Townes and Cities in Swetia; yet is it neuertheleſſe, but euen as one City or Commonwealth. I know that learned men will hardly credite this, becauſe they ſuppoſe vs to haue no ſociety, nor any coniunction of gouernment, and ſo (by conſequent) it cannot be ſaid, that Swetia can yeild the body of a Commonwealth; conſidering alſo, that the Townes are not tyed to the ordinances of other Cities or Townes, except with their owne good will and liking, as in the Conuentions priuate of aſſociates. So it is, that in the ſame degree of Commonwealth, whatſoeuer hath paſſed by plurality of voyces, it bindeth all the Subiects of that Commonwealth. As for my ſelf, I am not willing to conteſt with the learned: for I freely confeſſe the trueth of their ſaying; if wee conſider matters exactly. But in regard that the whole Nation of the Switzers conſiſteth of common eſtates, gouerning many Prouinces in common, deliberating altogether on the affaires of peace and warre, hauing (almoſt) a like Lawes and Cuſtomes, and are ſo ſtrictly conioyned by perpetuall Conuentions: admit that this were not one onely Commonwealth, and in ſuch nature as hath beene formerly ſpoken of; yet notwithſtanding, wee that write and ſpeake of theſe matters ſome-what more popularly, do imagine, that we ſhall not much faile, in calling this aſſociation and league, the City and Commonwealth of the Switzers.

Paſſage by plurality of vowes, bindeth all ſubiects.

The nation of the Switzer conſiſteth of eſtates in cõmon.

Thus then this Commonwealth eſtabliſhed by perpetuall alliances, hath conſerued her liberty for the ſpace of more then two hundred yeares, with great concord, and incredible vnion of hearts of all the Switzers. For albeit that once or twice (according as it hapneth almoſt ordinarily in all great Commonweals) they haue beene prouoked and ſtirred to ciuill warres: yet notwithſtanding, thoſe troubles were immediately pacified, and al reunited together againe in ſincere & cordiall affection; embracing the laudable deſire of their predeceſſors, to ſtudy ſtill for the freedome of their Countreyes maintenance. Neuertheleſſe, there are ſome kind of men (enemies to the Switzers) ſo impudent, as to reproch vs, that in Heluetia, euery man is a maſter or commander, and that our Anceſtors, hauing put to death, or troden vnder foote the awe of our Noblemen, by theſe meanes entred into this liberty, contrary vnto all right and reaſon. Others do (more truly) confeſſe, that our Noble-men did offer ſuch outrage to our predeceſſors, both in words and deeds, that they had iuſt occaſion to vndertake Armes, which all that while they managed very ſharpely, as it happeneth among people much abuſed and prouoked. But to ſatisfie the irreſolution of ſome friends, who vnderſtand not the eſtate of our affaires, and to rembarre the calumnies of the enuious, I thought good to imploy my labour, in deſcribing the forme of the Switzers Commonwealth, by reprouing all vntruthes to the full, and aſcending to the heighth of their originall.

How Commonweals are maintained.

Troubles ſoon ended, & mutuall loue embraced.

The reaſon for the Authors writing of this diſcourſe.

All Heluetia or Switzerland, is at this day conſidered in three parts: for firſt of all, the thirteene Cantons haue alwayes allyed and combined themſelues, as into one body of a City. And theſe are they, Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, Glaris, Baſile, Fribourg, Soleurre, Schaffouſe, and Appenzel. In the ſecond place are the aſſociates and confederates of the thirteene Cantons, to wit, firſt of all, the Abbot and Towne of S. Gal; next, the confedered Griſons, the Byſhop of Sion, and the whole countries of Valais, Rotuille, Mulhouſe, and Bienne. Conſequently, the territories or Bayliwickes, which are gouerned by the 13. Cantons in common, to witte; Turgow, Bade, the Rheguſces, now adayes called Rhinthall, Sargans, the free Prouinces, the inhabitants of Lugano, Locarne, Mendriſe, and the Vale Madie; whereto may well bee ioyned them of Bellizone, who are vnder the dominion of the three leſſer Cantons The cities and townes of the Cantons & confederates, are Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Zug, Baſile, Fribourg, Soleurre, Schaffouſe, S. Gal, Coire of the Griſons, Syon in Valais, Rotuille, Mulhouſe, and Bien ne for all the reſt do dwell in villages.

Moreouer, all of them abide not in Switzerland, neither within thoſe limites propoſed by Cæſar in his Commentaries: for of the thirteen Cantons, Baſile is as a quarter apart, which was anciently called the countrie of the Rauraſians. Schaffouſe is in Allemaigne or Germany, on the further ſide side of the Rhine: and one part of them of Glaris and of Vri, do touch (as some conceiue) with the Grisons and the Alpes. As for the associates, except the Abbot and Town of S. Gal and Bienne: al the rest are out of the limits of the ancient country of Heluetia. First we consider, that the Grisons retaine still their name and olde country of the* Rhætians. Next is the Valasians, who in elder times were called Viberins, Sedusians, and Veragrians. Rotulle is in Germany, and Mulhouse towardes the Franche Comté. Now as concerning the Iurisdictions or Baylywickes, they of Rhinthal and of the Sargans, are Grisons. But they of Lugano, Locarne, Mendrise, of the Vale Medie, and of Bellizone, are Italians by originall and Language: the other Iurisdictions remaine in Switzerland.

And heere you are to vnderstand, that these Cantons doe not hold equal authority ouer the distinct countries; but according as the associations haue beene made in diuersity of times, euenso are the authority of the Cantons diuers. They of Turgow, hold as their Lords and heads the seauen most ancient Cantons, namely, Zurich, Lucerne, vri, Suites, Vnderuald, Zug & Glaris. Berne, Fribourg, & Soleurre, do vndergoe some right in criminall causes. For the Prouostship or Precendency of the Empire (as they vsed to tearme it) and iudgement of criminall processes, was heeretofore referred to them of Constance, as their due: but among other conditions of peace, after the warre of Suaba, this authority was granted vnto the Switzers, which appertained equally to the fore-named Cantons, becausse they all ioyned together in the selfe-same warre. Moreouer, those seuen Cantons commanding at Bada, did the like to them of Sargans, Rhinthal, and ouer the Free Prouinces also. True it is, that in their gouernement of Bada, they associated the men of Berne with them; and they of Appenzel in the gouernment of Rhinthal; and all the Cantons to the foure Baylywickes, which are on the confines of Italy. Bellizone is subiect to them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald: and such (at this day) is the condition and estate of the Switzers Common-wealth. Now, I purpose to shew the times, the cause, and the principall Articles of the Switzers league. Also, what hath beene the estate of each Canton, before they became allyed together, and what their dues and rightes haue beene, and are. Lastly, what warres they haue maintained since their League vvas made.

CHAP. II.

Of the three first Cantons of the Switzers.

IN the yeare after the natiuity of our Lord Iesus Christ, 1307. they of Vri, Suts, and Vnderuald, wer the very first that Cantonned themselues. They were tearmed Swaines or Boores of the countrey, dwelling in vallies, and in their owne Language, stiled, Die drey Lander, also Die drey Waldstett: And, in time, Lucerne came into the fourth place. They dwelt in the Valleyes of the Alpes, betweene the Grisons countrey, the Vale of Liuiner, and high Valais, and were seated betweene the Canton of Zurich, and the countrie of Ergow. Some doe affirme, that they of Suits, are descended of the Cimbrians; they of Vri, of the Taurisci; & they of Vnderuald, of certaine banished Romanes; and indeed, their magnanimity in war, declares them to be issued of generous Ancestors.

The three first Cantons, and how they Cantonned themselues.

Of whom and whence these people are seuerally descended.

Their Annals do testifie, that the Emperor Lewes, sonne to Charlemaign, at the request of the Byshop of Rome, graunted these people liberty, to bee gouerned by Lawes made among themselues, & gaue them many other Priuiledges, for theyr faithfull seruice in warre against the Sazarins, in behalfe of the cittie of Rome. For the Sarrazins, who in those times much troubled Affrica, hauing inuaded Sicilie, came likewise into Italy: where they tooke some places: and afterward marching vnto Rome, easily made themselues Masters of the Vatican, vvhich then stood voyd of any defence. There they robbed the Temple of Saint Peter, breaking downe the gates thereof, that were of siluer and very great value, and afterward burnt and destroyed it. Hauing continued there diuers dayes in determination to surprize the whole Cittie; they heard tydings (as Historians say) that a great band of soldiers, belonging to * Cisalpine Gaule, came to the succor of Rome, which made them forthwith recoile, and to wast all the plaine Countrey about Rome. Among other badde seruices, they robbed the Temple of S. Paul vpon the way to * Ostia, and stuffed it with such fires, as the more part thereof was vtterly ruined. From thence continuing on theyr course in spoile and rauage, euen so far as mount Casinum, they stole away all the Iewels and Ornaments of the Abbey, and defaced a great part thereof. Thence getting vnto the sea shore, and lading their Shippes with their stolne booties: finding them ready to set saile, they lanched forth into the maine.

Now, the Annales of Switzerland or Heluetia, do say; that these three first Cantons, and they of the Valley of Hasell, were present at this fore-mentioned succour and supply, and passed two seuerall times into Italy, vnder the conduct of a certaine Italian Marquesse, named Guy. They pursued the Sarazins, and cut their rere-gard in peeces, bringing back a great spoile from this ouerthrowe of theirs, which they altogether gaue to the Temple of S. Peter, euen all that they hadde gotten from the enemy. In regard wherof, the Pope (as a recompence for so great a benefite) obtained (on theyr behalfe) great priuiledges from the King of France; and moreouer, presented them with those Ensignes or Standards; which yet, in our daies, they vse to beare in war.

Notwithstanding, the Emperor Lewes sonne to Lewes the Debonnaire, and yongest sonne to Charlemaigne, gaue them of Vri, to the Abbey which he had builte at Turegum, now called Zurich, where his daughter Hildegarde was Lady Abbesse: and the wordes of the Donation (truely translated out of the Latine Coppie) are these which follow.

The lands & people of Vri giuen to the Abbay of Turegum.

The Donation of the Emperour Lewes to the Abbay of Turegum.

According to the autentical latine Coppy

WE giue to our Abbay, founded at Turegum, where Saint Felix and Saint Regula rest in the Lord with their bodyes; our Bourrough or Towne of Turegum, scituated in the Dutchy of Suaba, in the Territory of Durgan, with all the appurtenances and dependances in diuers charges: to wit, the village of Vri, with the churches, houses, and other buildings aboue named: The slaues, male and female, young and old, lands eareable and desert, Woods, Meddowes, pasture grounds, Fishponds, Riuers, Ports, Passages, things found and yet to find, with all olde rents and reuennewes. Moreouer, our Forrest named Albis, and generally all those things fore-mentioned, that eyther now or heereafter do and may appertaine vnto vs, without reseruing or retaining any thing whatsoeuer.

The ancient priuiledges & liberties of Vri, not frustrated by this gift.

But it is not to bee thought, that this Donation did wholly abolish the ancient priuiledges and libertie of them of Vri: For, if we may credit them, the Emperor gaue not the Seigneury of all the country to this recited Abbay, but of one Village or two onely. Moreouer, if it were so that the whole valley of Vri had bin vnder subiection to this Abbay, yet notwithstanding, it coulde not much preiudice their freedome: becausse such as were any way subiect to Monasteries or Conuents, were obliged vnder certaine conditions, and enioyed their liberties in the meane while, onely their seruice to the Church excepted.

Beside, they receiued their Gouernors or Prouosts of the empire, to take knowledge and censure in causes criminall, without any appeale. They of Vri also did formerly do the like; and as concerning other causes, their Iudge, whom they tearme Amman (as much to say, as Maior or Bourgomaster) with his Councellors or Assistants, was chosen from among mong the people, by good knowledge had of him and them, & they are to prouide in common for the affayres of the Commonwealth. They of Suits & Vnderuald do gouerne themselues in the same manner: and among them, men belonging to the Church, haue some power and priuiledges. In these seuerall quarters wer good store of Noblemen. As among them of Vri, the Barons of Attinghuse, Schwynsberg and Vtzinge: The Lords of Sillini, Winterberg, Mose, Sedorf, Spiring, Meier, of Bourgs and of Oeztfeld. Among them of Suits, the Lords of Stouffacker, Rogkenberg, Schuuanow. In the quarters of Vnderuald, the Lords of Wolffenschiess, Blumenec, Rudentz, Altnach, Waltersperg, Lembourg, Liebourg, and Huneville. At the beginning, these Gentlemen carryed themselues very kindly with the other Inhabitants, and part of them serued as vassailes to some neighbouring Earles. But when they grew rich thorow succession of times, they began to misprize the people, and to subiect them to theyr vniust commands. The Gouernors, who ought to conserue the peoples libertie, making semblance of not seeing such harsh behauiours: fauoured the Gentlemen, as being next in condition to themselues, and by those meanes both augmented & supported their power.

Lords & Noblemen in these Cantons seuerally distinguished by their places.

The fourse or originall of confusion in any estate whatsoeuer.

In those times especially, not onelie the freedome of the Switzers Cantons, but likewise of many Townes in Germany, were in manifest danger. The Emperors were excommunicated, and in open warres assayled by the Popes, so that all Germany was diuided into two factions, one part wherof followed the Popes power, and the other the Emperors. The people of Switzerland, and some few of their Nobility, tooke part with Frederick the lawfull emperor, who (for that cause) renewed and reconfirmed the auncient priuiledges of their liberty. They of Suits can yet shew the Letters Patents of Frederick the second, written in the moneth of September, in the yeare 1240. wherby he receiued them of Suites into the safegard of the empire, as members thereof; and that they should not be any way alienated or estranged thence, hee confirmed their priuiledges, and called them people of free condition.

Partialities do euermore proue most dangerous.

Their liberties renewed and confirmed by the Emperors Letters Patents.

On the contrary side, the most part of the Nobility, especially such as were as vassals to Conuents and Abbaies, which were then in very great credit, they followed the Popes faction. Hence sprung the hatreds, enmities, and first foundation of ciuill dissentions, all taking a wonderfull increasing in the Interregnum of manie yeares, after the death of Fredericke. Neuertheless, in those very times, the forenamed people did (euen then) enioy their intire liberty, although many ambuscadoes were prepared to depriue them of it: as appeareth sufficiently by a deed patent of confederacie for three yeares, by them of Vri and Suits, with them of the Towne of Zurich, the tenor of which confederacie followeth thus.

Prouiſion for death of any of the twelue in the time of confederation

These Letters of alliance, made an 100. yeares before that they of Zurich hadde contracted perpetuall alliance with the three firſt Cantons, do euidently declare how thoſe people were euermore iealous of their liberty, without offering wrong neuertheleſſe vnto any perſon in conſeruing it. Now, about ten yeares after this alliance made, the Empire being trobled with factions, in regard it was deſtitute of an Emperor, and Heluetia much moleſted by the ouermuch licenſe, which the Nobility tooke to themſelues day by day: the three Cantons hauing heard Raoul of Habſpourg (who was afterward Emperor) to be highly commended for many Vertues clearely ſhining in him, gaue him yearly pledges, and electing him for their head, made alliance with him, that theyr liberty might be maintained at the ſwords point, if neede required. They of Zurich, Baſile, and Strasbourg did as much at the very ſame time. The like did manie free Townes of Germany, being called vnto their ſuccour, and gaue mony euery yeare to the neighbouring Princes, to the end, they might be ſecured by their meanes.

The Switzers continually ielous of their liberty.

The Nobilitie inſulted too much ouer the people.

Alliance made with the Emp. Raoul to preſerue their liberty.

The authority of Raoul, beeing buſied in other warres about Zurich, Baſile, and Strasbourg, comming ſhort of abilitie to repreſſe the inſolence of the Nobilitie: at length the people (being too much trod downe by great mens outrages) vndertooke Armes, and expelled them forth of the Countrey that had raiſed this diſorder. This warre continued twelue yeares, about the yeare of our Lord, 1260. and ſome few yeares following. And in this warre, all the Cantons beganne to fortify the paſſages of their Countreyes. They of Suits builded a Tower at Mount Sattell, fortifying and cutting off the great highway. They of Vnderuald, did dam vp the Lake with a ſtrong prouiſion of ſtakes & ſhrubs, toward the village of Stantz, and fortified the Port, by meanes of a Tower which they builded there. The year 1273. it came to paſſe, that Raoul of Habſpourg was elected King of the Romaines. Then the Gentlemen of Switzerland went vnto him, and gaue him to vnderſtand, that the people had rebelled: on the contrary, the people maintained, how much the Nobility had outraged them. The King hauing heard both parties, and ſeene the priuiledges of the people, gaue ſentence to their benefit, and made peace between them and the Noblemen expulſed out of Heluetia, whither they returned again for the more part. As for the reſt of the country, the king did generally confirme Gouernors in the name of the Empire, & not of the houſe of Auſtria: which Gouernors (from their beginning) did not dwell in townes or villages, but kept themſelues in their Caſtles, whence they came, twice or thrice yearely, to iudge in caſes of proceſſe, but more eſpecially in criminal cauſes.

Gouernors placed in the Emperors name, & not in the houſe of Auſtria.

In our dayes, there are Towns in Germanie, that receiued ſuch Gouernours of the Empire, who managed no other matter, but onely cauſes criminall, & had no other occaſions in Townes to attend vpon, but only thē. And ſo far off was king

Raoul

King Raoul abridged none of the Switzers liberties.

Raoul, from diminiſhing the liberties of the Switzers: as rather many of the Cantons ſtood beholding to him, for not only the confirmation, but likewiſe the amplification of their priuiledges. For, without depending on them of Zurich; he confirmed and augmented the priuiledges of the Canton of Suits, in the 18. yeare of his Empire, as appeareth by his Letters giuen at Bada, in the yeare 1291. where, in expreſſe termes, they of Sutts are called people of free condition.

They of Suits were termed free people.

True it is, that the King himſelfe tooke very great paines, to make the houſe of Habſpourg great: but he left to the Switzers their liberties entire. Either becauſe he would not be accounted vnthankfull, in ruinating thē that had ſuccoured him, and ſhewne themſelues faithfull in his right, before he was Emperour, perſwading himſelfe alſo, that his affaires would proſper the better, by hauing the Switzers his loyall friends and aſſociates, then to make rebels of ſubiects, who would carry but bad affection to the oppreſſors of their liberty: Or elſe in regard, that hauing (but a very little before) ioyned the Dukedome of Auſtria, as alſo of Allemaigne or Suaba, to his other poſſeſſions, he might thereby imagine, that it would beget him a generall hatred, to faſten on things of ſuch ſlender conſequence, and that all the profite hee could procure, by vſurping ouer the Switzers, could not value the ill-will he ſhould gaine thereby.

Auſtria and Suaba ioyned to the Emperors other rights.

Adolph de Naſſau, who was ſucceſſour to Raoul in the Empire, confirmed to the Switzers their priuiledges. By meanes whereof, the Switzers were highly hated of Albert, Sonne to Raoul, and enemy to Adolph. This Albert was the very greateſt aduerſary and perſecutor of the liberties of the Switzers. Hee had a great number of children, and to aduance and enrich them, hee began to ſtretch foorth his wings ſo farre as poſsibly he could, & eſpecially he reſolued, to prouide a new kinde of principality in Switzerland. Hee being become Emperour, attributed many things to the houſe of Auſtria, that appertained to the Empire: which made him offenſiue and inſupportable to his neighbours, in being ſhameleſſe, to get to himſelfe whatſoeuer he deſired, eyther by vniuſt demands, or elſe by manifeſt violence. And becauſe Eccleſiaſticall perſons were very powerfull, he practiſed by all meanes, eyther to make ſale to them of their iuriſdictions, or elſe to make them acknowledge him and his childrē, as their hereditary and perpetuall Tutors & Protectors. In this manner he dealt with the Colledges and Conuents of Strasbourg, Baſile, Conſtance, Coire, S. Gal, the Hermitage, S. Blaſe, Diſentz, Pfæuertz, Rinow, Wettinghen, Muren, Interlach, Trubic, Certia, Seconn, Schenniſis, Zurich, and many other places beſide. By the ſelfe-ſame cunning, he ſollicited & oppreſſed the Earles and Barons of Switzerland or Heluetia, to put themſelues into the ſafegard, and become vaſſals to the houſe of Auſtria. Among others were the Lords of Vilſow, Rotenburg, Reynſpourg, Eſchenbach, Albourg, Wolhuſe and Grencinge.

Church priuiledges inſulted vpon by the Emperor Albert.

Lords made vaſſals to the houſe of Auſtria, by the Emperours cunning.

In former times, the Colledges and Conuents depended vpon the Empire, & Lords & Gentlemen did neuer acknowledge any other Soueraigne vpon earth, but the Emperor onely: but this Albert laboured to faſten all to the houſe of Auſtria. Wee may eaſily iudge of his violence towards ſtrangers, by his bad carriage to his owne proper Nephew, to whō he would neuer (although hee was very many times thereto required) render the Hermitage paternall, which he gouerned in quality of a Tutor. But the Abbot of Saint Gal, two Colledges of the Towne of Zurich, and the Count of Hombourg, could neuer be brought to that point, to acknowledge them of Auſtria for their Protectors, neyther to ſell them any portion of their iuriſdictions. They continually alledged their ancient priuiledges, and would not permit, that they ſhoulde be diſmembred from the Empire: which much incenſed and offended the Emperour, who had practiſed vpon the rights of many other, eſpecially the Conuents Secoun, Murbach, the Hermitage, Interlach, Diſentz, and Lucerne, who had giuen him all that appertained to them, at Glaris, Lucerne, Suits, and Vnderuald. Howbeit, they had formerly promiſed (by verie authenticall letters) to the inhabitants of thoſe places, neuer to alienate them to any other. But all this while, Albert cunningly wonne the harts of ſimple people, and by goodly promiſes, made them to ratifie theſe alienations.

The Emperors cruelty to his owne Nephew.

Tyrants doe alwaies meete with ſome people that will reſiſt againſt their deſignes.

Hauing (by theſe meanes) gotten footing

The Emperor Albert a great enemy to the Switzers liberty.

Tyranny is cautelous in his proceedings, to compaſſe his intentions.

The practises of the Emperor Albert, to subiect them of Suits and Vnderuald.

ting in the round neighbouring Countries,& bought some Castles of the Conuents, in the Territories of the forenamed Cantons: hee began to looke into some meanes, whereby he might become Master of Suits and Vnderuald, which being enclosed by thē of Austria (that domineerd ouer the Hermitage, Glaris, Zug, Lucerne, & other places thereabout) caused many to imagine, that except hee could preuaile against thē too, they wold quit their liberty as the other did. Neuertheles, Albert being desirous to reach the height of his desire, by such meanes as he had propounded to himselfe: sent in Embassie to them of Suits and Vnderuald, the Baron of Liechtenberg, Gouernor of Alsatia, and the Baron of Ochsenstin, two of his intimate Councellers. They addressed themselues first to thē of Suits, and perswaded them to yeeld themselues into the protection of the house of Austria, who were very beningne Princes, & vnder whose dominion they might liue much more peaceably, thē formerly they had done vnder the Empire, dismembred and rent in peeces (as it were) while the Princes were in debate about the election of Emperors. They further added that they of Austria had the reuennes of many Conuents in those very quarters, and that if they refused; by displeasing Albert, they might well conceiue, that their affaires would but badly carry themselues; but in doing the contrary, his highnesse made them promise, of all honest and amiable entertainmēt, that a Prince could affoord them.

Faire words are of no cost to the enemies of free peoples liberty.

Threatnings of a Princes disfauour ominous.

The men of Suits, hauing bene aduertised before, concerning the intention & demaund of Albert, by Garnier, Count of Hombourg, Lord of a neere neighbouring Country, called La Marche: a man not well affected by Albert, because he had refused to yeeld himselfe vassale to ỹ house of Austria: And hauing conferred with them of Vri and Vnderuald, returned thus their answer to the Ambassadours. That the Kings and Romane Emperours had giuen them faire and ample priuiledges, carrying expresse charge, that they should neuer bee dismembred from the Empire: wherefore they were fully resolued, in imitation of their Ancestours example, to continue firmely ioyned to the Romane Empire. As for the Monasteries of Murbach and Beron, whose rights and reuenues (especially about Suitz) were then in the hands of the Austrian Princes, hauing formerly promised by authentical instruments, neuer to alienate themselues to any other authority whatsoeuer: If they had kept their promise, they would haue done the like in duty to them. But seeing that they had broken their faith, and all former contracts were vnnaturally cancelled: their example was no warrant to them for the like. Moreouer, they would render to Albert and his children, Princes of Austria, such fidelity and obedience as they ought to do: entreating Albert, seeing he was Emperor; that he would not permit them to be diuided from the Empire. Beside, in regard his Predecessours had confirmed their priuiledges to them of Suits (which himselfe as yet had not done) they therefore againe did humbly entreate him, that he would vouchsafe to confirm them. They also desired the Ambassadors, to returne this their answer to his Imperiall Maiesty, and to entreate on their behalfe, that he would benigntly receiue them.

Wisedome & good councell is neuer wanting in them that maintain their liberty by lawfull meanes.

Bad presidents do not merit to be followed when their extendure is to generall preiudice.

The Ambassadors hauing this answer, went to deale with them of Vri & Vnderuald: who (according to that which had beene accorded on among them before) made the selfe-same answere as they of Suits had done. In all the forenamed Villages, they did nothing else but shew to the Ambassadors, the Letters Patents and priuiledges, granted them by Fredericke, Raoul of Habspourg, and other Emperors, together with the letters and consents of the Monasteries: all of them making humble entreaty, that they might not be compelled to see al those things frustrated. But the Emperor hauing heard the Ambassadors, was highly offended at the answer, because the Switzers not only refused to acknowledge them of Austria for their Lords, & would not willingly be separated from the Empires body: but also declared, that they would yeelde to no disiunction from the Monasteries, by which meanes, all the precedent attempts of Albert, built vppon great cost and trauaile, were vtterly disappointed.

Vnity is requisite among such people as desire to preserue their libertles.

The Emperor greatly offended that his expectation was disapointed.

In some short while after, they of Suits, Vri and Vnderuald, hauing againe sent their Ambassadours vnto the Emperour, to obtaine confirmation of their priui-priuiledges: hee answered them in choller, that hee would satisfie their requests, according as they had done his demands. And that hee had deputed certaine Gouernors, which he purposed to send vnto them, and by whom they should more amply vnderstand his minde.

Ambassadors sent to the Emperor by the Switzers.

Following this intention, hee sent as Gouernors, the Knight Grisler, and Peregrin Landberg. Grisler was appointed for Suits and Vri, and made his abiding in an olde Castell aboue Suits, called Cusnach, and beside, hee builded another Fortresse on the Land of Vri. Landberg, the Gouernour of Vnderuald, had two Castles, to wit, Sarne aboue the Forrest, and Rotzberg beneath, which Forrest diuided the country of Vnderuald iust in the midst. These two Castles did formerly belong to the Conuent or Colledge of Lucerne, & the Maiors or Bourgomaisters made their dwellings there: but the Emperor Albert had solde them to the house of Austria, and there he appointed Garrisons. These deportments were something nouell and strange to them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald: for till that time, these three seuerall places together had but one Gouernour, who (ouer and beside) was many times Gouernor of Zurich and other Townes. Hee remained in his Seigneuries out of the Cantons, and euery yeare once or twice (being called) hee came thither to iudge in law-cases. The rest of the time, he had a Lieutenant chosen among the Country people, that executed his charge But now there was appointed two perpetuall Gouernors, keeping Garrison in the very strongest parts of the Country: which the people were constrained to endure, onely in feare of the Emperour, and in regard beside, that those places were in the power of the Austrian Princes.

Extraordinary Gouernors Castels erected, and Garrisons placed in the Country, are the beginning of manifest tyranny.

Multitude of Gouernors are very dangerous in any Commonwealth.

At the beginning, these Gouernours shewed themselues very courteous and affable to all men: labouring by blandishments and faire lookes, to winne the peoples harts, & to subiect them to the house of Austria. But perceiuing that these carriages did little auaile them, they began to checke and oppresse the people, by the command of Albert; who was againe greeuously enraged, by reason of a new league or alliance (made for the space of ten yeares) betweene them of Suits, and the Count of Hombourg. Tyranny thus encreasing day by day, Ambassadors (in name of the three Villages) were sent to the Emperour, who would neyther see nor heare them: so that they were constrained to declare their Commission to his Councellers. The summe whereof was, that being people of the Roman Empire, they had obtained very ample franchizes and priuiledges of the Emperors: whereof they were now in danger to bee despoiled, and oppressed by an irkesome and insupportable tyranny. For the inhabitants of the recited places, were without cause, or vpon very slender occasion, immediately imprisoned, & pressed with nouell exactions. Beside all this, euery man in particuler, was compelled at a certaine time, especially the first day of the year, to bring presents to the Gouernors, which neuer had beene put in practise before. In which respect, they most humbly desired the Councellers, to intercede on their behalfe to the Emperour: that such charges might bee taken from them, and that their auncient priuiledges might bee confirmed and put in full force againe. But the Emperours Councellers hauing conferred and agreed together, made answer; that the Villages themselues were the cause of this oppression, and that the Emperour was thus seuere to them, because they would not follow the example of Luceane, Zug, and Glaris, in yeelding thēselues to the house of Austria. Which doing, and making more account (then formerly they had done) of Albert and his children; they shold find him a Prince that would vse them very kindly.

A cunning tricke in the Emperour, whereby to frustrate and auoid the peoples complaints.

New exactions & gifts to the Gouernors enforced on the people

Such as the Master is, such commonly are his Seruants.

Gouernors enter like Angels, but continue and goe out like diuels.

The Deputies hauing receiued this answer, returned without doing any thing else: in the meane while, the tyranny of the Gouernors (being fauoured & winked at by the Emperour) grew more and more to greater strength. In a certaine Valley of Vnderuald, called Melchtall, ther dwelled an aged rich man, iealous of his Countries liberty, and one that had bene the cheefest in councelling his compatriots, neuer to subiect themselues vnto the house of Austria, but carefully to preserue their ancient liberty, which mā was named Henry of Melchtall. Landberg sent a Seruant vnto him, with charge to bring away with him a couple of Oxen. Wherto Henry answered, that he knew not himselfe ſelfe to be culpable of any crime, whereby the Gouernour ſhould exact ſuch amends of him: and albeit hee had committed ſome offence, yet hee ought not thus to extend his authority vppon his goods, before he had beene heard & condemned. The ſeruant being of humour anſwerable to his Maſter, arrogantly replyed, that inſtantly he wold driue thence the Oxen: and if he ſtood in need of them to plough his Land, his Country lubbers ſhould ſerue to draw in the yoake. Thus ſpeaking, hee tooke the Oxen out of their yoakes, and made himſelfe ready to driue them away.

Landberg was a most tyrannicall Gouernour.

The extortions of Landberg, witnessed in the History of Henry de Melchtall.

Oppreſsion is an eaſie matter to procure impatience in a Sonne, ſeeing his Father iniuried.

Arnoul, a luſty young man, and Son to Henry, mooued at this outrage offered to his father; gaue the ſeruant a ſound blow with a cudgell, as hee was driuing on the Oxen, and chanced to breake one of his fingers: but fearing the tyranny of his Maſter, he got immediately to the top of the Mountaines, and withdrew himſelfe among them of Vri, where hee kept cloſe with one of his kindred. Landberg vnderſtanding al that had paſt, ſent out for Henry Melchtall, demanding of him what was become of his Son. Henry made anſwer, that he knew not where he was, as indeed hee was meerely ignorant of his flight: whereat the Gouernour was ſo furiouſly enraged, that he cauſed the old mans eies to be pluckt foorth, droue away his Oxen, & deſpoyled him beſide, of the moſt part of his goods. This cruelty brought him into the hatred of all the people: but in regard of Alberts power and oppreſſions, commanding ouer them very ſtearnely, there was no man (as then) that durſt ſtir againſt him. And becauſe wicked courſes grow to a great head, when ouermuch licence is permitted to them: euen ſo inſolent iniquity in the Gouernors, did driue them out of one miſchiefe into another.

Tyranny may iuſtly be tearmed the Mother of wrong and iniuſtice.

Tyranny blindfolded by his villanous companion concupiſcence, and chaſtiſed by the iuſt iudgement of God.

Neere to the Abbey of Engelberg, and to the Village of Wolffenſchiez, in a place named Alzelen, there dwelt a country mā called Conrad de Bomgarten, maried to a very faire and beautifull woman. It chanced that a Gentleman, named Wolffenſchieſz, being Lieutenant to the Gouernor, returning from Engelberg, & paſsing by Alzelen, to goe home to his houſe at Rotzberg, found this womā in a meadow, buſied about ſome commendable exerciſe. He vnderſtanding that her husband was abſent, commanded the woman to make him ready a Bath, wherein he might waſh himſelfe, becauſe he was ouer-trauelled with heate and labour. The woman not daring to make refuſall, did as the tyrant had commanded her. Proceeding on further in his intended villany, he preſſed the woman to put off her garments, and come into the Bath to him; wherein ſhee promiſed to obey, prouided, that two varlets, which attended on him, might withdraw themſelues, as accordingly they preſently did vppon their maſters command.

One lewd intention euermore draweth on another.

The woman vſing ſome delay, yet feigning preparation of her ſelfe to come into the Bath; got recouery of a doore behinde in the chamber, and fled away in great feare and anguiſh. Her husband returning from the Forreſt, chanced to meete her, and vnderſtanding what had happened; entred his houſe, and with an Axe or Hatchet, which he then had in his hand, ſlew the Lieutenant ſitting in the Bath, and ſo he receiued the chaſtiſement due to his wicked attempt, vpon the honour of a vertuous modeſt woman. The Gouernour ſought all means to reuenge his death: hut he was ſo hated of all men, as he could not execute any thing. Beſide, the villany and indignity of his Lieutenant, with-held him from daring to require any helpe of the Country: in regard alſo, that he who had done the deed, was fled into the Lands of Vnderuald, & kept himſelfe hid among them of Vri. Some ſay, and among others, Eternilerus, and Stumpfius in his Annales of Heluetia, that this man was the Gouernour himſelfe; who ſeeking thus to violence an honeſt woman, became ſo ſlaine. But they of vnderuald maintaine, that hee who was kild in the Bath, was called Wolffenſchieſz a ſeruant to the houſe of Auſtria, and dwelling at Rotzberg.

Modeſty ſeeketh means to preſerue her chaſte reputation, and alwaies findeth helpe when ſhe leaſt loo, keth for it.

Eternilerus & Stumfius in the Annales of Switzerland.

While theſe Tragedies were thus acting at Vnderuald, Griſler, the Gouernour of Vri and Suits alſo, to keepe the people in the more awe and ſubiection; began to builde (by command from his Maſter) a Fort or Cittadell neere to Altorff, vpon a ſmall Hill called Solturne. This Griſler beeing a verye vaine-glorious man, made vaunt of abaſing the people in ſuch ſort, that hee would bow & bend them at his his pleaſure; wherupon he called his Fort, A yoake of extreme ſlauery to the Vrians. He perceiuing, that all men were enraged & badly bent toward him, and doubting, leſte ſome matter might ſecretly be contriued againſt him; to compaſſe diſcouery thereof, he vndertooke this courſe enſuing. He cauſed a Hat or Bonnet to be fixed vpon a long Pole, erected in the market place of Altorff, where the greater part of the Country people vſed to meete, and gaue command, that all men (taking off their owne Bonnets) ſhould bow their knees, and yeelde as much honour to that Hat, as they vſed to doe to him the Gouernor, or when they came into his preſence. His purpoſe and opinion was heereby, that ſuch as were malicioufly addicted towards him, would neuer humble themſelues, in doing ſo many reuerences to the Hat, eſpecially if they had any conſorts, vpon whoſe help they made any dependance: and that this occaſion would ſerue him as an honeſt pretence for their diſcouery to his ſpies, and ſo torture might be inflicted on them, to gain knowledge of the whole enterprize. In the meane while, he departed thence, to viſite the Country of Suits, where he was likewiſe Commander and Gouernor.

A Bonnet or Hat to be reuerenced by the people.

Note the ſubtilty of a Tyrant.

In Suits there was a Gentleman of marke, named Garnier Stouffacher, whoſe Father was called Raoul, and had bene the firſt Magiſtrate of Suits, about thirty years before. This Garnier had built a houſe in more ample and magnificent manner, then was the vſual cuſtome of the Country. It fortuned, that the Gouernor Griſler paſſed on horſebacke by this houſe, and demanded to whom it appertained. Stouffacher knowing himſelfe to bee in the ill opinion of the Gouernor, becauſe he had alwayes before councelled the people, not to ſubiect themſelues to them of Auſtria: This houſe (quoth he) is for the King and you, by whoſe liberality, I am poſſeſſour of it. Then the Gouernor anſwered; I am Lord of this Country, and henceforward I will not ſuffer any more, that yee ſhall ſway your ſelues after your owne appetites, in building houſes, as if you were Maſters, and that you ſhall well feele before it be long.

Garnier Stouffacher Sonne to Raoul Stouffacher firſt Magiſtrate of Suits.

Tyrants are enemies to them that maintaine the peoples liberty.

This anſwer deliuered with outragious menaces, greatly diſpleaſed Stouffacher, who (from that time forward) could not diſſemble his greefe. Which was the cauſe that his wife, being a wiſe, modeſt, and diſcreete Lady, perceiuing her husband ſad and penſiue, and vnderſtanding the reaſon thereof: exhorted him to hope well, in regard that God, to whom all violence and tyranny was diſpleaſing, wold neuer forſake ſuch as inuoked his help & furtherance. Moreouer, it would well become him to make ſearch after men of courage, ſuch as were oppreſſed with the ſame tyranny: to conferre with them, and ioyne their meanes together, to recouer the liberty of their Country; for ſhee durſt aſſure him, that God would bleſſe ſo holy an enterprize. Stouffacher, hauing a long time conſulted with himſelfe, at length went from Suits, to Vri, where he eaſily knew and perceiued, that Griſler was hated of all men in thoſe quarters, by reaſon of his inſupportable pride, euen as much as he was in Suits: eſpecially by the Baron of Attinghuſe, then cheefeſt in iuſtice at Vri, & a familiar friend to Stouffacher. This Baron firſt began to complaine, as extremely wearied with the inſolencies of Griſler, in erecting his Hat, as to ranke it with Princes; proteſting openly, that he could not permit his Country, any longer to endure ſo great a tyranny.

Councels of ſmall & ſlender appearance, grow to great effects: eſpecially againſt Tyrants and tyranny.

Afflicted mindes doe comfort one another by conference.

But Stouffacher fearing (perhaps) that the Baron vſed this kinde of language, only but to ſound him, and (as we vſe to ſay) to vndermine his ſecreteſt cogitations: kept his owne intention couert, contenting himſelfe, to breake his minde vnto an ancient faithfull friend of his, called Gautier Furſt, that is to ſay, the Prince. Theſe two hauing many and ſundry times conſidered on all matters, and taken into their councell (as a third party) Arnould Melchtall of vnderuald; bound themſelues together by mutuall oath, to ioyne all their meanes, and imploy their paines by a cõmon conſent, for the extirpation of tyranny, and reducing their country to her ancient liberty. Moreouer they concluded, that each of them in his owne quarter, ſhould procure ſo many men as poſsibly he could, prouided, that they were people of good and diſcreet carriage: who ſhold all ſweare, to imploy both their goods & bodies, and to maintaine one another in his right, for recouery of the Countries former freedome; and that in the meane while, each man ſhould acquit himſelfe of of his duty towards the Empire, the Monaſteries, as alſo to al Gentlemen & Yeomen. Promiſing likewiſe, to keepe this league & combination ſecret, vntill ſuch time as (by common aduice) all the confederates ſhould bee reſolued to publiſh it. They made choiſe alſo of a priuate place, neere to the Lake of Vri, called Grutly, where theſe three chiefe heads of the League vſed to meete, accompanied each one with three or foure, to aduiſe together what was to be done.

Promiſe and place of primacy appointed for meeting, to conferre on theſe ſerious affairs.

Thus you may perceiue, how the ground-worke of the League of Switzers was then begunne, by Stouffacher, Furſt, and Melchtall: and being ſo agreed vppon, each man returned by himſelfe home, to make coniunction with his cõpanions. Soone after this, not onely the vulgar people, but likewiſe the moſt part of the Nobility in the Villages, rancked themſelues with the confederates: For the Gouernours did moleſt the Noblemen, no leſſe then they did the common ſort, not making any difference betweene the one and other, but called the Gentlemen, peazants, and companions of raſcality. In like manner, they of Auſtria had appropriated (by little & little) to themſelues, the rights belonging to Noblemen: whereat many being offended, had forſaken (as it were) the part of Auſtria, as we haue formerly obſerued by the Baron of Attinghuſe.

Stouffacher, Furſt, and Melchtall, the three men of the league.

Oppreſsion is a key to open the vnderſtanding of moſt and leaſt.

The number of the confederates beeing encreaſed, it ſeemed good to many, that it was time to ſet hand to the worke, namely, to chaſe thence the Gouernors, & replant the ancient liberty of the country: for feare (leſte by ouer-long delay, their enterprize would be diſcouered (by ſome meanes) to the Gouernors. And therefore, in the yeare 1207. the 17. day of October, twelue of the principall men among all the confederates, aſſembled themſelues at a certaine place appointed. All inſiſted to lay hand to the buſineſſe ſo ſoone as poſsible might be; againſt which, they of Vnderuald onely oppoſed themſelues: becauſe that the Caſtles or Fortreſſes, which the Gouernor held in their territory, to wit, Sarne and Rotzberg, were places well munited, and almoſt impregnable, and if ſiedge ſhould bee planted before them, the King of the Romaines would come forthwith, bringing an Army ſufficient to ſuccour them. The other confederates yeelded to this motion, and agreed together, that the firſt day of Ianuary then next following, through al the Cantons, ſeizure ſhould be made, on all the ſtrongeſt Caſtles belonging vnto the Gouernor. To whom notwithſtanding, not any outrage ſhould be offered, neyther to any of their family or Garriſons: except only to ſuch as would make head, and withſtand them in Armies; but to ſend the Gouernors ſafely and well away, with their goods. Moreouer, that the Caſtles and ſtrongeſt holds or Cittadels, ſhould be raſed from the top to the bottome: to declare by manifeſt effect, that they had not vndertaken Armes for blowes or pillage, but onely to conſerue their Countries liberty. This reſolution agreed on, each man retired home to his houſe, awaiting for the day appointed: in the meane ſpace, according to faithfull promiſe, they kept their determination very ſecret.

Aduice taken for beginning the buſineſſe publikely.

A reſolution to expell the Gouernors from the neſt of their tyranny.

While theſe affaires were thus in forwarding, there happened a notable accident at Vri. One Guillaume Tell, a man in the confederacy, diuers times paſſed by before the Hat exalted on the Pole, as formerly hath beene related, without performing any reuerence thereto. And being therefore accuſed to the Gouernor Griſler: he entreated, that his inciuility might bee excuſed, becauſe hee reputed ſuch reuerence to bee a matter of no importance. But the Gouernor, who held him a man much to be ſuſpected, among Guillaumes children, made choiſe of a young little boy, whom the Father loued very dearly. And hee commanded Guillaume (being known an excellent archer) to ſet his ſonne ſome good diſtance off, & with an Arrowe, to cleaue an Apple vpon his head, which if he did not, his owne head ſhould be ſmitten off. Guillaume Tel anſwered, that his commaund was too ſtrange and ſeuere, and he had rather die, then thorough default of ſhooting right, to kill his deereſt ſonne. If thou doeſt not performe it, ſaide the Gouernour, it ſhall coſt both thy life, and thy ſonnes.

A notable hiſtory of Guillaum Tell, too much inuried by the tyrant Gouernor.

An hard iniunction to a Father by the Tyrant, and not eaſily to be aduentured.

Prayers and entreaties not preuailing, Tell tooke his Bowe; and, by the prouidence of God (who queſtionleſſe guided and directed the Arrow) cleft the Apple in twaine vpon his ſonnes head. Euerie one one of the beholders did not a little reioyce, at ſuch a faire and admirable ſhoot: but the Gouernor, not contented with ſo perillous a ſatisfaction, perceiuing another Arrow remaining vnder Guillaumes girdle, demanded of him, what vſe hee meant to make of that other Arrow? Guillaume replied, that it was a cuſtom among Archers, to draw more arrowes then one out of their Quiuers, for any occaſiõ that might happen. But the Gouernor ſuſpecting ſomething elſe, preſſed him more & more; & finally, promiſed him to ſaue his life, if he would confeſſe the truth: which accordingly Tell did, and that he had that other Arrow ready, therewith to kill the Gouernor, if his firſt ſhaft had ſlaine his Son. Then the Gouernor declared, that he wold not take away his life, becauſe he had promiſed the contrary: but he ſhould be kept in perpetuall priſon, and liue miſerably in darkneſſe, without conuerſing with any man liuing. Thus ſpeaking, he cauſed him to be faſt bound with cordes, & led into a Barque, that hauing paſt the Lake of Vri, he might be conuaied to the Caſtle of Cuſnach. The Gouernor, with his people & priſoner, being in the midſt of the Lake; a greeuous tempeſt ſuddenly exalted it ſelfe, which did put the Barque in euident perill. They perceiuing themſelues in extreame danger of their liues: one of Griſlers ſeruants ſaid to his maſter, that there was but one only means wherby to ſaue them, and that was, to vnbinde Guillaume Tel, and refer the Barques conduct to him, becauſe he was a moſt expert Marriner, ſtrong and able to direct them in ſuch a neceſsity. So extreme vrgent was the caſe, that euery man allowed the councell, & vnbound Tell; who faſtening hold on the Rudder, and guiding it manfully, preſerued the Barque among the rougheſt billowes, turning her prow towards the country of Suits.

Hauing attained neere enough vnto the ſhore, there appeared a mighty ſtone (like vnto a Rock) aboue the water, which to this day is called Telles Stone. Being hard by it, Tell caught hold thereon with his Bow, which lay at his feete in the Poupe, and leaping foorth quickly vpon that ſtone, he gaue ſo ſtrong a thruſt with his foote againſt the Barques ſide, that it returned back among the ſtearn billows. This done, he tooke his flight thence, and hid himſelfe among the neighbouring Mountaines. The Barque hauing long floated in this manner, was guided at length by the Gouernours ſeruants, to a Port named Brune des Fontaines. From thence the Gouernour ſet on his way towards Cuſnach, and muſt needs paſſe thorough a hollow craggy ſtraite, where Tell (well acquainted with all thoſe parts) by great good hap had ambuſhed himſelfe among thick buſhes: there he diſcharged an Arrow at the Gouernor, which paſſed quite through his body, & ſlew him. Ther remaineth yet (to our time) a Chappell, built on the place where the Gouernour was ſlaine: and another vpon the Stone or Rocke, where Tell threw himſelfe out of the Barque. After this ſucceſſefull ſhoote, Tell went to Suits, where he made all theſe matters knowne to Stouffacher. From thence hee tooke his way ouer the higheſt Mountains, and turning by Morſach, came back to Vri, wher hauing foũd Gautier Furſt, he acquainted him with all that had hapned. By this time, they had gotten hearts and hands enow, to expell all the Gouernors family and followers: but hauing reſpect to them of Vnderuald, and remembring their former reſolution for the firſt day of Ianuary following, they kept thẽſelues quiet, & Tell (in the meane time) liued cloſely among his friends.

The firſt day of Ianuary being come, they of Vnderuald made themſelues Maſters of two Fortreſſes, according to a compromiſe paſſed betweene them. In the Fort of Rotzberg there dwelt a chambermaid, who was in loue with a goodly young man of Vnderuald, and committed folly with him. An eſpeciall night of meeting being appointed by them both, the young man brought twenty other armed Souldiers with him, and cauſed them to lye cloſely hidden neere the Caſtle. He hauing giuen the ſignall to his wench, who knew nothing at all of the intended deceit, was mounted vp aloft to her by the helpe of a corde. Hauing ſtaide ſometime of dalliance with her, making her to beleeue one thing for another; he left the chamber a while, going to the window whereat he had bin drawne vp, & letting downe the cord, drew vp one of his companions, and then returned to his laſſe againe. He that had thus gotten vp, neuer left till he had drawne vp all his other fellowes, lowes, (who were vnmatchable for ſtrength and courage) and ſo got poſſeſſion of the place: where they kept all the gates ſtrongly defended, and cloſe ſhut vp, in expectation of good newes from their other conſorts, who were to ſeize the other Fortreſſe, called Sarne.

By baſe and contemptible meanes, the power of the oppreſſors was vtterly brought to nothing.

That other company conſiſted of fifty valiant men, thirty of them hauing ambuſhed themſelues in a neere neighboring wood: the reſt went directly towards the Caſtle, leaning vpon ſtaues and croutches, and carrying preſents to the Gouernor, (according to cuſtome of the day) as Lambs, Pigs, Calues, Cheeſes, and ſuch like things. The Gouernor was going to church, anſwerable to his ordinary wont at ſuch a time, and met them on the way, where perceiuing them to haue no other Armes then ſtaues and croutches, which ſerued (as it ſeemed) to ſupport their feeble bodies: hee made no doubt of any thing, but paſſed on, not a little pleaſed with thoſe preſents, and brought him in more liberall and plentifull manner, then they were formerly wont to do. Their ſtaues and croutches were made round, and pierced ſo hollow within: that they could eaſily ſcrew in long ſharpe pikes of iron, which each of them carried cloſe hid in his boſome. They came to the Caſtle, where beeing permitted entrance with their New-yeares gifts: they poſſeſſed themſelues of the Gates, giuing an appointed ſignall to their fellow-ſouldiers lying in the wood, who came immediately to ſuccour them, and tooke them all priſoners that were in the Caſtle. Afterward, hearing that Rotzberg was ſurprized by their other aſſociates, they releaſed all their priſoners, and the Gouernor alſo, whom they had laid ſure hold on, as hee was about to eſcape. When the Gouernor and his followers had ſolemnly promiſed vpon oath, neuer more to returne againe into thoſe quarters; they gaue them leaue to depart, & ſent them by ſafe conduct out of the Country, and then ruined thoſe two ſtrong Forts or Caſtles flat to the ground. The very ſame day alſo, they of Vri demoliſhed the new Cittadell, which Griſler had named, The yoake of the Vrians, being not as yet fully finiſhed: and in Suits, Stouffacher (with his followers) won and ruined the Cittadell of Louerts, builded nere vnto the Lake. On the morrow, the three villages (by their Deputies) made a publike league of amity and alliance, to continue for ten years, vpon the conditions before mentioned, cõfirming them al by ſolemne oath. Behold the end of their tyrannicall gouernment, whom Albert had eſtabliſhed ouer the Cantons

When Albert had receiued tydings of this ſudden change: he was wonderfully enraged, and reſolued to make war vpon the cantons, as thinking by ſtrong hand to bring them in ſubiection. He ſent firſt of all to his ſubiects of Zug, Lucerne, & other neighbours of Suits, Vri, and Vnderuald, to ſuffer no victuals to be conuayed to them. But in a ſhort while after, he was ſlaine by his owne Nephew, the Son of his Brother, and by his complices, in paſſing ouer the Riuer of Ruſſ: ſo that this war by him intended, remained now to be freſhly attempted. His ſonnes, being ſufficiently hindred from reuenging his deth, left the Switzers in peace: fearing leſte they ſhould ioyne with the Gentlemen, who had ſlaine their Father. About this time, they of Auſtria ruined many ſtrong places in Heluetia, as in the Territory of Zurich, Warte, Multperg, Schnabelberg, Maſchuande the Towne and Caſtle, and Farwange in the neighbouring quarter. Some moſt noble families alſo were by them ſubuerted and extermined, to wit, that of Eſchinbach, Wartz, Palme, & many other. For at the taking of the Caſtle of Forwange, in one day, 63. Gentlemen, with their ſeruants, had their heads ſmitten off: And in other parts of Switzerland, they of Auſtria cauſed to be ſlaine, or baniſhed out of the country, about a 1000. perſons, the moſt part wherof were Noble. There are ſome ill-willers, that do falſely accuſe the Switzers, to haue deſolated many places, & expelled many Noble families: when al this while, thoſe horrid actions (for the moſt part) were committed by them of the houſe of Auſtria.

He confirmed the priuiledges & ancient liberty of the 3. cantons, & eſtabliſhed a Prouoſt or Aduocate of the Empire, to be Iudge in law caſes in the Towne of Zurich, the round neighbouring places, and in the three Cantons, in name of the Emperor. This Prouoſt was named Raoul of Habſpourg, Lord of Lauffenberg, Sonne to

But the Emperor Henry being gon into Italy, (in which iourney an hundred Souldiers of Zurich, and as many of the other Cantons, were at his pay) the Prouoſt was falſely accuſed (as ſome ſay) before the Emperor, by the means of Duke Leopold, who hated him, and ſaid that he had abuſed his authority. So that he was depoſed, and Edward de Burgle, dwelling at Turge, ſubſtituted in his place. Afterward, Raoul being brought to anſwer his cauſe at the Court of France, dyed at Montpellier. His ſeruants brought backe his body, and cauſed it to bee buried in the Abbey of Wettinghen.

The reuenge of the Emperour Alberts Sonnes on the murderers of their Father.

The Sonnes of Albert, hauing ſlaine all them that were preſent at the murder of their Father, and expelled all their other complices; became rich and powerfull, for they had ſeized on the goods of al thē that had hand in the death of Albert. The three cantons were highly in their malice and diſgrace, yet they durſt not begin war vpon them, fearing (perhaps) the Emperor, who had taken the Switzers into his protection: but neuertheleſſe, they moleſted the Cantons by diuers in-roades, for they could eaſily offend them of Vnderuald, by Boates deſcending on the lake of Lucerne; yet the Cantons kept themſelues carefully within compaſſe of their guards, & mutually aſſiſted one another.

A difference betweene them of Lucerne & the men of Vnderuald.

In the yeare one thouſand three hundred and ten, a Ship well munited & furniſhed with men, ſet foorth from Lucern, to make aſſault on thē of Vnderuald, who in the defence of them of Vri, that were come (by great chance) with a Shippe of warre to aſsiſt them; did both bondge & ſinke the Veſſell of Lucerne, very neere to the Port, killing a great number of the Soldiers, and taking the reſt priſoners. This loſſe thus receiued, they of Lucerne (and their neighbours) tooke truce with the Cantons. In the ſame yeare, they of Suits, being deſirous to pacifie all matters among them: bought of Ewrard, Count of Habſpourg, Arte and Cuſnach, Villages of their Cantons, and ſubiects to the houſe of Habſpourg, encreaſing & enlarging the limitation of their bounds very much that way. But on the other ſide they had warre againſt the Monkes of the Hermitage, & for the ſpace of about four hundred years; each being at puſh of the Pike againſt the other, and for thoſe reaſons which I will breefely relate.

Lucerne glad to take truce with the Cantons.

War by them of Suits againſt the Monkes of the Hermitage.

The Emperor Otho, ſurnamed the great, about the yeare 950. hadde eſtabliſhed certaine bounds to them of Suits, and to the Monkes of the Hermitage. In theſe limitations, ſome Mountaines (fertile for paſturage) were left to the Monks, which till that time had bene poſſeſſed by them of Suits. It came to paſſe, that they wold not keepe themſelues to the Emperours appointment; but held their ancient limits. The Abbots of the Hermitage, who were not able enough to debout thē out of their poſſeſſion; gaue not ouer to obtaine of the Emperors ſucceſſors, confirmation of the ordinance ſet downe by Otho. About the yeare one thouſand, forty foure, the Abbot Geron accuſed them of Suits to Henry the third, Emperor. Raoul and Arnoul, Earles of Lentzbourg, & Gouernors of Zug, being ioyned with them of Suits, made their complaint likewiſe, that their limits were much abridged. But the Emperour Henry re-confirmed the grant of Otho, & condemned the Counts of Lentzbourg to a certaine fine of mony; all which notwithſtanding, they of Suits kept themſelues in their ancient poſſeſſiō ſtill, in deſpight of all ỹ the Abbot could do. Once more then, about the yeare of our Lord, 1144. the Abbot Raoul accuſed them before Conrad the ſecond, Emperor, who confirmed alſo the ſentence of Otho. Neuertheleſſe, they of Suits maintained themſelues (perforce) in poſſeſſion ſtill, and the Abbot (on the contrary ſide) defending the limits giuen him by the Emperor, and making vſe of them accordingly; raiſed warre vpon them, inuading continually one another, and taking priſoners on eyther ſide. Theſe enmities endured a long time, and at laſt, Raoul, Count of Raſperwill, brought them to an agreement, in the yeare 1217. This accord was imbraced & kept for about the ſpace of fifty yeares, at the end of which time, there came an Abbot, named Anſelme, vnder whom nouell differences began: becauſe that both ſides expounded the tract of pacification, in a contrary ſence and meaning.

The ground and originall of ſo many yeares warre betweene the men of Suits & the Monks of the Hermitage.

The grant of Otho the Great, reconfirmed by the Emperor Henry, the third of that name.

The Count of Raſperwil became a good peace-maker betweene long diſcontented enemies.

The warre being againe renewed, continued foure and forty yeares: but ſoone after, they of Zurich laboured to ratifie a firme peace, in the time of Henry the ſeauenth. While they were treating on this peace; ſome men of Suits, being gon in pilgrimage to this Abbey of the Hermitage: were villianouſly and publikely outraged by certaine Monks, which wholy brake off the negotiation. Moreouer, the Princes of Austria, who had appropriated to themſelues the protection of the Abbey: incenſed the Abbot and Monks againſt them of Suits, promiſing them continuall ſuccour. The warre hauing laſted long, wherein they of Suits were greatly endamaged: at length, in the yeare, 1313. the 23. day of February, they went foorth ſecretly into the fields in the night time, & hauing deceiued the guardes; entred by ſtrong hand into the Abbey, taking and leading thence the Monkes that had done the outrage, together with the Curate of the place, named Iohn, and the Maſter of the Schoole, named Raoul. There were then Monkes of noble birth in the Abbey, namely, Raoul, and Henry of Wnenberg, Iohn Regenſperg, and Burckhard Fleminger. This was the cauſe, that the Counts of Habspourg and of Tegge, and the Baron of Regenſperg, who were their neere allies and kinſmen, as alſo Iohn of Schwanden, Abbot of the Hermitage, greatly imployed their pains with them of Suits, for theſe Monkes. When the Monks had ſollemnly promiſed vpon oath, neuer more to deale with them of Suits in any ſuch enterprize, nor to attempt any matter of reuenge vppon them: they were releaſed, hauing firſt payed nine hundred pounds Tournois. But this enlargement came ſo farre ſhort of appeaſing them: that it wrought a quite contrary effect in them, continually fixing their thraldome before their eyes; ſo that thence forward, they ſought all meanes whereby to iniure them of Suits.

Peace broken off againe by villanous behauiour in the Monks of the Hermitage to holy Pilgrims

The Abby entred in the night time by them of Suits, to reuenge their wrong vpon the Monkes.

A reconciled enemy is very hardly to be credited.

Heereupon happened a new occaſion of troubles. After the death of the Emperor Henry, in the yeare 1314. the States of the Empire beeing aſſembled to create a new Emperor; the Electors found themſelues to be diuided in opinion. Foure of them elected Lewes of Bauaria, fourth of that name: but the other three gaue their voices to Frederick of Austria, the Sonne to Albert. He to make his part equall in voices to Lewes his number, named Henry, Duke of Carinthia; as King of Bohemia, maintaining that this kingdome belonged to him, by right of the Country, Frederick counted this Duke among them that ſhould giue their voyces: albeit that Iohn, ſonne to Henry the 7. was king of Bohemia, hauing married the daughter to the late deceaſed king. This diſmembring of the Empire, cauſed thoſe greeuous troubles in Germany and Heluetia. The three Cantons, enemies to the houſe of Austria, ioyning themſelues with Lewes of Bauaria: all their neighbors being before in their protection of Austria, or elſe at the time of theſe elections, approoued that of Frederick. Now in regard that the three Cantons onely, made head againſt Frederick; he preuailed ſo far, that (by his accuſation) the Biſhoppe of Conſtance excommunicated them, & they wer baniſhed by the Court Imperiall, which was at Rotuille. They were charged, that they had violenced the abbey of the Hermitage, & (in that tumult) had caſt downe and ſpoiled the holy ſacrifice: which they of Suits firmely and ſtoutly denied, promiſing contrariwiſe, ſeuerely to puniſh the offenders in ſuch a delict, prouided, ỳ they might be diſcouered to them. And althogh they could not produce any one; yet notwithſtanding, they remained baniſhed & excommunicated. In regard whereof, they humbly entreated the Emperor Lewes to vndertake the knowledge of this cauſe: which he did, and procured afterward, that they were reintegrated into the communion of the Church.

Election of Lewes of Bauaria, fourth of that name, Emperor, and a difference falling among the Princes Electors.

The cauſe of the diſmall troubles in Germany and Switzerland.

The three Cantons excommunicated and baniſhed, becauſe they would not yeeld themſelues to ſeruitude.

In this time, the Gentlemen that were forth of the lands of the 3. Cantons, with the Gouernors; ſolicited Leopold of Auſtria, Son to Albert, to make war vpon the Cantons. The Abbot of the Hermitage, and the Count of Monfort rouled on this wheele with their beſt helpe. The occaſion was very honeſt, as it ſeemed, to wit; that the Prince purpoſed to reuenge the outrage done to the Chappell of the Virgin Mary. The yong Prince, being young, powerfull, and a true heire to his Fathers hatreds: ſuffered himſelf to be thus councelled, and intended proſecution of this wat. His forces were about him, by whoſe meanes he had ſpoiled the places and caſtles of his fathers murderers: ẅ Soldiers were people aptly diſpoſed for war, and made rich by the booties they had taken in thoſe caſtles. Moreouer, he leuied a Warre prepared by Prince Leopold of Auſtria againſt the 3. Canton, and the cauſe thereof.

The diuision of the Forces belonging to Prince Leopold, and who conducted them.

Army, collected from Suisse, Suaba, and Alsatia, diuiding all these powers into two parts. One of them, which (as is credibly affirmed) consisted of about twenty thousand men; was conducted by himselfe against them of Suits. He gaue the rest to the Count of Strasberg, Gouernor of the vale of Hasell, that they might ascend the Mountaine of Brunig, and assaile that side belonging to them of Vnderuald.

The volunta-ry offer of the Cantons to the Prince, requiring peace and no way desirous of warre.

The Cantons hearing newes of this preparation, mustered vp their forces, & because nothing might remaine as forgotten: they sent to craue peace of the Prince, by the Count of Togge, promising to accept the Prince as their Iudge, & to make answer in his presence, to the Abbot of the Hermitage, and to the expelled Nobility. But the Prince would allow no audience to the Count, and refused all negotiation of peace. The whole hope and expectation of quietnes being thus cut off; a Fast was published & cõmanded throughout the Cantons, and prayers deuoutly made to God. All such as could carry Armes, were sent to the Garrisons in all those parts, where any entrance might be made into y^e countries.

The assembly of the forces of the three Cantons, and their number.

But because the Prince was at Zug, with the greater part of his power: the allies assembled thẽselues at Suits, which is the very neerest Canton to Zug, and there were mustred foure hundred Souldiers of Vri, three hundred of Vnderuald, and sixe hundred of Suits. These made vp 1300. men in all, and thus they resolued to attend the enemy, valiantly exposing their liues, for conseruation of their countries, liberties, wiues, and children: declaring themselues (in this case) no lesse worthy of commendation, then the Lacedemonians, who fighting for the freedome of Greece, dyed all with their weapons in their hands, at the passage of the Thermopylæ. It is said, that the Lord of Huneberg, a worthy Gentleman, dwelling in the territory of Zug, and being then in the Army of Prince Leopold, taking compassion on the death of so many innocents, at whose throtes slycing kniues lay ouerready (for it was concluded by the Nobility, to put the three Cantons to fire & sword) did secretly aduertise the confederates, by a Letter which he shot vnto thẽ fastened at an Arrow, that the day of S. Omer (which was the 16. of Nouember) they should be assayled at a place called Morgarten, and therfore it stood them on to looke to their businesse. The allies hearing this, fortified strongly that place; appointing men to all the wayes whereby the enemy should passe, and encamped themselues aloft on the Mountaine.

The great mercy and prouidence of God, preparing safety for oppressed people.

Fifty men had then ranked themselues together, which had bene banished from Suits, and they humbly desired, that their banishment might be reuoked, offering to imploy their paines couragiously, for the safety of their Country. But a sad answer was returned them, to wit, that many among them were guilty of very greeuous crimes: therefore they would not accept such people for companions, as fearing leste those faulty persons, might be the occasion of harme to the whole Army. These poore banished men (for al this) would not giue ouer their good affection, which they had intirely addicted to their Countries succour: but got possession of a little high Hill on the Frontiers, which hung ouer the way, whereby (of necessity) the enemy must passe.

War ought not to bar or abridge iustice, in cases of important necessity.

The battell of Morgarten, where a thousand, three hundred and fifty men ouerthrew twenty thousand.

The sixteenth day of Nouember being come, in the yeare, 1315. Leopold caused his troopes to issue foorth of Zug, about the breake of day; the infantery marching formost, with all the Nobility and horsemen: for the Gentlemen had resolued to chastise the poore Country people with their owne hands, whom they tearmed the Seditious. As they were entred on the confines of Zuits, hauing the Lake of Egeria on the one side, the high Mountaines on the other, and their Army betweene both. The banished men began to roule downe from the Mountaines top, great huge stones, and mighty Logs of Timber, vpon the Princes Army. Afterward, without the least intermission, hauing laid together great heaps of incredible big sharpe-pointed Flints: then showred them downe (as it were) vpon the horsemen, euen like to a violent tempest of haile.

Despised and refused assistance makes the best way to an honorable successe.

This accident neuer expected, did put the Army into very great trouble; for men were not able to gouerne their horses, frighted with the continuall falling of sharpe stones from aloft, and very greeuous wounds they receiued by thẽ. This being noted by them of Suits, who were ranged ranged vpon a very high place: they marched on to meete the enemy in the face; and (from a farre off) threw huge ſtones, and ſhot ſharpe pointed arrows at them. Afterward, they came to handy grapling, and charges with Halberds ſo furiouſlie, that both horſe and foote were put to flight; among whom, the Abbot of the Hermitage, and the Count of Mountfort were the formoſt, as is credibly reported. Ouer and beſide the footmen, 1500. horſmen were ſlaine in this battell, beſide many drowned in the Lake, & a great number (by reaſon of the narrowe paſſage, which hindred the ſauing of themſelues) were murdred by their own fellowes, and trodden to death with horſes. Two and fifty Citizens of Zurich, being all habited alike in garments of one colour, and well knowne by the Cantons, to be the moſt valiant men in all the enemies army, being ſent by the Senate to ſuccour the Duke of Auſtria, were ſlaine in the field.

The ſelfeſame day as the battaile vvas fought at Morgarten, the Count of Straſberg (hauing chaſed the Garriſon of Brunig from the Mountain;) entred into the Country with three thouſand men, and began to forrage euery where. He incamped at Alpenach, which is a Village in the Canton of Vnderuald, threatning the next morning to inuade the other part of the country beyond the Forreſt, if they on the hither ſide did not willingly yeeld themſelues. But in the meane while, they of Vnderuald beyond the Forreſt, aſſembled them of the Mountaines round about, & called to their aſsiſtance them on the hither ſide the Forreſt, whom the enemie had not found as yet, and by the ſame meanes gaue knowledge to theyr partakers which were at Suits. The Meſſenger arriued at Brunen the morrow after the battaile, but others ſay, that it was the very ſame day. Theſe newes beeing thus come, they of Vnderuald put themſelues vpon the Lake, and made ſuch diligence in getting to their houſes, as in two hours ſpace (by painfull labour and ſpeed of the Ferry men) they croſſed ouer the Lake, which indeede was very broad. An hundred men of Suits did accompanie them, with whome they arriued at the Port of Buchs, which is a village appertaining to them; then going on from thence to Burgenſtad, ioyned their people with the others troops.

The ouerthrow of the Count of Strasberg at Vnderuald, & in what maner it was performed.

Diligence and haſt is moſt expedient & auaileable when vrgent neceſsitie is a ſpur thereto.

Soone after, they came to aſſaile the enemy, who was come thither by the Lake of Lucerne, and ranged on through the country: but they compelled them to flight, and made them glad ſpeedily to recouer their Boats. Hauing thus chaſed them thence, they went towardes Alpenach, to ſeeke the Count of Strasberg: & although it was late, they concluded (neuertheleſſe) to aſſault the enemy, becauſe his powers were diſperſed amongſt the Villages, where they pilled and rauaged. Moreouer, night could be no hinderance to them, that were well acquainted with all the ſtraites and paſſages of the Countrey: which was an excellent reſolution, and wonderfull contrary to the enemie. For very hardly could the Count of Straſberg endure their firſt ſhocke or encounter, becauſe the diſperſion of his ſoldiers amazed him: and when hee ſaw two Enſignes belonging to them of Vnderuald, like a good and diſcreet warrior, hee perſwaded himſelf, that they of Auſtria were ouerthrowne at Morgarten.

Their marching towards Alpenach to deale with the Count of Strasberg and his forces.

Heereupon, he ſpeedily retired (thorow the Mountaines) home to his owne houſe, and the reſt fled amaine and confuſedly: but yet not all, for three hundred of them were left ſlaine in the fielde, and the whole booty taken from the enemies hand. They of Suits and Vri, hauing prouided for their affaires, came to ſuccour their confederates of Vnderuald, and in the night arriued at Buchs, where they did heare tidings of the victory. Wherefore hauing firſt giuen thankes to God, & gratified their friends with ſo fortunate a ſucceſſe, they returned home vnto theyr owne houſes.

The foile and flight of the Count of Strasberg, and all his followers.

This victorie, ſetled and aſſured the foundation of the Switzers confederacie or alliance, and from thence forward, they of Suits, vri, and Vnderuald, changed their league of ten yeares, into a perpetuall alliance, and ſo paſſed it by authenticall Letters. The Switzers tooke theyr name of Eydgnoſſen (which ſignifieth partakers in ſwearing, or conioyned together by one and the ſame oath) by this alliance. At this time, among ſtrangers, they are called Lords of Leagues, and Switzers, by reaſon of the Village or Canton of Suits. It may be, becauſe they fought in that quarter, for the maintenance of their libertie: or in regard of their long warre

I haue hereto annexed the tenure of the alliance, to the end, that euerie one may see, therein is nothing, either insolent or vniust, as some (to their great shame, haue falsely accused vs.

The Tenure of League and Alliance, confirmed betweene the three Cantons.

Taken foorth of the true Original coppy.

IN the Name of God. Amen. Forasmuch as humane sense is infirme and fraile, which is the cause that things intended to be durable and perpetuall (as they ought to be) are too soone and very easily lost or forgotten: It is therefore profitable and necessary, that such things as are established for peace, tranquility, profite, and honour of men, shold be couched and published by writings, and authenticall instruments. So then We of Vri, Suites, & Vnderuald, giue all men to knowe, who shall either see or heare these present Letters, that foreseeing & prouiding for difficult and queazie times, and for our more commodious enioying peace and rest, which are the best meanes, whereby to conserue our bodies and goodes: Wee haue promised and sworne each to other, in good Faith, and by Christian Oath, that Wee will mutually consult, councell, and ayd one another, to warrant our liues, and defend our goods at our owne expences, at all times, against all and euerie one, that would or shall offer outrage either to our bodies or goods, to Vs or Ours, in any manner whatsoeuer.

A careful and Christian consideration in any Common wealth.

Notwithstanding, if wrong be done to any one of vs, either in his body or goodes, We are all bound to succour him to our power: to the end, that (by friendshippe or iustice) the wrong may be amended or repaired. Moreouer, We binde our selues by the same Oath, that none of the three Cantons, shall receyue any man as Lord and Commander, without the aduice and liking of the other. Each one of vs, as well males as females, shall stand bound to obey their naturall Lords and Maisters, and liue vnder their lawfull power, in all seruices iust and legitimate: except the said Lords offer violence (in any manner whatsoeuer) to any of the Cantons, for vnto such Masters they shall do no seruice, vntill such time as they be concorded with the Cantons. We haue couenanted also, that not any of the Cantons or Confederates, shal minister an Oath, or binde himselfe to any stranger, without aduice of the other Cantons and Confederates. Not any person of the Confederates, shall communicate with a straunger (without aduice and permission of other Confederates) so long as the Cantons shalbe without a Lord. And if any one of our Cantons, violate and infrindge any thing, or point of that which is contained in these Presents: he shall be esteemed as a disloyall and periured person, and his body and goodes confiscate to the Cantons.

A louing League, whet a particular iniury extendeth it selfe in generall.

Concerning an Oath or bond to any stranger, or communication with him.

MOREOVER, WE haue agreed and condiscended, not to accept or entertaine any Iudge or Magistrate, that shall buy his office with money, or any bribe else, although he be of our owne Countrey. If difference or warre happen to be moued among the Confederates: then such as are knowne to bee of most honesty and wisedome, shall meet together, to pacifie & confound the war or difference, either by louing composition, or censure of right. If the one side do reiect this proposition, the Confederates shall assist the other side, to the end, That the debate may bee ended, either by amity or iudiciall sentence, and at the charges of them that would not stand to the award.

A worthy example for all Commonweales to imitate.

If any suite or warre shall arise betweene two of the Cantons, and any one of them will not yeeld to a friendly composition, or according to right: the third Canton shall maintaine the cause of that side, that submitted most to reason, and powerfully assist it, either to end the contention by a louing composition or by iudiciall sentence. If any one of the Confederates shall kill one of his owne fellowes, he must dye also: except hee can make it appeare, and the Iudges likewise auouch it by their sentence, that he did it vpon vrgent necessity, and in defence of his owne bodie. If he flye for the fact, whosoeuer of our Countries shall receiue him into his house, there to lodge or maintaine him: he is to be banished perpetually, except by common consent of the Confederates federates he can win grace.

For such as shall fire eyther houses or goods in the Cantons.

If any of the Confederates either priuily, manifestly or impudently, shall fire any house or goods of some other of the Confederates: he shall bee expulsed (for euer) out of our Countries; and whosoeuer lodgeth or maintaineth him, shall stand bound to satisfie the others losses. No person shall exact a pawne or gage, except it be of his debter, or one vnable to answer him otherwise: and it is not to be done neither, without consent of the Iudge. That euery man shall be obedient vnto his Iudge, and make publike declaration, which Iudge (of our Countries) hee will accept, to vndergoe iudgement before him. Whosoeuer refuseth to obey the sentence giuen, shall pay the interests to him of the Confederates, for whose profit & benefit the sentence was deliuered.

For such as refuse the sentence giuen by the Iudge.

And to the end, that these conditions aboue written, may remaine firme, inuiolable and perpetuall: WE Subnamed Citizens & Allies of Vri, Suites, and Vnderuald, haue put our Seales to these presents, at Brunen, in the yeare of our Sauiour Iesus Christ, 1315. being the morrow after the day of S. Nicholas.

The liberties and alliances of the Switzers, confirmed by the Emp. Lewes.

These Cantons hauing conquered their enemies, and confirmed their Alliance, sent men to the Emperor Lewes, to aduertise him of all. He at the beginning of the yeare, held a day imperiall at Nurenberg, where the Princes of Austria were condemned of high treason, the goods which they had in Suisse, confiscated to the Emperor and Empire, and the liberty of the Cantons fully confirmed. The Letters containing this ordination, were giuen in the campe at Merride, the 23. day of March, in the yeare 1316. & the second yeere of the Emperor Lewes. The same Emperor, about the yeare 1323. estabilished as Gouernour in these three Cantons, Iohn, Count of Arberg, vnto whom (as Lieutenant of the Emperour Lewes) the Cantons gaue their Oath.

The power & authoritie of the Gouernor limited, at his entrance into his rule ouer the Cantons.

The Gouernor promised them also by Letters Patents, that hee would not diminish or preiudice (in any maner whatsoeuer) their liberties and alliances, nor suffer them to be alienated from the Empire, neither to be reduced vnder the power of them of Austria, or of the Noblemen excluded from the Countries of the Cantons. Beside, that no man amongst them should be drawne in iustice out of these countries, and that their Iudges should not be taken from any place else, but meerly from among themselues. And because the Gouernours should not infringe the liberties of the Cantons, their power was limited by the Emperor, and prohibited (vnder greeuous penalties) from diminishing in any manner whatsoeuer, the liberties graunted to the Cantons. The Letters Patents which contained these articles, were giuen at Pauia in the yeare 1329. and on the day of S. Iohn Baptist.

Gouernours chosen among themselues.

The Emperors that succeeded Lewes, confirmed these things, and permitted (moreouer) to the Cantons, to elect Gouernours (for their countries) among themselues, but in the Emperors name, and to haue highest iustice in causes both ciuill and criminall.

It is the Nature of tirants themselues being disquieted, to permit the people not to liue in peace.

They of Austria hauing bin so shrewdly gauld, as hitherto hath beene declared, grew to truce, not because theyr forces were wholly weakned: but in regard that they were impeached in war against the Emperor Lewes, so that they coulde not deale with so many matters all at a time. In the meane while (neuertheless) some incursions and losses were made in Suisse on either side. It came to passe, that they of Wesen and their neighbours, which liued below the gouernment of Glaris, and in diuers kinds molested them of Suites: who came and met them with a main army, and compelled them to craue peace. On the other side, the Abbot of the Hermitage, had caused the three Cantons to be excommunicated, especially them of Suits: first by the bishop of Constance, & afterward by the Pope. Fredericke of Austria, who termed himselfe to bee Emperor, likewise banished them but the Emperor Lewes tooke away the curse, and by his commandement, Peter, Archbyshop of Mayence, remitted them into the communion of Christians. Also, the Abbot of the Hermitage, wrote to them of Suits that hee had renounced the Popes Bull, and would not suffer it to bee serued against them.

The Emperor contradicteth the curse of the Bishop & Pope.

During this time, that the truce continued on either part, they of Austria drew into league with them, Hermin & Ewrad, Counts of Kybourg, and Lordes of Dun: this happened in the yeare, 1317. By the meanes meanes of these Earles, they procured such an hindrance, that the men of Interlach could send no victuals to Vnderuald. In the yeere one thousand three hundred twenty three, they drew to them Iohn of Habspourg, Lord of Rasperwill, and heyre to the Count of Hombourg. Afterward, they combined themselues with him, against the Cantons, because his Landes neighboured to the Canton of Suites, and lay aptly to cut off all releese, and rayse warre. The yeare following, Raoul and Herman, Counts of Werdenberg, and Lords of Sargans, made alliance also with Leopold of Austria: but their brother Henry tooke part with the Emperour Lewes, who (at that time) was excommunicated and depriued of the Empire by the Pope. By these meanes, great diuisions fell in the empire, some depending on the Popes decree; others mocking it, and cleauing to Lewes, as their lawfull Emperor.

The cunning proceeding of them of Austria against the Cantons.

The Emperor excommunicated and depriued by the Pope.

In these troubles, the Cantons maintained themselues carefully, and in amitie with the partakers of Lewes; whereto also, many Townes of Suisse conformed themselues. For, although (at the beginning) they of Zurich, and some others followed the part of Frederick of Austria: yet notwithstanding, he being prisoner, and hauing renounced the empire, albeit his brethren continued warre against Lewes, they of Zurich ioyned with Lewes: as with him that then was their onely true Emperor. In the yeare 1327. the Cantons made alliance with the Imperiall cities and townes, that stood fast for Lewes, to wit, Mayence, Wormes, Spire, Strasbourg, Basile, Fribourg, Constance, Lindaw and Vberlingen: with this League they of Zurich and Berne combined themselues. But fiue hundred yeares after, Lucerna made perpetuall alliance with the three Cantons. In few words, I will tell you the occasion, after I haue first declared somwhat, concerning the beginning and estate of the said City, before it becam allied with the Cantons.

The Cantons ioyn with the Cities that held for Lewes the true Emperor.

Lucerne ioyned to the 3. Cantons.

CHAP. III.

Of the Originall estate of Lucerna, before it leagued it selfe with the Cantons.

THE city of Lucerna is seated on the riuer Russe, which issueth forth of a great Lake, whereby wee may passe to the three Cantons. Also, at the foote of an high Mountaine, commonly called Pilates Mount. The scituation is commodious, because this is the way, to trauell by the mountain of Saint Godard in Italy. From Fribourg, the Merchants are transported ouer the Mountaines, and from thence into Italy, with beasts of carriage: and (reciprocally) the Merchants of Italy descend by the Lake and Riuer of Russe, to the Rhein, & thence into the Ocean sea.

A description concerning the situation of the City of Lucerna.

It is not certainly knowne, neyther at what time, nor by whom the Citie was builded: but one saith well, that on each side of the Riuer there is a castle (which are houses nowe inhabited by Citizens) and builded by the Allemains or Germaines. Concerning the opinion of Etterlinus, who wrote some small history of Suisse or Swetia, referring these matters to the house of Austria, and thinketh that those castles serued as a retreate for robbers and theeues: he abuseth his own iudgement greatly therein. For, in the time of Raoul of Habspourg (and no sooner) they of Austria began to commaund in these quarters here, when the Dutchie of Austria fell to the house of Habspourg. And it is no way credible, that a Prince would euer endure; that theeues should make vse of a passage so commodious, for trauelling from Suisse into Italy.

The time whē and by whom Lucerna was built, is vncertaine.

At what time they of Austria beganne their rule nere the Cantons.

It seemeth, that Lucerna was so named, in regard of a Lanterne, which duly euery night is there aduanced, and bright lights clearly shining therein, for benefite of of passengers vpon the Lake. And it is very likely, that the high ancient Tower, which (at this day) standeth aloft on the bridge (as in like maner there is another at Zurich, called Wellemberg) serued for that purpose. Our graue ancients & forefathers, termed euery such kind of Tower Pharos. A Charter granted to Guichard the Priest, auoucheth; that Lucerna deriued her name from Antiquity. For, the Annales of Lucerna do declare, that the Lucernians (hauing serued Charlemaigne in a warre against the Sarazins) obtained of him diuers priuiledges, and especially, the vse of Cornets, wherewith they did both summon the battailes and retreats, euen as they doe nowe at this present time.

The Charter of Guichard the priest, out of the Annals of Lucerna.

Be it howsoeuer, anciently, the Cannons of the colledge of Lucerna, helde great authoritie, as also in many Townes of Germany. This colledge was founded by Guichard the Priest, brother vnto Ruperte, Leader of the horsemen to king Lewes, who was sonne to King Theodorick, who died in the yeare seuen hundered, & founded also the colledge of Canons at Zurich. The colledge of Lucerna fell to the Abbot of Murbach, by the donation of King Pepin. The same Abbot was Lord of Lucerna, vntill the time of the Emperor Albert of Austria: who hauing resolued to establish a new kinde of principality in Swetia, as already wee haue told you; bought Lucern of the Abbot of Murbach, by giuing him foure villages in Alsatia, and a certaine summe of money, amounting to the valew of two thousand Markes of money, as it is affirmed.

The colledge of Lucerna, founded by Guichard the Priest, & what Donations were thereto annexed.

This City enioyed (formerly) the enfranchisement of many things, & sundry goodly priuiledges beside, so long as the Abbots were Lords thereof; and yet they held no soueraigne iurisdiction: for, the cittizens were the greatnes of the citty, builded the wals and rampiers, and fortified it (by their owne discretion) in those times. The Prince of Austria also promised for his part, to conserue their priuiledges inuiolably, and made shew of being a verie gentle Lord, as he was neuer sparing of goodly promises. But soon after, the dominion of the Austrians proued to gripe and oppresse the Lucernians, who were constrained (to their great disaduantage) to make warre vpon their neighbours. For they were the first that exposed themselues to make incursions on the Cantons, and maintained a garrison in their citties at their great charge. The Tower of Sbourg, which standeth yet to this day cõfirmeth what hath bin said: for there it was, where the Lucernians planted a Corps de guard, against the incursions which their enemies made vpon the Lake. When they had no open war, nor any assurance of peace, the Austrians did not much care to maintain them. In the meane while, Trafficke ceased, the fields were forraged, and many times the Lucernians fell into the hands of their enemies. Moreouer, being gone to warre with them of Glaris, vnder the conduct of Otho, Captaine of Colmar, to encounter with the Emperor Lewes, the wages promised them, was made void and frustrate. They themselues had paid many in other warres, and lent good summes of money on scedules, to Captaines of the Austrian Princes; but now, in place of payment, they were handled in such sort, as they thought both their good seruice and mony vtterly lost.

The Tower of Sbourg.

Otho, captain of Colmar, leader to the of Lucerna.

Being thus tyred and harried so many seuerall waies, they supplicated and desired (oftentimes) them of Austria, to be at peace with the Cantons. But perceiuing they trauailed all this while in vaine, themselues (in the end) accorded with the Cantons, leauing (neuertheless) the rights of the house of Austria to them intirely. This peace exasperated not onely them of Austria, but also many cittizens, seruants, and pentioners to Gentlemen, by whom they benefited & inriched thẽselues. Both the one & other feared, that the City would ally it selfe with the three Cantons, and that in so doing, they wold estrange themselues from the Austrians. And therefore they conspired together, to oppresse them that had counceld the people to make this peace, and that they should exhort them to be allied with som other. For this effect, in secret they contracted a league; the substance whereof was this, That at a certaine houre of the night, they of the citty should open the gates, and at the same instant, they of Austria, (with so many horsemen well appointed) should make seazure of the Cittie. Afterwardes, hauing ioyned their their forces together, and reduced the City into their owne power: they would puniſh the friends of the Cantons, break the peace, and plant a Garriſon in the city, to the end, that afterward no ſuch matter might be againe attempted.

The care and prouidence of the Cittizens in a time of vrgent neceſsity.

But the Cittizens being aduertiſed, of the traines and ambuſhes prepared for them, vpon the appointed night did put themſelues into armes, placed good guards at the gates, & prouided ſo ſurely for their ſafety, that ſuch as tooke part with the houſe of Auſtria, durſt not bee ſeene any way to ſtirre. Then the Gouernour of Rotembourg (with many Gentlemen) beeing come to the gates, they of the Citty (to whom he termed himſelfe a friend) gaue him entrance, and ſome ſmall number with him, ſuffered the reſt to ſtand without. Perceiuing that this cunning tricke tooke no ſuch ſucceſſe as he expected, and not daring to doe any thing by open force, becauſe he was the weaker; he returned the next morning to Rotembourg with his traine, and ſome Citizens of Lucerna, partakers with the Auſtrians, fearing to be puniſhed by the City, went away with him.

The league & Alliance made betweene them of Lucerna, & the 3. Cantons

This combination was the cauſe of haſtening the league between the Lucernans and the three Cantons; for, perceyuing the iniuries and ambuſhes of the Nobility, and the dangers where-with they threatned them: they thought it fit not to reiect the ſuccour of their neighbours, which they accepted, as ſent from heauen. So they beeame vnited together, on the Saturday before Saint Martins day, in the year one thouſand, three hundred, thirty two.

Extremity vrged againſt the Lucernians by them of Auſtria.

When the Auſtrians had intelligence hereof, they appointed Garriſons in diuers places about Lucerna, as namely, at Sempach, Rotenbourg, and Meyenberg: by meanes whereof, they did cut off all victuals from the Lucernians: and if any aduentured farre from the City, they were either ſlaine, or taken priſoners, ſo that they were conſtrained to goe ſeeke for food with a maine army. The yeare enſuing, and the ſeuenteenth day of March, the Lucernians going with their troopes towards Buchnaß (which is a Caſtle, now called Hertenſtein, vpon the Lake of Zug) the Lord of Ramſwag, Gouernour of Rotenbourg, for the houſe of Auſtria; layde an ambuſcado for them on the way, and ſlew about ſome foureſcore of them. The reſt that were ſcattered in the fieldes, and looking after pillage, aſſembled themſelues together, neere to Buchnaß, and charged the enemy ſo couragiouſly, that they enforced them to flight, hauing firſt loſt an hundred foote, and eighteene horſe.

The battel giuen at Buchnaſſ, and what ſucceſſe enſued thereon.

The Gouernor of Auſtria well perceiuing, that ouuert power ſtood not for his aduantage, neither did any way benefite him in his buſineſſe: vndertooke the firſt traine of ambuſcadoes, and priuate practiſes. There were then at Lucerna, many perſons that had beene penſioners to the houſe of Auſtria. This war was verie troubleſome to them, for they had loſt their penſions, and beſides, enioyed not the reuennewes of their owne inheritances; which (for the moſt part) lay on the lands of the Auſtrians. The Gouernour conferred with them, and becauſe they were of the very worthieſt houſes in the Citty, and the cheefeſt of them: he aduiſed them to perſwade the Citizens to renounce their alliance with the three Cãtons, and render themſelues again to the houſe of Auſtria. He ſhewed them, that they might bee much more endamaged by one Prince, being a potent enemy, & ſo neere a neighbour, then by the three Cantons, who (in the paſſed Warres) could doe them little, or no harme at all.

The ſecond coniuration againſt the men of Lucerna.

And foraſmuch as it had happened at this very time, that the lower Towne, and the fields about it, were greatly iniuried by impetuous and extraordinarie raines: the Gouernor made vſe of this accident, to his own aduantage; telling them that God puniſhed them by ſuch a means, becauſe they rebelled againſt their lawfull Prince. But becauſe theſe coniurations could not preuaile, nor hee mooue the people with all his goodly perſwaſions; he would compaſſe his intention by another ſtratageme, and complotted with cloſe confederates, to maſſacre the Authors and conſeruators of this Alliance with the Cantons, taking their faith vnder oath, and Letters ſigned and ſealed. And, becauſe they might be known one to another, each of the Conſpirators did weare red ſleeues, which onely was their noted marke. Whereupon grew the Prouerb

They were to meete vnder the great Arch or Gate, neere to the publike houſe of the Taylors fraternity: for then the watch for night ſhould ceaſe to walke the round in that quarter: Alſo, the Lieutenant to the Duke of Auſtria, muſt haue an army ready to bee let into the City by the conſpiratours, who (purpoſely) ſhould open the gates. But God (by his gracious prouidence) diſcouered theſe bloody conſultations, the very ſame night as the maſſacre was to bee executed. For, as the conſpiters met in Armes at the place appointed, a yong man, paſsing accidentally by, vvithout dreaming or thinking on any ſuch matter, diſcouered the buſineſſe, and vnderſtood their deliberation. The night was very darke, by meanes whereof, he ſoftly ſlipt away, hying ſpeedily to the butchery or Shambles, where perceiuing by the lighted candles and noiſe he heard, that diuers were there vp out of bedde, drinking and playing: hee went in amongeſt them, and tolde them the things hee had heard.

The bloodie intention happily diſcouered, euen whē it was to bee performed.

Forthwith they ran to the Gouernor, and acquainted him with the compact, & the Citizens quickly had warning to arm themſelues, and good Guards alſo ſent to the gates: moreouer, they ruſhed in ſodainly vpon the conſpirators, and tooke them priſoners, before they could giue entrance to ſuch ſupply as they expected from without. And to impeach the Lieutenant to the Duke of Auſtria, from attempting any thing by manifeſt force, or violence againſt the City, it being in this dangerous agitation: the ſame night they ſent (in poſte) for ſuccour vnto the three Cantons, who alſo ſent them three hundred men early in the morning. After this happy ſupply was thus come to thē, they conſulted then togither, concerning puniſhment to bee inflicted on the conſpirators. Their Letters were laid before them, and ſuch other guilty perſons, who had eſcaped out of the tumult, by fauour of the nights extreame darkeneſſe, vvere likewiſe apprehended and impriſoned, as was moſt conuenient.

The conſpirators taken and impriſoned ſodainly.

Puniſhment to be inflicted on the offenders.

Now, in regard that the number of the conſpirators was great; and, many among thē of the principall houſes, vvho had ſtore of kindred and friends in the city. At requeſt of the three Cantons, their liues were ſaued, and they puniſhed by the purſe, after they had ſolemnly ſworne neuer to attempt any thing more againſt the ſtate of the city, nor contrary to their alliance with the three Cantons. Heereupon, they of Lucerna made a law, wherby it was prohibited to the Citizens, not to make any aſſemblies or clandeſtine meetings in any place, nor to bind themſelues one to another by Oath: except vpon any bargain they made for monies, they ſhould leaue twice as much in the hands of the Seigneury.

Grace and fauour done vndeſeruedly to the offenders

A law againſt conuenticles and cloſe meetings.

At this time, they of Auſtria were reconciled to the Emperor Iewes, to whom alſo, a great accuſation was made of the three Cantons & the Lucernians. VVho (contrarywiſe) well excuſed themſelues, and ſhewed, that they were allied vppon plenty of good reaſons, and without doing wrong vnto any man. Whereupon, the Emperour gaue charge to them of Zurich, Berne, and Baſile, who were then allyed to the houſe of Auſtria, and friends alſo to the Cantons (for three yeares before, the men of Zurich had aſsiſted them in a Warre againſt the Griſons) to pacifie the difference, and make an agreement of the Cantons with the Auſtrians.

Complaint made to the Emp. againſt the three Cātons and Lucernians.

VVherefore, in the yeare, one thouſand three hundred thirty foure, by entermiſe of their Ambaſſadors, truce vvas taken for two yeares and an half, on theſe conditions following. That during this time, they of Lucerna ſhould not be conſtrained to pay the moneyes borrowed of them, nor the wages due to the Lucernians by the Captaines. That they might make vſe and ſeruice of the Money of the Dukes of Zoſinge, forged in their Cittie: rendering obedience and honor done to the Dukes.

Conditions of truce betweene the Auſtrians and the Cantons agreed vpon.

The alliance with the three Cantons, to remaine in abſolute integrity, and the Cantons not to hinder the D. of Auſtria from inioying the goods and reuennews which they helde in the countries of the Cantons. The Emperour was to depute the Commiſſaries, for hearing the differences of the Dukes with the Cantons, at any time whatſoeuer.

The truce further prolonged betweene them.

Afterward, the truce was further prolonged, and although the peace was ſcarſely well aſſured, but was ſometimes broken: yet they of Auſtria made no more open warre vpon the confederates. Vntill after ſuch time as they of Zurich wrung themſelues into the alliance, in the yeare, 1351. Then Glaris and Zug came in the yeare following, and Berne the yeare after that: Concerning the eſtate and alliance of theſe Cantons, we come to diſcourſe more at large.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Originall, condition, and eſtate of Zurich, before it leagued in with the amity of the Cantons.

Concerning the antiquitie of Zurich, and when it was builded.

IT is not to bee doubted, but that Zurich is one of the moſt ancient Citties of Swetia. The Annals of the country doe declare, that it was builded ſixeteene yeares after the cittie of Treues or Treuiris. Marianus Scotus ſaieth in his Chronicles, that Trebetus, ſon to Ninus, builded the city of Treues, in the time of the Patriarch Abraham. The Romane hiſtories make honourable mention of the

The Tigurins are the people of Zurich, and were conquered by Iulius Cæſar.

Tigurines, who are they of Zurich, becauſe they were preſent in the war of the Cimbrians againſt the Romans, and ouerthrew the Conſull Caſſius. Afterwards, when Iulius Cæſar came to the conqueſt of the Gaules, they were vanquiſhed and ruined by him. After that time, to the inuaſion which the Allemaines or Germaines made: Zurich was ſubiect to the Romane Empire, then fell into the handes of the Kings of France; and laſtly, came to the Germane Empire, which beareth ſ̄ name and ſhadow of the Romane empire.

Two Colleg. all Churches in Zurich, and a caſtle on the riuer of Limagus.

There are in Zurich two Colledgiall churches; one of men, the other of Women founded by the Kings of France. In ancient times, theſe colledges were (wellneere) Lords & commanders of the citie. There was alſo (heretofore) a caſtle, builded vpon a little hill, nere to the Riuer of Limagus, where the Gouernours (eſtabliſhed by the Kings of France) kepte theyr abiding, who were Prouoſts of the city, & of thoſe colledges. Afterward, vnder the Germane Emperors, thoſe Prouoſtes ſtill continued, but they dwelt not in the caſtle: becauſe the gouernment was willingly giuen to the Princes. Neuertheles, ſince thoſe times, there grew in the city a councell of ſixe and thirty men, twelue whereof gouerned for the ſpace of foure moneths. The commonwealth was ſo ordered in the yeare, 1100. and continued in that eſtate till the yeare, 1336. and then it fell to changing, in manner as heereafter we ſhall declare.

A Councel of 36. men, to gouern by ſeuerall turnes.

The beginning of the city of Zurich, and in what manner it proceeded.

From ſuch time as the city beganne to throwe off the yoake of the Colledgiall churches, it began alſo to conſider on hir owne freedome, and how it might beſt receiue increaſing. For, amongſt the diſſentions of the Emperors and Popes, the men of Zurich adhered to the Emperors, and followed Fredericke Barbaroſſa, Fredericke the ſecond, and Lewes of Bauaria, who augmented theyr liberties and franchiſes, eſpecially Fredericke the ſecond. For, after the death of Berthoult, the laſt Duke of Zerungen, Prouoſt of the Colledges, and alſo of the Citie of Zurich: he receiued the cittizens into protection of the Empire, about the yeare, 1218. Then afterward, he tooke many priuiledges from the Colledgiall churches. Amongſt other, the right of electing the councell, and graunted it to the citizens, ordaining, that it ſhould neuer bee lawfull to alienate zurich from the Empyre. Alſo, in the time of Fredericke, the Cittizens made the ditches and walles about the City.

Zurich neuer to be alienated from the Empire.

It came to paſſe, that they requeſted the Prieſts & were citizens of the Cittie, to furniſh their part of charge towardes theſe these fortifications, and commãded them moreouer, to rid their houses of some women ill reported of: which offended them in such sort, as they with-drewe themselues from the Citizens. But this difference was appeased by the byshop of Constance. Some few yeares after, the Pope excommunicated them of Zurich, becaus they tooke part with the Emperor Frederick. At the same time, they ruinated (by permission of the Emperor) the old Castle, fearing least some (enemies to their liberties) should get possession therof. At this day it is a very pleasant place, beautified with Linden and other fayre trees planted there. And becaus the City stood excommunicated, and (by consequence) exposed to the violence of any man: many Gentlemen round about, much molested the Citizens, so that the trafficke of silkes, being very great before in that place, was from thence transported to Come.

The Pope excommunicated them of Zurich.

In the yeare, 1351. they of Zurich did take their first alliance with the Cantons of Vri and Suits, the tenour whereof you haue already seene. Some few yeares after the death of Frederick, his Nephew Conradine laboured to subiect them of Zurich, to the Dukes of Suaba: vnder the pretence and colour, that they had long time bin Prouostes and Gouernors thereof. The Cittizens maintained theyr liberty very firme and strongly, which caused Conradine to worke so with the Emperor Conrad, that Zurich stood proscribed from the Empire. But Richard of England, king of the Romanes, tooke away the proscription, and by Imperiall Letters, confirmed the priuiledges of the Cittizens. In those Letters, amongst other matters, these words following are contained.

The first alliance of Zurich with the Cantons of Vri and Suits.

A true Coppy of the fauor done by Richard of England, K. of the Romanes, to them of Zurich.

BY faithfull report, which is come to our serenity, we haue vnderstood, that Conradine, Sonne to the late King Conrad, who named himselfe D. of Suaba; not contented with this fault, in vainely vsurping the honor appertaining to another, without hauing any right or power so to do: hath published a sentence of banishment, against our Citizens of Zurich (as if they were subiects to that Dutchy) planted in the especiall bosome of Vs and our Empire, & not appertaining any way to that Dutchy, but immediately to the Empire, according as frõ antiquitie hath beene established, and is now approued in our time, &c. Giuen at Haguenaw, the xx. day of Nouember, in the yeare one thousand two hundred sixty two. And of our reigne the sixt.

These Letters do render an ample testimony, of the liberty belonging vnto them of Zurich: notwithstanding, they tooke no great effect then, becaus such as succeeded in the Empire after Fredericke the second, to Raoul of Habspourg, held no great credit, so that (by manie) they are not numbred among the Emperors, but all this interuall or respite of time, is referred vnto an Inter-regnum, wherein the most part of al the variances were decided by the sword, rather then by iustice and law, and the stronger trampled the weaker vnder their feet. Aboue all, the Gentlemen that had anie means, did nothing else but machinate against the liberties of those Cities that were their neighbors. All the wayes were couered with theeues, & (in briefe) this License wrought a meereconfusion among the most wicked and desperate, mouing them to attempt and execute euen whatsoeuer themselues pleased.

How and at what time the people of Zurich lost theyr liberty.

Heereuppon, they of Zurich, desiring to conserue their liberty, and maintaine themselues in peace: sent an honorable Ambassage to the Lord of Regenspourg, entreating him to be their Gouernour and Captaine, vntill the election of a newe Emperor, and (for that effect) offered him honest and sufficient gages. The Gentleman was a neighbour to Zurich, a rich and powerfull Lorde in those times. Hee proudly reiected the honour which the men of Zurich did him, and made them answere in this manner. If the Citizens would obey al his commandements, and subiect the Cittie to him; hee was readie to take them into his protection, and would be their benign Lord. But if they refused his offer, they should ſhortly bee compelled to accept it, euen in meere deſpight of them: becauſe their Citty was ingirt and inuelloped with his caſtles, as Fiſh within a Weele, or water Leape.

The ſtrong places of the Lord of Regenſpourg, neere to Zurich, and his potent Confederates.

This vauntery of the Lord of Regenſpourg was not wholly vain, for he had many ſtrong places neere vnto the cittie: as Wrtpia on the Lake of Zurich, a mile and a halfe from the cittie; Glanzembourg, a Towne and caſtle of like diſtance, and on the riuer of Limagus. He had (moreouer) much neerer to the cittie, vpon a high Mountaine towards the Sunne-ſetting, two caſtles, to wit, Vltiberg and Balderie, impregnable (as was imagined) by reaſon of their ſcituation. Beſide, the Towne and caſtle of Regenſpourg, not aboue fiue miles at the moſt from Zurich. And, beyond all theſe, manie Countes or Earles were Leagued with him; among other, the Count of Kybourg, dwelling at Burgdorff, the Count of Raſperwill, of Togge, of Nidow, of Arberg, and the Barons of Eſchenbach, of Riggenberg, of Kilchberg, of Balme, of Hombourg, of Warts, and many other. They of Zurich, hauing beene ſo ignominiouſly refuſed: addreſſed themſelues to Raoul of Habſpourg, mortall enemy to this Regenſpourg; made alliance with him, & within two yeares following, tooke the caſtles of Vtznaberg, Wrtpia, Vtliberg, Balderie, and the Towne of Glanzembourg, molleſting Regenſpourg in ſuch ſort, as at length hee deſired peace, and came to make his abiding at Zurich. Theſe things hapned in the yeare, one thouſand, two hundred, ſixtie ſixe, and the yeares following.

Pride & ſcorn full contempt very iuſtly ſcourged and rewarded.

In the yeare one thouſand, two hundred, ſeuenty three, Raoul of Habſpourg, was created king of the Romans, by common conſent of the ſeauen Electours of the Empire. Afterward, being choſen Emperour, the Cittizens of Zurich, ſerued him in many Warres, hee finding them ſtill faithfull, and valiant ſouldiers. In the warre of Bohemia, he had two hundred, which he placed betweene the Enſignes in the firſt ranke: exhorting the others ſouldiours to imitate the magnanimity of them of Zurich, whom (he ſaid) he had well knowne and made proofe of before. Alſo, the moſt part of them dyed in the field, of battaile then giuen, and the Enſignes of the other were borne (for their honour) into the Temple of the Cordeliers or gray Friars. Raoul hauing receyued ſo many ſeruices by the men of Zurich, gaue them diuers priuiledges: and to honour them the more, beautified their Enſignes of Armes, with a Diadem and Bend of Purple.

Raoul of Habſpourg King of the Romanes, and a friend to them of Zurich.

Many haue imagined among the vulgar ſort, becauſe in the battaile at Winterberg, that the Bend was afterward annexed therto, as a note or mark of theyr ignominy. But there are many thinges yeelding contrary reaſons to this opinion. For, in the firſt place, the notes of ignominy are not red, but meerly black. And afterward, when René, Duke of Lorraine, tooke away all the marks of the enſignes belonging to the Switzers, in the warre againſt the Duke of Bourgongne; they of Zurich would neuer permit, that the Bend ſhould bee taken out of theyr Standard. And in the yeare, one thouſand, fiue hundred and twelue, when Pope Iulius gaue new Standards vnto the Switzers, the Councell of Zurich would not alter any thing whatſoeuer in theyr Enſigne, no, not ſo much as the bend or Diadem, which they neuer would haue done, if they had beene any notes of infamy.

The ſtandard of Zurich carried away by the enemy, at the battaile of Winterberg.

The conſtancy of the Switzers, for their enſignes of Armes.

Moreouer, Iohn of Winterduer, who liued at that time when they of Zurich wer conquered by ambuſcadoes at Winterduer, ſpake to King Raoul theſe Words: He crowned the Standard of Zurich with great action of graces. The ſame Authour alſo declareth, that in the warre at Reigenſpourg, Iaques Mulner, a cittizen of Zurich, couered (with his owne body) Raoul of Habſpourg, who was caſt from his horſe: and hauing remounted him vpon his own, brought him forth of the preaſe ſafe and ſound. For which great fauour, Raoul did much honour to the man, and loued him ſingularly; yea, hee was alſo a deare friend to them of Zurich. This they auouch, becauſe Carion, and ſuch as were of his minde, did highly wrong the cittie of Zurich, accuſing it of ſedition & rebellion againſt King Raoul, who therefore foiled them, and brought them vnder his obedience by armes.

Iaques Mulner, a worthie Citizen of Zurich, and his honorable acte.

and the byshop of Constance. Now to the end that they of Zurich might ioyn themselues with the other: they assayled the Towne of Winterduer, and tooke it in the assault, vnder conduct of the Count of Togge, and there (in Garrison) was the Lord of Werdenberg, with great troopes, in name of Albert of Austria. The first day they were Victors, but on the morrow, by treachery in the Lorde of Werdenberg, who caused the Ensigne belonging to the Byshop of Constance, to be carried before him: by this cunning stratageme, the men of Zurich were ouerthrowne and cut in peeces. They attempted againe another warre in the name of Adolph, against them of Groningen, the which is in the territory of Zurich. But Albert Duke of Austria, sonne to Raoul, was offended at their enterprize, beeing informed by his people, that the greater part of them of Zurich, were slaine at Winterduer; which caused him to come and besiedge Zurich, which hee imagined to bee quite emptie of any defensiue men.

The Lorde of Werdenberg, his cunning stratagem, against them of Zurich.

A politike stratagem performed by them of Zurich, against Albert Duke of Austria.

The Citizens made a muster of theyr men (apt for armes) in the Citty, and on a place very high, where sometimes the Castle stood; and that the Duke of Austriaes Army might easily discerne them. And, because their number might appeare to bee much more greater then it was, they caused all their strongest and stoutest women to be armed, and theyr children of biggest stature: which made the enemy to imagine, that there were great store of warlike people within the Citty. Afterward, they sent Ambassadors vnto Albert, to remember him, that his Father alwayes loued and maintained that cittie; that the cittizens had serued him in all his warres, and wherein they (euermore) carried themselues faithfully and valiantly. Wherefore, they intreated him to follow his Fathers steps, and to accept them of Zurich rather as loyall and seruiceable friendes, then to beleeue false rumors spred abroad by their il-willers, considering withall, that they were ready to giue him satisfaction.

Peace concluded betweene Du. Albert, & the men of Zutich.

Albert answered the Ambassadors very kindly, & willed them to come to him at Winterduer; where the peace was confirmed betweene him and them of Zurich: vppon condition, that they should acknowledge and honour Albert as lawfull Emperor. This peace was continued after the death of Albert, and in the warre which his sons made against them that had slaine him: the cittizens of Zurich kept themselues stil faithfully on the behalfe of Austria, and fought for them against the three Cantons. After that, in the battell of Morgarten, fiftie men of Zurich were slaine in the field, as hath alreadie beene declared. Moreouer, when the Emperour was in some troubles, because some had elected Lewes, Prince of Bauaria; and others Fredericke, the Sonne to Albert, the men of Zurich helde a long time for the part of Fredericke.

Worthy seruices done by the of Zurich.

In the yeare, 1330. peace was made betweene Lewes of Bauaria, and Fredericke of Austria, whereat, Fredericke renounced his Imperiall Election, and Lewes (to recompence him) promised to pay him a great summe of money. And because hee could not presently furnish him therewith, in regard of the Warres hee lately had, to his mightie expences; gaue vnto him foure Townes as a pawn, and security of payment, Namely, Zurith, Schaffouse, Rhinfeld, and Neubourg on the Rheine. But they of Zurich, immediately sent Ambassadors to the Emperour, to shew him, that they were so incorporated with the Empire, as they could (by no meanes) be separated from it. Their Letters were shewn to the same effect, read and perused by the Emperor; and then, although he loued them but a little, because they had taken part with Fredericke: yet notwithstanding hee left them to their owne liberties, and in sted of Zurich, Brissacke was giuen in gage to them of Austria.

The men of Zurich would not be separated from the Empire, making it known by their Ambassadors.

The Ambassadors had also brought with them, the Deputies of the three Cantons, whom Lewes greatly affected, because they had alwayes beene faithfull vnto him. These Deputies declared, that the City of Zurich was a louing & frendly neighbor to the Cantons, & had highly serued them many times. Beside, they of Zurich promised, that (hereafter) they would be no lesse faithfull & obedient to Lewes of Bauaria, who was then their only lawfull Emperour, then they had formerly beene to Fredericke of Austria. This did much offend the Austrians; for, albeit Fredericke had renounced the empire: yet notwithſtanding, Leopold, Albert, and Otho his brethren, would not ratifie the agreement, but continued warre againſt Lewes of Bauaria. By which means Zurich fell off againe from friendſhippe with them of Auſtria, and was excommunicated by the Pope, in ſuch manner, as for the ſpace of eighteene years, there was no exerciſe of ceremonies (according to the Romane Church) vſed in Zurich. The Prieſts departed from the citizens, ſome by their owne meere motion; others were expelled by the Bourgeſſes, becauſe they refuſed to adminiſter the Sacraments. There were none but the Cordeliers or gray Friars, who went forth at one gate, and entered immediately at another.

Zurich, a louing friend & neighbour to the Cantons.

The Citie ſtanding thus excommunicated, and hated by the houſe of Auſtria: many Gentlemen, ſeruants vnto that houſe, much molleſted the Cittizens. Wherefore, in the yeare 1333. they of Zurich, with the men of Strasbourg, Baſile, and Berne, beſiedged and took a caſtle on the Rheine, named Schunaw, belonging to the Lords of Geroltzegh, and ruinated it, becauſe it was one of the retreats for theeues. The yeare following, the men of Zurich ruined many caſtles, to wit, Fryenſtein, on the riuer of Toſe, and another nere vnto it, called Touff the high. Alſo Schenenwert, on the Limagus, about three miles from Zurich and Schlatte, neere to Eſgow, becauſe the Gentlemen to whom theſe caſtles appertained, did greatly trouble the city of Zurich.

The next yeare inſuing, the Gouernement of the Common-wealth of Zurich was changed; which prooued to bee the cauſe of great garboiles, and the principall occaſion, of allying the citizens with the Cantons of Swetia. We haue already told you, that the commonwelth was gouerned by 36. men, and in ſuch ſort, as twelue commaunded during the ſpace of foure months. Some difference hapned between them and the people, in regard whereof, the people began to demaund an account of their adminiſtration, eſpecially, of the twelue that were in the ſecond order. Some were accuſed among them, of robbing and diſſipating (in a ſmall time) the publike treaſure, and beſides, that they had bound the Cittie in in no meane ſtore of great debtes. Eight of thoſe men, finding themſelues to bee hardly clear in this caſe, retired from the city: the other foure, voluntarily reſigned vp their charge. Thus the authoritie of twelue ceaſing, they grew to a forme of electing Magiſtrates, being choſen out of euery band of the tradeſmen, and by ſeuerall nomination.

The Emperour Lewes confirmed this kinde of Commonwealth by his Letters Patents, and the ſucceeding Emperours alſo approued the ſame. They that had withdrawne themſelues from the Citie, yeelding after to the peoples iudgement, were condemned in ſeuerall fines: and they that ſped the beſt were baniſhed for three yeares, hauing firſt faithfully promiſed neuer to make any conſpiracie againſt the citizens. Heereto alſo was annexed a note of infamy, to wit, that neyther they, nor any of their children, ſhold euer be admitted into Councell. The ancient men and councellors, beeing affraide of a iudgement ſo ſeuere, beganne to diſtruſt their owne cauſes; ſo that nine among them forſooke the Cittie. This departure of theyrs was conuerted vnto baniſhment, and their goodes confiſcated. As for the reſt, nine of them vvere condemned in great fines, and then baniſhed for two yeares: with this brand alſo ſet vpon them, that they nor their children ſhould euer be admitted vnto councell. Others, that ſtood to their tryall, iuſtified themſelues before the people, and were elected to be of the new councell.

The baniſhed men made their retreat to a Towne, ſcituated on the Lake, two miles (or thereabout) from Zurich, named Raſperwill, which at that time belonged to Count Iohn, of the Houſe of Habſpourg. Three years before, he had made requeſt to them of Zurich, to accept him as a Citizen: willingly they would, and did (at laſt) receiue him, although he was Leagued with them of Auſtria, and diuers of them alſo were of his parentage. Heereupon, hee liſtened the ſooner vnto the baniſhed men, and made a confederacie with them, vnder certaine conditions; for ſecuritie vvhereof, hee gaue them the Caſtle of the Towne in keeping. Theſe baniſhed men being thus commodiouſly lodged & fortified, began to ac-accuse them of Zurich, pretending to haue suffered great outrages by them; they defamed the Consull and new councell,and to make attempts against the Citie,vsing(to this effect) the helpe of some of their friends, that remained still in Zurich. Some of them being discouered by the councell,were punished: others fled away secretly, and ioyned with the banished men. And becausе these banished men had falsified their solemne promises: they were banished perpetually by the Senate,especially they that stood relegated but for a certaine time enioyned them.

Warre raised by them of Zurich against the banished men.

Now, becausе the citizens of Zurich stood in slender security,either for themselues or their goods, since those banished men were excluded the city: diuers times they admonished the Count of his duty,that he being a Bourges, ought not to continue his fauour to the banished men,but rather to withdraw al helpe and comfort from them. Perceiuing the Count made no reckning of their complaints,they leuied another Army, and went and besiedged Rasperwill, the retire and refuge of the banished men. In vaine was this attempt of theirs, becausе the banished men had great plenty of victuals, and defended themselues valiantly, whichmade the other to raise their siedg. Glady therefore they quitted the place, & so much the rather,becausе the Count of Habspourg,protector of the banished, and whom most especially they sought for; was not at Rasperwill, but in a Castle called Grinow, which is at the head of Zurich Lake. They discamped thence, & marched with their Army vnto that very place, beeing conducted by Diethelme, Count of Togge, who was at controuersie with the other, concerning the castle of Grinow.

The banished proued too strong for them of Zurich, in warre raised against them.

The Count of Habspourg (with his Army well appointed) was encamped at Buchberg, whence he came mainly running vpon them of zurich, who landed suddenly from their Boates; and they granting them no leysure to bee raunged in order of battaile, put all in rout and disorder that were on Land, compelling them to enter their Boates againe, in which confusion they lost not many mē, except the Count of Togge, who was taken prisoner.But after that al their troops were ioyned together againe in the middle of the Lake,being moued with anger, and desirous to wipe off the shame formerly receiued: by aduice of their Leaders,they went on shore againe, brauely bidding them the battaile, which they wonne. And such was their succesſe,that the Count of Habspourg,and many Gentlemen with him,were slaine in the field: moreouer, they carried away in their Boates a mighty booty, & sixe Ensignes of the enemies.The citizens of Rasperwill, hearing of this ouerthrow,to reuenge the death of their Lord, they cut in peeces the Count of Togge, who was conuaied on Land,so soone as he had beene taken prisoner in the first encounter.

The succesſe of the men of Zurich,gainst the Count of Habspourg at Buchberg.

The Count of Togge hewed in peeces.

This things hapned in the yeare 1337. And the same yeare,the Emperor Lewes, and Albert of Austria, second of that name,surnamed the Cripple,made peace betweene Iohn of Habspourg, Sonne to the deceased Count; the banished men of Zurich,and the Consull and Citizens of the City, vpon these conditions following. That the banished men should pay to the citizens (as a fine or amerce-ment) the summe of sixe hundred markes of money: remaining still out of Zurich fiue years,during which time, they shold not come neare the citty, by the space of two miles; which beeing expired, they should againe be receiued,& their goods remaine entirely to them. The Emperor conceiued, that this new gouernment in the state, would highly strengthen it in these fiue years:for there was appearance of great danger,that if the ancient Councellors were re-established, alterations would ensue in many matters,& nothing else please them, but the old form of rule, as many of their friends and partakers earnestly desired.

Peace newly confirmed betweene the men of Zurich,& them that were banished,vpon diuers conditions.

This peace lasted not long, for the banished men (fauoured by a great number of the Nobility) made no regard at all of their promises:but molested the citizens, and conspired daily something or other against the city. In regard whereof,by permission of the Emperour, the houses, and al the goods which the banished had in the city, were confiscated. Notwithstanding, the yeare following, bv the intermise of Agnes Queene of Hungary, (who was daughter to Albert,first of that name, and after the death of her Father, remairemained in Swetia the moſt part of her time) of Fredericke of Auſtria, and ſome other of the Cities: peace was renewed betweene the baniſhed, and the citizens of Zurich: yet this was no firmer, or dured any longer then the former. For although the baniſhed promiſed faithfully, that they would ſtand to the councell of Zurichs ſentence, and pay the fines wherin they were condemned; yet would they not make any ſatisfaction at all.

Peace once more renewed, & broken againe the ſecond time.

Many of the houſe of Habſpourg, (among others, the Sonne and kindred to Count Iohn, whom they of Zurich ſlew in the battaile at Grinow) aſſembled a great number of Gentlemen, offended with the liberty of Zurich, hating that Democritall gouernment, as being too popular in their opinion: fauoured the baniſhed, and prouoked them ſtill on againſt them of Zurich. And they on the other ſide, for their better maintenance, firſt of all burned two Caſtles: one neere to the Toſe, appertaining to the Lords of Landberg, Gentlemen of marke: and the other to the Lords of Schowenberg, on an high hill aboue Elgow, becauſe theſe places did much iniure them. And to fortifie themſelues yet ſtronger, they combined amity with the cities of Conſtance and S. Gall. Alſo, becauſe ſome differences remained to be appeaſed with them of Schaffouze, and war might be moued from thē: they yeelded willingly (by intermiſſion of Ambaſſadors to ſome other cities) & in ſhort time after, comprehended them of Schaffouze in alliance with the cities of Conſtance and S. Gall. At the ſame time, they allied themſelues alſo with the Biſhop and city of Baſile. Afterward they receiued into the number of their Bourgeſſes, many houſes of the Rhodes, or of S. Iohn of Ieruſalem: to be ſupplied and maintained with Gentlemen, and men of warre, as continually (and from time to time) were in that worthy Order of Knights of S. Iohn.

Meanes deuiſed and vndertaken, to reſiſt enemies and maintain their liberties.

Schaffouze, Conſtance, & S. Gall allied with Zurich.

Theſe puiſſant cities and people round about, being leagued with them of Zurich by new alliances, or reconfirmation of their ancient amity: the eſtate of the city remained more peaceable, and it ſeemed, that the baniſhed had loſt all hope of euer enioying the city by power. But in this ſleeping time, they conſpired very ſecretly, to make themſelues Maſters thereof by treaſon. Count Iohn of Habſpourg, Son to him that was ſlaine on the day at Grinow, as already we haue ſhewn, was ioyned with them; vpon condition, that he ſhould re-eſtabliſh the baniſhed men, in poſſeſſion of their goods in the country, and that they ſhould diſingage the lands of the Count, morgaged for debts to his creditors. With them ioyned the Count of Toggenbourg, Peregrin Landberg (who ſome yeares before, had beene at great debate with them of Zurich, though all ſeemed to be laide aſleepe by an agreement made betweene them) the Baron of Marzing, and many Gentlemen, partly pentioners and vaſſails to the Count of Habſpourg, whō they gladly endeuored to gratifie, & partly as friends to the baniſhed, who had many ancient friends and partakers in the city, ſome wherof were well acquainted with al the conſpiracy, and others alſo that would ioyne with them, if the firſt attempt ſucceeded well. A further hope alſo was conceiued, that no meane number more would come to their part, if they did but ſee the ancient councellors, namely, ſuch as were greatly indebted, and could ſubſiſt by no other meanes. Such likewiſe, as in this alteration of the ſtate, wer not honoured nor recompenced according to their expectation, and who were vnworthy to be ſeene of others, aduanced and preferred before them. Then again, ſome others, who were weary of the eſtate in her preſent condition, deſiring nothing more then nouelty: as in all commonwealths are daily to be found, too many ſuch kinde of people. The reſolution of the conſpirators was, to make vſe of the night time, and to plant armed men in all the ſtreetes of Zurich, and to force the houſes of Raoulle Brun, Conſull alſo of all the new Councellors, and the reſt of their enemies, to maſſacre them, ſeize the citty, make themſelues Lords therof, and take away the liberties of the cittizens.

Loue of goods and greedy deſire of reuenge, are the onely Councellers of this conſpiracy.

Other reaſons inducing hope of more partakers in the treaſon.

A new coniuration of the baniſhed men againſt them of Zurich & the City.

In this manner, the 24. of February, in the year 1350. Peregrin Landberg, Count of Habſpourg, many Gentlemē, and ſome of the baniſhed with them, came vnto Zurich. The fame ranne through the Citty, that they came to preſent a requeſt to the Councell, in behalfe of the baniſhed. At the ſame time, diuers armed armed men had ſecretly ſlipt into the city, and hid themſelues in the houſes of their complices. The Counts and Gentlemen had a very great troope of armed Groomes and Pages waiting on them, ready to execute whatſoeuer their Maſters ſhould command them. Moreouer, there wer ſundry companies readily prepared (both of horſe and foote) who in the night ſhould come neere the city, and there to be ſuddenly let in, after the watch-word was giuen. Others ſhould come by Boates, and on that ſide where the Lake makes a ſeparation of the citty: to ruſh on by impetuous troopes, & hinder the country-men round about (who were very honeſt and faithfull to the city) that they ſhould not come that way to helpe or releeue it.

Treacherie by water, as well as by land.

All things being thus ordered and appointed, vpon the very ſame night determined for the maſſacre, the conſpiracy was diſcouered: more by the prouidence of God, then any councell or induſtry of men. For God (vndoubtedly) preſerued this city, to be (very ſoone after) the firſt, for conſeruing the Switzers liberties, as alſo, for the retreate of his church.

The admirable prouidēce of God in the conſeruation of Zurich.

The chiefe men of this coniuration, were in the houſe of a citizen, where they conferred on their affaires, and cloſely expected the houre of night, when the watch-word was to be giuen abroad. A ſeruant of the houſe, who neuer had knoledge of this enterprize, being layd vpon a Bench to ſleepe, happened to wake by their cloſe whiſpering, and lending ſome attention to their talke, obſerued their words very carefully, yet ſnored as if hee had bene in a ſound ſleepe. So ſoone as he could conueniently do it, ſoftly he got away, and went directly to the lodging of Raoul le Brun, who was Conſull then, reuealing to him at full, what danger hung ouer the head of him, the whole councel, and all the honeſt minded people of the city. He alſo acquainted him with the watch-word, whereby the enemies ſhold be knowne one to another, in the darke obſcurity of the night.

In what manner the treaſon was diſcouered by a ſeruant of the houſe where the conſpirators met together.

The Conſull hauing heard the ſeruants words, armed himſelfe immediately, and went towards the Towne-houſe: the enemies were going and comming already through the ſtreetes, yet he eſcaped well among them, becauſe hee deliuered the watch-word readily to them, and ſo got on to the Towne-houſe. A ſeruant of his, attired in the garments of his Maſter, hauing not vnderſtood the watch-word, by reaſon of the great feare and haſte the Conſull made, was ſlaine by the enemies before the Towne-houſe: not ſo much becauſe he could not giue the word, as for that they tooke him to bee the Conſull.

The care and diligence of the Conſull Raoul le Brun in ſuch an vrgent time of neceſsity.

In the meane while, the Conſull commanded one of the Officers of the Seigneury, to run to the church, and to ring out the watch-bell, after the wonted māner, to ſignifie the comming of enemies. The Officer ſeeing the gate before the clock-houſe to be round engirt with enemies: by a ſecret doore belonging to the church, got into the clock-houſe, & rung out the terror to all the city. On the other ſide, the Conſull (himſelfe) cryed out aloud on the top of the Town-houſe, Arme, Arme, the City is full of enemies. Now the Riuer named Limagus, or Limmatus, diuided the city in twaine, & thoſe two parts met and ioyned together, by the means of two Bridges made of wood. Immediately, euery one ran to theſe bridges: but becauſe the planks and boords of the one were not made faſt nor nailed, they threw them all downe into the water. By this meanes, all the fury and tempeſt of trouble, kindled it ſelfe at the other Bridge, which ioyned neere to the Towne-houſe.

The watch-bell reports the enemies being in the City, & ſummoneth the Citizens together.

There is a place of indifferent greatneſſe, at the entrance to the ſaid Bridge and houſe: the enemies got poſſeſsion of that place, and of another neighboring to it. Heere the conflict grew very ſharp, for, from foorth the higheſt roomes of the houſes, they of the city hurled downe Tyles and great Stones vpon their enemies, who were alſo to fight with other cittizens, gotten together in great number, and came to ioyne with their beſt helpe. The Butchers were the formoſt men in the fight; for they were then vp in the Butchery (it being builded neere to the Riuer) killing Oxen and other cattell. Hauing heard the noiſe and out-cryes of the Conſull, they ran out vpon the enemies, with their Axes in their hands. In memory whereof, and as a teſtimony of their hardineſſe; the common-wealth gaue them a Lyon of Copper or Braſſe, which which(as yet)they beare yeerely in pomp and triumph through all the citty. They were moued to vndertake Armes, by theſe meanes following.

Traitors doe commonly proue voluntarie and forward cowards

The Count of Toggenbourg, beeing with-drawne into a houſe of one of the conſpirators,and perceiuing the danger, fearing alſo his owne skin-coate; after he had a while conſulted with his Hoſt: determined to free himſelfe from blowes, reſoluing thus; that if matters fell out wel for his companions,he could eaſily come in againe among the troopes,and ſpeake to them, as if he had bin alwayes in the crowd. But if it happened otherwiſe,he wold be ſure to ſaue himſelfe,& learne to meddle with better buſineſſe. According to this concluſion,himſelfe, his Hoſt,and his ſeruant, well laden with money, got into a ſmall Boate,belonging to a fiſherman, named Bax, who ſhould conduct them along the Riuer out of the city. But fearing leſt this Bax ſhould diſcouer their flight, the Count commanded his ſeruant, that ſo ſoone as they were out of the city,he ſhould preſently kill the fiſherman. He being neerer to them then they imagined (by reaſon of the nights darkneſſe) vnderſtood their purpoſe and reſolution concerning himſelfe: wherein he wiſely preuented them, by ſuffering the boat to tilt ſuddenly on the one ſide, and ſo they all three together fell into the Riuer.

Miſchieuous and wicked councell,returnes many times to the ruine of the author & deuiſer.

Making haſte afterward home to his owne houſe, and waking all the neighbours dwelling about him; hee deſired them to take Armes ſecretly, becauſe the city was in eminent perill, and enemies were hidden in many parts thereof, but he knew neyther how,nor what was their intent. Heereupon, they armed themſelues preſently,and hearing the Conſull ſtill crying, Arme, Arme: waked other friends and neighbours, by whoſe helpe they got the Bridge, and there raunged themſelues orderly in fight againſt the enemy. It is further ſaid,that the Prieſts of the great church, being then ſinging Matins,and hearing this tumult in the night: armed themſelues from the houſes round about, and entred in among the thickeſt throngs, fighting valiantly for the freedome & ſafety of their country. It might ſo come to paſſe,that this year the Popes excommunication was firſt raiſed, and that after eighteene yeares were expired, the Prieſts entred into the city againe.

Thus the citizens (by little and little) gathered their ſtrength together,for from euery part they came in full troopes, and declaring their valour in ſo great a need, the enemies that were in the citty (conſtrainedly) gaue way. Fifteene among them were ſlaine, and more then thirty ſeuen taken priſoners, among whom was the Count of Habſpourg; others ſaued themſelues by fauour of the night. The Baron of Matzinge, and Peregrin Landberg were among the dead. The Count that fell into the water, was there drowned. The bodies of the ſlaine lay three whole daies on the pauement,expoſed to the mockery of all men, and to be trampled on with the feete of euery paſſenger.

Diuers of the conſpirators ouercome and ſlaine.

An ignominious,yet deſerued handling of ſuch enemies.

On the morrow,ſeuenteene, the principall men in the coniuration, were broken, and their bodies laide on wheeles: eighteene were beheaded. The Count of Habſpourg, Huldrich, Baron of Bonſtert, and ſome other,remained priſoners. The Army of the Count of Habſpourg,as well that which came on the lake, as the other by land,hearing this tumult in the citty, and ſeeing no man came that ſhould open the gates to them: retired backe in great feare, ſo that in the morning, the people gathered vp their armes and weapons for warre,which the run-awaies had gladly left behinde them,for their eaſier eſcaping.

A ſhamefull kinde of death inflicted on ſome of them.

The Counts army glad to run away.

Matters being thus appeaſed at Zurich, to preuent any more new troubles in the city: the Conſull brought an Army into the field,on the ſecond day of March, & being ſeconded with ſupplies ſent them by the men of Schaffouze; they went and beſiedged Raſperwill, the Fortreſſe & retreate of the conſpirators. The inhabitants of the Towne knowing that their Count was taken, the baniſhed mangled in peeces, or made fugitiues and vagabonds, and hauing no likelihood at all of ſuccour: on the third day of the ſiedge yeelded,and bound themſelues ſollemnly to the common-wealth of Zurich,promiſing (for euer after) to acknowledge them as their chiefe, and render them all ſuch duty, as formerly they had done to their Count. The Towne taken,they of Zurich thought they had gotten two aduantages. One was, that from thence forward, no pilling or rauage was more to be made of their country, as oftentimes before had bene, and that the city wold now safely be preserued from ambushes and treasons. The other, that the kindred and friends to the imprisoned Count, began to treate on peace: fearing to lose all the country about Rasperwill, because the Towne and the Count were taken.

Enemies to the liberty of the people, gaine nothing by the refusall of peace.

Heereupon, the Queene of Hungary procured, that truce should be accorded for certaine moneths: but Raoul & Godfrey of Habspourg, being summoned by them of Zurich to make peace, declared no affection thereto. Considering withall, that diuers Gentlemen, neighbours, but enemies to the men of Zurich, incited them rather to make warre. So all hope of peace being quite cut off, the first day of September (the same yeare) they of Zurich conducted their Army towards the country of the Marche, situated at the beginning of the Lake of Zurich, towards the Sun-setting, then being in obedience to the Count of Habspourg. The cities of Constance and Saint Gall, sent succour to the men of Zurich, and hauing spoylde & burnt all the country, they besiedged a Castle, called Rasperwill the olde, and followed it so closely; that the besiedged, hauing no more meanes of resistance, yeelded, & went away with their liues saued. The Castle was ruined downe to the ground, and they of the March promised fidelity and subiection to the commonwealth of zurich. This done, the Army went to a Towne, called Rasperwill the new. They brake downe the Bridge that ioyned to the Lake, beate downe the Castle, and most part of the walles of the Towne, and hauing heard (for certaine) that Albert of Austria meant to come aid them of Habspourg with great forces: they set the Towne on fire, and burnt it wholy, not leauing any iote thereof remaining.

Another Army made out by them of Zurich, vpon denying the peace offered against the two Rasperwilles.

Another war against the mē of Zurich, by the Wadners of Sultz, &c.

At the same time, certaine Gentlemen, named the Wadners of Sultz, dwelling in Alsatia, declared warre against them of zurich, taking their Merchants, pilling & outraging them by all manner of wayes. They of Basile and Strasbourg withdrew, & gaue supportance to these wars there. Vpon these indignities, they of zurich wer moued, to seize on about eight score and ten persons of Basile and Strasbourg, that were come on pilgrimage to the Chappell of the Hermitage. As essaying by this meanes, whether they of Strasbourg and Basile, compassionating the imprisonment of their citizens: would expell from their countries those Gentlemen that were the cause of this disturbance. This fell out to proue but a very vaine hope, for these cities and their Bishops, offended with this vniust detention of their pilgrims; ioyned themselues with Fredericke of Austria, Fribourg in Brisgow, Selestad, Brissac and Colmar. Hauing vnited their forces together, they resolued to make warre on zurich, and redemand their prisoners by Armes. The men of zurich, finding themselues not strong enough, in regard of their precedent warres, seditions and losse of men, which had greatly impaired them in power: deliuered backe the prisoners, and so turned aside this dangerous tempest.

To auoid and put by a great danger, it is good to passe one of lesse power.

Now because they had suffered great outrages, and saw no likelihood of any better successe to ensue: they sent Ambassadors to Charles IV. to whom they made their businesse knowne. They told him, that hauing taken (in a iust warre, & within their citty) the Count of Habspourg their enemy, for maintaining their cause against him, they were molested and assaulted by Gentlemen neighbours. But that which most of all greeued them, was, to see those Gentlemen assisted by Fredericke of Austria, and other potent citties of the Empire. And because zurich was an Imperiall Citty also; they made their recourse to him, as being the sole head of the Empire. They humbly desired him, to lend them both aide and councell, and to take order by his power and authority, that (in succeeding times) the Princes of Austria, the cities and Towns of the Empire, nor any other Gentlemen might make warre against them, contrary to all right and reason. But rather to permit, that their citty might enioy her wonted liberty, in peace and quietnesse: considering, that they were ready (as they ought to be) to answer before the Emperor, to all whatsoeuer any man could obiect against them.

The men of Zurich demand succour of the Emperor, by sending their Ambassadors to him.

The Emperor hauing heard the complaint of them of zurich, answered the Ambassadors most humanely: that hee coueted nothing more, then to haue their liberliberty continue in full perfection, and would do his endeauor, to accord them with Fredericke of Austria, and his associates. But he could giue them no succor, nor attempt any thing by force, against the house of Austria, the Nobility of Germany, or the Cities of the Empire: because (at that instant time) they were far stronger then he. Wherfore, they of Zurich should deuise to pacifie their differences with such enemies: by some reasonable agreement, wherein he would assist them to his power.

The negotiation of the men of Zurich, with Albert of Austria.

The Ambassadors departed away very sadly with this answer, and came home againe to zurich. And because (at that time) Albert of Austria, Sonne to Albert, was in Swetia: they of zurich sent presents to him by Ambassadors, to whom he gaue kinde entertainment, and tolde them, that he would come meete them with an ample power, for he desired to be a friend to them of zurich, and had some matters to acquaint them withall. Afterward, when the Ambassadors came vnto him againe at Bruges in Swetia, he was become an enemy to zurich, by accusations and reports of the Noblemen, and spake sharply to the Ambassadors, saying: That they of zurich had done him great wrong in ruinating both the old and new Rasperwills, and spoyling the Marche likewise, because they were in his Seigneury. He therefore demanded, that they should restore what they held from him, rebuilde those places which they had ruined, and repay their pillages with ready money, & in so doing, hee would pardon them all those wrongs.

How the lands of Iohn of Habspourg belonged to Albert of Austria, in manner of a right by title.

As concerning his maintaining the lands of Iohn of Habspourg; they belonged to him, in manner following. Garnier Count of Hombourg, Lord of Rasperwill the elder, and of three castles, seated vpon one Mountaine, named Wartenberg, nere to Basile, dying without children; the succession fell vnto that Iohn of Habspourg, who was slaine at Grinow. But Otho and Albert, Princes of Austria, laid claime to them, being the stronger (I know not whether they had any other title) and all the other goods of Garnier, including both Rasperwill the elder, & all the March. Neuertheless, they rendred all vnto Iohn of Habspourg, and he to hold it of them as in Knights fee, and so became their vassaile and pentioner. Thus you see, why Albert of Austria said, they had done him wrong, and wherefore he demanded satisfaction.

Innocence hath euermore an armor of proofe wherewith to defend it selfe.

The Ambassadors of zurich made answer, that (from those places) ambuscadoes had beene made against their citty, their cittizens spoyled and slaine, and in those castles their banished men were harboured. Therefore, seeing they had ruined Rasperwill, which no longer was an abiding for Noblemen, but a retreate for theeues & banished men: they thoght it no way meete, that any should be compelled to builde it againe, or in the selfe-same place. They entreated the Prince to consider seriously on euery thing: they being alwaies ready, to debate their cause before the Princes and cities of the Empire, and in any such place as hee would appoint. The Prince answered them in choller, that this was not a difference which stood in need of any Iudges, to beate downe his castles, and waste the places of his Seigneury. But if all were not reduced againe to the first condition, and full satisfaction made: he would imploy all his forces, and constraine them of zurich to do it. In briefe, he would haue no other debating of this cause, but by the point of the Sword.

The alliance of Zurich with the Cantons, to maintaine all their liberties together.

The Ambassadors hauing made their answer to the councell of zurich, & they perceiuing also euidently, that the cittie would very shortly be besiedged, because all the Noblemen were already in armes: the men of zurich well knowing, that in expecting aide from the Emperor or the Empire, was meerly to abuse themselues; resolued to combine alliance with the Cantons, for the better preseruation of their common liberties. Till then, they maintained themselues in amity one with another, and although in the day at Morgarten, they of zurich gaue succour to the Duke of Austria; yet notwithstanding, the Cantons were not offended therewith, but rather tooke pleasure, to approoue the hardinesse and valour of the men of zurich in fight.

Vnity of harts and hands, maketh any people to become inuincible.

Hauing then so maine an enemy (in common) against them all, to wit, the Duke of Austria; both the one and the other then might easily iudge, that their forces beeing thus combined together, they had thereby the better meanes for rereſiſtance. Moreouer, the Cantons were not ignorant that this their alliance with them of zurich, did highly accommodate them for prouiſion of victuals; becauſe there was a very excellent market at zurich, and the Lake was apt to tranſport both food and Merchandizes. Wherefore, after that the men of zurich had ſent their Ambaſſadors to the Cantons, to require their alliance in loue, and freely had acquainted them with their preſent dangers: the Cantons imbraced their motion very thankfully, and (ſoone after) ſent their Ambaſſadors to zurich, with plaine power to confirme this alliance, which was fully reſolued on in the Moneth of Aprill, in the yeare one thouſand, three hundred, fifty one, and engroſſed in writing at the beginning of May following. Now albeit zurich is the fift, cõming thus into alliance with the Switzers; yet notwithſtanding, becauſe it is a citty much renowned and mighty; the firſt place was giuen to it, and zurich named to be the firſt Canton. The men of zurich (yet to this day) do hold that name and ranke, among all the thirteene Cantons, as well in dayes occaſions of the Switzers accounts, as in all Ambaſſages, and other publike actions whatſoeuer.

Zurich had the honour granted it, to be named the firſt Canton.

This vnity of them of zurich, cauſed warre (ſo much the ſooner) to come vpon them: for the Prince of Auſtria was already very angry with them of Suits, Vri, and Vnderuald, which firſt of all were leagued together: neuertheleſſe, hee aſſured himſelfe (one day) to bring them vnder his yoake. For, becauſe the country was barren, and not conueniently grounded for warre; there grew ſome apparance, that (at length) it might bee ſubdued, albeit they were good Souldiers, and well reſolued for fight. But when Lucerna, which was vnder the dominion of Auſtria, ioyned with them, and then (ſoone after) zurich, a free citty, and cheefeſt of all other in the country: the Prince became much more mooued and troubled: for he was not ignorant, how greatly this alliance had ſtrengthened and authoriſed them of zurich. And therefore he concluded, to lay hold on this occaſion, to make warre on the men of zurich, and beſiedge their citty; to eſſay if thereby he could vnknit this knot of combination, before any other (following example of the former) ſhould make any more new leagues. See heere the true cauſe of the warre, and I dare maintaine, that no cauſe (concerning the ruine of Raſperwill) incited it; becauſe (at all times) when peace was treated on after the warre began: they of Auſtria neuer vrged that article, concerning the building againe of Raſperwill; but rather that they of zurich, ſhold renounce their alliance with the cantons.

The alliance and vnion of people, is as a thorne in the harts of all ſuch as would oppreſſe them

The principall intention of the Duke of Auſtria.

Thus then, in the Moneth of September, the yeare 1351. Albert of Auſtria beſiedged zurich. He had encamped with him, Lewes, Count of Brandenberg, Fredericke, Duke of Teck, the Duke of Vrſilinge, and the Burggraue of Nuremberg. The Biſhops of Wircebourg, Bamberg, Friſingen, Coire, and Baſile ſent him ſuccour. He had fiue and twenty Counts or Earles in his Army, namely; Ewrad, Count of Wirtenberg, conducter of the Army: Lewes, count of Ottigen: Frederick, count of Ortemberg: the two counts of Schmanalech: the two counts of Tetnanges: the two counts of Furſtemberg: the three of Tierſtein: they of Habſpourg and Kybourg; Raoul and Hermand of Werdemberg; Albert and Henry of Nellembourg; Guillaume of Kilchberg; Immer of Strasberg, of New-chaſtle, of Nidow, of Arberg, of Fribourg, of Zolerin, and of Metbourg. Likewiſe the citties of Straſbourg, Baſile, Fribourg in Briſgoye, Soleurre, and ſome others ſent aide to the Duke. It is ſaid, that he had in his Army two thouſand horſe, and fiue thouſand foote. On the other ſide, the foure Cantons ſent a good Garriſon to them of zurich. The Souldiers and the cittizens fortified the citty, and made diligent prouiſion of all things requiſite to withſtand the ſiedge, and to defend it: ſo that (on both ſides) there were ſome ſallies and skirmiſhes.

The firſt beſiedging of the Citty of Zurich.

There neuer wants ſtore of helpe to be found, when any people are to be oppreſſed.

But few daies after the ſiedge, peace was made, by the intermiſe of Frederick, count of Togge, and of Fierthez Retchberg, commander of Rhodes, abiding at Vateuil, with them of Baſile and of Berne on condition, that the Switzers ſhould refer themſelues vnto the definitiue iudgement of Agnes, Queene of Hungary, to whom, eyther ſide ſhould ſend their Aſſeſſours, and that which was concluded by them, with plurality of voyces, eyther party ſhould ratifie. For this effect, they of zurich were to giue in 16. Hoſtages, of the cheefeſt Peace made, and on what condition.

A traine is made, to entrap them by a sheete of paper, that could not be ouercome by force.

of the Citty, and Albert promised by his Letters, that no wrong should bee done vnto them. The foure Cantons would not accept of this peace, alledging, that no trust ought to be giuen to the Queen of Hungary, who would not faile to giue sentence in fauour of Albert, he beeing her brother. Neuertheless, the men of Zurich, who had a good opinion of the woman, did so presse the other Cantons, that they subsigned together the conditions: adding this exception (in common) that their alliance should continue in full force.

A sentence no lesse pernitious then the warre.

The Duke of Austria chose for Iudges, Immer, Count of Strasberg, and Peter of Stoëffelen, commander of Tannenfels. They gaue sentence in behalfe of their Master, whereby it was appointed, that they of Zurich were bound, to renew (according to their former condition) the olde and new Rasperwilles, and giue satisfaction to Albert: rendring backe Lucerna vnder his gouernment, and surrender also great store of possessions and rights, in the territory of Vnderuald. They tooke away likewise from them of Suits, their right of fishing in the Lake, and their ancient possession and vse of many Forrests. Finally, they condemned all the fiue Cātons, in great fines of money: neuer hauing any regard, what wrongs the city of zurich had endured, by them of Rasperwill, nor other reasons and defences proposed by the Cantons, and by Philip Kyen, Knight, and Peter de la Baume, Consull of Berne, their Iudges deleagued.

Religion and protestation of willingnes to peace, in the mouth of a woman, exalted to authority, are apteſt instruments (among all other) whereby to deceiue and abuse the people.

Queene Agnes approued the sentence of Alberts Iudges. She was a witty woman, that had an outward appearance of great sanctity, as we vse to say, from the teeth forward. At all times when she saw her brethren forward to make warre, but greatly vnfurnished; then would she bee sure to procure truce or peace betweene the Switzers and them. Onely to this end, that they might assemble their troopes together in the meane time, and bee the better prouided for a sudden assailing thē at vnawares. Yet all that while, she would still protest, that she did all this for the enioying of peace, and in meere compassion which she had of the Switzers.

Now albeit this sentence was most vniust; yet notwithstanding, the Switzers promised to ratifie it. But the Duke being not contented with all this, commanded them of zurich, to set at liberty (without eyther fine or ransome) Count Iohn of Habspourg, their prisoner taken in faire warre, and of whom the Iudges made not any mention. Heereupon, they of zurich would not yeeld to any thing, by which occasion, the Duke imprisoned their hostages, contrary to his faithfull promise, planted a Garrison on the Frontiers, and prepared himselfe for a new warre.

More insultation of the Duke of Austria.

CHAP. V.

How Glaris, being conquered by the Cantons, came afterward to be accepted into their louing alliance.

The determination of the Switzers, whē peace was made voide, and war must needs be vndertaken.

THE Switzers seeing that all hope of peace was vtterly frustrated, & that they must needs re-enter into war: determined among thēselues, to inuade the country of Glaris, for feare leste (in that quarter) the enemy would make courses on the lands of the confederates, and especially on them of Suits. Wherefore, the very same yeare, and in the Moneth of Nouember, the men of Zurich, Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald, ioyned together, and led their troopes towards Glaris. Without any blow smitten, they made themselues Masters of the whole country, taking oath of them of Glaris; and in regard of their faithfulnesse, as also their approued valour in war, which they had well tried oftentimes before; they receiued them into their alliance.

A breese description of Glaris.

Glaris is a straite Valley and long, cōtaining a league and an halfe of the Germane measure, neere to the Riuer of Limagus or Limmatus. It tookname from the principall Towne of all the Country, being engirt on three sides with very high Alpes: hauing the Grisons on the South side, & towards the East, Vri, & Suits to the West, and on the North, the field called the Grisons sons country, by which, the Riuer of Limagus runneth along the Valley, and enters into the Lake of zurich. Glaris had bin subiect a long time, and for the space of many yeares, to the Abbey of Secon, & was giuen to S. Fridolin, by two brothers, named Ours, and Landolphe. They of Glaris paied tythes to this Abbey, and certaine constituted rents, beside taxations of some inheritances. They were not charged with any imposts, or subsidies whatsoeuer: they held their owne lawes, & a councell among their cittizens. True it is, that the election belonged vnto the Abbesse; but the Prouostship or gouernment (both of the Abbey and country) was the Emperors onely, & in his power.

The Abbey of Secon giuen to S. Fridolin, by two brothers.

Afterward, Frederick Barbaroßa gaue it to Otho, Palatine of Bourgongne, from whose successors, it came to them of the house of Habspourg. Vnder pretence of this authority, Albert of Austria, Sonne to the Emperour Raoul, made himselfe Lord of Glaris, in despight of the whole country: who had promised to the forenamed Abbey, neuer to be separated or alienated from it. This vsurpation was the cause, that many Noble families forsooke the country, and withdrew themselues thence, some to Vri, and others to zurich. They of Austria being well fortified, expulsed out of his house the Baron of Suanda, a rich Gentleman, and well beloued in those parts, appropriating all his goods to themselues. They vsurped also the rights of the Maiordome of Glaris, & brought in a nouelty neuer before practised: sending Gouernors into that country, to haue a seuere eye ouer the people, and to iudge them by processe in law.

What meanes the oppressors of any people do vse, in bereauing their liberty, & at length to dispose all at their owne pleasure.

Those Gouernors were very rude and insolent, so that the people (in despight of the Austrians) yeelded themselues voluntarily to the Switzers, when they came to warre vpon them, and made perpetuall alliance with them. Gautier de Stad, Gouernour for them of Austria, departed from Glaris, after the inhabitants had sworn fidelity to the Switzers, withdrawing himselfe not far off, namely to Wesen. But they of Glaris chose among thēselues (according to their ancient custome) a Maior or Amman, and their vsuall number of councellers. And because they expected nothing more, but that the Austrians would soone come againe to molest them: they strengthened their walles, and trenched their Valley, neere to a Village named Naifell, where was the easiest entrance into the country; that needed no fortification, but only there, al the rest being engirt with Mountaines round about.

Glaris yeelded willingly to the Switzers.

During these alterations at Glaris, in the Moneth of December, they of zurich marched with their Army towards Bada, where was a great Garrison of the Austrians, that by their often out-roades made much waste on the Lands of zurich. To requite them with money of the same stamp, they of zurich forradged the coūtry about Bada, and burnt the Subburbs of the Towne, getting vp on the Mountaine, to come neerer to them. But towards Tetiuille, on the Mountaine, a Captaine of the Austrian horsemen, named Ellerbach, made firme the passage with foure thousand men. They of zurich were no more then 1300. (some say they were much lesse) notwithstanding, they set vpon the enemy, and wonne a very remarkable victory, leauing there 700. enemies slaine, among whom (as is credibly auouched) there were 65. Gentlemen.

Of the day at Tetiuille, where the men of Zurich had a worthy victory gainst their enemies the Austrians

The yeare following, Gautier de Stad, not long before Gouernor of Glaris, hauing leuied an Army, prepared himselfe, to subiect the country again to the house of Austria. Hee tooke occasion to do this, because he had receiued intelligence that two hundred men of Glaris were in Garrison at zurich. But the other inhabitants ouercame him in a ranged battel, where he was slaine, and a great number of the Nobility, the 2. day of February.

The ouerthrow of Gautier de Stad, late Gouernor of Glaris.

The selfe same day, the Austrians that were at Zug, beeing gone by Boates to Arte; did set vpon the lands of Suits, but met with the like welcome as Stad had at Glaris. In like manner, al the confederates sent an Army to forradge Berone, and other neighbouring places, from whence the Austrians issued foorth oftentimes, to set vpon the Lucernians: As (on the other side) the Austrians put to fire and blood Cusnach, and some other places, yet not without their owne great losse. About the holidayes of Pentecoste, the Lucernians, assisted by the three Cantons, tooke (by assault) a Castle, called Habspourg, seated on the Lake of Lucerna; cut in peeces all them that were there in Garrison, & ruinated it quite frō the top to the bottom.

Another ouerthrow happening the same day.

Courses and out-roades made onely for spoyle.

CHAP. VI.

Of Zug, and at what time it came to be comprehended, in league and confederacy with the other Cantons of the Switzers.

Concerning the ſcituation & firſt eſtate of Zug.

IN thoſe times, Zug hapned to be thus comprized in alliance with the Switzers. It is a Towne betweene Zurich and Suits, ſeated at the foote of a Mountain, rich in paſturages, and vines planted on the ſides ioyning to the Lake, which aboundeth with plenty of Fiſh, common to them both of Zug and Suits. It is reputed to be the capitall Towne of certaine people, which accompaied the of Zurich, in the warre of the Cimbrians againſt the Romanes. Sometimes ſhee aknowledged diuers Gētlemen as her Lords: but afterward, fell into the hands of them of Auſtria, who, during the warre againſt the Switzers, maintained there an ordinary Garriſon, which did many harmes to them of Suits and Zurich. And this was the cauſe, that in the yeare 1352. and the Moneth of Iune, the men of Zurich, with the foure other Cantons, prepared an Army to go againſt Zug. The Soldiers finding their ſtrength far too weake, would not attend the Switzers comming: but withdrew to Bremgarten, and other places thereabout. But the Townesmen, who would be faithfull to the Duke of Auſtria, maintained the ſiedge for fifteene daies ſpace: neuertheleſſe, hauing receiued a very violent aſſault: they yeelded themſelues, & tooke an oath to the Switzers, on this condition. That if within a certaine time appointed, the Duke of Auſtria brought an Army, to cauſe the ſiedge to bee remoued: they would returne againe vnder his obedience, and ſtand acquitted of their oath giuen to the Switzers. To effect this buſineſſe, they ſent their Ambaſſadors, to require ſuccour from the Duke of Auſtria: he being then in the Abbey of Champ Royall, about fifteene leagues from Zug, & there the Ambaſſadors let him vnderſtand their charge and meſſage.

The Cantons made an Army forth againſt Zug.

Zug being aſſaulted by the Cantons, yeelds it ſelfe vpon condition.

It chanced at that inſtant time, that the Duke was walking in a Gallery, demanding of his Faulconer, whether hee had (that day) fed his Hawkes or no? Thē the cheefeſt of the Ambaſſadors, named Herman, taking him at that word, ſaid. Alaſſe my Lord, haue you not more care of your Subiects, thē of Hawks? Eſpecially now, when the enemy hath ſo ſtrictly engirt vs, as if you ſend not preſent ſupply, conſtrainedly we muſt ſurrender our ſelues? The Prince returned this anſwer. It is wel, yeeld your ſelues; before it be long time, we will recouer againe whatſoeuer wee haue loſt. And becauſe they of Zug well ſaw, that it was in vaine to looke for any comfort thence: they ioyned themſelues in vnity and alliance with the Switzers.

By tyrants & oppreſſors, people are (oftentimes) leſſe valued and eſteemed then Hawkes and Hounds.

Hardly were the Letters of this alliance written, for combining thus the Cantons by oath: but Albert, Duke of Auſtria, now the ſecond time beſiedged the citty of Zurich, about the midſt of Iune. But at the end of the Moneth, by intermiſe of the Matqueſſe of Brandebourg, peace was made, on theſe conditions following. They of zurich ſhould ſet at liberty Iohn of Habſpourg, their three yeares priſoner, without eyther fine or ranſome. Alſo, that the Duke of Auſtria ſhould acquit (frank and freely) the hoſtages of zurich, whom he had likewiſe impriſoned. They of Zug and Glaris, abſolued of their oath taken to the Switzers, ſhould (as before) yeeld obedience to the houſe of Auſtria. In the meane while, nothing ſhould hinder, but that the alliance of the Switzers muſt ſtand firme.

A ſecond beſiedging the Citty of Zurich.

Conditions of the peace concluded on.

In the time of this treaty, Iohn of Habſpourg came forth of priſon, without paying any ranſome; but the Hoſtages of zurich wer not releaſed, according to ſworn promiſe: for before they could get forth, they were compelled to pay ſixteen hundred crownes for a ranſome, & yet could not enioy eyther peace or ſafety. For ſo ſoone as the Count of Habſpourg was releaſed, hee gaue Raſperwill, and the places neighbouring about it, to Albert of Auſtria; who immediately fortified Raſperwill, and planted a Garriſon there, whereby a new warre was engendered. For the Soldiers of that Garriſon ranne in on the Lands of zurich, and ſlew fifty men at Meile,

The crafty ſleights of ſuch men, as hold neither piety nor honour in due reſpect and eſtimation.

Meile, which was a Village belonging to one of the Chanons of zurich.

Heereby we may plainly perceiue, that the Duke of Austria did but seeke occasion, whereby to begin the warre againe. The yeare following, as the Ambassadors of Suits were gone (in name of the fiue Cantons) to require of them of zug, the obligatory oath of their alliance, according to the Articles of pacification: they of Austria expulsed them away with outrages. In regard whereof, they mustred their forces together againe, and made themselues Masters of zug the second time, and then commanded the cittizens, to giue their oath to the Switzers. In the same yeare, 1352. the sixteenth day of March, Berne ioyned it selfe in alliance with the Switzers. But we are to speake somewhat in this place, concerning this citty; which is the most powerfull among all them in Swetia.

At what time Berne allied it selfe with the Switzers.

CHAP. VII.

Of the building of Berne, the situation and condition thereof, and how it was yeelded to the Empire.

Berthoul, fift of that name, & the last Duke of zeringen, built the citty of Berne, and being offended with the noblemen, who had caused his male children to bee poysoned in their youth: he submitted it to the Empire, & affranchised it. The Emperor Fredericke the eleuenth, ratified the Dukes will, and after the death of him, in the yeare, 1218. a Gouernor was sent to Berne, named Otho of Rauenspourg, in name of the Empire. But some yeares after, for good seruices done by them of Berne to the Emperor: hee gaue them much greater priuiledges and franchises, exempting them also from hauing any more Gouernor.

By whom Berne was builded.

Berne made an Imperiall City.

In the troubles and confusions which happened in the Empire, the Count of Kybourg, Lord of Burgdorff, stroue to abolish the citties liberty, leaguing himselfe (for that purpose) with Gentlemen his neighbours, and the Towne of Fribourg, which Berthoul the fourth had built: And his Son had giuen in charge to both these Townes, to continue friends for euer. As concerning the occasion of this war, it grew thus. The men of Berne had bought certaine Lands beyond the Riuer of Ar, & began to prepare a bridge, which the Count would not suffer, he beeing Lord beyond the Riuer. Whereupon they of Berne, (desirous to make themselues as strong as their enemies) did put themselues into the protection of the Count of Sauoye, who repressed the attempts of the Count of Kybourg, and hauing obtained peace, enlarged the compasse and roundure of the citty. Then after warre was moued, betweene the Count of Sauoye, and the Duke of Bourgongne, the Count promised the men of Berne, that if they carried themselues valiantly, and he prospered in his attempt; he would grant them whatsoeuer they would demand of him. They performed their duty so well, that the enemy was discomfited: and then (as in recompence) they desired nothing else of the Count of Sauoye, but their ancient liberty, and he granted their request, and kept his promise most faithfully with them. After that time, they of Berne were alwayes friends, and allied to the house of Sauoye.

Zug is assayled by the enemies to her liberty.

The Citty being reintegrated into her wonted liberty, before they entred into league with the Switzers, had many and very difficult warres, as well for conseruation of their liberty, as enlarging their limits. They gaue a battaile to Godfrey of Habspourg, in the yeare, 1241. but that was to their owne disaduantage, because the enemy was far greater in number. Moreouer, Raoul of Habspourg, accompanied with them of la Tour and de Gruyere, besiedged (two seuerall times) the Citty of Berne; vnder colour of accusing them of Berne, that they had violated the publike faith of the Empire, in taking prisoners, and euill entreating certaine Iewes. Albert of Austria, sonne to the Emperor Raoul, did twice bid them battaile before the citty, and many citizens were there slaine.

The men of Berne had diuers wars before they came to be in number of the Cantons.

A great league and combination made against the Citty of Berne.

slaine. In the yeare 1291. the Counts of Sauoye, Neuberg, and Gruyere, the Bishop of Lausanna, the Lord of Tour, beside some Townes and Gentlemen, made a league against Berne: but by the aide of the Counts of Kybourg and Arberg, as also the citty of Solleurre, the men of Berne wonne a mighty battaile, at a place called, The hill of Thunder. Auldrich Erlach was cheefe of the Bernish Army in that warre. During the yeares following, many of the Castles, neighbouring to the citty, were taken in war, and demolished by them of Berne. They also had victories in the warres moued in the vale of Simmia, and in many other places, against the Noblemen that much molested them, whereby they greatly enlarged their limits. Also the inhabitants of the vale of Hasell, who were at free liberty, ioyned with them of Berne. This happinesse of theirs, so enflamed the malice and enuy of the Noblemen against Berne, as thereon ensued the memorable battaile giuen at Loupen.

The famous and memorable battaile giuen by Counts and Gentlemen, against the men of Berne at Loupen.

Many Counts and Gentlemen, hauing leuied a well prepared Army, of sixteene thousand foote, and three thousand, fiue hundred horse, at the least, went and besiedged Loupen, which is a small Towne appertaining to them of Berne, who were about fiue thousand, assisted with three hundred men of Vri, as many of Suits, as many of Vnderuald, and as many of the Vale of Hasell, Raoul Erlach being chiefe of these troopes. This small number ouercame the enemy in a ranged battaile, nere to Loupen, where dyed in the fielde, the Count of Sauoye, who was sent to the Campe by his Father, onely to treate on peace: but the other constrained him to make one in the battaile. There were slaine also, the Counts of Nidow, of Arberg and Valendis, fifteene hundred horsemen, among whom were fourescore Gētlemen of marke, and aboue three thousand foote. This battaile was fought the 21. day of Iune, in the yeare 1339.

A fortunate and successefull pursuite of victory, against them of Fribourg and many townes more.

After this successefull day, they of Berne made warre (to their aduantage) against them of Fribourg, who were vassails to the house of Austria, and also to the Gētlemen about Fribourg. For at Schonnenberg, they of Fribourg were ouerthrowne, and lost many of their men, their country forraged, and the Subburbs of their Towne burnt. Signow, Langnow, Burgdorff, Longuenall, Pyrnestic, Arberg, Erlach, Nidow, Thun, and other Townes and great Villages, were eyther spoyled, or taken by them of Berne. Finally, Agnes Queene of Hungary, made an end of this warre, by meanes of a peace which shee compounded. In all these warres, they of Berne euer felt, that Gentlemen, no better then vassails to the house of Austria, most laboured to oppresse them: whereas (contrariwise) the amity of the Switzers did highly aduantage them. But in the meane while, and contrary to their hope and expectation, they were drawne into a new warre; wherein they of Vnderuald ioyned themselues with their enemies. The Lord of Ringenberg, and the Prouost of the Abbey scituated betweene the two Mountaines, were Bourgesses of Berne. They were Gouernors or Bayliffs also of that country, which lies neere to the Mountaine of Brūnic, and the Lake of Brientz.

An vnexpected warre of thē of Berne, against the men of Vnderuald.

The reason of the warres beginning and proceeding.

It came to passe, that they of the country, accounting the gouernment of these two Lords to be rude and harsh: began to mutiny against them, and after they had called to their aide the men of Vnderuald, who were neere neighbors; they tooke the Castle of Ringenberg, in absence of the Lord, set it on fire, and denied the Prouost such duties and tythes, as they were accustomed to pay. They of Berne sent Ambassadors, to exhort them of Vnderuald, not to succour such seditious persons against all right and reason. But they of Vnderuald made no reckoning of this aduertisement, but went and encamped with the seditious at Brientz. On the other side, the men of Berne, hauing required their allies of Solleurre, Thun, Bienne, and Morat to send them succour, and it being sent them; marched with all their troopes to Brientz, gaue battaile to the seditious and them of Vnderuald, compelling them to flight, and retire into the neighbouring Mountaines. They of Vnderuald (storming at this disgrace) called their confederates of Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Zug, and Glaris to helpe them: but they of Berne sent their Ambassadors to those Cantons, offering the iustice & equity of their cause, and to haue it tried before them.

Amity or alliance being vniust, is the ruine and ouerthrow of their confederates.

Heereupon, a day was held at Lucerna, where where the Deputies of the Switzers, hauing heard the reasons aledged on either side, commanded them of Vnderuald, to renounce their alliance with them of Brientz. On the same day, the men of Berne made a perpetual alliance with the three Cantons, Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald. Now, although this alliance is made but with three, yet Zurich and Lucerna are comprized therein. For the three first Cantons bound themselues to succour them of Zurich & Lucerna whensoeuer they called them, and to bring with them the men of Berne, who by the same alliance are tyed thereto, if Zurich and Lucerna do desire it. In reciprocall manner they of Zurich and Lucerna, promised solemnly, to go assist (with all their power) the men of Bern, if the three Cantons cal them thereto.

Alliance and league perpetuall made by them of Bern with the Cantons.

Immediately after this alliance made, the city of Zurich was besiedged agayne the third time. For, Albert of Austria, accused the Cantons before the Emperour Charles the fourth; who hauing heard the answer of the Cantons, made a truce, vntill his returne from a voyage, which hee was constrained to vndertake, about som affayres of the Empire. Beeing returned, he came to Zurich, where he heard either parties, and directing himselfe vnto the Switzers, especially to them of Zurich, he aduised them to renounce this alliance: adding withall, that the citty was Imperiall, and could make no alliance vvithout consent of the Emperor. But the confederates rendred a sufficient reason for what they had done, exhibiting their priuiledges, and making it manifest, that the alliance contracted between them, could not any way preiudice the rightes of the Empire. Seeing he could not driue the Switzers out of this league, then he made his re-course to Albert, desiring him to sell Lucerna, Glaris, and Zug vnto the Empire, because the difference did concerne those three places especially. But Albert audaciously answered him; That he would rather buy some Townes, if the Emperour would sell him any, then let him haue any of his for mony.

The thirdtime of siedge laide to the City of Zurich.

A proud answer of Albert of Austria to the Emperor.

Once againe the Emperor pressed the Switzers, to suffer him to end the difference, and promise to tye themselues to such orders as he should set downe, assuring them that Albert would do the like. But the Switzers would not consent ther to, without plaine exception of their priuiledges; and the Emperor vrged his authority, without any reseruation: by the which meanes, all this long imparlance serued to no purpose, but only that a truce was taken for some time. Which beeing expired, the Emperor being incessantly importuned, ioyned with Albert of Austria, and besiedged Zurich. The besied (by diuers ambassages) intreated the Emperor, not to presse thus into the house of Austriaes fauour) their citty, which was Imperiall: for they desired nothing but conseruation of their priuiledges, and would not reiect any composition whatsoeuer, if it were reasonable.

The Emperor ioyned with Albert of Austria.

Then the Emperor began to summon Albert to listen to a pacification; which hee would not doe: in which respect, the Emperor raised the siedge, and returned home. That which also moued him hereto, was, because his Camp stood composed of soldiers, who were (almost al) prest forth of Imperiall Townes and Citties; & (in his opinion) bare more affection to the Switzers, then to the house of Austria, albeit those souldiers during the siedge) would obey none other then the Emperor. After the Emperors departure the duke of Austria also speedily got him gon: hauing heard, that the other Cantons had sent forth supply vnto them of Zurich. Neuertheless, hee lodged his troopes in Townes, Villages, and Castles round about, enioyning them, not to suffer the Cantonnes to haue any rest, but continually to make incursions on theyr Lands.

The siege raised from Zurich by Gods most singular prouidence.

At length, in the fift year of this war, by authority and intermise of the emperor Charles the fourth, peace was concluded betweene the Prince of Austria, and them of Zurich. Now because it would seeme a troublesome matter, to insert heere the whole Tenure at large; we will be satisfied with a breefe Summary of the Articles, which are these following.

Peace made between them of Zurich, and the Duke of Austria.

Articles of Peace concluded on, betweene the Duke of Austria and Zurich.

1. VVHatsoeuer hath bene taken on either side in this Warre shall be restored againe.

2 They of Zurich shall not receiue into the the number of their Bourgeſſes ſuch as remaine vnder the domination of the Duke of Auſtria: but if any will retire themſelues to Zurich, they may be receyued. Prouided, that they bee of the number of them, which the Cittie might receiue, before this peace was made.

3 Such as hold any other way then in fee-ſeruice, ſhall be vnder the iuſtice of the lords of thoſe Fees. And they which make vſe of another mans poſſeſſions, ſhall ſurrender them, or ſhal ſtand bound to anſwer the ſame in Law: except it be for the goods of the baniſhed.

4 From hence forward, they of Zurich ſhall not ally themſelues vvith the ſeruantes of the Duke of Auſtria: or contrariwiſe, they ſhall helpe to recouer his rights.

5 If any difference happen to bee mooued, betweene the Duke and the Cantons: It is ordained before hand, that ſome Iudges ſhall conſider on the cauſe.

6 Thoſe alliances which the Switzers haue made together, ſhall remaine in their ful power and integrity.

There are diuers other Articles in this pacification: but I am onely contented with theſe, as beeing the principall and cheefeſt.

It fell out, that diuers interpretations were made vpon this agreement, which likewiſe begat new contentions: yet they were ſtill qualified, before they came to hand-blowes, for either ſides purſe being emptied of money, and their forces fayling, made them vnwilling to heare of any more warre. Albert Bucheimer, Lieutenant to the duke of Auſtria, preſſed them of Zug, to giue their oath of fidelity vnto his Prince, which they would not do, but with exception of their alliance made with the Cantons, or elſe to ſtand acquitted by the ſayde Cantons, to whom they had giuen their faith. This difference was referred to the Emperor Charles the fourth, who finally gaue iudgement, that they of Zug ſhould ſtand exempted from alliance with the Cãtons: becauſe (quoth he) the Articles of pacification doe declare, that the Switzers ſhall not poſſeſſe any of the Dukes Towns, neyther hinder any way his gouernment in them.

A new variance concerning the Canton of Zug, & referred to the opinion of the Emperour.

Now, although this ſentence was greatly greeuous to the Switzers, conſidering, that in one of the Articles, the alliances made, were (by name) excepted, and onely ordained, that no new Alliances ſhould be made with the vaſſails to the houſe of Auſtria: yet notwithſtanding, they were ſo ouer glutted with war, as they wer vpon the point to leaue Zug to the Duke of Auſtria; if they of Suites (who had not (as yet) ſigned the peace) had not oppoſed themſelues againſt it. They then ſodainly gathered their troops together, and went to Zug, demaunding againe the faith of the Citizens, who (for their part) had ſent their Deputy to Suits to require confirmation of the faith firſt giuen. This done, after ſome long debating and conſulting, it was at length concluded; by meanes of the Lorde of Torberg, that truce ſhould be confirmed for the ſpace of eleuen yeares, which was till after the deceaſe of Albert. During this truce, they of Zug and Glaris continued allyed with the Switzers, and al that while were thereunto ſubiect, acquitting themſelues of all duties due to the houſe of Auſtria. The Duke receiued from Suits a man, from foure yeares to foure yeares, whom hee confirmed Amman or Maior at Zug: And he gaue as Gouernour vnto them of Glaris, Godfrey Mulner of Zurich. Afterward, the truce being expired, it was againe confirmed for a longer time.

The Switzers being wearie of war, would yeeld to their owne iniurie, rather then to heare of any more trouble.

A truce concluded on for 11 yeares, laſting till after the death of Albert.

The ſonne of Albert, named Leopolde, greatly hated the Switzers; but he durſt not meddle with them, leaſt hee ſhould gaine as litile thereby, as his Father had done. And therefore he would worke his will by others, ſetting the Switzers at variance with the Engliſhmen, who hauing ſpoiled the country about the Rheine, entred into Swetia, where they did as much harme to the Auſtrians, as to the Cantons. But hauing bin beaten in ſome incounters, after they had forraged in Swetia, and all the countrey about Montbeliard, Baſile, Strasbourg, and run into diuers other places, they retired home to their own houſes, & hapned Anno 1376.

War made by the Engliſhmen againſt the Switzers.

Six years after, war was moued againſt the Count of Kybourg. Hee was enforced to take (by treaſon) the Towne of Solluerre, allyed with the men of Berne, and at the very ſame time, they of Auſtria would haue ſurprized Dun and Arberg, Townes appertaining to the Canton of Bern. Conſequently the Count of Kyburg made made open war vpon them of Solleurre, to whome they of Berne and the other Cantons sent supply. The Duke of Austria, who (so lately before) had made alliance with the Switzers, fortified (vnder hand) the Count of Kybourg, and (contrary to his faith) furnished him with victuals, and other necessaries for warre. Neuertheless, the Count was not able to endure the burthen of amity agreed on betweene them of Solleurre and Bern, but sold them Burgdorff, for the summe of forty thousand Crownes.

To ruinate the people they must bee diuided.

The Duke of Austria had a difference, in what manner I know not, with the Imperiall Cities and Townes. They made a league, wherein Zurich, Berne, Solluerre, and Zug were comprehended: but the Duke brake all in sunder by his cunning deuices, pacifying himselfe amiably with the Townes of Suaba and Franconia. And as for the Townes on this side the Rheine in Halsatia, hee conquered them in one battell. This victory did so aduance his hopes, as he began to consult with himselfe, how to bring the Townes of Swetia vnder his obedience, and the occasion of the warre grew thus. Peter of Torberg, Gouernour of Wolhouse, and in the Vale of Entlibuch, and Herman Grunenberg, gouernour of Rottenbourg for the Duke of Austria, who had engaged these places vnto them, tyranized on the people, and did many outrages to the neighbours of the Lucernians. The people being tyrannically dealt withall, sent men to Lucerna, to desire acceptation into their Bourguership. But the two Gouernours hauing discouered it, caused the Deputies to be hanged, and all them that had anie hand in the matter, recompencing them with death, that had faithfully imployed their paines, to giue life againe to theyr languishing countrey. Moreouer, they imposed new passage Tolles at Rottembourg on the Switzers, or else they might haue no passage there.

Warre begun by Leopold of Austria, against the Switzers.

Tyrants neuer want execrable and monstrous cruelties.

The Lucernians manhood at Rottenbourg.

The Lucernians, too much prouoked by so many iniuries, being ayded by the men of Suits, Vri, and Vnderuald: made themselues masters of Rottembourg, the 29 day of December, in the yeare, 1381. spoyling the Castle, which Grunenberg had forsaken. They did likewise beate downe the walles of the Towne, and filled vppe the Ditches: for feare least the Austrians should lodge any Garrison there, wherewith to molest the Lucernians againe. Some short while after, they of Sempach were receiued into Fellow-Bourgeship with the Lucernians, & two hundred men were put in garrison by the Lucernians, into the Towne of Richensee: but the Lieutenants to the Duke of Austria, hauing sodainely leuied an Armie, tooke the Towne by assault, cut y throats of the whole Garrison, put most part of the inhabitants to the sword, burned all the rest aliue, in the same fire wherewith the Towne was embraced; shewing no pitty to aged, sicke women, or children. On the other side, al the Cantons, except Bern, took a place in those parts, named Meyenberg, & there planted a garison but the Austrians (faigning a flight) drew the Switzers soldiers forth into the opē field, where they slewe fourescore and one of them, and compelled the rest to retyre speedily into the Towne. The Cantons aduertised heereof, called their people together, set fire on the Towne and Castle, leauing not a iote of them vnruined.

Richensee taken by assault burnt, and all in it slaine or burned, by them of Austria.

These beginnings and entrances into warre, seemed to threaten the Switzers with a farre greater confusion: & therefore, they of Austria made their preparations carefully, yet with great pomp, and euery day (by Letters and Heraulds) denounced warre against the Switzers, at the beginning of the ensuing yeare. The Switzers considered likewise on their owne affaires, and prouided to set vpon all those enemies, which had enclosed thē round about. The men of Berne, who had not boudge as yet, beeing sollicited by many messages from their confederates: ruined two Castles, to wit, Torberg, and Kopping, belonging to Peter of Torberg. They of Lucerna, Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald, spoyled the Castle and Towne of Woolhouse, as also Liele, Rinach and Baldeg. The men of zurich ioyned their forces with the Cantons, and after they had made some courses & waste in the countries neerest to their limits: in retiring backe, they tooke (by assault) the Castle of Rumelange, and set it on fire. And because the Duke of Austria made the mustering of his people, especially at Brug & Bada, neere to Zurich: it was imagined, that he would go and besiedge that Citie also. And this was the reason, why the foure foure Cantons ſent ſixteen hundred men to ſuccour them of Zurich.

Duke Leopold vnderſtanding that ſuch a Garriſon was at Zurich, marched ſodainly with his army towardes the Cantons, which ſeemed then naked of the moſt part of their troopes. But this enterprize was diſcouered by their ſpies, & therefore left the citty of Zurich, in the cittizens guard, and returned back thoſe ſixteene hundred men which marched vnder their Enſignes day and night; and ſo diligently, that they arriued at Sempache, euen at the ſame inſtant as the duke came to lodge his troops there. That day was the ninth of Iuly, and battell was giuen the very ſame day, wherein Leopold ſonne to Albert the wiſe, and Nephew or youngeſt childe to the Emperor Albert, was ſlaine in open field, with ſix hundred ſeuenty ſix Gentlemen, whereof there were three hundred and fifty more remarkable then the reſt by reaſon of theyr Helmes and Burganets, beautified with Coronets and goodly plumes. After ſo faire a victory, the Cantons began to extend their ſtrength thoroughout all Swetia, and chaſtiſed ſuch as hadde forraged their country, pilled the Citizens, & moued Warre vpon no occaſion: many caſtles were ruinated, and many Towns taken.

The battell at Sempach, in the which, the D of Auſtria, and 676. gentlemen were ſlaine in the plaine field.

In the yeare, one thouſand, three hundred, foureſcore, and ſeauen, the ſecond day of the moneth of February, truce was agreed on for a yeare, by the entermiſe of ſome Townes. The times of truce being expired, the citizens of Weſen, on the Lake de Rine, deliuered vp their Cittie to them of Auſtria, who ſlew the Switzers that were there in Garriſon. Afterward, the enemy (with great forces) to the number of eight thouſand at the leaſt, ſet vpon the Landes of Glaris the ninth day of Aprill. Some ſay, that they were aboue ſixteene thouſand men, conducted by Donatus Count of Togge, Peter of Torberg, Iohn of Klingenberg, Iohn Counte of Werdenberg, Lord of Sargans. This laſt man made choyſe of two thouſand men, which he brought by Beglinge, to encloſe the Switzers, and make them turne theyr backes with ſhame.

Truce fully agreed vpon for the ſpace of a year, but being expired new quarrels aroſe againe.

The other marched boldly on towards the Walles, which they of Glaris had fortified and made ſtrong their countries entrance the yeare before, gayning thereby ſuch aſſurance of the wall, as the victory was almoſt intirely in their hand; yet they beganne to pillage, and burne all that was about them. Meane while they of Glaris met together in a neere neighbouring Mountaine, to the number of three hundred and fifty, and thirty beſide, which they of Suits had ſent from the neereſt valley. This ouer-little Troope, by greatneſſe of corage and reſolution, met with the enemy in a verie narrow paſſage; where they ſaluted them with ſuch impetuous ſtormes of great ſtones, & whereof the place affoorded no ſcarſity: as, drawing them into a place more open, they preſſed and purſued on them vvith ſuch extreame boldneſſe; that the great armie was forced to flight, after they had renewed the charge eleauen ſeuerall times, as the Annales of Glaris do teſtify; for, ſo often did the enemy labour ſtill to ſet vpon them.

A bargaine made, but without any certainty.

A notable victory obtained by 380. Switzers, againſt 8000. enimies to their liberty.

The Count of Werdenberg, looking from the height of a Mountaine (which hee had betaken himſelfe vnto) and perceyuing the ouerthrow of his aſſociates, ſaued his owne ſtake, as ſwiftly as he poſſibly could. There were two thouſand enemies ſlaine in this battaile, and about fiue hundred vvere drowned in the Lake: becauſe the multitude of Runne-awayes, brake downe the Bridge in theyr haſte, vvhereby they ſhould paſſe from Glaris to Weſen.

After this battell, the Cantons ſhewed themſelues ſtill in many other skirmiſhes againſt the Auſtrians, taking towns and Caſtles, either by force or compoſition: but they fought no more battels. For by entremiſe of the Citties of Conſtance, Vberlingen, Rauenſpourg, & Rotuille, truce was taken for ſeauen yeares: and afterwards it was prolonged, euen ſo farre as for the ſpace of twentie yeares; and finally, peace was made for the terme of fiftie yeares.

Townes and Caſtles taken by skirmiſhes but no more battels giuen or fought.

Peace being eſtabliſhed for ſuch length of time, brought ſome more eaſe & quyetneſſe to the Cantons. But in the yeare one thouſand, foure hundered and one, the war of Appenzel began, & continued ſeuen whole yeares. Appenzel is a Region of Swetia, ſeated neere vnto the Alpes, towardes the Eaſt, and on the Head of the Lake of Conſtance. At this day, it is is one of the thirteene Cantons; but as then it was no way allyed with the Switzers: it onely acknowledged (as a Lord) the Abbot of S. Gall, who was then called, Cuno de Stouffen. Some difference happened between the Abbot and them of Appenzell, and after it had long time bene debated in Lawe before Iudges; they fell at length to pleade theyr cause at the swords point. The Townes neereſt to the Lake of Conſtance, did take part with the Abbot, who had ſundered them from the men of Appenzel, with whom they were allyed and combined. The Abbot hauing leuied an army of the inhabitants of thoſe townes, gaue battell to the men of Appenzel, who ouer-came them, droue them in diſorder, with great loſſe of their men.

Townes diuided from Appenzel to take part with the Abbot, yet foiled in fight

After this foile, they of S. Gal, of Appenzel, and of Suits, aſſociated thēſelues together. The Duke of Auſtria ioyned with the Abbot; but they of Appenzel prooued ſtill victorious in all other encounters. And after they had conquered a great part of the country about them, ruined many Caſtles, and taken diuers Townes: at length they compeld the Abbot to craue peace, & leaue them in their wonted liberty.

A new warre hapning betweene the Cantons, and Fredericke of Auſtria.

Seuen yeares after theſe troubles were ended, a new warre kindled it ſelfe, betweene Frederick of Auſtria and the Cantons. The occaſion was, becauſe Fredericke had carried away (from foorth the Councel of Conſtance) Pope Iohn the 22. He was put to baniſhment from the Empire, and excommunicated by the councell. By this decree of the Emperour, and of the Councell, the peace for 50. yeares was broken, the Cantons abſolued of their Oath, and commandement giuen them to take armes againſt the Emperor: which they did, and tooke in that warre Biberſtein, Bada, and other places belonging to them of Auſtria.

A war of the Switzers, for the recouerie of Bellizona, from the dnke of Millaine.

In the yeare, 1422. the Switzers ledde their army by the Alpes, and by the Griſons, to beſiedge Bellizona; it beeing a Towne which the Count of Monſax had ſold to them of Suites, Vri, & Vnderuald. The Duke of Millaine ſeemed to ſay, that this place appertained to him; and thereupon tooke it by intelligence. To recouer it againe, the Switzers conducted their army thither this yeare, then in Anno 1425. and the year following alſo. But they could not take the Towne notwithſtanding, they made hauocke, and forraged the Valleyes round about neighbouring, and belonging vnto the Duke of Millaine.

Cunning deuices prepared onely to ouerthrow the people.

But in the yeare, 1436. they of Auſtria, by cunning trickes and ſubtle deuices raiſed a great ciuill warre among the Switzers. Firſt, betweene the Canton of Zurich and the men of Suits, to whom (ſoon after) the other confederats ioyned themſelues. The Duke of Auſtria (firſt of all) ranked himſelfe with them of Suits: and then (ſoone after) made alliance with the men of Zurich, and gaue them aſsiſtance There were ſome encounters, and the Switzers beſiedged Zurich: but ther was no battaile more memorable, then that which (not long after) was giuen at Baſile, the yeare, 1444. and the 26. day of Auguſt.

The battell of the Switzers againſt the Armignacs before Baſile.

The Dolphine of France, who was afterward King, named Lewes the 11. had brought a puiſſant army betweene Montbeliard and Baſile; prouided partly by the practiſes of Pope Eugenius, to breake the Councell of Baſile, and partly by the emperor Frederick, as wiſhing well to the Switzers. Sixteene hundred Switzers entred into battell againſt that great armie, and made a terrible ſlaughter of them. True it is, that all the ſixteene hundered men were ſlaine likewiſe, as beeing ouerborne with the meere multitude of their enemies: but they brake the whole armie in ſuch ſort, as they forſooke all Germanie immediately, to get themſelues into France againe. This memorable day, might well be compared with the battell of the Lacedemonians, at their paſſage of the Thermopylæ*, conſidering the magnanimity of ſo ſmall a number: who, for the ſafety of their country (euen all Germany) oppoſed themſelues valiantly, againſt an infinitie of enemies. In theſe ciuill Warres were made many Truces, which was the cauſe, why ſuch as haue written thereof, do not agree together in the computation of the yeares. The common opinion is, that this war laſted ſeuen yeares: but it began in the yeare, 1436. & firme peace was made and ratified in Anno, 1450.

Diuers alliances of the Switzers with their friendes & confederats of the Switzers. And the yeare following, they of Appenzel allyed themselues with seauen Cantons. And again, a yeare after, the Citty of Saint Gall, with sixe Cantons. Consequently, and in the year one thousand, foure hundred, fifty foure, the men of Schaffouze allyed themselues with the sixe Cantons. But I shall make better mention of these alliances heereafter, and in apter manner.

A yeare after this peace, the Abbot of S. Gall made alliance with foure Cantons of

Warre by the Switzers, against Sigismond, Duke of Austria.

These alliances were no sooner made but a new warre beganne to shew it selfe, against Sigismond Duke of Austria. Pope Pius had excommunicated him, I know not vpon what occasion, and so incited the Switzers to warre. On the other side, the Lords of Grandler, brethren of Gratz a Towne in Styria, hauing bene dispoiled of their goods by Sigismond, desired ayde of them of Zurich, who had receyued them into the number of their Burgesses. Then the Switzers went and assaulted Winterduer, tooke Rasperwill, Diessenow, Frawenfeld, and Turgaw. In the end, peace was made, Anno 1460. by the meanes of Lewes Duke of Bauaria. Afterward, in the yeare, 1466. certaine Articles of peace & mutuall amity, were set downe in Writing, yeares after, war was renewed against the Duke of Austria, so that the Switzers led their troopes towardes the Towne of Mulhouse, on the Frontiers of La Franche Comté. This Town had made alliance with the Cantons some moneths before: and in the same yeare, a Towne vpon the Rheine, neere to Basile, named Waltzhut, was besiedged by the Switzers.

Articles of peace set downe in writing, yet war ensued thereon againe.

Warre of the Switzers against the D. of Burgundie.

In the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, seuenty foure, began the Switzers warre against Charles Duke of Burgongne. It grew hot, and wonderfull sharp, in the yeare seuenty sixe, for two battailes were fought, in both which the duke was vanquished; but it tooke ending at the beginning of seuenty seauen, by reason of the Dukes death, who was slaine in Lorraine. The Princes of Austria were the sparkes to kindle this war. For Sigismond Duke of Austria, hauing ill performed his businesse in warre, which he maintained so long a time against the Switzers, was constrained to agree with them, although much against his minde. In the meane while, to torment them by some other meanes, he engaged those Landes which hee helde in La Franche Comte (as Montbeliard and Basile, neighbors to the Switzers) to Charles Duke of Bourgongn, the most potent Prince of his time, aduenturous, and of an high hand. Sigismond perswaded himselfe, that (as manie times it fals out among neighbours) some difference would shortly grow betweene Duke Charles and the Switzers: for they had sent Ambassadours to the Duke, to pray him renew the ancient amity of the house of Bourgongne with the Switzers, and confirme the Articles of peace, not long before concluded with Sigismond, in so much as concerned the engaged countries. But the ambassadors could neuer gaine accesse to the Prince, in regard of their hinderance by Hagenbach, chiefe Minion to the Duke of Bourgongne, and established Gouernor by him ouer those countries. This Hagenbach was the principall fire-brand wherby to kindle this war; for he gaue many outragious words vnto the Switzers, & daily kept company with theyr enemies, as Heudorff, Eptinger, and some other Gentlemen, who had threatned the Switzers with war.

Sigismond ingaged Montbeliard & Basile to the D. of Burgundie.

Minions attending on Princes, are oftentimes firebrandes to kindle warre.

Hee tyranized also cruelly in those pawned countries, so that the poore subiects who vvere able to performe no more, intreated most earnestly Duke Sigismond, their ancient Lord, to disingage them, & receiue them againe vnder his gouernement. This request vvas quickly granted them by Sigismond, a Prince verie benigne, and (for his facility) sir-named the Simple.

D. Sigismond, sirnamed the Simple.

But the Duke of Bourgongne desired not to purse the money againe. And on the other side, the tiranny of Hagenbach still increased, so that hee grevv insupportable to the people, & neighboring lords. There vvere some other thornes between the Switzers and the D. of Bourgongne: becaus Count Ramont being seruant vnto him, had sent away diuers chariots from them, laden vvith Hides. In the mean vvhile, King Lewes the eleuenth, vvho desired not greatly the Dukes life, and had prooued (neere to Basile) the valour of the Switzers horsemen, made alliance vvith them. And although himself vvould not meddle vvith the vvarre, yet he could vvhet on the Switzers, and (by vnderhand trickes) furnish them vvith money, to the end that necessity should not inforce any pacifi-pacification. He accorded Sigiſmond likewiſe with the Switzers, and made an Alliance betweene them. Soone after, Rene Duke of Lorraine, Strasbourg, and Baſile, with theyr Byſhoppes; Colmar, Seleſtad, Montbeliard, and ſome other cities, ioyned themſelues likewiſe into this confederacy.

Hagenbach had the wages due vnto his villany and oppreſsion: & ſo may all other ſpeede, that abuſe their Princes.

During this time, Hagenbach was taken in a place, named Briſſac, and the D. of Auſtria hauing conſigned the money at Baſile, for which hee had engaged his countries, re-entred vpon poſſeſsion of them, and (by ſentence) cauſed Hagenbach to be condemnd, and his head publikely ſmitten off. Contrarywiſe, Duke Charles made warre vppon the byſhop of Cologne, pretending, that the Prouoſtes Office, or protection of the Byſhopprick appertained to him, and therefore planted his ſiedge before Nuſs, aboue Cologne. The Emperor Fredericke, accompanyed with the Empires forces, encamped nere vnto him, to fight with him. And, according to right and maieſty of the Empire, ſent vnto the Switzers and their confederates, to aſſault (on their ſide) the Duke of Bourgongne, that his forces might be broken and ſcattered. But immediately after, hee ſhewed himſelfe to bee of the houſe of Auſtria, and (conſequently) an enemy to the Cantons. For ſo ſoone as the Switzers were entered into Bourgongne, and had won a battel, and taken ſome Townes, hee made peace with the Duke of Bourgongne, wherein the Princes of the Empire were comprized, and the Townes which had ſuccored the Emperour in this warre. But the confederats were excluded, to wit, Duke Sigiſmond, Duke René, the Cantons, and the forenamed Townes.

Hatred & enmity of great perſons, do laſt a long time.

Duke Charles, beeing deliuered from the warre which he had againſt the Emperor and the Germaines: turned all his forces vpon the Switzers, and theyr Allies. There were ſome encounters on either ſide: but the very greateſt effortes and valour, ſhewed themſelues in three battailes, whereat the Duke himſelf was preſent in perſon. The firſt was fought at Granſon, neere to the Lake of Yuerdun. which (at this day) is called the Lake of Newcaſtle. This Towne had bene taken by the Switzers, and re-taken againe by them vpon compoſition: neuertheleſſe, the Duke of Bourgongne (contrarie to his promiſe) hanged and drowned the Souldiers of his Garriſon; but (ſoone after) hee receiued wages anſwerable vnto his owne perfidie and cruelty, the Switzers ouercomming him in a fielde of battaile. True it is, that then he loſt not many of his men, for the Cauaklrie ſuſtayned, and meerely couered the Infantery beeing broken and diſordered, and the Switzers had not their Horſemen there, becauſe they came not at a conuenient time: yet notwithſtanding, the Duke of Bourgongne loſt his baggage, wherein hee had great ſtore of Riches and Treaſure.

The battell that was fought at Granſon.

Then afterwardes, there was another battaile fought at Morat, neere to Berne: the Switzers (after a great ouerthrow of their enemies) wonne the day, and it is ſayde, that eighteene thouſand Bourguignons lay ſlaine in the fielde; and to this day, there is ſtill to be ſeene huge heapes of dead mens bones, as a credible Teſtimony of that victory.

The battell fought at Morat.

The third battaile, was fought before Nancy in Lorraine, beſiedged by the duke of Bourgongne: but the Switzers ſent in ſuccour vntò the Duke Rene of Lorraine, (who had ſixe hundered men at [illegible] well neere all Frenchmen well pr[illegible]) eight thouſand foot, and the other confederates three thouſande more. With all theſe forces Duke René gaue battell to Charles, who had many more to attend him: neuertheleſſe, he was ouercome, & (in flight) ſlaine by the Switzers, and ſo (with him) dyed all this warre. A yeare after, the Switzers paſſed the * Leopontine Alps, which mountaine is now called S. Godard, & went to giue battell to the D. of Millain, in a place named Iornico. The occaſion of the war, was, becauſe the inhabitants of the valley towardes Iornico, ſubiects to the Canton of Vri, complaind of diuers outrages doone them by theyr neighbours, who molleſted and troubled them in the vſe and poſſeſsion of certaine Forreſts. The Switzers Ambaſſadours, being vnable to reconcile this difference, the men of Vri, craued ſuccour of theyr confederates, and ledde their Armie to Bellizona. But becauſe they could not beſiedge it in regard of the winter: they leſte ſixe hundered men in Garriſon at Iornico, which is not farre from thence.

The battell fought at Nãcy, wher Duke Charles of Burgundie was ſlaine.

Theſe two places are vpon the Teſinus, a Riuer paſſing thwart the Lake Maior, and ſo goes to Pauia.

They of Millaine goe againſt the Switzers, and a battaile is fought.

The Millaineſes came in great troops, to ſet vpon the Garriſon of the Switzers, which being ſhut vp in the ſtraites of the Mountaines; the more ſpeedily and eaſily ſlew fourteene hundred of them, and chaſed the reſt quite out of the Valley. This battaile was fought about the third day of Nouember, 1478. And in the Moneth of December following, by the intermiſe of the King of France, peace was made betweene the Duke of Millaine, & the Switzers. In the ſame yeare, Pope Sixtus made alliance with the Switzers, and beſide other priuiledges, he gaue thē alſo ſtrong pardons. Two yeares after, the Switzers ſent ſeuen thouſand men, to aide King Lewes the eleuenth, according to the tenour of the alliance before contracted. But they hauing paſſed ſo farre as Chaalous, the King (who had obtained the height of his enterpriſe) hauing then no occaſion elſewhere to imploy them; ſent them backe againe with very good recompences: where-with many of them were ſo earneſtly allured, that they ſtroue among themſelues, who ſhould firſt take penſions or wages of the French.

Pope Sixtus allyeth with the Switzers, & giues them large pardons

The yeare after, they of Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solleurre, made a particular alliance, becauſe they conceiued, that their aſſociates had carried thēſelues inhumanely on their behalfe, in the war againſt the Duke of Bourgongne. For the forenamed cities and townes had bin at great charges, as well for conduct of their victuals, as alſo the carriage of the Artillery: moreouer, they furniſhed more people, then the other cantons did. Neuertheleſſe, when they ſhold diuide the ſpoile and booty, which was very great and rich; the cantons that had defraied nothing, neither brought any ſuch number of men, tooke their part of the booty by equall portion. In regard of which iniury (as they pretended it) and ſome other light offences; theſe cities and townes, deſiring to prouide particularly for their owne affaires; allied themſelues onely together. But the other cantons were heereat greatly offended, eſpecially, they of Vri, Suites, and Vnderuald: maintaining, that it was not lawfull for the Lucernians, to make any new alliance without their knowledge and conſent.

The ſeedes of warre among the Switzers, quite ſmothered by means of a Hermit.

A particular combination of ſome Cantons by themſelues from the reſt.

This matter was debated diuers daies together, in a Councell holden at Stantz in Vnderuald; and finally by the meanes of an Hermit, named Nicholas of Vnderuald (who was then in verie great authority among the Switzers, by theyr reſolued opinion of him, that hee was a holie man) the parties were accorded to conditions, to witte; That the fore-named Townes ſhould depart from that nouell alliance, and altogether (by a common conſent) ſhould agree on cauſes then debated; as that Fribourg and Solleurre, ſhould bee receiued into the number of the Cantonnes of Swetia, ſo that there ſhould be tenne Cantons: And becauſe the former eight (which were and are called the olde Cantons, becauſe they allyed themſelues together before the other) had made a bodie of a Commonwealth together of the Switzers, for the ſpace of ſixe ſcore and fiue yeares, or thereabout; I will heere ſet downe a Summarie of the articles of the alliances which thoſe olde Cantons made, and of that which was ſubſcribed vnto at Stantz by a common conſent among the Cantons.

Conditions concluded on by the Hermit and Cantons, for a generall contentment.

A briefe Summary, of the Alliances and Confederations, made betweene the 8. ancient Cantons of Swetia.

The firſt Article of the leagues, concerneth mutuall ſuccours, and publike affaires

THe principall & firſt Chapter or Article of the leagues and alliances, doth concern the aide and ſuccour which one ought to giue another, againſt ſuch as wrongfully ſhall aſſayle them: wherein all thinges are verie well ordered, gouerned by equity, and according to reaſon. For, to the end that no warre may be lightly mooued, and vpon ſmall or ſlender occaſions; It is firſt of all ordained, that the Cantons which are offended, ſhall make knowne the merite of the cauſe to the Councell in generall for that Canton eſtabliſhed. And then, if it do appeare, that offence and out-rage is done, it may demaund ſuccour and aſſiſt-

Concerning the alliance of Glaris.

In ſome other alliances, namely, that of Glaris, this knowledge is deferred to other allyed Cantons. After that the equity of the cauſe hath appeared, & the outrage receiued: the Canton interreſſed, may require the Confederates to come and helpe it. In the interim, the Cãton may not make recourſe to whom it liketh beſt; but onely to that vvhich is allyed to it in ſome eſpeciall manner. For (as I haue hitherto ſhewne) euery one of the Cantons is not allyed with all the other. In the firſt place, concerning them of Zurich, allyed by antiquity with ſix of the cheefeſt Cantons; they may demand ayde of all thoſe ſixe. Since then, they made alliance with them of Berne: and ſo (by conſequent) they are bound likewiſe to giue them aſsiſtance, being therto required. The Berniſhmen may call vnto their aſsiſtance, them of Vri, Suites, and Vnderuald, by reaſon of ancient alliance: and they (reciprocally) may cal to their ayde, and for their other confederats the Canton of Berne. But by reaſon of the new league, they of Zurich and Berne, muſt require ayde one of another. The Lucernians (in times of neceſsitie) may haue recourſe to the men of Zurich, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, and Zug. They of Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald, may call all the other Cantons. And they of Zug haue the ſame right as the Lucernians, that is, to require aide from the Cantones of Zurich, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, and Lucerna. They of Glaris, haue recourſe vnto the Cantons of Zurich, Vri, Suits, & Vnderuald.

Euery Canton is not allied with al the reſt.

Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald.

The Lucernians in their neceſsity.

Now, although that all haue not their rights alike heerein; yet notwithſtanding if one Canton require one or two of his allies to come and ſuccour him: all the Cantons muſt aſſemble together, becauſe they which are firſt called, ſhall giue aduertiſement to the other. But, aboue all things, they ſhal ſend their Ambaſſadors to the Chappell of the Hermitage, or to a place named Kienholtz, and if queſtion bee made of an acte, which concerneth the men of Berne: they muſt aduiſe altogether (by all meanes) to appeaſe the difference in friendly manner, or according vnto right, or (if it may not ſo bee done) how they may aſſuredly giue ſuccour. Their alliance ſpeaketh expreſſely, that ſuch as are called vnto aſſiſtance, ſhall not vſe any fraude or deceit, neither any friuolous or vaine excuſe, but to aſſiſt with all their powet.

All the Cantons haue not their rights alike.

No fraud or excuſe to bee vſed in giuing ſuccour.

And becauſe it may ſo happen, that a Canton ſhall bee ſo ſodainly aſſayled at vnawares, as the enemy may ſtoppe all the paſſages, and ſo (by conſequent) the Canton can compaſſe no meanes of craning ſuccour, neyther by Letters or Ambaſſages. For this it is prouided and expreſſely ordained, that in ſuch a caſe, and when moſt neede is of ſpeedyeſt helpe: al the confederate Cantons, ſhall aſſiſt with all their forces, euen as if they had beene (by name) called thereto. In the alliance with them of Berne, it is ordained; That if the enemie aſſault the higher countrie, the confederates ſhall make ſpoile on the other, vpon the Landes of the enemie: thereby to ſcatter his forces. And the ſame to bee done in the higher countrey, if the enemie intrude vppon the lower. They that are called to ſuccour, ſhall come at their owne expences, and without any wages. Onely in the alliance of Berne, with Vri, Suites, and Vnderuald, mention is made of Wages, Namely, of a Sol Tournois (each day) for euerie man on foote. Neuertheleſſe, if the Warre be in the countrey of Ergow, then they of Berne ſhall pay nothiug. But there is a Village or Hamlet, neere vnto the firſt Lake of the Riuer Ar, which is called Vnderſee: beyonde which, ſuch foote Souldiours as come to aſſiſt the one or other partie, ſhall receiue that aforeſaid Wages.

When any Canton ſhall be ſodainly or vnawares aſſaulted by the enemie, and when no help can be required.

Aide on theyr own expence, and without wages, or elſe what wages is to be receiued

If the warre laſt of any continuance, and that they muſt beſiedge and batter ſome Towne, Village, or Caſtle, and the ſame is fully concluded and agreed vppon, by common conſent and aduice of the Cantones: then that Canton, in whoſe fauour, and on whoſe limites, the Towne or Caſtle of the Enemie is beſiedged, ſhall pay onely the charge and expences, as well for munition, pouder, conuoy of Artillerie, Pionners, as all other things neceſſarie and requiſite in a batterie. Neuertheleſſe, if the Warre bee vndertaken, not onelie in the name of one cãton, but ſ vnder name of the Switzers whole Commonwealth:

For a warre of long laſting, and beſieging or battering Townes, or Caſtles.

then they ſhal euery one pay their ſhares alike.

Of wrong done to the whole Nation, or in particular in places farre diſtant.

Likewiſe it comes to paſſe many times, that ſome ſuch as dwel far off from Swetia, doth offer wrong to the whole Nation, or to one part in particular; in the meane time, no knowledge is had how to purſue this warre, eyther becauſe the enemy is too farre diſtant, or keepeth no certaine abiding, where he may bee dealt withall. For ſuch, it is ordained, that if (by any occaſion) they, their goods, or any of their complices can bee apprehended on the lands of one of the Cantons: hand ſhall be laid on them, & they conſtrained to ſatisfie them whom they haue offended. Finally, to preuent & hinder, that none ſhall abuſe, or be abuſed by the Switzers Soldiers, leading them whether they liſt: in many alliances, the limits wherein ſome ſtand bound to ſuccour other, are preſcribed and determined. The limits are partly to the Cantons confines, according to their extendure foorth, or a little more further out: but they may not paſſe the ancient bounds of Swetia.

Orders for the Soldiours of the Switzers.

The ſecond Chapter or Article, is touching publike differences or controuerſies, between two Cantons or more. For aſmuch as it cannot be otherwiſe, but the very beſt friends and confederates, may ſometimes haue cauſe to diſioyne & ſunder: our predeceſſors did deuiſe, to ſtay the conſequence of ſuch differences, to wit, that no warre ſhould follow, as fearing leſte alliance and kindneſſe might thereby periſh, & vtterly be broken. Firſt then it is ordained, that the other Cantons ſhall ſend their Ambaſſadours, to take order, that the variance may amiably be ended, or according to right, and it is eſtabliſhed to be adminiſtred in manner following. Each party ſhall chuſe two Iudges of his owne Canton, to whom they ſhall promiſe by oath, that without any affection or loue to their country, they will iudge on the difference. To theſe foure Iudges, a fift muſt bee added, named Vnipire or Superarbitrator: who is elected ſometimes by the Iudges, and ſometimes by the parties. If the one canton will not vndergo iudgement, nor ſuffer his right to bee examined: the other cantons ſtand bound by alliance, to ſuccour him that conſents, that the controuerſie ſhould bee ended by the Arbitrators.

The ſecond Article concerneth publike controuerſies.

Iudges choſen to heare and define variations, and a Superarbitrator added to them.

The third Chapter or Article, concerneth alliances. The foure firſt Cantons do determine, that it is not lawfull for any one among them (without the will & conſent of the other; to bind themſelues by Oath, or make alliance with any, whoſoeuer it is. Likewiſe, in the alliance of Glaris, it is ſaide, that they may not make any alliance or confederacie, without conſent of the other Leaguers. For otherwiſe, the other Cantons may reſerue to themſelues, the liberty and authoritie of making new alliances, yet leauing (in meane while) the ancient ſtil in ful force. They kept alſo the freedome, for increaſing and diminiſhing their alliances, by a publike and common conſent. And ordained in like manner, that theſe alliances might bee renewed by writing, or by word of mouth, and to bee confirmed by Oath, if neede required, from fiue or ten to an hundred yeares. If this might not bee done commodiouſly, yet notwithſtanding, they were to be obſerued firmly.

The third article touching alliances, and beginning with the foure firſt Cantons.

Liberty to augment and leſſen leagues and alliances.

In the fourth place, are added exceptions; becauſe certaine Cantones, which anciently did concerne the Empire; as Zurich, Berne, Vri, Suites, and Vnderuald, excepted the Empire, and the rightes thereof, from which they pretended no derogation by this alliance, in any manner whatſoeuer.

Lucerna and Zug, excepted the rites of the Duke of Auſtria. By the alliance of Glaris, are excepted all rights and deuoires due vnto lawfull Lords and Magiſtrates. Likewiſe, in all theſe confederations, are excepted the ancient alliances, rights, priuiledges, and cuſtomes of the Cantons, together with their Caſtles, Villages, and Hamlets: ſo that thoſe rights remaine ſound and intire to euerie one.

The fourth Article ſpeaketh of exceptions to bee obſerued in the alliances.

Now, although the other Chapters and Articles are not of any ſuch importance; yet notwithſtanding, they tend to maintenance & conſeruation of peace and quietneſſe. There is one for the puniſhing of homicides or Men-killers. Hee that killeth any one of the Confederates, ſhall looſe his head: except hee can make good proofe, that hee did it in defence of his owne bodie, and for ſafetie safety of his life. Whosoeuer shalbe condemned and banished from his Canton, shall stand banished and excluded also from the countries of the other Cãtons: and whosoeuer lodgeth or assisteth anie such person, shall be guilty and punished in some other nature.

For puniſhment of homicides and baniſhed perſons, in their ſeuerall qualities of offence.

Concerning debts, pawnes matrimony, & known vsury.

There is another Article, which prohibiteth the exacting or vrging of names to wit, if any Lay-man attempt to pay himselfe in his debtes, by the name or meanes of Iudges of the Church: onely causes Mattimoniall, and manifest Vsury, are to be referred, and sent to the Court for the Church. No man shall exact a pawne of any one, except of his debter, or him that standeth pledge for him. Neither shall he receiue pawnes of his owne priuate authority, but by consent of the Iudge. No one shall engage himselfe for another man.

Of iudgments and not standing to the award and censure.

Concerning iudgements, it is ordayned, that each man may haue, & assigne his Iudge. He that shall not appeare according to the assignation, but falleth into default, and interresseth the contrarie party by his absence, shall pay his charges. Causes shall be pleaded in the Audience Hall of the Canton, where the acte makes mention of the deed doing. Iustice is to be done without fraude or deceite. And euerie man shall content himselfe with the iudgements, Lawes, and customes of the Canton, where his cause is pleaded.

Matters too largely dilated, do manie times breed offence.

Although that these Articles, and other such like, may seeme to bee of small consequence: yet notwithstanding, because thereby (oftentimes) great debates do arise, yea, warres with our alliances, in discoursing them distinctly & at large, it contents me (for mine owne part) that I haue thus breefely & summarily toucht them.

The Tenor of the Arrest or Agreement made at Stantz.

The first Article is for pacification of wars that may happē among the Cantons, and of differences betweene particular persons.

FIrst, we ordaine, that no one of the eight Cantons, either by it selfe, or aided by others shall enterprize to make war on any one of the said Cantons, or any other ioyned there-with in this alliance. Neither shal offer anywrong to their bodies, goods, Townes, Countreyes, or people, nor robbe or despoile them of any thing to them appertaining. If any one of the eight Cantons shall do otherwise (which God forbid) and outrage any of the other. To the end it may bee remedied, and order giuen, that our alliance may remaine firme, so that wee may liue together in peace like Bretheren: all the other Cantons shall ranke themselues with that which is offended, and conserue the rights thereof, in good faith, and without any fraud. And if some particular person, or many together, shal doe wrong or iniurie vnto some other particular body: that then speedily, and without any contradiction, they shall be chastised by their Magistrate (in vvhat place soeuer it is) according to the quality of the offence, and as they haue deserued. Neuertheless, if any one shall commit such insolences vpon the iurisdiction of another, and moue it to be troubled, answere may bee made him in the very same place, and he iustly punished, according to the right and custom of the country.

Of insolencies committed on the iurisdictions of other men.

The 2. Article concerneth assemblies or Conuenticles without knowledge & consent of the Magistrate.

Secondly we say, that hence-forward, none shall attempt to make anie assembly, and therein to purpose anie thing whatsoeuer (either secretly or publikely) in the Citties, Townes, or Countries of Swetia, whereby any damage or danger may ensue, without making it first knowen, and with the consent of the Lordes of that Canton. Whosoeuer swerueth, and endeuoureth to make any such assembly, or shall fauour it, either by worde or deede, shall bee chastised by the Magistrate, according to the exigence of the act, and that without the least hindrance or delay.

For disobedience to Magistrates, or infringing their orders and decrees.

In like manner, and by common consent, we expressely ordaine, that (honour and oath reserued) it shall not be lawfull for any one, to encite the subiects of any Canton, to do any thing derogatorie, to the obedience due to the Magistrate, or moone the people to any disobedience or reuolt. And if the subiects of any one of the Cantons, shall bee rebellious against the commandements thereof: that then the other Cantons shall succour it faithfully, and reforme those subiectes to their duties, according to the agreement of our alliances.

The third Article concerneth the Military discipline of the Cantons, answerable to that of Sempach.

Thirdly, because that after the battell of Sempach, our Ancestors resolued vpon some ordinances, concerning matter of warre: it seemed good to vs, to explicate in this agreement, that which is perpetuall, euen the principall Article of those ordinances, and in regard of our selues and our successors, to set it downe as followeth. If one Canton or more, do bring an Army into the field, marching with colours displayed against the enemy: all they that march vnder those colours, must continue together for the fight, as honest men ought to do. And according to the example of our Ancestours, what necessity soeuer is enforced, be it to fight in ranged battaile, in skirmish, or otherwise, how short or long soeuer the time be: it is to be carried according to the orders Military, made after the day of Sempach.

The fourth Article concerneth matters of contracts passed long ago by our Ancestors

In the fourth place, we haue ordained, that those contracts passed long time since, by our Ancestours, as concerning Ecclesiasticall persons, and other things, in the yeare, one thousand, three hundred and seuenty; shall bee obserued inuiolably, firmly, and from point to point. And to the end, that the memory thereof may be perpetuall, at al such times as our alliances may be renewed by oath: those two transactions and ordinances, concerning affaires of warre and Ecclesiasticks, together with this amiable agreement, shall be publikely read, among and with the Articles of alliances. But to the end, that yong men, and they of meaner yeares also, may the better remember our alliances, and obserue them the more faithfully; we haue agreed, that heereafter (from fiue yeares to fiue yeares) the alliances shall be renewed throughout all the Cantons, by oath, which shall bee giuen for this effect.

For yong men and they of vnder age.

The fift Article concerneth booties conquered in warre, & the ransomes of prisoners.

Finally, we haue accorded, that when any warre happeneth, all the booty conquered from the enemy, and those sums payed by prisoners for their ransomes: shall be distributed (by equall portions) among the number of Soldiers, which the Cantons or Townes haue in the Army. But the Citties, Townes, Castles, Countries, passages, anuall reuenewes, iurisdictions, and other things of the same nature, though conquered in warre, shall be equally parted or diuided among the Cantons, according to their ancient custome. If we permit any of these things to be bought or solde to any; the money paide, or arising thereby, shall be distributed among the Cantons by equall portions.

The reason of making and publishing this amiable agreement so generally abroad.

We haue determined and published this louing agreement, and in this manner, that all such as haue or shall carry Armes with vs, all Subiects, cittizens, inhabitants, confederates, and parties ioyned with vs, may haue their iust portion in the booties. But as for Cities, Townes, Castles, Countries, men, reuenewes yearly, iurisdictions, ports, and conquered passages: such things doe belong to the Cantons onely. We make exception in this accord, of our perpetuall alliances, intending that nothing thereof shall bee infringed; but that this present transaction shall be inuiolably maintained, yea, faithfully and without any fraud, for the confirmation and manutention of our alliances.

Fribourg and Solleurre receiued into the number of the Cantons, making them ten.

This Arrest was ratified with the consent of all, in the yeare, 1481. in the house for particular alliances of our Townes: And by common accord, they of Fribourg and of Solleurre, were receiued into the number of the Cantons. And then the common-wealth of the Switzers (for the space of twenty yeares) stood composed of ten Cantons; whereto consequently, Basile and Schaffouze, and then Appenzell were added. But before we speake of their alliances, wee must say somewhat as concerning Fribourg and Solleurre: then will we summarily declare, what they did, after their receiuing into alliance.

CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Towne of Fribourg; who was the first Founder thereof: And how it came into league and alliance with the Cantons.

The originall of the Towne of Fribourg.

Fribourg is a Towne, seated vpon the Riuer of Sana, builded by Berthoull, fourth of that name, Duke of Zeringen, some few yeares before Berne. These two Townes maintained themselues long time in amity: but after the Dukes death, Berne became subiected to the Empire, and Fribourg fell into the hands of the Counts of Kybourg, that dwelt at Bourgdorff, which was the cause, that (by succession of time) they forsook their affection to them of Berne. First of all, they were present in the warre with Godfrey, Count of Kybourg, against the Bernians. Soone after, their friendship was renewed againe, but yet with this exception, that if the Lords of Fribourg were at discord with Berne, the Fribourgers might follow their Lords part, without any preiudice to that louing accord. Some short while after, the Count solde Fribourg to Raoul, King of the Romanes, and from thence forward, about the space of two hundred years it remained vnder the dominion of Austria. During which time, the Fribourgers beeing conducted and commanded by them of Austria, were present in many fought battailes, giuen to the Bernians at Loupen, at Schonenberg, and elsewhere. Againe, afterward they renewed (diuers times) their ancient alliance and amity, with the men of Berne.

The diuers deportments and carriage of the Fribourgers.

Fribourg sold to the King of the Romans.

In the yeare 1403. after they had bin tormented (in many kindes) by Noblemen, they contracted a perpetuall alliance with the Bernians: and yet notwithstanding, continued subiects to them of Austria. This amity endured forty fiue yeares, at the end whereof, warre being moued betweene the Prince of Sauoye, and the Fribourgers: they of Berne followed the faction of the Prince of Sauoye, to whom they had beene allied, and stood friends a long time. There were some courses on eyther side, and a battaile fought neere to Griertz, wherein the Fribourgers had the worst. The yeare after, the Ambassadours to the King of France, of the Duke of Bourgongne, and of the Cantons, made a peace. And the yeare following, Albert of Austria being come to Fribourg; some certaine men of the Towne complotted with him, to make warre vpon the Bernians. Matters grew on so forward, that there was some apparance of sedition, and one was ready to run vpon another: if the men of Berne (by a singular prouidence and addresse) had not appeased the commotion, by the sending of their Ambassadors.

The perpetuall alliance made betweene the Fribourgers and the men of Berne.

The enemies of peace put themselues formost into the greatest danger.

Albert perceiuing that Fribourg fauoured the Cantons, and leaned to that side, and that the citizens, who enioyed the priuiledges of their Ancestors, obeyed not entirely to what he commanded them, and that oftentimes (according to their alliance) they followed them of Berne, and went in warre with the Cantons: he began to lose all hope of remaining any longer Master of the Towne. For this cause, the cheefe Master of his houshold came to Fribourg (sent by the Prince as some say) where he caused instantly to be noysed through the Towne; that the Prince wold very suddenly come thether, how soone he knew not. Heereupon, he borrowed and got together, all the siluer Vessels, Tapistries, and such like costly mooueables, to adorne that house in the Towne, where it was saide that the Prince should alight and lodge. But (by vnder-hand meanes) the Master of the household, caused those goods to be secretly transported out of the towne.

Albert seeing he should lose Fribourg before he could quit it, taketh the latter hand or course.

The day beeing come, of the Princes appointment to be there, he rode foorth with his horsemen, as it were to meet his Master, accompanied with the worthiest men of the Towne. Being farre enough off, no Prince came; but only such horsemen as he had sent before, to attend the Master of the housholde, and the charge he had. When they were come into a place of security, he saide to them of Fribourg,

A cunning tricke of the Master of the household.

bourg, who rode in his company to honour the Prince, that for the confidence they repoſed, in their league made with the men of Berne, and combined amity with the Cantons: they were rebels to the Prince, and therefore it ſtood with reaſon and iuſtice, that the Prince ſhould get what he could from them: as namely, the ſiluer veſſels, and the other goods brought from the Towne.

There is nothing gained by goods ill gotten, and loſing the harts & obedience of ſubiects.

Speaking theſe words, hee galloped away with his traine to meete the Prince with the ſpoiles of Fribourg. But the cittizens, beeing thus vnworthily handled, made a far ſtricter alliance with the Bernians, and ioyned themſelues alſo with the confederates, vpon certaine conditions. So that during the warre againſt the Duke of Bourgongne, the Cantons ſent a thouſand men for Garriſon into Fribourg. And the Fribourgers likewiſe, were preſent in the battailes with their confederates, againſt the Duke of Bourgongne, carrying themſelues very valiantly in that warre. Afterward, they were receiued (with them of Solleurre) into the nũber of the Cantons, as heereafter we ſhal tell you.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Citty of Solleurre, being one of greateſt name in Swetia.

The originall and antiquity of Solleurre.

Solleurre is one of the moſt ancient cities or townes in all Swetia. It is called by many, the Siſter of Treuers, which was builded (as the ancient Annals doe make mention) in the time of Ninus. The olde Romane inſcriptions, which are yet to bee ſeene at Solleurre, do teſtifie the antiquity of the citty. But by the warres and courſes of the Allemaignes, Hunnes, and Franconians in Gaule, vpon the declination of the Romane Empire; Solleurre was ruined, as many other cities and townes were in like manner. But after that the Franconians became Lords & Maſters, it was rebuilded, and yeelded in ſubiection to the Biſhop of Geneua. For it is ſaid, that in the Church or Temple of S. Victor, neere to Geneua, theſe words are found written.

Solleurre rebuilt and ſubiected to the Biſhop of Geneua.

Acta ſunt hæc regnante Domitiano, Epiſcopo Geneuenſi, quo tempore etiam Caſtrũ Salodorenſe Epiſcopatus Geneuenſi ſubditum erat, &c.

Theſe things were made and done, in the time of Domitian, Biſhop of Geneua: during which time, the Caſtle of Solleurre was ſubiect to the Biſhop of Geneua, &c.

Solleurre numbred among the Imperiall cities.

In the times of the Allemaigne or Germane Emperors, Solleurre was daily numbred with the Imperiall cities & townes: yet (notwithſtanding) in ſuch ſort, as the colledge of the chanons enioyed the principal priuiledges and franchiſes. And it is ſaide, that they haue the ſame rights as the chanons of Zurich.

The Dukes of Suaba, Gouernors of Solleurre.

The Dukes of Suaba were Prouoſts or Gouernours of this citty, as likewiſe of other Imperiall towns in Swetia. They of Solleurre (in auncient times) made an alliance with the Bernians, I cannot well tell in what yeare; but ſince that time, the two cities haue borne good and loyall amity together. And (almoſt) in all the warres the Bernians had: the men of Solleurre euermore ſuccoured them with happy ſucceſſe.

The men of Solleurre excommunicated by the Pope, for taking part with the true Emperor.

Vpon the contention moued betweene Lewes of Bauaria, and Fredericke of Auſtria, which ſhould be Emperor of them both: they of Solleurre tooke part with Lewes, by which occaſion, the Pope excommunicated them, and then they were afterward beſiedged by the Duke of Auſtria. But they of Berne ſent them foure hundred men for their Garriſon. Moreouer, they had warre againſt the Count of Kybourg, who wonne a battaile of thẽ, by treaſon of one of their cittizens. Finally, in the yeare, one thouſand, three hundred, fifty and one, they made a perpetuall alliance with them of Berne, & continued alwayes good friends with the other Cantons. So that after the warre of Auſtria, wherein Leopold was ſlaine; they made peace and alliance with the houſe of of Austria. But it was vpon thoſe ſame conditions, that the other Cantons, with whom they were ioyned in letters and contracts of alliance; by generall and common aduice, ſhould eſtabliſh and ſweare them together in the Military ordinances. Then after that the war againſt the Duke of Bourgongne was ended; wherein they deliuered true teſtimony of proweſſe and valour, in the iudgement of all men; they were accepted and receiued (with them of Fribourg) into the nũber of the Cantons.

Their receiuing into the number of the Cantons.

CHAP. X.

Of the Switzers wars againſt them of Millaine; againſt the Venetians; and at the conqueſt of Naples.

THE men of Fribourg and of Solleurre, being admitted into ranke with the Cantons; the Switzers made theſe warres enſuing. In the yeare, one thouſand, foure hundred, eighty and ſeuen; Iuſtus de Sillim, Biſhop of Sion, leuied an Army of Valachians and Switzers, which he led beyond the Alps, againſt the Duke of Millaine. But the iſſue of that voyage was vnfortunate, becauſe the Duke ouerthrew them: ſo that they were enforced to returne home againe to their owne houſes, after they had loſt very many of their men.

War made by the Switzers, againſt the Millaineſes.

The yeare following, the Switzers ſent ſuccour (according to the tenour of their alliance) to Sigiſmond, Duke of Auſtria, againſt the Venetians. And then afterward, they were in pay with the King of France, Charles the eight, who had renewed the alliance, which his Father made with the Switzers. They were firſt in Bretaigne, where the King won a great victory againſt the Duke, at Saint Aubin. Then againe in Italy, when Charles conquered the kingdome of Naples. And at Fornoüe, when hee gaue battaile to the Princes of Italy, that were leagued againſt him. In all theſe warres, the Switzers did good and faithfull ſeruice vnto the King.

Succour ſent againſt the Venetians.

They ſerued the King of France for pay, in many places.

In the yeare, one thouſand, foure hundred, & ninety, another ciuill warre kindled it ſelfe in Swetia. The Abbot of S. Gall had begun to build a new Abbey at Roſack. The cittizens of S. Gall, they of Appenzell, and the ſubiects to the Abbot (partly moued by a kinde of deuotion, as vnwilling that the bones and reliques of S. Gall, ſhould be carried any where elſe; and partly alſo for their owne profit, fearing leſte the packs of linnen cloth (which grew to great gaine among them) ſhould be tranſported to Roſack conſpired together, and at vnawares, went out in Arms, and ioyning together in troopes, went to beate downe the new building, which was not (as then) fully finiſhed. The Abbot not a little moued with this iniury, called the foure Cantons, wherto he was allied, to aide him. The ſixe other Cantons, mediatours for peace, exhorted thẽ of S. Gall, to decide this difference with the Abbot, by courſe of right in law. But becauſe the confederates alledged, that great wrong was done them, in building a new Abbey, and (by that means) abolishing their ancient priuiledges; therefore conſequently, they had iuſt occaſion to vndertake Armes, and would not haue it debated in iuſtice. The foure Cantons with ſome other people of their allies, brought their troopes to Turgaw: but this warre was appeaſed without blowes. For firſt of all, they of Appenzell made peace with the Switzers, who took from them the Valley of Rheguſce. Then afterward, the citty of S. Gall being beſiedged, peace was made betweene the cittizens & the Switzers; by the means of George, Count of Sargans, Gaudentius, Count of Metſch, and the Lords of Conſtance. In like manner, the ſubiects to the Abbot were reconciled, after each one had paide his fine.

Strife about the bones and reliques of S. Gall, & the building of a new Abbey.

The Abbot craueth aide of foure Cantons.

The war vndertaken of S. Gall.

A war ended, and neuer a blow ſmitten.

Some ſhort while after, followed the laſt warre againſt the houſe of Auſtria, which the Switzers called, the warre of Suaba: the Emperor Frederick did ſpread the ſeeds abroad, but after his death, his Sonne and Succeſſor Maximillian, gathered them together. Fredericke had procured, that certaine Princes, Lords, and Townes ſhould make an alliance, which they tearmed, The great league of Suaba: and (among other matters) to oppreſſe eſpecially (as was conceiued) the liberties of the Switzers. The Emperour was a great league to oppreſſe the liberties of the Switzers.

was chiefe of this league, which was beneficiall to Germany in one kinde: for by that meanes, the wayes were more ſafe & aſſured, theeues were taken and puniſhed, and their caſtles and places of retreat beaten to the ground. There had beene (long time before) ſome enmities betweene the Switzers, and ſome of their neighbours, vaſſails to the houſe of Auſtria.

Day by day the fire lay kindling, and the Switzers ſuffered inſupportable iniuries and outrages. On the other ſide, they of Auſtria, greeued the Griſons with nouell charges, and had caſt them out of their ancient poſſeſſions in ſome places.

A league of the Switzers and Griſons, againſt that of their enemies.

Vpon this occaſion, and to prouide for their owne ſecurity, againſt the violence of their enemies; the Switzers and the Griſons made a perpetuall league together.

Moreouer, King Lewes the twelfth, deſirous to recouer the Duchy of Millaine, which he auouched to belong vnto him: purchaſed the amity and alliance of the Switzers, who in ſuch a perillous time, thought good not to refuſe it, neyther to let ſo fit and apt occaſion ſlippe them.

Diuers victories of the Switzers.

Many goings and commings were betweene them, to pacifie this buſineſſe, and the parties on eyther ſide took arms, in the yeare, one thouſand, foure hundred, ninety nine. Many encounters they had in this warre, and the Switzers ſtill remained victors: except once, when they were put into route, neere to Conſtance.

But they recouered their honour againe the ſame day, hauing freſhly recollected their forces, and then giuing battaile to the enemy, enforced him to forſake the place. Moreouer, they and the Griſons, in eight other as great encounters as skirmiſhes, had ſtill the aduantage: as at Mont de Lucé, at Treiſe, Harden, Fraſtenz, on the plaine of Malſa, nere to Baſile, in the Forreſt des Freres, in the vale of Leime; and laſtly, at the Caſtle of Dorneeh, appertaining to them of Sollewre.

They of Auſtria, beeing tired and ſpent with ſo many loſſes, came finally to a compoſition; by the intermiſe of Lodowicke Sforzza, Duke of Millaine, who ſent thether the Vicount Galeazzo. And ſo peace was made, vpon this condition, that the liberties of the Switzers ſhould remaine in their integrity, and they were confirmed in the poſſeſſion of all thoſe places which they had taken before from them of Auſtria. In like manner, the iuriſdiction in criminall cauſes, at the command of Turgaw, which they of Conſtance had enioyed vntill that time, was giuen to the Switzers.

Behold what gaines they get, that labour to aboliſh the peoples liberty.

Thus you ſee the laſt warre (except that of the Griſons againſt Iohn Iaques de Medicis, Lord of Muſs) that the Switzers had to this preſent time, to maintaine the liberties of their countries, againſt the violence and force of forraigne Princes. They were afterward preſent in many other warres, and wonne renowne of beeing hardy and valiant men: but thoſe warres were made partly in Italy, partly in France, vnder authority and command, eyther of the King of France, or of Popes, or of the Dukes of Millaine. For immediately after the peace made with them of Auſtria; the Vicount Galeazzo began to make ſecretly a leuye of Switzers.

Reſt and quietneſſe doth well helpe, after long toile and labour ſpent in war.

Contrariwiſe, the King of Prance demanded ſuccour all openly, according to the tenour of the league, which was granted to him. Notwithſtanding, contrary to the will and Edicts of the leagued Lords; Galeazzo enrolled fiue hundred Switzers, by the aide of whom, together with an army of Lance-Knights, which he had got together, Duke Lodowicke recouered Millaine.

The Frenchmens beſiedging of Nouara.

Soone after that, the Frenchmen being come with a puiſſant Army to beſiedge Nouara, the Switzers that were then in Garriſon, perceiuing it to bee a place, not of defence, nor well munited, nor wherein they could any way reſiſt the enemy; agreed to depart, and repaired home to their owne country. The Duke tooke the habite of a Switzer Soldier, and mingled himſelfe among the reſt, onely to eſcape: but happening to be knowne and diſcouered, by a certaine man named Turman (who afterward was hewed in peeces) he was taken and led priſoner into France, and kept in the Caſtle of Loches. For the reſt, they do great great wrong to the Switzers, that impute to the whole Nation, the faulte of one man onely. If they will charge all them that were with the Duke, becauſe (maulgre his will) they compoſed with the French: yet (for all that) they muſt not couple the whole Nation of Switzers, with them in that action. Conſidering, they that did the deede, were not ſent by their Cantons, to ſuccour Duke Sforza; but followed his faction, againſt the Edicts of their Lords. Heereto may be added, that they appeared not to be partiall, or hare-braind in the buſines, when they departed by compoſition.

One mans offence may not blemiſh a whole nation.

In the ſame yeare, when theſe things were done beyond the Mountaines; Huldrich, Duke of Wirtemberg, made an alliance for twelue yeares, with the common-wealth of the Switzers. In like manner, the Emperor Maximillian renewed the hereditary alliance, made formerly by Duke Sigiſmond, with the cantons of Zurich, Berne, Vri, and Vnderuald. In the yeare, one thouſand, fiue hundred and one, two potent cities on the Rhine, namely, Baſile and Schaffouze, were ioyned to the number of the Switzers cantons.

Alliances of Princes made with the Switzers.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Citty of Baſile, and diuerſity of opinions, how it receiued that name: As alſo the originall and antiquity of the Citty.

THE Citty of Baſile, capitall & cheefeſt in the country of the * Rauratians, is the very greateſt of all the cities and townes in Swetia. It is not knowne at what time it was firſt of all built. Amianus Marcellinus maketh mention in his hiſtory of it, calling it Baſilia, and teſtifieth, that the Emperor Gratian erected a Port hard by it, to bridle the courſes of the Allemanes. There are ſome other, who do thinke that it tooke name of Baſilica, Mother to the Emperor Iulian. Phlegonius, the enfranchiſed ſeruant of the Emperor Adrian, maketh mention of Baſilia, in a little Tract which he wrote of admirable things, and of people that liued long: but it is not well knowne, whether hee meaneth this citty or no, whereof we now ſpeake. But the opinion of them is moſt probable, that hold the citty of Baſile to take name, from one of the Romane Colonies, ſent by Auguſtus into the country of the Rauratians, before named.

*A people of Belgia, neere to the Riuer Rhene.

Opinions concerning the name of Baſile.

But Baſile is in the number of the free citties of the Empire, and hath obtained (for very long time) verie franke and liberall priuiledges, from the Romane Emperor. The Biſhoppricke and Vniuerſity encreaſed the renowne thereof. And as it is a neighbour to the Switzers, ſo hath it beene likewiſe very carefull for maintaining it ſelfe in amity, long time before it came to bee allied with them. For after the Pope had excommunicated the Emperor Lewes of Bauaria (in which caſe all Germany was combuſted with great troubles) they of Baſile made alliance, and promiſe of mutuall ſuccours, with them of the three firſt Cantons; and afterward, in the yeare, 1327. with Zurich, Berne, and many other citties and townes of Germany. In the yeare one thouſand, three hundred, forty fiue, they made a particular alliance (for 2. yeares) with them of Zurich, and then renewed it for three yeares after. Againe, in the yeare 1365. by the procurement of Leopold, Duke of Auſtria, an Army of Engliſhmen came and forraged the country of Halſatia, beſiedged Strasbourg, and threatned Baſile with the ſame behauior, becauſe the cittizens of the leſſer Baſile, engaged by the Biſhop to the Duke of Auſtria; would not ſubmit themſelues wholly to his will.

Baſile numbred among the free Cities of the Empire.

The men of Baſile were friend with the Switzers a long time.

Engliſhmen inuaded the Country of Halſatia, by Duke Leopolds meanes.

On the other ſide, Baſile beeing not ſtrong for reſiſtance of an enemy, by reaſon of an earth-quake, which had caſt downe the walles and many houſes, and fire had conſumed and done as great harme: Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, and Solleurre ſent a ſtrong Garriſon to Baſile: ſo that the Engliſhmen durſt not beſiedge the citty, but retired thence, becauſe the Empe-

A ſtrong garriſon ſent to Baſile.

Emperor Charles the fourth, alſo broght an Army againſt them. In like manner, in the warre of them of Baſile, againſt Katherine of Bourgongne, the widdow of Leopold, in the yeare one thouſand, foure hundred, and nine, the Bernians & they of Solleurre ſent ſuccour: the other Cantons imploying themſelues carefully, to accord them with the houſe of Auſtria. Moreouer, at the time of the councell of Baſile, when as Lewes the Dolphin of France, brought a great Army into Germany, to breake the councell, and made warre on the Switzers, by the inſtance & working of the Duke of Auſtria, who had procured him to come: the Switzers maintained and defended the citty and councell, againſt the encountering of a ſtrange enemy; as an example very remarkable, it beeing not aboue ſixteene yeares, ſince they had coaped with great troops of the French. True it is, that they all (well neere) loſt their liues there: but yet they did ſo weaken their enemies troops, that he tooke part with thē which fled faſteſt.

Katherine the Widdow to Duke Leopold.

The Dolphin of France brought an Army into Germany.

They being thus anoyded, the men of Baſile ioyned their forces with the Switzers, and ſo made warre together on the Duke of Auſtria. In like manner, when Charles, Duke of Bourgongne, made himſelfe ſo terrible, and affrighted all the world, they of Baſile ioyned in alliance (for ten yeares) with Strasbourg, and other citties on the Rhene. Afterward, with Sigiſmond, Duke of Auſtria; René, Duke of Lorraine, and with the Cantons. In this warre they ſhewed themſelues both faithfull & valiant, for their confederates. Finally, a great warre being moued betweene the Emperour Maximillian, the Switzers and Griſons: they of Baſile remained neuters, without giuing ſuccour to eyther ſide, nor receiued their Garriſons; but they furniſhed them both with victuals and munition. In this warre there was a battaile giuen (almoſt) againſt the walles of Baſile, afterward at Dorneck, where the Switzers wonne a faire victory ouer the enemies, whom they did beat backe to the gates of Baſile. But during all this warre, the cittizens of Baſile fauoured equally both the one and other ſide. To conclude, by the diligence of Lodouico Maria, Duke of Millaine, the Ambaſſadors on both ſides met at Baſile, & peace was made betweene the Emperour and the Switzers.

The Basilians ioyne with the Switzers againſt the Duke of Auſtria.

War between the Emperor Maximillian, the Switzers and Griſons.

The Switzers allowed well of this expedient, in the men of Baſile during this warre, and the Emperor Maximillian (for his part) ſeemed not to improoue it. But the Noble-men, who were deadly enemies to the Cantons, held Baſile (almoſt) in the ranke of a foe, becauſe the citty did not then ſhew it ſelfe openly, as an enemy to the Switzers; and not onely the ſubiects to the houſe of Auſtria, but many more, who till then had beene cittizens; with-drew themſelues to the Count of Ferrara, and about Montbeliard, into Halſatia, and to Briſgow, countries appertaining to them of Auſtria. Being in thoſe places, they ceaſſed not to outrage (both with words and deeds) the inhabitants of Baſile, who being moued with ſuch indignities; the yeare after the war ended, to wit, one thouſand, fiue hundred and one; made a perpetuall alliance with the Cantons, and ſo were left in peace with their neighbours, who ſtood in awe of the Switzers ſuccour.

The Emperor and the Switzers no way diſtaſte the dealing of the men of Baſile in the warre.

CHAP. XII.

At what time Schaffouſe was receiued into the number of the Cantons; and the antiquity thereof.

SChaffouſe, accepted the very ſame yeare, to be nūbred among the cantons, is not of ſo great age and antiquity. It is ſeated on the Riuer of Rheine, within Germany, and yet notwithſtanding, the Bridge is in Swetia. In the time of the Emperor Henry the third, the Counts of Nellenbourg builded there an Abbey, which ſtandeth yet to this day, and it is thought, that it gaue a beginning to the cittie: as likewiſe the citties of S. Gall, Lucerna, and many more in Germany, haue deriued their originall from Abbeyes. The Rheine is alſo another cauſe of the citties encreaſing, continuing ſo for ſome thouſand of yeares ſince, beneath the citty, where wherewith it is (in a manner) encloſed. It falleth downe from a very great height, with ſuch a dreadfull noyſe, and remounting vp againe into the ayre ſo vehemently, that it maketh there a continuall fogge or myſt. And for this cauſe, and the vncapableneſſe of any Boats to paſſe there, all ſuch as deſcend downe the Lake of Conſtance, and from Cella on the Rheine, are conſtraind to diſcharge at Schaffouſe; which hath beene conceiued by many, to giue that name to the Citty, to wit, of a Squiffe, or of a Boate, which the Germanes call Skiff, or Schiff, thence to bee tearmed Schaffouſe. Neuertheleſſe, the vulgar ſort, taking vp a falſe etymologye of the word Schaff, which ſignifieth a Sheepe; haue grounded their opinion ſtrongly thereon, and forged Armes alſo of the ſame nature. There is a great tole or cuſtome gathered in this Citty, eſpecially for the paſſage of Salt: which appertained in ancient times, and before the foundation of the Citty, to two Noble Families, to wit, of Turn, and of Stad, which remaine yet to this day at Schaffouſe.

No Boates able to paſſe the water at Schaffouſe.

Concerning the name of Schaffouſe.

A great Tolle or Cuſtome for ſalt.

Schaffouſe at liberty at the firſt, but afterward alienated by the emperour.

At the beginning, the principall dominion or ſway of the City, belonged to the Abbot, who elected and choſe one halfe of the Magiſtrates; but (by little) and little) they exempted thẽſelues from his gouernement, and obtained many good priuiledges and franchiſes of the Emperors. But Lewes of Bauaria (weakened by long warres) could not pay the Duke of Auſtria, ſuch monies as he ought him, according to an agreement made betweene them, which cauſed him to alienate and ſell Schaffouſe, together with ſome other Townes, and ſo (by that meanes) it became diſmembred from the Empire. After that time, Schaffouſe remained ſubiect to the Dukes of Auſtria, for the ſpace of foureſcore and fiue years, euen vntill the councell of Conſtance: for then Fredericke of Auſtria, becauſe hee brought Pope Iohn the two and twentieth out of the councell, was baniſhed by the Emperor Sigiſmond, who cauſed him to bee ſo narrowly purſued, that all his goods were partly pilled, and partly confiſcated to the Empire, without any other meanes of helpe.

Schaffouſe ſubiected to the Dukes of Auſtria for 85 yeares.

In this warre, Schaffouſe became reunited to the Empire, and the cittizens (hauing giuen a good ſumme of money, to the Emperor) obtained great priuiledges vnder Letters patents: and therein was plainly expreſſed, that (thence forward) their Citty ſhould not any more be alienated from the Empire. But Frederick the third, of the houſe of Auſtria, being Emperor: laboured to ſubiect it againe, and that the citty of Schaffouſe might remaine to his ſucceſſors. And therefore hee permitted Duke Sigiſmond, to compell the cittizens to ſweare fidelity to him; which they refuſed to doe, but with exception of their priuiledges, and they would not receiue the Princes Ambaſſadors into the citty, but vppon that condition. Contrariwiſe, the Ambaſſadors preſſed them earneſtly, to oblige themſelues to the Prince, without any exception, and propounded certaine Articles, for the maintenance whereof, they required oath: threatening the cittizens with very great harmes, if they would not yeelde to that which they demanded of them.

Schaffouſe vnited to the empire again, and great priuiledges grãted thereto.

The men of Schaffouſe, ſeeing the Ambaſſadors perſiſt ſtill in their opinion: to make good their owne part, receiued the Switzers Ambaſſadors into their citty, and made alliance (for ſome yeares) with them of Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Suits, Zug, and Glaris, ſo that the Ambaſſadors of Auſtria returned backe, and performed iuſt nothing.

The Switzers Ambaſſadors receiued into Schaffouſe, & alliance made with them.

Before this, they of Schaffouſe were in good amity with the Switzers, and from the yeare, one thouſand, three hundred, forty fiue, made alliance (for ſome time) with them of Zurich. But becauſe they were Subiects to the houſe of Auſtria, againſt whom, the Switzers had (well neere) continuall warres: they could not then entertaine firmely this amity, but were compelled, to go in war againſt the Switzers, vnder the Enſignes of the Auſtrians. But after this laſt alliance, they were very good and faithfull friends vnto the Cantons, and bare them company in many warres and battailes. For immediately after the alliance began: the Auſtrians came and aſſaulted the Switzers, and namely them of Schaffouſe.

The Cantons made war on Sigiſmond of Auſtria, by the Popes command.

It came to paſſe, that the Cantons (obeying the command of Pope Pius) made war with Sigiſmond of Auſtria, which being pacified, they of Auſtria tooke Armes againe, becauſe Mulhouſe and Schaffouſe had ioyned themſelues with the Switzers, who ledde a great Army to the Count of Ferrara, and into the quarters about Montheliard. At the ſame time, Peregrin de Hewdorff, accuſed them of Schaffouſe in the Imperiall chamber of Rotuille, and ſollicited ſo much, that they were put to baniſhment from the Empire. Among others, he charged Iohn and Conrad de Fulach, brethren & cittizens of Schaffouſe; of a noble and ancient Family, who ſometimes poſſeſſed a Caſtle, neere vnto the downefall of Rheine, whence Albert of Auſtria had expelled them, but ſoone after they entred it againe by intelligence. In regard whereof, they & the other cittizens that maintained their iuſt quarrell, were proſcribed. In this war the Cantons ſent a good Garriſon vnto Schaffouſe.

The men of Schaffouſe accuſed by Peregrin de Hewdorff.

While theſe helpes and ſuccours laſted, the cittizens made diuers courſes into the lands about, appertaining to the houſe of Auſtria; as in the Mountaines of the black Foreſt, in Hegow, Kleckgow, and other limitrophing lands of Suaba and of Baſile. Finally, hauing laide ſiedge before Waldshout, which is a Towne at the entrance into the Blacke Foreſt, where the Riuer of Ar falleth into the Rheine, and which was vnder the Auſtrian gouernment, peace was made; wherein they of Suaba were exempted, & ſtood baniſhed from the Empire, at the purſuite and charges of Sigiſmond. Thus then the Cantons hauing experimented in theſe warres, the faithfulneſſe of them of Schaffouſe, and knowing well withall, what commodities they receiued from ſuch a citty, ſeated in ſo apt a place on the confines of Swetia; And reciprocally, the men of Schaffouſe, feeling themſelues to be deliuered from their enemies, by the good aſſiſtance of the Switzers; they thought it very expedient, both for the one ſide and the other, to prolong the alliance. And accordingly, in the yeare 1479. they made an alliance for twenty fiue yeares following: wherein were comprehended, the men of Vri and Vnderuald, with whom Schaffouſe (till then) had not any particular acquaintance.

Incurſions made on the Auſtrians lands, b them of Schaffouſe.

A new alliance of Schaffouſe for 25. yeares, made with the cantons.

The tenour of this alliance, is (almoſt) anſwerable to that of the ancient Cantons. For in the firſt place, they binde theſelues to aide one another. Afterward, they eſtabliſh a forme of iudgement, for reconciling or auoyding ſuch differences, as ſhould happen between them of Schaffouſe and the Cantons. Then followeth in what manner debts ought to be paide, & what meanes are to be vſed in ſuch caſes. Then for the puniſhment of homicides, or men-killers. The laſt Article concerneth the new & ancient alliances, to wit, the one ſide ſhall make no new alliance, without the will and conſent of the other: And that the auncient alliances ſhall alwayes be eſteemed of moſt aduantage, & to precede all the other.

A breefe of the Articles and conditions of the alliance.

After all this, the warre of Bourgongne hapned, and ſome yeares conſequently, that of Suaba, mooued by the Emperour Maximillian, againſt the Switzers. In both theſe warres, they of Schaffouſe did their duty exceeding well, furniſhing men and money for the weale-publike: by which meanes, they entred into the good grace of the Cantons, much more then euer they did before, and wonne great honour. Alſo, the yeare after the laſt warre, to wit, 1501. they made perpetuall alliance with the Switzers, and were enrolled in number of the Cantons, obtaining the 12. ranke or roome.

Schaffouſe is reckoned for the twelfth Canton.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the warres of the Switzers, ſince ſuch time as they came to be in number of the Cantons, and making them twelue.

After that Baſile and Schaffouſe were numbred with the cantons, and that they were 12. during the alliance which they had made with King Lewes the 12. in the yeare, 1503. ſome among them (in great number) went for him in the war of Naples, without leaue neuertheleſſe, and againſt the Edicts of their Magiſtrates. As the Switzers and French might brag of ſmall happineſſe, in the firſt warre of Naples, Naples, vnder King Charles the eight: ſo their fortune prooued little better in this laſt warre. They, who (during the firſt warre) were left in Garriſons, in ſtrong places and Fortreſſes of the Kingdome; dyed of diſeaſes for the moſt part. Such as eſcaped in this warre, in recompence of their trauaile, brought home to their owne houſes, that villainous contagion of the Pockes, which afterward was tearmed the Spaniſh diſeaſe, the Neapolitane euill, and the French Pocks: At the laſt war they were ouercome in two battailes, and loſt a great number of their men. The yeare 1507. the Cantons ſent ſuccour vnto the King, who (by their meanes) made himſelfe Maſter of the field, which the Genewayes had planted in a Mountaine, that commanded ouer their citty, which (ſoon after) yeelded it ſelfe.

The ſpaniards brought it firſt out of the Indies into Chriſtendome, & beſtowed it on the French, at the ſiedge of Naples.

At the ſame time, the Emperor Maximillian demanded men of the Switzers, and they promiſed him a leuye of 6000. men, prouided, that he ſhould not leade them againſt the King of France, their allie: but becauſe he would not accept this condition, the leuye remained, and was not made.

An honorable minde in the Switzers, not to beare arms againſt their Allie.

Soone after, to witte, in the yeare 1509. the league of alliance betweene the King of France & the Switzers, tooke ending, and the Emperor, Pope Iulius the 2. the Kings of France and Spaine, leagued themſelues together, and made warre on the Venetians, wherin the Switzers ſerued the King of France for wages. The yeare following, Pope Iulius made alliance with the Switzers, by the meanes of Matthew, Cardinall of Sion, who immediately after the alliance concluded, led ſixe thouſand Switzers into Italy; vnder pretence of defending the lands of the Church, againſt the Duke of Ferrara. But his true intent was, to ſurprize and expell the French out of Millaine. The Switzers hauing diſcouered his purpoſe, would not follow the Cardinall againſt the French, and their Lords had likewiſe forbidden them: ſo that the Pope ſent them into Swetia, without paying them their wages, wherat they were very highly diſcontented.

The Cardinal of Sion a warriour and capitall enemy to the French

In the yeare 1511. perpetuall alliance betweene the Switzers, the houſes of Auſtria and of Bourgongne, was renewed. On the other ſide, the Ambaſſadors of France deſired the Switzers to renew the alliance with their King: but the moſt part of them were diſpleaſed, becauſe ſo ſoone as the firſt alliance was expired, the King had denied them all their payes and yearely penſions.

The Switzers offended with the King of France, about their payes & penſions.

And albeit that a very great number among them, were no ſound well-willers or friends to the Pope, who likewiſe had not payed them: yet notwithſtanding, fearing leſte hee ſhould excommunicate them, they durſt not allie themſelues with the King of France, who then was enemy to the Pope. Hereupon, hapned a diſgrace to be done them by the French, for they had taken at Lugano, a Herauld of the Switzers, with letters from the Seigneury about him: firſt, they drowned him, and to deſpight the Switzers, the Coate of Armes, which the Heraulds and Officers to the Cantons vſe to weare, they ſolde at open port-ſale, or out-cry, as we commonly call it.

Great wrong done to an Officer of Armes.

The Switzers, in the very ſtrongeſt of winter, led their Army ouer the Alpes, where hauing burned ſome Villages, they returned backe againe, without performing any other memorable deed. But the yeare following, Pope Iulius (who had loſt a great battaile at Rauenna, at encountring there with the French) called them to helpe him, and therefore they ſent into Italy, an Army of twenty thouſand mē. They beeing ioyned with the Venetians (then reconciled to the Pope) tooke at their arriuall Cremona and Pauia, driuing the French out of the whole Dukedome of Millaine, ſo that nothing remained to them, but onely the Caſtle of Millaine. In regard of theſe worthy exploits, the Pope gaue the Switzers the title, of Defenders of the Church; enriching their Standards with diuers Images, and publikely gaue to the whole Nation of the Switzers, two great Standards, which they call, Paner, that is, The Sword and Bonnet, as a noted marke of liberty. Maximillian Sforza, re-eſtabliſhed in his paternall domination by the Switzers ſuccour: made alliance with them, and gaue to the Cantons Lugano, Locarna, Mendriſa, and the Vale of Madia.

The Switzers reuenged on the French in very notable manner, and called, Defenders of the Church.

The Sword & Bonnet, ſignes of liberty.

He gaue alſo to the Griſons, their confederates, the Vale Telina or Volturena. Likewiſe Charles, Duke of Sauoye, whoſe predeceſſors had particular alliance (long time before) with ſome of the Cantons:

Great giſts beſtowed on the Cantons.

made alliance with all the Switzers, for 25 yeares after following.

In the ſame yeare, the King of France ſolicited the Switzers, to become agayne allied with them: but becauſe hee would not ſet free the Caſtle of Millaine, and ſome diſcouery was made beſide, that his Ambaſſadors laboured to corrupt ſome particulars by gifts, and to buy theyr voyces for faire money layde downe; they were commaunded to depart out of the Leagued countries; and ſo the warre was renewed again. For the King ſent a great Army into Italy, vnder the conduct of the Lords of Triuulſe and Trimouille, who beſiedged Maximillian Sforza in Nouara. Hee was then accompanied vvith foure thouſand Switzers, to whoſe ayde, eight thouſand more were ſent. Their vantgard being arriued at Nouara, and they within being ioyned with them, they gaue the battell to the French, vanquiſhing & driuing them out of Italy. Guichardin the Italian, an Hiſtorian much renowned, writes that the Switzers won ſuch honor by this victory, as many haue made no difficulty in equalling this happy ſucceſſe of theirs, with (almoſt) all the braue exploites of the Greekes and Romanes. Notwithſtanding, the field was deere enough bought by them, becauſe fourteen hundred Switzers were there ſlaine, and the moſt part of them by the Cannon, before that they could come to handye ſtroakes. Which made the people of Swetia to murmur in many places, and all blame fell on them that tooke part with the French: ſo that diuers withdrew themſelues from Swetia for a time onely, and two only had their heads ſmitten off in thoſe mutinies and commotions: for the reſt, all was well pacified, without any effuſion of blood.

After this victory of the Switzers, the Emperor Maximillian, quitting the amity and alliance of the King: aduiſed the Switzers, to enter France by Bourgongn, with an army of ſix thouſand men; wherto (wel-neere) ſixteene thouſande other voluntary ioyned themſelues, together with ſome troopes of horſe belonging to the Emperor, vnder the conducte of the Prince of Wirtemberg. There they beſieged * Dijon, the capitall City of all Bourgongne. But the Lorde of Trimouille, an olde Captaine, beeing not of ſtrength to defend well the place, agreed vvith the Switzers, on conditions, that the King ſhould acquit whatſoeuer he pretended to the Dukedome of Millaine, and paye them (at certaine appointed times) ſixe hundred thouſand Crowns; for aſſurance whereof, he gaue them foure Lordes of marke, as hoſtages, with whom the Switzers departed thence immediately.

Nowe, although it was a matter moſt palpable and notorious to all men, that this compoſition warranted the kingdom becauſe that Dijon being taken, the Switzers might haue run vp ſo farre as to the gates of Paris, or ioyne themſelues there with the Engliſh; and beſide that king Lewes hadde not a ſufficient Army to make head againſt them; yet notwithſtanding, he would not ratifie his compoſition. For he would not admit (by any meanes) that his rights to the Dukedome of Millaine, ſhould be ſo much as talkt of. The Switzers ſeeing themſelues thus handled, and highly offended with ſuch ſlye trickes: threatned to kill the Hoſtages, except the confirmation might be brought within a certaine time. Neuertheleſſe, the winter grew extreame vpon them, and yet they reſolued to re-enter France in the month of Nouember: But the King ſent his Ambaſſadors, who laboured (by all meanes) to make a perpetual peace with the Switzers. In the meane while, they coulde no way ioyne, becauſe the conditions which the King propounded, were very vnreaſonable: which was the cauſe that the time ſpent it ſelfe in dayes and deliberations, in meere talke and friuolous diſputes, whereby the enterprize of marching into France, was quite broken. Concerning the reſt of theſe meetings and aſſemblies, they were thus conſidered on, that in the month of December, the ſame yeare, they of Appenzel were added to the Cantons number, and held the thirteenth place.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the Originall of Appenzell: how it tooke that name. The Lawes, Customes, & maner of gouernment there obserued.

A description of the situation of Appenzel, and the villages therto belonging.

APpenzel is the name both of a Country, and of a Village. The country is situated somwhat aboue S. Gall, betweene the high Mountains, and on the Frontiers of the Grisons country. The inhabitants liue (scatteringly) in Villages, and among the number of them, there are eight chiefe and principal, which haue euery one their Temple or parish church. The maine head of all is the village of Appenzell, whereof all the rest of the countrey beareth name. This Countrey was sometimes vnder the gouernment of the Abbots of saint Gall, and because they alwaies vsed to dwel in the chiefest town or village, wher they builte a very strong Castle, named Claux: the village was therefore cald Appenzel, which in Latine is, Abbatis Cella: that is to say, The Chamber or dwelling of the Abbot.

Abbatis Cella The Abbots Chamber or dwelling.

The inhabitants of Appenzel buy their liberty.

The people of Appenzel aimed at liberty, first by armes, and after peace made, they bought liberty for themselus & their children, by meanes of a great sum of mony, which they paied to the Abbot. They had wars which continued seuen yeares, against Cuno de Stouffen, Abbot of S. Gall; to whom the townes about the Lake of Constance, and belonging to Frederick D. of Austria, the bishoppe of Constance, the Count of Wirtenberg, & many Counts & Gentlemen gaue succour. Yet they of Appenzel would not yeeld themselues for all this, but being ayded by the Cittizens of S. Gal (who, at the beginning, were partakers with the Abbot, but afterward ioined with them of Appenzel, won som battels, tooke fiue Townes, and more then sixty Castles, part whereof were quite ruined. In this war, they leagued themselues with the Switzers, who were enemies vnto the house of Austria. Some say, that they allyed themselues with Suits and Glaris only; but others doe maintaine, that it vvas with Lucerna, Vri, Suites, and Vndernald.

Their Warre made against the Abbot of S. Gall.

Their league with the Switzers.

This Warre tooke ending in the yeare, 1408. and by meanes of the Emperour Rupert, agreement was made betvveene them of Appenzel and their enemies, in the City of Constance.

Their form & maner of their order and gouernment. first by themselues, and afterwards in due fashion.

This being done, the men of Appenzel framed a forme of gouernment to themselues, which yet they hold vnto this day. For till then, each village had her ensign, and her estates apart, or by it selfe. Now there was but one Ensigne, one assembly of their estates, and one Councell, composed of the most honest people, and the notablest persons in all the Villages thoroughout the countrey. Then three years after the peace was made, the Abbot of Saint Gall attempted a new suite against them: but then they made alliance with Zurich, Lucerna, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, & Glaris, which so offended the Abbots of Saint Gall, as, about the yeare one thousand foure hundred twenty fiue, Henrie Mansdorff (then Abbot) preuailed so far, that they of Appenzel were proscribed by the Emperour, and excommunicated by the Pope. Banishment was no great hurt, or inconuenience to them in any manner whatsoeuer, because the countrey (being round engirt with Mountaines, and not Trafficking almost with any bodie) no inuasion could bee made vpon them. As concerning the excommunication sent from the Pope, they resolued in an assembly of al the country, not any way to care for it. And therefore they expelled all the priests (that obserued the command of the Pope) out of their Countrey, and vvould not permit them to administer the Sacraments: amongst all which they killed but one.

People are banished and excommunicated, because they maintain their coũtries liberty.

The Abbot of Saint Gall, perceiuing that this course did him not any seruice; and that (on the other side) the men of Appenzell ranne verie fiercely vpon such, as durst tearme them to be excommunicate, and ruined the Castelles of manie Gentlemen. Finally, by helpe of the Byshoppe of Constance, and the Noblemen of Suaba, hee accused them before the Electours of the Empire, imploring theyr helpe and aide in this extreamitie. The Electors sent to the Switzers, and to the Cities of Suaba, that they ſhould bring them of Appenzel vnder obedience. But the Switzers would not make any war on their neighbours and fellow cittizens: but rather laboured to make peace, which was agreed on foure yeares after this excommunication, the men of Appenzell hauing beene (before) ouercome in two encounters, by the Count of Toggenbourg.

Warre made vpon the Noble-men by them of Appenzell.

This peace laſted not long, for the Gentlemen, neighbours to Appenzell, about the Lake of Conſtance, aſſembled a great number of horſemen, wherewith to inuade them of Appenzell. But they diſappointed their hope, and got before them; poſſeſſing themſelues of Rineck, & of the Vale of Rheguſce, in the year, 1445. The Lords of Hagenwill, who helde that country in pawne or pledge: cauſed them of Appenzell to be cenſured with baniſhment, by the Imperiall Chamber eſtabliſhed at Rotuille. But gaining nothing by the bargaine, they ſolde them their right, for the ſumme of ſixe thouſand crowns, and tooke off the cenſure. In the yeare, 1452. they made perpetuall alliance with ſeauen of the Cantons, and (after that time) ioyned themſelues with the Switzers, in the warres againſt the Dukes of Auſtria, of Bourgongne, and the league of Suaba, wherein they ſhewed themſelues both faithfull and valiant. Afterward, in the yeare, 1513. they were receiued into the number of the Cantons.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the alliance made betweene the fiue laſt Cantons; And a breuiate of their Articles, binding them together in confederacy.

ALL the latter cantons, except Baſile, long time before their receiuing into this ranke, were allied to the other ancient Cantons, and then afterward, at ſundry times they were receiued and numbred with the cantons, according as wee haue noted already.

Now thoſe Cantons doe hold this right aboue their confederates, that they deliberate, and giue aduice in their dayes of conſultation, for all occaſions concerning (in common) the common-wealth of the Switzers. They haue a ſhare or part, in all commodities and diſcommodities of the comminalty. They gouerne (in equall authority) all the Baliwicks by them obtained, and partake equally and publikely, all booties gotten in warre. For the reſt, the Articles of alliance of the old Cantons, and latter with the firſt, are almoſt alike.

What rights and priuiledges belonged to the Cantons

The firſt and principall Article, concerneth mutuall ſuccour or aſſiſtance, wherein there are diuerſity of clauſes. The Cantons which ſhall be called, ought to ſuccour their aſſociate or companion, without any fraud or delay. If a Canton be ſo ſuddenly engirt by the enemy, as he cannot call the other, neither by Letters nor Ambaſſadors; yet ſhall not they forbeare (for all that) from giuing ſuccour, and in as ſpeedy manner, as if they had receiued expreſſe aduertiſement. If the latter Cantons doe conceiue, that a wrong is done vnto them; yet notwithſtanding, they ſhall mooue no warre againſt any perſon, without the will and conſent of the olde Cantons. If their enemies will debate their cauſe in iuſtice, and accept the Switzers for their Iudges, or others of equall and indifferent iudgement: the Canton may not attempt to purſue his right by Armes. Euery one of the Cantons, at their owne charge and expences, ſhall come to ſuccour the other, and ſend ſuch numbers of men as they would haue, and according as they ſhall ſee it commodious, wherewith the other Canton muſt content it ſelfe. In like manner, the limits are preſcribed, wherein the auncient Cantones ſtand bound to ſend helpe to the new: And the limits are the confines of the Cantons, as they then ſtand. There is likewiſe mention made, concerning charges and expences, at the beſiedging and battering of Townes and Caſtles. And the Lawes agreed vpon at Stantz, touching the partage of booties, which alſo are heerein confirmed.

The ſecond Article declareth, what kinde kinde of course is to be obserued, if a difference do happen between two Cãtons or many: But wee shall speake in our second Booke, what forme of iudgement is in the case to be kept. Moreouer, there is mention made, concerning actions in cases of iniuries betweene particulars, and what Iudges they are to take note of in that kind. Then for the exacting of names: Concerning commerce, and free Trafficke, and what bargaining ought to stand free for buyers, as well on one part as the other. That no Canton shall receiue the citizens and subiects of another Canton: till they be first left at liberty, by them vnder whose dominion they were before. That the new Cantons shall not make alliance with any whosoeuer, without consent of the olde Cantons. If war is mooned betweene the old Cantons, the latter shall remaine as newters, and labour onely to agree the parties. Each Canton shall keepe his or her ancient priuiledges rights, and customes in their true integritie.

An especiall suruey of the conditions most material

Behold the principall conditions of the latter alliances, wher namely it is decreed that the new Cantons shal not moue any warre, without aduice of the old, neyther refuse that which is right, nor any honest condition of the countrey; and other such like things, concerning warre, are established fully. And becaus that the most part of the latter Cantons, are vpon the limits and euen out (as it were) of Swetia; they ordained, that no one shoulde attempt to make any warre, except it were for some matter of very great importãce: and so much the rather, becaus it is very hard to conduct and maintaine an army in those quarters.

CHAP. XVI.

Heere we are to speake of the Switzers wars in Italy, when the French vndertooke to recouer the Dukedome of Millaine, &c.

The death of Lewes, the 12 K. of France, after whome succeeded Frances de Valois.

IN the yeare of our Lord, one thousand, fiue hundred, & fifteene, King Lewes the twelfth dyed. He had newly sought by his Ambassadors, the amity and alliance of the Switzers. Neuertheless, in the meane time, he made great preparation for war, pretending to recouer the dukedome of Millaine. Frances de Valois, his kinsman, and his sonne in law, came after him (as successor) to his crown; who following the deliberation of his father, had also his minde and eye fixed on the Millaineses. The Switzers (on the other side) allyed with the Emperour Maximillian, Ferdinand King of Spaine, Sforza Duke of Millaine, and with Pope Leo the tenth: vndertook to defend Millaine against the French. Wherefore, after they vnderstood the King of France his preparation they sent (at their first leuy) six thousand men to the Duke of Millaine. Afterward, the tenth of Iune, they made another leuy of 13000. men, which they sent also to ioyne with the first.

The Switzers attempt to guard Millain against the French.

King Frances passed ouer the Alpes in the meane while, by vnaccustomd waies, shunning the Garrisons of the Switzers, which were vpon the vsuall passages, and entred into Italy, with an Armie verie potent, of French and Germaines. This was the reason that the Cantons sent twelue thousand men more thether, so that the campe of Switzers onely, consisted of one and thirty thousand men. Now, although the Kings troopes were well prouided and resolued, yet they woulde not hazard any thing, nor set vppon so great an Army of Switzers: it being such indeed as hardly (at any one time) had so manie euer before beene in the field. Hereupon by their Deputies, they began to treat on peace with the Colonels of the Switzers: who likewise (for their part) were not far off from it in disposition, becaus they considered, that their confederated princes did not march on roundlie vvith them.

The Camp of Switzers, was 31000. men in number, and neuer so many of them seene before in the field at one time.

For first of al, their wages was not paid them, according to promise. Moreouer the Emperor had not sent his companies of horsemen, as he stood bound to do by the confederacy. And contrarywise, he had not prohibited the Lance-Knightes (which hee might haue done in regard of his authority) from going in seruice with the King: but suffered them (by troopes) to depart from Germany, and enter into France. Finally, although the forces of the Pope and King of Spaine were neereyet

yet notwithstanding, they could hardlie be perſwaded to paſſe the Pau, and ioyne themſelues with the Switzers. Beſide, there were meſſengers gooing and comming betweene the French and them, & from them to the French. Wherefore, the Switzers ſeeing themſelues vvithout money, and forſaken of their Conſortes: made peace in the village of Galleras, with the Deputies to the King of France, vnder honeſt conditions. Which hauing bene confirmed by ſome Cantons, immediatly twelue thouſand Switzers took their way to Coma, and returned home to their countrey, without tarrying for the reſt, who likewiſe prepared to depart the next morning. But the Duke of Millaine would not accept the conditions of this peace; and the Cardinall of Sion, (a great and perpetuall enemy to ỹ French) laboured by oblique meanes, to break & fruſtrate all.

12000 Switzers part home to theyr country, without the reſt of their cõpanie.

It came to paſſe, that by cunning tricks and plottes, the thirteenth day of September, the Switzers of the Guard to the Duke of Millaine, and ſome others beſide offended with the King, in the night time brake in vpon the French, ſending worde inſtantly to aduertiſe their companions, in what danger they were, and intreated their preſent ſuccour. The other, imagining that it would be a great ſhame vnto them, to forſake their friendes in ſuch a neede, and being made to beleeue withall, that the French had begunne this broyle, went with all their troopes to aſſiſt them. The fight was very ſharp on all ſides, but the night parted them. In this charge was ſlaine Frances, the Lorde of Bourbon, the Lord of Imbercourt, alſo the Count of Sancerre, the Prince of Talemond, ſonne to the Lorde of Trimouille, the Lords of Buſſy d'Amboſe, and manie other: which made ſome to holde opinion, that the Switzers were Maiſters in this conflict, and a brute ran thorow Italy, that they remained conquerours. But the very ſame night, the King hauing mounted his Artillerie on their carriages, leuelled the battalions of the Gaſcoigns and Germaines, re-aſſembling the horſemen vnder their Regiments, and ſending Bertelomeo d'Aluiana with the Armie of Venetians: very earely in the Morning, he gaue battaile to the Switzers, whom he vanquiſhed, after they had loſt manie of their men.

A hot & fierce fight between the Switzers & the French wherein the Switzers wer ouerthrowne in the end.

Read the lord du Bellay, in the firſt book of his Memories.

The Switzers ſeeing the victory in a contrary hand, withdrew them-ſelues to Millaine; yet in ſuch ſort, that their retreate ſauoured not of flight. For, they brought backe the Artillery which came out of Millaine, and marched in ranke of battaile, hauing their wounded Men in the middeſt among them, and going but a very ſoftly pace: yet in all the French Army, not a man, eyther Horſe or Foot, durſt purſue them. On the morrow, hauing lefte the Duke of Millaine fifteene hundred men, to ſtrengthen his garriſon in the Caſtle, they returned into Swetia, by the way of Coma. But, by reaſon of their foile, the French recouered the dukedom of Millaine.

The retreat of the Switzers backe to Millaine.

The Emperour Maximillian conteſted hardly to take it from them againe, & the yeare following, he ledde into Italy (to effect that hope) an army of Germans and Switzers: but he could doe nothing, and ſo was glad to come backe again immediately. As for the King of France, hauing well felt how deare a price this victorie coſt him: he neuer ceaſed till hee hadde made peace and alliance with the Switzers in the end. Perpetuall peace, betweene the French and the Switzers, was made in the yeare one thouſand, fiue hundred, and eighteene, the laſt day of Nouember: and the alliance was confirmed three yeares after, to wit, in Anno one thouſand, fiue hundred, twentie and one. The Articles both of the peace and alliance, are ſet downe in their due place, heereafter following.

The Dukedome of Millain recouerd by the French

CHAP. XVII.

A Diſcourſe, concerning the Alliance of the Switzers, with the King of France.

AT that very time, all the Cantons, Zurich onely excepted, made Alliance with the King of France. And, although they of Zurich were earneſtly

Certaine reasons why the mē of Zurich refuſed to be allied with the king of France neſtly ſollicited by the reſt, to ioyne in this league with them: yet for all that, they could neuer bring them to the point of yeelding to this alliance. In the firſt place, the yeares going before, Mathew, Cardinall of Sion, who came verie often to Zurich: by his Orations and perſwaſiue ſpeeches, had wholly eſtranged them from the French. On the other ſide, Huldrich Zuinglius, being then a principal miniſter at Zurich, in his ordinary preaching and Sermons, ceaſed not to turne the people, from taking wages to goe in warre ſeruices. Shewing by arguments & remonſtrances of great weight, that it was not lawfull for a Chriſtian man, to ſet himſelfe to ſale for a price of money, and go ſhed the bloode of ſuch as are (oftentimes) innocents, and neuer did him any manner of wrong. He ſayd, they ought to follow the manners of the ancient Switzers, who (by their manhood) had planted liberty in their countrey. All which while, they wholly eſtranged themſelues from ſuch courſe of liuing; their liues wer maintained by their trauell; neuer binding themſelues vnto any Prince, neither hadde they any freedome that was to be ſold.

The al'egations of Huldrich Zuinglius, why Chriſtian men ſhould not make themſelues hyrelings in warre.

And as hee had words verie readie at command; ſo he approued by great ſtore of ſound reaſons and arguments, that ſuch alliances did but eneruate & meerely proſtitute the liberty of the Switzers to forraine Kings and Princes. So that the men of Zurich, being (otherwiſe) people of peace, and little addicted to martial affaires; were much mooued with his ſpeeches, and abhorred this new League. On the other ſide, the Captaines that hadde bene in the warres in the times of King Charles the eight, and Lewes the eleuenth, diſſwaded them from the league, as being farre vnlike to the alliances with former Kings. For, in precedent times, after that the Switzers had well vnderſtood & comprehended the occaſion of the war; they made choiſe of ſuch Captaines and ſoldiers as they ſhould ſend to the king, according to their promiſe. But in the Newe League, the Cantons neither choſe Captaines nor Soldiers, neither cared vvhat became of all; what the occaſions of the warre were, nor whether they vvere iuſt, or no. But, if the King were to deale with any people, he choſe ſuch Captains of the Switzers as himſelfe pleaſed, and cauſed them to come whether he thoght good. By which meanes, the Cantons had not any power ouer their Men for warre, except they might counter-mand them, when any warre was moued in the country.

The men of Zurich were peacefully minded, and little giuen to warre.

Taxations impoſed vpon the new legue

Moreouer, many ſaide, that this newe League was contrary to the ancient and perpetuall alliances of the Switzers. For, in the firſt Article they ſtand bounde, to guard all the Prouinces of France, againſt all enemies whatſoeuer they are. True it is, that the firſt alliances were exempted; but immediately is added, that if the ancient allies begin to make warre vpon the French, the Cantons ought to ſend ſuccour to the King, againſt the other: whereon enſued (as it ſeemeth) that if any one of the Cantons, or of the Confederates, could not haue reaſon (in friendly maner) of the King of France, and would purſue his right by Armes; the other Cantons are bound to warre on him, according to the new League, and contrarie to the promiſes of the ancient alliances.

Articles concerning the ancient and perpetual Alliances of the Switzers.

Moreouer, it is not any long time, ſince the Switzers denied theyr troopes to the Emperor Maximillian, alleadging (for their excuſe, becauſe he would haue had them ſerue at his Corronation) that they were occaſioned (for many reaſons) to keepe their men of warre (as then) at home in their owne countrey. Therefore it appeared to them verie vnfitting, that they ſhould then allye themſelues with the King, who would make a Leuye of them, ſo ſoone as the alliance was concluded.

The Switzers denyed their troopes to the Emperor Maximilian, and vpon what cauſe.

They conceyued alſo, that it would be farre off from theyr auncient grauity and magnanimity, if they ſhould league themſelues ſo ſtrictly with the King of France; of whom (but a yeare and an half before) they had written vnto the Electors of the Empire; that it was no way expedient that he ſhould gouern the affayres of Germanie, ſo that if he ſhould be elected Emperor, they were not minded to giue him obedience. And, as concerning the commodities of the alliance, which many did make lowd proclamations of: there vvere others of opinion, that the profite would fall into ſome particular purſes, and eſpecially of ſuch, as enriched themſelues by the penſions of Fraunce; but the Commonwealth of the Switzers would be no way benefited by the bargaine, as very easily was to be proued.

Arguments very considerately alledged by the Switzers, against ioyning in League with the King of France.

For in the first place, the country had no neede of any strange horsemen or infantery, hauing worke enough to doe in nourishing their owne breed for that imployment. Moreouer, the hope of helpe, and money from France, robbed the Switzers of all their true force and courage. In following the example of their predecessors, they were best to let their hope leane and rest vpon God, to serue and honour him in sincerity of heart, and vprightnesse of conscience. That not onely hope in God, would faile and diminish by such a League; but also it was to be feared, that it would very strongly break and corrupt their ancient manners, cause all husbandry to cease, giue ouer honest trades and exercises, and engender nothing but idlenesse. And then is easily known what followeth; dissolution in diet and apparrell, drunkennesse, whoredomes, adulteries, thefts, and blasphemies. For these are the fruites of warre, and the Arts that are lerned in the armies of strange Princes.

The fruites of war in forrain Princes seruices.

For a finall conclusion, the euent and successe of precedent alliances, haue both instructed and guarded many (especiallie the men of Zurich) to weigh well & consider on nouell combinations. For, albeit that some fewe did sufficient seruice to the nation, as that which was made against the Duke of Bourgongne: yet notwithstanding, the most part of those alliances, brought it into great extremities. Because in such straunge warres they lost many of their people: or els in those countries, they were rudely hurried and agitated, by factions and seditions. For these reasons, and diuers other considerations; the inhabitants of Zurich could not (as then) be induced to ally themselues with the king of France.

Some former examples wer not altogither warrantable.

But the other confederates, who were not of any such opinion, maintaind what they did, by reasons enow. First, they declared, and would prooue it, that euery voyage in war was not condemned by the word of God: but that many holye persons had made wars; wherein they were ayded and succoured by others, as in like manner they had assisted their Allies. Secondly, that the war of the Switzers was not mercenary nor vendible; because they went to the seruice of a King onely, (with whom they were ioyned by an honest alliance) with the will and consent of their Lords.

Arguments for alliance of the Switzers with the K. of Frãce, against those formerly alledged by the of Zurich.

Thirdly, that if the King should moue a warre, which all men knew to be vniust; then it remained in the power of the Lords of the Leagues, to deny him succour. But if the occasion were doubtfull and vncertaine: the souldier had nothing to doe to make any curious inquisition thereof: it only appertained to the King and his Councell, to render a reason for it. Fourthly, that the Switzers Countrey was greatly peopled, but narrow, hard, & barren in many places, and could not furnish so many men with nourishment: wherefore the commodity was not to be condemned, which the King had offered voluntarily.

The Switzers countries stored with people, but very barren.

To these we will adde, that the Switzers ought to consider, with what neighbors they were enclosed, som wherof enuyed them, and others pryed into their Liberties: so that it was both well and wisely done, to fortifie themselues with strange succour against them, and that trust and hope in God, did not prohibite the vse of humane assistance. Also, this was a means to traine vp the Switzers in martiall discipline, which is necessary for all Commonwealths: and in regard whereof, warlike people haue euermore beene highly respected. Finally, although that some alliances haue discommodited the Countrey; yet notwithstanding, the Switzers haue sped well in the more part, especially, in those which they had with the kings Lewes the eleuenth, Charles the eight, and Lewes the twelfth. And therfore they must needs expect a happy yssue of this which they contracted with a King powerfull & fortunate.

Martial & militarie Discipline very expedient for all Commonweales.

This was the discourse then made concerning aliance with the French: as I learned of my predecessors, which liued in those times. The selfesame question hath bene often and seriously debated & handled, euen in my time, by men well grounded in the affayres of State, to whome (as yet) I referre the further knowledge of the case.

And first, The Abbot of Saint Gall. CHAP. XVIII.

Another Discourse of the Author, concerning the associates in particular manner.

HItherto wee haue shewne what the Cantons & confederates are, making vp a whole body of the Switzers Commonwealth, and what hath beene the estate and condition of euery one of them before they were leagued. Also, for what causes, at what times, and with what conditions they assembled themselues in a body politicke. Now we will discourse of the associates of this Commonwealth, according to the same order: and we will heere shew, wherefore, when, and vppon what conditions they allyed themselues with the Cantons. And because the Abbot, and the Citty of Saint Gall [illegible] the first ranke, wee purpose [illegible] them.

The City of S Gal tooke name at first of one Gallus, a Gentleman of Scotland.

Gallus, [illegible] ty of Saint [illegible] name, wa[illegible] of Scotla[illegible] or Schol[illegible] named Colom[illegible], with whome hee came into France, and thence transported himselfe into Germany, to a place called Tuggen, neere to the Riuer named Limagus, at the mouth of the Lake of Zurich. There he preached the Gospel with great zeale and affection, to the people of the Countrey, then bewitched vvith diuers kindes of Idolatry. Hee continued (soone after) at Bregents, at the mouth opening of the Lake of Constance: next, at Arbonna, and in diuers other places of Swetia, for the space of sixteene years, or thereabout. Gonzo Duke of Suaba, hauing called him to bee Bishoppe of Constance; he would not accept that charge: but councelled the Duke to giue it to one of his schollers, named Iohn, whom hee thought to be more fit for the place. As for himselfe, about the yeare six hundered and thirty, he retired into the Mountaines, aboue the Lake of Constance, into a very solitary place; and in the very same plot or square of ground, where the Citie and Abbey of S. Gall now standeth: hee builded a little Cell or house, wherein he spent the rest of his dayes, with som of his schollers, in the studye and meditation of holy matters.

Gallus refused to be bishop of Constance, and preferred one of his schollers to it.

The death of S. Gal, & succession of his schollers, and his litle house becomming an Abbey.

After the death of S. Gall, his schollers liked well to liue in that place, and according to his manner of life: neuertheless, without making profession then of anie certaine rule or order. But the Kinges of [illegible]rance, and the Dukes of Suaba, taking delight in their deuotion, did them many [illegible]inde Offices: where by the number of these religious men encreased, & (by little and little) the small silly house of saint Gall, became conuerted into an Abbey. For fourescore yeares after the death of S. Gall, they requested Counte Bertrand, Gouernor of the countrey for the Kinges of France, that hee would giue them an Abbot. He sent them a Priest, named Omer, bred and brought vp in a Colledge, called Coire of the Grisons, and towardes Pepin, Prince of France, sonne to Charles Martell: who following the aduice of his father, established this Priest the first Abbot of Saint Gall, and then (first of all) the Monkes made profession of the rule of S. Benet.

Omer a priest the first Abbot of S. Gall.

Af-

After that time, the abbey became verie rich and powerfull, so that the Abbot of that place, was sette in number of the Princes. And in ancient times, he was vnder protection of the Emperours, who tooke the Gentlemen of Suaba to be Gouernors of this abbey. Afterward, warre being kindled betweene the Abbot, and them of Appenzel: the Monkes well perceiued that their Conuent stood in neede of some good Protectours, becaufe the Townesmen or Cittizens of S. Gall, who were (as within the abbey) ioyned with them of Appenzell, who were also fauored by many seruants of the Abbot.

The Abbot of S. Gal desires to be receiued into the number of 4. Cantons, and to bee ordered by them.

For this cause Gaspar de Landberg, then the two and fiftieth Abbot (by the aduice and counsell of the Monks) requested the Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Suites, and Glaris, to receiue him into their alliance: establishing them patrons, fathers, & defenders of his freedom, & of al his goods, possessions, vsances, and priuiledges. This right is perpetuall, and at all times, and as often as a new Abbot is to be elected; hee promiseth this accord, and that al the places of his Seigneury, shall alwayes lye open to these foure Cantons, and they to haue free accesse thither. And if diffrence shal happen between him and any other: he shall commit it (continually) vnto the hearing of the foure Cantons, and be iudged by them.

Landberg the Abbot beeing dead, Huldrich sirnamd the Red, succeeded after him.

The succeſſour to Landberg, named Huldrich, and sir-named Le Roux, added to this first alliance, that the foure Cantons should send (one after another) one of their Councell, that should remay two yeares with the Abbot, to bee Ca taine of all his country: He gaue assistan in pleadings and iudgements, & the mo ty of all fines remained to the Switzers. Moreouer, it was ordained in this allyance, that in all warres the Abbots subiects should goe to the succour of the 4. Cantons. As concerning that vvhich Abbot Huldrich renewed, and the League also, ioyning himselfe more strictly vnto the foure Cantons, the cause was thus. Sometimes before, the Citizens of Saint Gall, they of Appenzel, and the subiects of the Abbot, had conspired together, and ruined the abbey of Rosach, which the Abbot had newly builded. So that the foure Cantons hauing sent for the other Cãtons to theyr assistance, reseated the Abbot in his rites, and reproued his aduersaries very stoutly. This association endureth yet to this day, and although al the Cantons are not at agreement with the Abbot, as concerning matter of Religion; yet notwithstanding, according vnto the articles of alliance, they send him a Captaine, who manageth and gouerneth ciuill causes, conseruing (in this regard) the rights and priuiledges of the Abbot.

Abbot Huldrich renewed the league with the four Cantons, and more strictly.

Couenants of alliance kept, though not in Religion all alike.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Towne or City of S. Gall.

THE Citie of Saint Gall, oweth her originall and encreasing to the Abbey, and hath beene enfranchised by the Emperours, who vnited it to the Empire, and gaue it many priuiledges and immunities. In the time of the Emperour Arnould, the citie began first to be enclosed with walles: as fearing the courses and surprizals of the Hungarians, and both it and the Couent were vnder the Empires protection. The cittie was subiect vnto the Abbey in many things: meane while, the citizens had their rites, which they augmented by their industry, & by means of the Emperors liberalities. Now, when the number of cittizens, and the riches of the Abbey beganne to increase: many debates and conten tions also tooke Original, betweene the abbot and the citizens. Oftentimes, the Townes round about it, and the Imperial cham- set them at agreement again. Sometime likewise, they were glad to satisfie the Abbots demands with money, and encreased their liberties, by buying their rightes of him. But when they of Appenzel moued warre against Abbot Cuno de Stouffen; the men of S. Gall beganne to take part with the Abbot, and got nothing for their labour but blovves, vvhich caused them (soone after) to make alliance vvith them of Appenzel. This vvarre being ended, and some other after, abbot Landberg, being made a fellow-Bourgesse vvith with foure Cantons · the cittizens of S. Gall, to maintaine themselues by the like expedient, entred perpetual alliance with Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Suits, Zug, and Glaris. This alliance was sworne on the Eue of S. Iohn Baptist, in the yeare, 1454. And they of Saint Gall made a publicke banket for the Ambassadors of the Cantons, whereat were present aboue fifteene hundred men. Before this alliance, they were leagued with some Cantons for certaine yeares: as with Zurich, Constance, and Schaffouse, in the yeares, 1312. and 1347. And at other times often with Zurich and Constance. Afterward, with Zurich, Berne Vri, Suits, & Vnderuald, in the yeare 1329. But I haue purposely omitted those alliances made for so short times, contenting my selfe onely with this last mentioned, which continueth to this day

CHAP. XX.

Of the Leagued Grisons.

Concerning the antiquitie of the Grisons, beeing sometime called Rhetians, of the captain Rhætus.

IT is generally agreed on that the people of the Grisons are very ancient. For some ages before the birth of our Sauior Iesus Christ, the Tuscans beeing driuen from their houses bythe Gauls they possessed the Alpes, vnder conduct of their captain, named Rhætus, for whose sake they called themselues Rhætians. Heretofore this country extended it selfe greatly in length & largenes, so that the Romane Emperors made two Rhætian Prouinces, named the first & second Rhætia: which comprehended not onely the Alpine regions, but also a great part of Suaba & Bauaria. Now, it is well knowne, that this first Rhætia beginneth at § sourse of Rheine, & taketh a sufficient great quarter of the Alpes, and all the valleyes on both the sides. Almost all the people ther are (to this day) called Grisons; and in former times they were tearmed Gris: as likewise the Allmains gaue them the same name, & call them beside, Graw-punder, that is to say, Leagued Grisons. For, in regard that these Rhætians are Leagued, not onely with the Switzers, but also among themselues, and that of verie long time, we call them Leagued Grisons, & sometimes the Switzers names them simply, Punder, that is, Confederates.

Diuersitie of names giuen to the people of Rhætia.

Three seueral Leagues of the Grisons.

Wee are to obserue three leagues of the Grisons. The first tooke name of her antiquity, and of the scituation of the countrey: for they called it, The High League, or high Grisons. It containeth nine teene Communities or Fellowshippes, among whom (heeretofore) the Abbot of Dissentiss, and the Baron of Rhætia, & the Count of Misauk held the cheefest ranke; but the families of the 2. latter are expired. Neuertheless, among them in common, they which possesse the Castle of the ancient Barons of Rhætia, are called Lords of Rhætzurs, a title which (some short while after) the Lordes of Marbrée took; and after them, they which are named Plantes. They of Tauetscher, Liuiner, and Masoxertal are the principall people of this league.

1. The High Leauge, or high Grisons.

The second is called, The league of Gods house. I thinke it to be so termed, because the byshop of Coire is comprized in this league. It also comprehendeth nineteene Communities; two whereof doe speake the Germane Language; the other, vse the Rhætian or Grison, which is their mother tongue, & cometh neere to the Italian. The principal people of this league are the city of Coire, which is the bishops See. Also they of Pregaul and of Engadin, out of which countries run two renowned riuers, to wit, Etsch and Inn.

2. The league of gods house or of the Hospitall.

The third league hath ten Communities, and is called, The League of ten Iurisdictions. Therein are comprized them of Rhuchemberg, and of Tunlesch. The former two leagues had (at the beginning) amity and alliance a certaine time, vvith the Cantons neerest to them. For, in the yeare, 1419. the byshop, the Chapter, & the cittie of Coire, made Allyance vvith them of Zurich for one and fiftie yeeres. Also, they were sometimes allyed vvith them of Glaris. And the Grisons of the high league, wer long time confederated with them of Vri. Then after, with them of Gods house they made a perpetuall alliance vvith seauen of the Cantons. But the thirde League is not comprized in this alliance, and yet notwithstanding do entertaine this amity and ſociety with the confederates, euen as firmely and faithfully, as if they ſtood ſolemnly bound thereto.

Alliance of the Griſons with the Switzers, and vpon what occaſions.

First then, in the yeare 1497. the high league, more properly called, The Griſon league, made perpetuall alliance with ſeauen Cantons: and the yeare following, the league of Gods-houſe ioyned it ſelfe with them, by this occaſion following. Some yeares before, the league of Gods-House had had certaine great differences, with the dwellers in the county of Tyroll. In the end, by the will of the Emperour Maximillian, it was decreed; that the parties ſhould chuſe an equall number of Iudges, to take knowledge of their variance, and that Thomas, Biſhop of Conſtance, ſhould be Arbitrator aboue all the Iudges. But while the Councellers to the King delayed to end this diſcord, the Biſhop of Conſtance dyed: and in his ſtead, Maximillian ſubrogated Fredericke, Biſhop of Ansbourg. But the Kings councellers taking no knowledge of this other Arbitrator, prolonged (from day to day) the deciſion of the ſuite, as before they had done: all this while molleſting the Griſons, and charging them ſtill with nouell impoſitions.

A great difference between the league of Gods-houſe, and them of Tyroll.

The Griſons depute two of each league for ending their caule.

They perceiuing no ceſſation, deputed two of each league, and ſent to Inſpruk, inſiſting, that this difference ſhould end, according to the order of the Emperour Maximillian. Which the councellers pretended not to know, albeit diuers of them, and (among the reſt) the chancellor was preſent when the decree was ſet downe. Yet notwithſtanding, becauſe the Deputies ſhould not bee ſent backe without anſwer; they aſſigned a day at Velcure, in Lent the next yeare enſuing. In the meane while, they of Auſtria planted Garriſons vpon the Frontiers, and ſtrong Artillery in diuers places, making (vnder hand) their preparation for warre. For they had appointed that day expreſſely, becauſe they would ſet vpon them at vnawares, & vtterly ouerthrow the Griſons, no way ſtanding on their guard: wherein the Biſhop of Coire lent his helping hand to them of Auſtria. But the league of Gods-Houſe, hauing diſcouered the enemies intent; ſent men to the cantons, who kept then a day at Zurich, and gaue them to vnderſtand this eminent danger.

Cunning trickes, and fit for ſuch to vſe, as deſire to oppreſſe the peoples liberty.

The Ambaſſadors declared, that beſide the olde quarrels, new differences were moued, betweene them of Auſtria and the Switzers, ſo that there grew an appearance of warre: therefore for the profit & ſecurity both of the Switzers & Griſons, it ſeemed good, that they ſhould be allied together. For by that meanes, the Griſons ſhold eaſily expell the enemy out of their country: although they gaue them but little ayde, or almoſt none at all. On the other ſide, the Switzers ſhould haue a Bulwarke to back them, and ſo might the more ſtrongly make head againſt the enemy. The Cantons, who had bin well affected to the Griſons before, and knew thoſe Mountaine-bred men, to bee a warlike diſpoſed people, and how beneficiall this alliance wold be both to the one and other: concluded and eſtabliſhed a perpetuity of loue with the Griſons, in the yeare 1498. and the Moneth of December, and the Articles of the alliance are theſe that follow.

An offer of alliance betweene the Switzers and Griſons.

A perpetuall league of loue with the Griſons.

The Articles of alliance, betweene the Switzers and the Griſons.

For friendſhip and aſsiſtance

1. Firſt, that they ſhall be friends, & giue mutuall ſuccour one to another.

Agreeing of controuerſies.

2. The ſecond Article concerneth the agreeing of differences, which may happen betweene confederates.

No ſelling of debts.

3. The third is, that no man ſhall giue or ſell away, thoſe actions that he hath againſt his debter, or the anſwerer, or ſurety for him.

For food and trading.

4. The fourth concerneth victualles, according to one anothers trading: And to bee freely in the Markets, without ſtanding bound to pay any new tributes.

For new alliances, & making of peace.

5. That neither the one nor other ſide, ſhall make any new alliance, wherein theſe Articles ſhall be compriſed, but with exceptions: And that in times of warre, the one ſide ſhall not make peace, except the other be therin comprehended alſo.

Theſe are the Articles and principall points of the alliance. But the yeare following, the warre of Suaba happened, wherein the Griſons valiantly defended their Frontiers, againſt the men of Auſtria. And by the ayde of their people, many times in like manner, and by the aſſiſtance of the Switzers, diuers braue battailes were were wonne against the enemy. Yet after these victories hapning on either side, peace was (at length) made in the citty of Basile, with the Emperor Maximillian; in which peace, the Grisons are also comprised. By this meanes, the beginning of the alliance was wholesome and happy to both parties, and afterward, in many wars where the Switzers were present, vnder wages of strange Princes their confederates: the Grisons alwayes marched as kinde companions with them.

Peace made in the citty of Basile, for the Switzers and Grisons.

It came to passe, that in the yeare one thousand, fiue hundred, thirty and one: Iohn Iaques de Medicis, who afterward was Marquesse of Marignano, getting vsurped possession of the Castle of Muß, vpon the Lake of Coma, and hauing taken Clauenna from the Grisons, forraging the country thereof: many Cantons, according to their league of alliance, sent succour to the Grisons: by meanes whereof, the enemy was ouercome at last, and driuen far off. In our time, the Grisons were allied with the French, and with the cantons of Swetia, and went to warre together for the King: yet in such sort neuertheless, that they send oftentimes a regiment separated of the Switzers, & which hath his Colonell & Captaine in chiefe.

CHAP. XXI.

The Alliance of the Valaisians, or people of Valois.

THE name of Valaisians, or them of Valois, comprehendes three distinct people, enclosed within the most high Mountaines, and dwelling in the Valley, from the sourse of Rheine, so farre as the Lake * Lemanus. They were anciently called Viberines, Seduſians, or Seguſians, some say, Sebuſians, and Veragrians. At this day, the Viberines and Seduſians, are called the high Valaisians, and are diuided into seuen Dioceſſes, or Wards of ten Parishes. The Veragrians, or lowe Valaisians, are subiects to the other: but the Bishop of Sion is Prince of all the country, hauing the soueraignty both temporall and spirituall, and he is called Count, or Gouernor of Valois. We haue described in another Tract, apart by it selfe, not onely this Valley, but likewise all the most remarkable things of the Valaisians.

A description of Valais or Valois.

* A Lake of the Allobroges by Geneua and Lausanna.

The Bishop of Sion is Count and Gouernor of Valais or Valois.

Fiue Wardes or Dioceſſes of the Valaisians, made first alliance with Lucerna, Vri, and Vnderuald, in the yeare 1417. They were then in warre against a Bishop, named William de Raron, and his Father Guiscard, whom they had (by a popular tumult) forced from their houses. The Bernians gaue assistance to the Bishop and his Father, who were of their Bourgesses: And for this cause the Valaisians desiring to haue succour elsewhere: allied themselues with the fore-named 3. Cantons. Now fearing leste this might be an occasion of breeding quarrell betweene the Bernians, and the three Cantons allied with the Valaisians: the other cantons, who were as neuters to the businesse, laboured so earnestly, that the difference was pacified, and the Lords of Raron re-established in their goods. Before this alliance, the Valaisians had made one (for the space of ten yeares) with them of Berne, in the yeare 1250. Againe, after this warre, they contracted another alliance (for certaine time) with the Bernians. But in the yeare 1475. they made a league defensiue and offensiue. And in the same yeare when wee wrote this History (to wit, 1575.) an hundred yeares being expired, after the beginning of this league: they renewed and confirmed it on eyther part, by magnificent Ambassadors. Two yeares before they were leagued with the Bernians, they made a certaine agreement with them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald.

Guillaume de Raron and Guiscard his father.

Contracted alliances of the Valaisians with the Bernians.

To conclude, in our time, vpon great differences mooued, concerning matters of Religion, Ceremonies, life and manners of the Cleargy, whereof reformation was required, Swetia being diuided into contrary parts; Adrian, Bishop of Sion, and seuen Wardes of the Valaisians, in the yeare 1533. made alliance with seauen Cantons, in the Towne of Fribourg, which Cantons made profession of the Roman Religion, as namely, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, Fribourg, and Solleurre. In this Alliance (ouer & beside that which is vsed in the other) it was especially agreed, that they should aide one another, to maintaine the vsed and approued Religion, to wit, that of the Romane Church, against all them that would depriue or violence it.

CHAP. XXII.

Of. Rotwill, or Rotuill.

Opinions concerning the name of Rotwill, or Rotuill, which is an Imperiall Towne or Citty.

SOme haue imagined, that Taxgatium, whereof Ptolomy speaketh in his Geography, was Rotwill or Rotuill, which Glareanus calleth Erythropolis, hauing changed the Aleman or Germane word, into a Greek word: but they much deceiue themselues. For Ptolomy placeth Taxgatium in the country of the Grisons, and Rotuille is scituated beyond Danubius in Germany, on the left side of the Riuer Nicra, and very neere to the Spring-head of both those Floods or Riuers. This citty is sufficiently renowned among the Imperials, for therein is a chamber of the Empire, which is vulgarly called Hofgricht, whereunto all the round neighbouring countries resort, for causes of appeale. Such as are contumacious, and fayle of their appearance there; are sent (by sentence of the Iudges) into banishment from the Empire. It is said, that this chamber was established by the Emperor Conrad the third, and that it is 424. yeares since.

The first alliance of them of Rotuille with the cantons.

The first alliance that they of Rotuille made with the Switzers, was in the time of the Emperor Fredericke the third, in the yeare 1463. This alliance was renewed diuers times betweene them. At last, in the yeare 1519. they contracted perpetuall alliance with all the Cantons of the Switzers. During the warre of Suaba, they of Rotuille (engirt with enemies on all sides) shewed themselues alwayes faithfull to the Switzers; offering them amiably and liberally all their riches and men: which the Switzers could not accept, but onely desired them, to defend their citty against the enemy. Now in regard that Rotuille is scituated along the limits of Swetia, and that succour cannot bee brought to one another, but with danger, considering, they must passe through other mens lands: the alliance speaketh expressely, that they must be carefull for drawing any war vpon them, or vpon any of their confederates.

Rotuille is scituated thorough the midst of Swetia.

A breuiate of the Articles of alliance betweene them and the Cantons.

And first of all, It is said, that they may not make war with any whosoeuer, without the knowledge and consent of the Cantons. They shall giue no succour to any person out of Swetia, without the will and consent of the Cantons. Moreouer, if they would haue reason by Arms, for any iniury or out-rage done vnto thē; they must attempt nothing, but by aduice of the Cantons. If their enemies will vndergoe iudgement, such as the Cantons shall thinke to be honest and equall: the men of Rotuille must also consent therto. If warre chance to bee moued among the cantons; they of Rotuille are to follow that part, which the most part of voyces do allow. The cantons are to conserue (with all their power) the Imperial chamber of Rotuille; which (in the mean while) shall vse no authority against the Switzers, or any of them. And if any stranger shall cite or summon thether a Switzer; they are to make knowne, and he likewise, how farre he is to bee defended by priuiledge. In breefe, they are not to molleste any Switzer in that iurisdiction.

The Imperiall Chamber of Rotuille, to be powerfully defended.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Mulhouse.

The situation and nomination of Mulhouse.

Mvlhouse is a Towne in the county of Ferrara, or (as some do hold opinion) in the Territory of Basile. It is thoght that in ancient times it was called Ariabinium. For in the Guide or Directer of wayes, appointed by Antonius Augustus; this place is set betweene Augusta Rauraca (which is Basile) and Vruncim, which some do thinke to be called at this day, Ensheym; then Mount Brissac, Heluetum, and Strasbourg are named. In times of antiquity, Mulhouse was in number of the Imperiall townes: but the Bishop of Strasbourg was Gouernor thereof, also of the Towne Mulhouse one of the Imperiall Townes.

Towne of Colmar. It came to paſſe, that warre happened betweene Raoul of Habſpourg, and the Biſhop of Strasbourg, wherein Mulhouſe was taken from the Biſhop, & the Caſtle ruined. After which time, Mulhouſe was againe re-obtained, and numbred among the Imperiall Cities and Townes.

Her firſt alliance with the Switzers, was made about the yeare 1464. For in regard that the neighboring Gentlemen molleſted the Towne, and narrowly watched all occaſions to aſſault it: the cittizens made alliance with them of Berne, for fifteene yeares, as alſo with Fribourg and Solleurre, and by meanes of the Bernians interceſſion, the other ſeuen Cantons tooke the Towne into their protection. Which proued ſo diſpleaſing to the Noble-men, that theſe priuate enmities conuerted themſelues (ſoone after) into open warre: which cauſed the Switzers immediately, to ſend and plant Garriſons in Mulhouſe. Afterward, all the Cantons brought their troopes into the field, and came with great aſſiſtance to releeue Mulhouſe.

Aliance made with Berne for fifteene yeares, and other.

In the end, hauing beſiedged the towne of Waldshout, appertaining to the houſe of Auſtria: they compelled the Gentlemen, to come to ſome equall conditions of peace. Afterward, they of Mulhouſe were receiued for fellow-Bourgeſſes with them of Baſile, and thereby more ſtrictly vnited to the Switzers. Nine yeares after, the 19. day of Ianuary, they made alliance with all the thirteene cantons. The conditions were all alike to the alliance of Rotuille, as well in regard of warres, as leagues with ſtrangers.

Alliance with all the thirteen Cantons

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of Bienne.

The ſituation and eſtate of Bienna.

Bienne is at the ende of a very pleaſant Lake, abounding with plenty of fiſh & round engirt (on all ſides) with goodly Vineyards. It is vnder the gouernment of the Biſhop of Baſile; and yet it enioyeth lawes and regiment a part by it ſelfe, as alſo liberall frãchiſes and priuiledges.

The firſt alliance of thẽ of Bienna, was made with the men of Berne, in the yeare 1303. to ridde the country of certaine robbers and theeues, which wandred there in ſo great numbers, as almoſt no way had any ſecurity for paſſage. In this alliance, they of Strasbourg, Baſile, Fribourg and Solleurre were alſo comprized. Three years after, in regard of ſome great differences, which they had with their neighbours: they made a particular alliance with the Bernians. Their third alliance was made in Anno 1352. and fifteen yeares after, becauſe Iohn de Viana, Biſhop of Baſile, (a man of turbulent ſpirit) wold not ſuffer any of his neighbours to liue in quiet: they of Bienna, deſirous to prouide for their owne eaſe and tranquility, ioyned themſelues more ſtrictly with the men of Berne, by giuing each to other the right of fellow-Bourgeſſes. The Biſhop very angry at this vnion, muſtred together ſome troopes of horſe, and (at vnawares) ranne vpon them of Bienna, and clapt vp in priſon the Authors of this aſſociation.

Iohn de Viana Biſhop of Baſile, a man troubleſome to his neighbours.

When the men of Berna heard of this deede, they came to ſuccour their fellow Bourgeſſes, tooke (by force) the Caſtle, which the Byſhop had in Bienna, ſet the priſoners at liberty, and made warre vpon the Byſhoppe, as alſo on them of Solleurre, his aſſociates. In this warre, they tooke and ruined many places, which were in ſubiection to the byſhop.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Geneua.

Eneua is the laſt and vtmoſt Cittie of the Allobroges, of which (amongſt other of Antiquity,) Cæſar hath made mention in his Commentaries.

Iulius Cæſar in comment. lib. 1

Iul. Cæſ. in com. Lib. 1. The ſcituation and antiquitie of Geneua.

It is neere to the limits of the Switzers, at the end of the Lake Lemanus, and an iſſue of Rhone commeth into it. Not onely the words of Julius Cæſar, but alſo many antiquities there found, do teſtifie the ancientneſſe of the citty. Many famous Monuments might haue beene ſeene there, but that the citty was oftentimes ruined by enemies, and much deſtroyed and defaced by fire. For I finde in ancient chronicles, that in the time of Heliogabalus, Geneua was embraced with ſo fierce a fire, as hardly was any one houſe to be found, that ſtood free from it. The Emperour Aurelianus reſtored the citty againe, being ſo pitifully diſfigured, granted it great priuiledges, and gaue it the right of Fairs, and of the Empire, becauſe it was ſcituated moſt commodiouſly. Hee called it Aurelia, according to his owne name: but after his death, ſhe took her ancient name againe. Afterward, it was forradged (as many other citties were) by diuers barbarous Nations, intruding themſelues into France. And ſome 250. yeares after, or thereabout, within the ſpace of 7. yeares, fire tooke it in ſuch terrible manner, as the moſt part of the citty was quite ruined.

Geneua called by the name of Aurelia.

The Biſhoppricke of Geneua, in former times had very ample priuiledges & franchiſes: yet notwithſtanding, the cittizens held their liberties to themſelues, and alwayes carefully conſerued theyr leagues perpetuall with the Biſhop, according as they were left vnto them by their anceſtors. The Counts of Geneway were great enemies to their liberties: who (neuertheleſſe) were vaſſailes of the Biſhoppricke, and held their Earledomes of him by fealty. So in like manner were the Counts of Sauoye; but the cittizens maintained their rights and priuiledges couragiouſly againſt the Counts.

The Countes of Geneway and of Sauoye, great enimies to the liberties of the cittizens of Geneua.

In the yeare 1420. when Amias, the firſt Duke of Sauoye, laboured to obtain of Pope Martin, by way of enterchange, the right and ſuperiority (as they call it) ouer the citty of Geneua: the Biſhop named Iohn de Pierre-ſcize, made an agreement for him, and all his ſucceſſors with the cittizens, that he nor they ſhould at any time conſent, that the liberties of Geneua ſhould be exchanged or alienated. If eyther he, or any of his ſucceſſors did otherwiſe; the cittizens might hold and ranke him or them in the number of traitors and conſpiring enemies. Some while after this, the Emperor Maximillian, hauing amply publiſhed his Sonne in law, Philebert, Duke of Sauoye, Vicar of the Empire in thoſe parts: then againe, Philebert and his brother Charles, ſtroue to ſubiect Geneua vnder their awe, pretending the title of this new right, and priuiledges of the Vicarſhip, giuen in former times to the Counts of Sauoye, by the Emperour Charles the fourth. Who (notwithſtanding) tooke from Count Amias, all action, power, iuriſdiction, and preheminence, ouer the citty and territory of Geneua.

An agreement made betweene the Biſhop and cittizens of Geneua, concerning the liberties of the Citty.

While theſe practiſes and conſpiracies of the neighbouring Princes laſted, they of Geneua maintained themſelues heedfully in amity with the Switzers, and (diuers times) made alliance with the Bernians and Fribourgers, for certain years. At length, they combined alliance and fellow-Bourgeſhip perpetually, with thē of Berne, and confirmed it more ſtrictly, in the yeare 1536. Then in regard of the religions alteration, the Duke of Sauoye, and the Biſhop of Geneua, made war vpon the cittizens, they being ſuccoured by them of Berne. This alliance hath bene (ſince then) renewed, and many friendly motions made, to allie Geneua with the Cantons: but I know no reaſon, why it is nor executed and done.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of New-Caſtle.

THE Citty of New-Caſtle, is ſeated in the country of the Auantici, vpon the lake which is called the Lake of New-Caſtle, at the head whereof is another little Towne, called Yuerdun. New-Caſtle is both a citty and country, and the Count thereof was choſen by ſucceſſion of the Counts of New-Caſtle: but ſince, falne to the Counts of Hochberg, the Marqueſſe of Rotelin, and to two Dukes of Longueuille. During the warre betweene King Lewes the twelfth, and the Switzers, the men of Berne (in name

The eſtate of New-caſtle, being both a City & County in the ancient country of the Auantici.

name of all the cantons their confederates) possessed themselues of the citty of New-castle, and of the whole county, and placed there a Gouernor. This order the other cantons continued, except that of Zurich, who hauing lost their ranke: at the returne of it to their turne againe, they should command at New-castle two yeares together.

A Gouernor placed in New-castle by the Cantons.

But when the time drew neere, Ione of Hochberg, widdow to the Duke of Longueuille, preuailed so much, as (with certaine conditions) the county was surrendred back againe, in the yeare 1529. Somtime before, this county had beene allied from the Cantons of Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solleurre by meanes of some Articles, which were confirmed againe vpon this restoring or surrender. At this day, the counties of New-castle are particularly allied with the men of Berne, or the Bernians.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of those people that are gouerned (in common) by the Cantons of the Switzers.

WEe haue appointed for a third part of our Switzers common-wealth, those people that are gouerned (in common) by the Switzers. It is necessary then, to say some-what of the time, and by what title, they became subiects to the Switzers. Among them there are some Townes, which wee may tearme stipendaries: because (at their own proper costs and charges) they march along in warre with the Switzers. Neuertheless, they gouerne themselues by their owne lawes, and make election of their Magistrates; & yet the maine soueraignty appertaineth to the Switzers, to whose Lawes and Edicts, those Townes stand bound to obey. Anciently they belonged to the house of Austria, but during the warres against that house, the Switzers became Masters of the neighbouring countries, and these Townes yeelded themselues to them vpon certaine conditions; to wit, that they should be as well subiect to them, as to the house of Austria, their ancient priuiledges saued and excepted. Those Towns are Bada, Bremgarten, Frauenfeld, Mellingen, and Rasperwill.

The cause & reason of this instant argument.

A good and singular kinde of gouernmẽt and well obserued among them in those parts.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of Bada.

Bada is a Towne vppon the Riuer Limagus, or Limmathus, and so called, in regard of hot waters, whereof there are many Welles or Fountaines in that place, whereunto men and women vse to resort (in great numbers) from diuers countries. For this cause some haue called it the Towne of Baths, others, the Castle. According to custome of our Elders, who called Baths, those places where there were hot Springs and Fountaines: so may wee tearme this, the Switzers Baths. As in Italy there are the Baths of Statiell, and others: In France, the Baths of Aix, of the Conuenes, and of the Tarbes. In Germany, the Baths of Spach or Spaw, and of Aix. In like manner, Bada, a Towne of the Marquisate of Bada, in a certaine inscription, is named, The Bathes: And in the inscription of Wettingen, they of Bada are called, The cittizens of the Baths.

Hot waters or Baths belonging to the Switzers.

Of Baths in diuers countries,

In England likewise is a Towne of Baths.

This Towne is one of the most ancient of Swetia, by the testimony of Cornelius Tacitus, who tearmeth it a Towne or Citty, hauing in abundance, and with great pleasure, very wholesome waters. The same Author saith, that the Romans took notice of a Garrison in the Castle of Bada, and reputed it selfe to be a Garrison: for the Mountaines which close & ioyne together in that quarter, do locke vp the country. To passe out of Germany and Swetia into France, and into Italy, wee must goe through Bada, then ouer the lands of Zurich; from thence into the country of Ergow, and thwart ouer Swetia. In ancient times, this Towne had two Castles, one seated vpon an high Rocke, which is nothing now at this day, but old decayed ruines (being spoyled and defaced by the Switzers, as we shall declare anon.) And the other at an end of a bridge, where where (in our time) dwelt the Bayliffes or Gouernours, which were ſent thither by the Cantons. Bada hath had (in former times) Counts, the race whereof are quite extinct, and their ſucceſſors haue bene the Lords of Habſpourg, who ioyned that County to the houſe of Auſtria, and diuers other goods. But from the houſe of Auſtria, Bada came into the Switzers hands, at the time of the Councel of Conſtance, in manner following.

Bada ioyned to the houſe of Auſtria, & reuolued to the Switzers.

Fredericke of Auſtria, brought Pope Iohn the 22. out of the Councell, & maintained him againſt the Emperour and the Councell. For which cauſe, by the Decree of the Councell, he was excommunicated, baniſhed from the Empire, and his goods confiſcated. The Emperour himſelfe, with an aſſembled Army, from the Townes and Citties of Germanie and Suaba, the Duke of Bauaria, and ſome others, made warre vpon him. Alſo commandement was giuen to the Switzers, on behalfe both of the Emperour and the Councell to aſſaile Frederick with al their forces. Whereof they made refuſall, alledging that they could not doe it, and their honor ſaued: in regard of the peace formerly made (for fifty yeares following) with them of Auſtria; confirmed by Oath and Letters Patents. The Fathers of the Councell made anſwere to this excuſe of the Switzers: that Fredericke was an enemy to the Church, excommunicated and baniſhed by publike order: This warre concerned the good of ỹ Church, who was offended and iniuried (in her members) by Frederick.

By what meanes Bada came into the power of the Switzers.

A Councel of war, & their anſwer returned vnto the Switzers.

Wherefore, if in this cauſe the Switzers vndertooke Armes, according to the command of the Emperour, they ſhould do a good and holy worke. They ſhould alſo well conſider with themſelues, how much it woulde wounde their honour, if (in contrary oppoſition) they continued idle excuſes, which would wrap them vp in the ſame cenſure and condemnation with Frederick. Ouer and beſide all this, according to the aduice of the Ambaſſadors of England, Denmarke, Sweden, Norway, Bohemia, Polonia, and Princes, Gentlemen, and Lawyers, the Emperour declared, that the Switzers might (vvith a good and ſafe conſcience) make warre vppon Fredericke, notwithſtanding the peace made. Becauſe that the Subiects of the Empire, in all actions doe except expreſſely or couertly, the right and Maieſty of the Emperor.

In the ſelfe-ſame councell it was decreed, that men did not ſtande bound to keepe Faith with them that were called heretikes.

The Emperor ſent a copy of this areſt and decree to the Switzers, enioyning them againe to make war on Fredericke, and by the ſame meanes adiudged to the empire, all that which they of Auſtria had engaged to them before. Promiſing alſo, not to make any peace with Fredericke, til the Switzers were firſt reintegrated into their former agreement. The Switzers being then perſwaded with ſuch reaſons, leuied their Armes; but becauſe they were to Warre in the name of the Emperor, and of the Romane Empyre, they demanded wages of the Emperour: declaring, there was no reaſon, that they ſhould furniſh themſelues at theyr owne charge, and the fruite of the victory fall into other mens hands; and that theyr wealth was not ſufficient to furniſh ſuch expences.

A Copy of the Decree ſent by the Emperour to the Switzers

The Switzers demand wages of the Emperor for their ſeruice.

The Emperour thought this demand to be made in equity: neuertheleſſe, becauſe he was ſomewhat empty of money, hee agreed with the Switzers, that all the goodes of the houſe of Auſtria, which they poſſeſſed already, or could conquer in this warre; they ſhould enioy it in the Empires name, vntil they ſhould be paid their wages, and charges during the war. By eſpeciall Letters, the Emperor exhorted them of Zurich to enter the field, and granted them (in title of Fee) the Countrey which is beyond Mount Albius, named the Free Prouince, which they of Auſtria held. According heereto, the yeare one thouſand, foure hundred, and fifteene, about the fifteenth day of April, the men of Zurich, with their troops well prepared; went to beſiedge a Towne ſeated on the Riuer of Ruſs, named Mellingen and on the third day tooke it by compoſition. From thence they went to Bremgarten, where the Cantons of Suits & Zug ioyned with them. They of Bremgarten, (by example of the other) yeelded thẽſelues to the Switzers, vnder protection of the Empire.

The Emperors Letters to them of Zurich.

The Conqueſts of the Switzers.

At the ſame time, the Lucernians tooke a Towne named Surſey. The Bernians, aſsiſted by them of Solleurre, Bienna, the County of New-caſtle, and ſome others beſide, got into their power Zofingen, Arberg, Arow, Lentzbourg & Brug, to-together with the country of Ergow. As for them of Zurich, after they had taken the forenamed Townes, they beſiedged Bada. All the other Cantons, except Bern ioynd with them, for they of Auſtria held no place in Swetia of greater ſtrēgth then this: and the Garriſon of Bada had much ouer-trauelled the Switzers, eſpecially them of Zurich, and this was the reaſon, that the Cantons reſolued to force both the Towne and Caſtle. As for the towne, after it had beene beaten with the Cannon, for the ſpace of three weekes, without ceaſing, it yeelded. But the ſoldiours ſtill defended themſelues in regard of the fortreſſe, and held out well, after redditi-on of the Towne. The Switzers on the other ſide, hauing receiued ſuccour from them of Berne, did dayly beate the place, and preſſed the Garriſon to yeelde themſelues. At length, the Souldiers hauing no more ſtones, arrowes, darts, nor anie other munition proper for defence, truce being granted for ſome dayes: vpon condition, that if within a limited time Fredericke of Auſtria did not deliuer thē from this ſiedge, they would quit the place, and deliuer the caſtle into the power of the Switzers.

The towne of Bada is yeelded vp to the Switzers.

The Caſtle of Bada vpon conditions of deliuery.

While theſe things were in working; by the interceſſion of the Duke of Bauaria, and the Burggraue of Nuremberg, Fredericke was reconciled to the Emperor Sigiſmond, who ſent immediately his Ambaſſadours to the campe of the Switzers, to giue them command for the ceaſing of warre. But the Switzers feeling yet the outrages which the Garriſon of Bada had done vnto them, ſo ſoon as the truce time was expired, ſo preſſed them within, that two dayes after Pentecoſt, the caſtle was deliuered to them, which they burned and quite ruined, as ſoone as the enemy had auoided it. On the Morrow, the Count of Togge, Ambaſſadour from the Emperor, being arriued at the Switzers campe, to command them agayne, that they ſhould giue ouer armes, found the caſtle to be taken and ſpoyled. This ſtrooke ſomewhat deadly vnto the Noble mens hearts: but they had no occaſion to complaine, becauſe the Switzers had done nothing, but in caſe of open & lawfull warre.

Subtle deuices to breake the blowes of the Switzers, and to holde their liberties dayly bridled.

A counter-ſtratagem of the Switzers.

Then, as the Emperor was ready to go for Spain, to fetch thence Pierre de Lune, that he might be Pope, who afterwardes was called Benet the eleuenth; beeing in need of money, becauſe his cofers vvere emptied (hauing disburſed great payes, without any intermiſſion in the precedent warres, and for the affaires of the Councell) he engaged to them of Zurich, Bada, Bremgarten, Mellingen, Surſey, and the Lands to them belonging. Alſo to them of Berne, the country of Ergow, vvhich they had taken, as already hath beene declared: yet paying a great ſum of crowns. At this day, the country of Ergow is poſſeſſed by them of Berne onely. The yeare following, they of Zurich made a part of that which was ingaged to them, ouer to the Cantons of Lucerna, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, and Glaris.

The Emperor engageth lāds to them of Zurich, and of Berne.

From the beginning, the men of Vri vvould not haue any part; as thinking, that the detention of theſe places, contradicted the treaty of peace made vvith Fredericke. But after they vnderſtood the reaſons of their confederates, who proteſted (in themſelues) the ſame deſire of obſeruing the peace: but that by commaund of the Emperor, and of the Councel, they vndertooke armes. Next, that by the will and conſent of them both, they poſſeſſed now thoſe places for wages, and price of warre-ſeruice, and held them on the faith of the Emperor, the ſoueraigne Lorde; yet for a great ſumme of money, vvhich they had layd out & disburſed. The men of Vri hauing heard theſe Reaſons, and other of the like Nature, entred into part of this engagement. The Bernians alſo vvere receiued in at the length.

Vri ſtood free from all theſe partakings, til further information from their confederates.

Vri and Berne accepted into this combination at laſt.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of Bremgarten, and Mellingen.

Bremgarten is a Towne, ſituated on the Riuer of Ruſs, which encloſeth it in the midſt almoſt, in forme of a demy Iſland, a great Germane mile beneath Lucerna. It appeareth by the ancient priuiledges of this Towne, that it was (heretofore) numbred among the Imperials. Neuertheles, it became (afterwards) ſubiect vnto the Counts of Habſpourg, then to the Princes of of Auſtria deſcended of them. But it is not well knowne at what time, neyther by what title, they came to make themſelues Lords thereof.

A deſcription of the ſcituation of Mellingen.

Mellingen is a little ſmall Towne vpon the ſelfeſame Riuer, about half a German mile below Bremgarten. It hath alwayes beene vnder the dominion of the Counts of Habſpourg. Theſe two Towns were taken (as Bada) in this war which the Switzers made vnder the Empires name, and then afterward, the Emperour Sigiſmond pawned it to the Cantons: vpon condition, that all their ancient rightes, priuiledges, and cuſtomes, ſhould remain entire, and the Cittizens to yeelde the ſame dutie to the Cantons, as formerly they had done vnto the Counts of Habſpourg, and Princes of Auſtria their Lordes. At this very day, both theſe Townes are vnder gouernement of the eight firſt Cantons.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Raſperwill.

The forme & ſcituation of Raſperwill.

AS concerning Raſperwill, it is a town on the Lake of Zurich, wherin dwelt (ſometimes the Counts of Raſperwil, who had to their ſucceſſours the Countes of Habſpourg, that gouernd likewiſe in theſe quarters. In the yeare 1458. the Switzers became maſters thereof. There were then two factions in this town, the one of Auſtrians, and the other of Switzers. Duke Sigiſmond, tooke ſome of the Switzers partakers, and brought them as priſoners to Inſpruk. The reſt amazed at this deede, fled into Swetia; but by entermiſe of the Cantons, they all re-entred Raſperwill againe. For the Cantons proteſted out alowde, that they would come and aſſault the towne, except the priſoners might be enlarged, and the baniſhed receiued.

Two factions of Auſtrians and Switzers in Raſperwill.

How Raſperwill became ioyned to the Cantons, and ſo afterward continued.

It came to paſſe the yeare following, that the Switzers made warre on them of Conſtance, who had done them ſome deſpighfull outrages. Peace being made, as they of Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, and Glaris returned homeward to their houſes, they demanded victuals for their troopes, and paſſage thorow Raſperwil, which they eaſily obtained by the purſuite of their partakes. But, being entred more ſtrong, and in greater number then the Cittizens (the moſt part whereof were Switzers in affection) they compelled the Cittizens to ſweare fidelity to them. So that from that time, Raſperwill remained in the power of thoſe foure Cantons: who (neuertheleſſe) left the citizens to the ſame liberty as they had vnder the Dukes of Auſtria.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of Frawenfeld.

How the town came to be taken by the 7. Cantons.

TWo yeares after the taking of Raſperwill, the ſeauen Cantons then being in warre againſt Sigiſmond, Duke of Auſtria, tooke Frawenfeld, the chiefeſt town in all the country of Turgow. There were reaſons and occaſions enow, whereby this warre was vndertaken and attempted. The Duke had impriſoned Cardinall Cuſano, byſhoppe of Breſcia, and becauſe he did not releaſe him, ſo ſoone as Pope Pius (who formerly was named Æneas Syluius) ſent him command to doe it, hee was therefore excommunicated. But, becauſe this Thunder-bolte did not diſmay him, and he appealed from that ſentence, to the next Councell: the Pope commanded the Switzers to defend the Churches rightes, and to ſet vpon Sigiſmond. The Cantons, who had as much credite with the one, as vvith the other, obeyed the Popes command: but there happened other occaſions to induce this warre.

The cauſes that procured this warre.

The Pope commanded the warre.

The towne of Winterduer, in the countie of Kybourg, appertaining to the Canton of Zurich, was ſubiected to the Duke of Auſtria. There is euery yeare in that place a Fayre, on the day of Saint Gal, the ſixte of October, whereat the Countrey people round about doe meete in great numbers. They of Kybourg being come thither, the gates vver ſhut againſt them, vppon a ſiniſter ſuſpition of the inhabitants, that they of Zurich would ſurprize the Towne, during the Faire time, & had therefore made ſome preparation.

Small ſparkes can cauſe and kindle a great fire, and triuolous ſuſpition proue to produce great harme.

Now, as the Bayliffe eſtabliſhed by the Canton of Zurich in thoſe quarters, required that the Gates might be ſet open, and that they of Kybourg might haue free trading, according to theyr accuſtomd maner, promiſing that the town ſhould

One wrong or iniury draweth on another, and to no meane danger should receiue no endamagement; notwithstanding all this, no credite would be giuen vnto his words. As a counterchange of this iniury, they of Zurich prohibited their people from bringing either victuals or merchandizes to Winterduer. The Duke of Austria on the other side, standing vppon his guard, placed a garrison in the towne. These things happned before the excommunication from the Pope.

It is now called both Stiria and Austria.

But yet there was another occasion for the moouing of this warre. There were two brethren, Gentlemen of mark, of the country of Stiria, named Vigilius, and Bernard Gradlers. They of Austria, had inforced them from their houses, and despoyled them of all their goods: without excepting so much as the dowrie belonging to Bernards wife, who was of the house of Starckenberg. After they had sollicited the Duke a long time, to restore theyr goods againe, and neuer could obtain so much, as that hee would admit but vvhat iustice did allow: at length, they withdrew themselues into Swetia, and were receyued as Bourgesses into Zurich. Afterward, hauing brought a little town, called Eglisow: they made warre on the Duke of Austria, assisted by the men of Zurich. The Duke placed a new garrison at Winterduer, but after the troopes of Zurich were drawne thence: some difference fel betweene the Garrison, and the inhabitants of Kybourg. So that once more they of Zurich (hauing demanded succour of their confederates) went foorth into the fielde, going to besiedge Winterduer. At this time then, to wit, in the yeare, one thousand, foure hundred and sixty, Diessenhow, a Towne on the Rheine, in the country of Turgow, this country also, and Frawenfeld were conquered, and reduced vnder the power of the Switzers.

Violence and cruelty is deaf and will not heare any iustice.

A new Garrison is planted at Winterduer, which soon after was besiedged.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of the nine Baylywicks, or Gouernments.

The Baylywickes gouerned by the 7. first Cantons, and others with them.

THE common Baylywickes, are gouerned (in part) by the seauen first Cantons, and partly by some other with them. There are nine Baylywicks, or Gouernments in all, to wit; the Countie of Bada, the three Prouinces, Turgow, Sargans, the Rheguſces, that is to say, the valley of Rheine, which they call Rinthall, Lugano, Locarna, Mendrisa, and the vale Madia. The foure last are beyond the Alpes, in Italy, towards the Millainneses, & speak Italian; the other the Germane tongue. Sargans, and the valley of Rhinthall, are on the Frontiers of the Grisons: the other 3. are seated within the confines of ancient Swetia.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of Bada and Turgow.

The maner of their Conqueſt hath bin already declared.

IN this manner (then) were the Towne and County of Bada, Turgow, and Frawenfeld, by the Switzers conquered; at such times, and by those meanes, as formerly hath bene related. The Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suites, Vnderualde, Zug, Glaris, and Berne, commaunded at Bada. They are Lords of Turgow, except the Canton of Bern, which hath no part therein. As concerning the taking knowledge of criminall causes, the Emperour Sigismond tooke it from Frederick of Austria, at the time of the Councell of Constance, and engaged it to the City of Constance, which kepte it till the yeare 1499. when the Emperor Maximillian attributed that authority to the Switzers, by a treaty of peace which hee made with thē. And therefore the seuen first Cantons aboue named, are Lords of Turgow. But concerning the knowledge of crimes, appellations and fines or amercements, which may happen, as oftentimes they doe: that appertaineth to the tenne first Cantons, who made warre agaynst the Emperour Maximillian, and the League of Suaba.

Criminal causes took away by the Emp. Sigismond.

The authority belonging to the ten first Cantons.

CHAP. 34.

Of the three first Prouinces.

Concerning the scituation and true names of the free Prouinces.

NOW, to speake of the three Prouinces, which are along beyond the Riuer of Russ (to distinguish them from the free Prouince, beyond the Mountain Albius, which was giuen to them of Zurich, by the Emperor Sigismond, as we haue already declared before:) they were taken by the Switzers, at the very same time when when Bada was conquered. Heere let me tell you, that we call certaine Caſtles & Villages, which lye along the Riuer of Ruſs, both aboue and below Bremgarten, free Prouinces. This name was giuen them (in mine opinion) becauſe that the three villages, to wit, Meyenberg, Richenſee and Ergow, had anciently kept (each one) her iuriſdiction, Magiſtrates, and Officers by themſelues: ſo that they ſeemed as three ſeuerall Prouinces, nowe ioyned all into one. In times paſt, all that quarter was called the Countie of Rora, and ſo it was named by Henry the 5. Emperour, in a priuiledge of the Abbey of Muren. The caſtle belonging vnto the Countes of Rora, was in the Towne of Arow.

The reaſon why the name was thus giuē them, according to the authors opinion

At ſuch time, as (by command of the Emperor and the Councel of Conſtance) the Switzers made warre on Fredericke of Auſtria, they of Lucerna conquered thoſe places, which are along the Riuer of Ruſs, and namely that county of Rora. After the warre, when they contended vvho ſhould be Lords thereof only: the Cantons of Zurich, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, and Glaris oppoſed againſt them, and in diuers dayes held at Begkenried, Vnderuald, Suits, and in the campe before Bremgarten, they ſhewed, that (from the beginning of the warre) the Cantons had agreed, that they ſhould be Lords (in common) of all places in the countrey of Ergow, that ſhould be won in that Warre. Now, although the Lucernians maintained, that they had giuen charge thereof to their Ambaſſadors; yet notwithſtanding, after the teſtimonies were gathered both of the one ſide & other, the Lords of Berne beeing appointed iudges of the variance pronounced, that theſe 5. Cantons had part in all the country.

Some difference among the Cantons, concerning the conqueſt of the free Prouinces.

The Lucernians pleaded their Title in right of theyr Ambaſſadors.

Tenne yeares after that, by conſent of the ſixe Cantons, they of Vri were ioyned with them, and hadde a great part alſo in that gouernment. And therfore Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, and Glaris, are Lords thereof at this day. The countrey is not great; and therefore, of what Canton ſoeuer the Bayliffe is, hee makes not his reſidence there: but vvhen neceſſity doth ſo require, he comes once a yeare to iudge ſuites in law, and then he is lodged (moſt often) in the Abbey of Muren, which is rich enough, and well builded.

Vri ioyned with them ten yeeres after, & had a part in the gouernment.

CHAP. XXXV.

Of the Sargans.

AMong the Griſons, the Sarunetes liued long time ſince; but at this day, both their towne and countrey is vulgarly called Sargans, whereof diuers ætymologies are made. But in the auncients Chartes, this Towne is named Sarunegans, which is a word deriued from the name of Sarunetes, whereof Pliny maketh mention. Now, becauſe the dwelling of the Sarunetes was at the ſpring of the Riuer Inn, where now they of Engadin and of Munſtertal make their abiding; the inhabiting Sargans (now in queſtion) it may be, are yſſued from them there: or elſe might take their name of the Riuer called Sar, which runneth thorough the Towne.

The ſcituation of the Country and Town of Sargans, and diuerſitie of names therto belonging.

In former times, this countrey belonged to the Counts of Werdenberg, who in that reſpect were called Countes of Sargans. Afterward they pawned it vnto the Auſtrian Princes, and at another time to the Counts of Togge, but redeemed it againe, and poſſeſſed it til the yeare 1483. And then, George Count of Werdenberg, ſold it to the ſeuen firſt Cantons, who ſent a Bayliffe thither each one by his turne, that commanded the whole country, & kept in the caſtle where the Countes were wont to dwell. As for the Towne of Sargans, although it is ſubiect vnto the Switzers: yet notwithſtanding, it enioyeth hir priuiledges, and electeth Magiſtrates that adminiſter Iuſtice, and alſo deale in criminall cauſes.

The Counts of Werdenberg, Counts of Sargans.

Sargans ſolde to the Switzers.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of the Rheguſces: now adayes called Rhinthall.

That is to ſay: The Valley of Rheine.

THE Rheguſces are of the Griſons countrey, dwelling on the bankes of Rheine, aboue the Lake of Conſtance. As for them that dwell beyond the Rheine, where where are Bregents and Velcure: they are yet to this day, ſubiects to the Houſe of Auſtria. But they on the hither ſide, as Rhinek and Altſtetten, two little Townes, and the valley tending toward the Count of Werdemberg, they are obedient to the Switzers. Heeretofore, all this countrey appertained vnto them of Auſtria, who pawned it to the Lords of Ion. But at the time of the Councell of Conſtance, when as Fredericke of Auſtria was baniſhed by the Emperour Sigiſmond: the Count of Togge, the Emperours adopted ſonne, ſeized on this valley of Rheine, and other places belonging vnto the houſe of Auſtria, by disburſing money for them, to whom they were engaged.

The ſcituation of Rhinthall, and of the countries on either ſide of Rheine.

The valley of Rhein ſeized by the Count of Togge adopted ſon to the Emperor.

Afterwards, this Count pawned this Valley of Rheine, for a great ſumme of money, to two Gentlemen, Huldrich and Conrad Beierer, brethren. In the yeare, 1460. Iaques Beierer, their Brother and heyre, hauing ſome variance with them of Appenzel, and fearing his vnablenes of keeping this valley againſt their ſtrength: willingly ſolde them his rights, and reſigned the engagement. After that, this valley remained in the power, and vnder dominion of Appenzel, for the ſpace of thirty yeares, or thereabout.

The valley ſolde to them of Appenzell.

But when it ſo fell out, that the men of Appenzel were troubled in warre, againſt the Abbot of S. Gall, his ſubiects, and the Cittizens alſo, and the Abbey of Roſach (new built) quite defaced: the Canton'd Switzers, confederates with the Abbot, muſtred vp their troops, and called their other allies to them, by whoſe helpe they maintained the Abbot, and condemned them of Appenzel in a great fine. Which made them to require peace, and beſide, to offer them the rule of the Valley of Rheine: the poſſeſſion whereof fell (as a recompence) to the Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Suits, and Glaris. After this, they parted with a portion of this Seigneury, to the Cantons of Vri, Vnderuald, and Zug, who had aſsiſted thē: likewiſe to Appenzel, who indeed wer ancient Lords thereof. So that (euen to this day) theſe eight Cantons, each after other) ſend a Bayliffe into this valley, who makes his abiding in a ſmall Towne, called Rhinek, at one end of the valley, ſomewhat aboue the place, where the Rheine enters into the Lake of Conſtance.

How Rhinthall came to belong to the Switzers.

Bayliffes ſent by the eight Cantons to the valley for Rulers there.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of the Gouernments and baylywickes which are in Italy.

FOure Bailywicks do yet remain, which the Switzers call Baylywicks beyond the Mountaines, becauſe they are quite ouer the Alpes. The firſt is Lugano or Luca, a Towne vppon the Lake, which ſome call the Lake of Gauna; others, the Lake of Lugano. This Lake is in the middeſt of two other Lakes, to wit, that of Coma on the left hād, and on the right hande of the Lake Maior, whereinto it ſhutteth vp it ſelfe.

Baylywickes beyond the mountaines.

Lugano or Luca the firſt Bayliwicke.

The ſecond Baylywicke, and neereſt of all to this former, is Locarna: a very pleaſant Towne, at the head of the Lake Maior, ſometimes beautified vvith verie goodly and ſtrong Caſtles, and accounted the cheefeſt in Lombardie, next vnto that of Millaine.

Locarna the 2

The Bayliwick of Mendriſa, on the left hand of the Lake of Gauna, maketh the third.

Mendriſa the third.

And for the laſt, there is the Vale of Madia, which depended heeretofore vpon Locarno, as Mendriſa on Lugano.

The vale Madia the fourth

Theſe foure Baylywickes fell to the Switzers, in the yeare, 1513. by the Donation of Maximillian Sforza, Duke of Millaine. For, hee hauing driuen the French out of Italy, by the counſell and authority of Pope Iulius, and being holpen therein by the Venetians and Switzers, he made a preſent of theſe four Baylywickes (abutting on the Frontiers of their countrey) to the Switzers. He gaue alſo the Vale of Tellina to the Griſons. But three yeares after, King Frances hauing vanquiſhed the Switzers at Marignano, expelled the Duke, and re-vnited to his Crowne the Dukedome of Millaine. By an accord made at Fribourg, he confirmed this donation of his owne royal authority, as his ſucceſſors in the dukedome of Millaine did the like.

How and in what manner theſe ſeuerall Baylywickes came to bee commanded by the Switzers.

All the Cantons ſend their bayliffs thether by turnes, except that of Appenzell, which vvas not in the number of the Cā-tons, when as theſe countries were firſt giuen to the Switzers: but they were receiued in a yeare after onely.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Of Bellizona.

Bellizona in obedience to three of the Cantons, yet recouered by the Dukes of Millaine.

WE might ranke among theſe Bayliwickes of Italy, the Towne of Bellizona, which obeyeth to the Cantons of Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald. This Towne (in former times) appertained vnto the Countes of Miſauk, who were reiected by the Dukes of Millaine. Afterward, hauing found meanes to enter againe by intelligence; they ſold it to them of Vri and Vnderuald. But the Duke of Millain recouered it againe, and tooke it from the Switzers, by the ſame ſubtle tricks which the Counts of Miſauk had vſed to repoſſeſſe it. This hapned about the yeare, 1422.

Bellizona yeilded to the Cãton of Vri.

After that time, the Switzers made many voyages ouer the Mountaines to recouer Bellizona. At length, in the yeare 1500. they got into poſſeſſion of it agen. For, in regard of continuall warres betweene the Sforzaes and the French: the men of Bellizona willing to prouide for their owne ſafety, yeelded themſelues to the Canton of Vri. The French, becomming maſters of the Millaineſes; labored often (but all in vain) to regain the town. Finally, at ſuch time as the Dukes of Millaine gaue the fore-named foure Baylywickes to the Cantons, they were alſo confirmed in the poſſeſſion of Bellizona.

The Switzers in full poſſeſſion of Bellizona.

Three Baylywickes in Bellizona, & how their gouernment is ordered equally.

The whole country is diuided into 3. Bayliwicks, to witte, Bellizona, the vale Brune, and Riuiera; and in like maner gouerned (turne after turne) by thoſe three Cantons, that they haue a Balywicke belonging to each one. As if Vri doe eſtabliſh a Gouernour or Bayliffe at Bellizona: Suits placeth one alſo in the vale Brune, and Vnderuald one at Riuiera. Then beginning againe, Vri commends one to Riuiera, Vnderuald to the vale Brune, and Suits to Bellizona. And becauſe that the Baylywick of Riuiera is of the leaſt reuennew, moſt commonly, he that hath bene Bayliffe at Bellizona, is eſtabliſhed nexte after at Riuiera.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Alliances made by the Cantons, with Kings and Princes neere neighbouring to them.

The Learned & wiſe counſel of the Grecian Orator Demoſthenes wel approued and experienced by his own country.

Demoſthenes, the moſt eloquent of all the Græcian Orators, a man woonderfully well acquainted with affayres of State, and (aboue all) a deare Louer of his Countreyes liberty, wrote thus. Ouergreat familiarity with Tyrants, ſhould be ſuſpitious to ciuill and free Cities: And no truſt is to bee repoſed in them, eſpecially if they bee neighbours, becauſe euery King and Tyrant is an enemy to liberty, and contrary to lawes. The euent and ſucceſſe attending on ſuch caſes, did well witneſſe, that this Learned man had giuen very wholeſome counſell to the Athenians, yea, and to all Greece. For Phillip the ſonne of Amyntas (againſt whom Demoſthenes made head) and the ſucceeding Kings of Macedon oppreſſed the liberty of the Greekes, by a diſſembled amity, and working certaine combinations and alliances, deuiſed onely for their owne aduantage.

The Switzers haue bin wondred at, for their leagues.

The caſe ſtanding thus, I thinke, that many ſtand thus amazed, what ſhoulde moue the ancient Switzers to make ſuch alliances as they haue done with ſtraungers, Kinges and Princes, their Neighbours. But heere is to bee noted and obſerued, that all alliances doe not hurt one like another in a Commonwealth. They are to be miſtruſted, which do import a league offenſiue and defenſiue, & ouergreat familiarity. Otherwiſe, for the benefite of peace, it is needfull ſometimes, that Princes and great Lords nere neighbouring, ſhould ally themſelues togither, for the better vſe of ſome rightes, and the eaſier mannaging of their affayres. The ancient Switzers made many ſuch alliances of peace and amity. And if at any time they were knit more ſtrictly to ſome King or Prince, it was not inconſiderately done: but, as appeareth by the tenour of the alliances, the conditions wer ſuch, as their liberties could no waies be eaſily touched or wronged.

What alliances are ſaid to be dangerous and what are indifferent, & not hurtfull.

The prouident care of the Switzers, in making their Leagues.

They

Leagues with Popes.

With neighbor Princes.

With Bishops and Cities.

They made diuers alliances, for a certainty of times, with Popes; as Sixtus, Iulius the second, Leo the tenth, & with Clement the seauenth. With neighbouring Princes; as the Dukes of Austria, of Sauoye, of Millaine, and of Wertemberg. Then, with the Byshoppes of Constance, the Cities of Suaba, and others on the Lake of Constance, and on the Riuer of the Rheine. But, without staying our selues at the most part of these alliances, wee will touch those onely, vvhich were hereditary, that continue yet, must longer continue, and are most notable among all the other. As namely, the Alliances with the Dukes of Millaine, of Austria, of Bourgongne, of Sauoye, & the most remarkeable and last of all, with the King of France.

Their alliances of most note and obseruation.

CHAP. XL.

Of the Alliance made by the Switzers, with the Dukes of Millaine.

Vncertaintie of the first treaty of alliance.

I Cannot well set downe what treaty or discourse was anciently had, and at the first time, betweene the Duke of Millain, and the Switzers. But in the yeare, one thousand foure hundred sixty and sixe, Duke Galeazo, and Blanche Maria his wife, made an accord and agreement with eight Cantons, vpon certain conditions: which yet vnto this day, are called, The Articles or Capitulations of Millaine. Wherein also, mention is made of other auncient capitulations, which shew and testifie, that long time before, the Switzers, especialy they of Vri, which inhabite at the Alpes, had beene associates with the Lombardes, vnder certaine conditions. But because the auncient Capitulations, are (almost) quite worne out of mens memories: I will propose the Summary of the accord with Duke Galeazo, and his wife, the Lady Blanche Maria.

Galeazo D. of Millaine, and his Wife Blanche Maria capitulare with eight Cantons

The Articles of Agreement, betweene the Duke of Millaine, and the Switzers.

The Ordinary of the great Church of Millaine, against them of Vri, and vpon what occasion

THE first Article, concerneth them of Vri. The Ordinary of the great church in Millaine, intended a Processe against them, concerning the Valley of Luiner. By this first Article, the Duke agreeth with them of Vri, to haue free possession of that valley, in the regard of ciuill Iurisdiction: renouncing his owne rightes, and promising to obtain the same of the Ordinary.

They of Vri, on the other side, shall pay a tribute to the Duke, & euery yeare, in the Moneths of Iune or Iuly, or before midde-August, shall send him foure Hawkes, and a Crosse-bow. As concerning the difference touching the Churches reuennewes, betweene the Ordinary, and them of the Valley, each of the two parties shall nominate two Iudges, and to those foure Iudges, the Duke shal adde one, as an Arbitrator: and of him he must and will make choyse among the Lords of Councell, and in one of the seauen Cantons. These Iudges, must nominate what it is, that the Prince and they of the Valley, should pay vnto the Ordinarie. And if there happen anie variance besides, for matters of Duties not payed: they also are to censure thereupon.

Iudges apointed betweene the Ordinarie and them of Vri.

The second Article is, that the eight Cantons, their subiects, and all they that haue dwelt in their countries, the space of foure yeares, shall enioy the ancient liberty, to wit, that they shal stand exempt from all tributes, impostes, and tolles, throughout Millaine, euen to the ditches of the Towne.

The nature of the 2. Article.

The third Article, concerneth debts, and imprisonments.

The third.

The fourth is for such variances as may happen between the Duke and the Cantons, and of some particulars against the Duke.

The fourth.

The fift, is for processe and suites of particular persons.

The fift.

The sixt, matter of free Trafficke, and that it shall bee lawfull for the Switzers, to go and sell their Wares and Cattle:

The sixte.

tle: and the Duke no way to impeach them in their selling, or his Subiectes in their buying.

The seuenth. The seuenth importeth, that the duke and the Switzers shall maintain and preserue themselues in good amity: and that neither party shall giue passage, or allow lodging or harbor to the enemies of neither side.

Renewing & reconfirmation of these articles. Now, in regard that after this transaction, Millaine changed her Lordes oftentimes, these Articles haue beene also renewed and confirmed from one time to another. And finally, in the yeare, 1512. Ferdinando Gonzaga, Gouernour of Millaine. in the name of the Emperor Charles the fifte, renewed this accord with the Switzers, very neere with the same conditions.

The Articles of Agreement, betweene Ferdinando Gonzaga, Gouernor, and the Switzers.

Freedome from Tolles. THE first Article concerneth benefit of exemption, from Tolles, Taxes, and other charges. Item, it shall be lawfull for the Switzers, to buy any kinde of bread corne. But if there be a dearth, and the Market measure is sold for more then thirteene Francks, it is not lawfull to transport any. Neuertheless, for our amity with the Switzers, they may carry away two hundred measures. The Cantons did make the same condition with them of Millaine.

For Bread Corne.

A Franke is two shilliugs sterling.

Selling of salt The second, is for the selling and carriage away of salt.

Free passage and trading. The third, confirmeth to the Switzers their ancient priuiledges, for going and comming freely, and trafficking through all countries of Millain, without any need of support or safe conduct; except in the time of pestilence, and then to bee free from all Tolle, onely the gate of Millaine excepted.

To whome these priuiledges belongeth The fourth, declareth who and what they are, that must enioy these priuiledges; wherein are (by name) excluded all Millaineses, that shall retire themselues into Swetia.

For auoyding of fraud and deceit. The fift ordaineth, to preuent & auoyd all means of fraud, that such as inioy these priuiledges, shall not keepe companie, or trade in merchandize with them that are vncapable, or may not haue the benefit of them.

Awardes in suites. The sixt speakes of awards, and decision of law suites.

Disobedience in awardes or sentence. The seuenth willeth, that if criminall parties on either side, doe withdraw to anie one of their precincts, after that they or he shalbe adiudged culpable, on knowledge of the cause: he or they shall be sent backe to their Magistrate, who is to chastise them according to the exigence of the case.

Of reuennues goods, &c. on either side. The eight is, that in such reuennes, dismes, goods mouable and immouable, which the Switzers possesse in the Dukedome of Millaine, or which may fal to thē from this time forward: they shall haue the same rights in them heere, as the Millainneses enioy in Swetia.

For free and friendly passage in eithers countries. The ninth; that passe & passage may be as free and safe in the countries of each other, as formerly it hath bin, & with the like maintenance of amity.

Of other Alliances. In the tenth, the Switzers make exception of their other alliances, & all precedent instruments: to the end that they may not derogate or faile in the fore-named conditions.

The time of this alliance. In the last, the time is agreed on and prefixed, for this combination: which is, to continue for foure years after the death of the Emperor Charles.

Of the Switzers alliance yet with Millaine. Now, although (for diuers reasons) this agreement hath not beene renewed to this instant between the King of Spain, Duke of Millaine, and the Switzers: yet notwithstanding, both on his part, and theirs likewise, ancient amity hath beene carefully kept; and euen to this day, the Switzers enioy (almost) the same priuiledges, as in elder times they did among them of Millaine.

CHAP. XLI.

Of the Switzers Alliances with the Dukes of Austria and Burgongne.

A straunge course, that much contention should beget as many frendships. LIke as there hath beene no Prince or Princes, that haue made so much war vpon the Cantons, as the Dukes of Austria: so in the same manner, the Switzers did neuer make so many accords, treaties and alliances, as with those Dukes. At this time, I meane not to make mention of those thoſe alliances which haue laſted but for ſome few years, and agreed or combined with one or two Cantons onely; but rather will reſolue my ſelfe on the perpetuall and hereditary alliance of Sigiſmond, Duke of Austria with the Cãtons; which was renewed afterward, by the Emperor Maximillian, Charles the fifte, and Ferdinand.

The Emperor Sigiſmond, firnam'd the Simple, a gret enemy to the Switzers.

This Sigiſmond, firnamed the Simple, was ſonne vnto Fredericke, who brought Pope Iohn the 22. out of the Councel of Conſtance, whereby he was baniſht from the Empire. Sigiſmond was a great Enemy to the Switzers, and had many warres againſt them, wherein he was continually beaten, as at Winterduer, Mulhouſe, Waldſhout, in Turgow, and other places, & loſt in theſe warres the countrey of Turgowe, which is great, fertile, and well peopled, yet afterward conquered and kept by the Switzers. Seeing by Armes he could not quaile the Switzers, hee withdrewe into Fraunce, and required ſuccour of King Lewes the eleuenth, which hee was flatly denyed: becauſe the King would not entangle himſelfe in warre with the Switzers, of whoſe magnanimity he had formerly made good proof, being Dolphin, when the battell was fought againſt them neere to Baſile.

K. Lewes the 11. denied ayd to Sigiſmond againſt the Switzers Sigiſmond engageth Ferrara to the Duke of Bourgongne.

Hereupon, he made his recourſe tothe Duke of Bourgongn, and pawned to him the County of Ferrara, and other Seigneuries on the Frontiers of Swetia, for the ſum of fourſcore thouſand crownes: onely that he might finde buſines for the Switzers, by meanes and help of the duke of Bourgongne. Lazius writes, that Sigiſmond ſold Swetia it ſelfe, but therein he abuſeth himſelf. This engagement did not aduance the matter, according vnto Sigiſmonds expectation: for Hagenbach, gouernor in theſe pawned countries to Charles Duke of Bourgongne, began to tyranize vpon all the people, violating women and children, and putting many innocents to death. By which occaſion; Sigiſmond being moued to compaſſion, and incited by the continual complaints of his ſubiects; redeemed the pawned countries, & conſigned the mony to be paid at Baſile. But notwithſtanding all this, D. Charls would not forſake his poſſeſſion, but ſtroue ſtill to hold the ſame by force. The Switzers (on the other ſide) were but crookedly dealt withall by Duke Charles.

The cruel and violent dealing of Hagenbach.

To be plaine, Sigiſmond nor the Switzers were ſtrong enough to make head againſt the Duke, and therfore ſome men, better ſeene and ſkild in ſuch buſineſſe, layd downe their opinion; that Sigiſmond and the Switzers were beſt to agree in vnity, and make war together vppon their common enemy. King Lewes the eleuẽth puſht hardly at that point, and followed the matter very hotly: for it was his cuſtome to prepare ſuch diets for the Duke of Bourgongne, and to raiſe him ſo many enemies as might bee. To further theſe practiſes, he ſerued his owne turne with a Switzer, namd Iuſtus de Sillini, who ſoon after was byſhop of Sion, and of Granoble alſo. Sigiſmond likewiſe fauored him, and gaue him as many good reſpects, as hee could receiue by his byſhopprickes. At length alſo by his meanes, and by authority of the King, an hereditary alliance was made, the ſubſtantiall points wherof follow thus.

Good aduice in caſes of extremity, much auaile.

For benefit of enioying their owne rightes.

The Duke and the Switzers ſhall remaine Lords of thoſe countries, citties, caſtles, Fortreſſes, Townes, Burroughes, and Villages as they haue taken, and now poſſeſſe; without any ſuite in Law, or any kinde of quarrell to bee offered on eyther ſide for them; neyther ſhall ſuffer anie wrong or iniurie to bee done, neither to the countries, citties, caſtles, &c. of one another.

But if any ſuch perſon do purſue his intention by violence, they among whom he hath retreated him ſelfe, ſhall preſent him immediately in iuſtice. Becauſe neither the Duke, nor the Cantons ought to lodge, maintaine, or fauour (in any kinde whatſoeuer) the Enemies of one another.

All enmities and warres which formerly haue beene betweene Duke Sigiſmond, and the Switzers, and their predeceſſors, ſhall bee appeaſed and layde to ſleep, by meanes of this agreement, which is to be inuiolably kept on either ſide.

All former wars and iars, cut off by this peace.

This firſt tranſaction was made before the war of Bourgongne; in the yeare one thouſand, foure hundred, ſeuentie & foure. In the ſame year, Sigiſmond of Auſtria, René of Lorraine, the Byſhoppes of Straſbourg and Baſile, the Cities of Straſbourg, Baſile, Colmar, Seleſtad, Montbeliard, and ſome others, made alliance with the Switzers for certaine yeares, againſt the violence and tyranny of the Duke of Bourgongne, who being ſlaine 3. yeares after in the battaile of Nancy, Sigiſmond of Auſtria renewed the hereditary Alliance, and this firſt tranſaction made with the Switzers, by the entermiſe of K. Lewes the eleuenth. This alliance was confirmed with the Cantons of Zurich, Bern, Lucerna, Vri, and Solleurre, with liberty to the other Cantons, to enter into the ſame alliance if they pleaſed. There was not any new Article added at that time: but onely the forme and meanes of mutuall ſuccour, which was couched in far more cleare and plaine tearmes. Some years after this, Duke Sigiſmond not hauing any legittimate children, reſigned his Dukedome to the Emperor Maximillian, reſeruing onely to himſelf an annual penſion. Maximillian required the Switzers to enter the forenamed alliance with him. But becauſe they had beene at ſome variance with him, and hee with them, and there grew ſome apparance of warre (conſidering it ſeemed euidently, that Sigiſmond had thus deſpoyled himſelfe, to iniury the Switzers:) they would not enter into any nouell alliance, eſpecially, becauſe hee meant nothing elſe but fraudes in all this carriage, as the euent plainely declared. For immediately, they of Auſtria, and of the league of Suaba, moued warre againſt the Switzers and Griſons.

The Emperor renewed the hereditary alliance of Austria with the Switzers.

on the twelfth yeare, which was in Anno, 1511. the Emperor renewed the hereditary alliance of the house of Austria, with the Switzers, and ioyned in one, the house of Bourgongne, and his Nephew Charles, of whom he was tutor. Moreouer, not onely the Switzers of the first alliance, but the twelue Cantons. Item, they of Appenzell, with the Abbot and Towne of S. Gall, confirmed this alliance hereditary, with the houses of Austria & Bourgongne.

The contents of the alliance or transaction made by the meanes of K. Lewes the 11.

In this alliance or transaction so confirmed, made by the meanes of King Lewes the eleuenth, is expressely set downe first of all: that therein is comprehended only the county of Bourgongne, and the high countries of Austria, the county of Tiroll, and that which is beyond the Mountaine. Item, some Townes along the Rheine, as Waldshout, Lauffenberg, Secon, Rhinfeld, & others that are on this side the Mountain. Neuertheless there is added, that order shall be giuen, that those other countries not comprized in the alliance, shall not enterprise any thing by Arms against the Switzers, nor the Switzers against them. All outragious words & actions are prohibited, for feare of alienating their harts, as hath happened sometimes heeretofore thereby.

Money giuen by the Emperor in the name of his Nephew Charles.

Moreouer, the Emperor Maximillian promised, in the name of Charles his Nephew, to giue (in present) euery yeare in the citty of Zurich, to each one of the cantons, two hundred crownes. To the Abbot and citty of S. Gall, and the Bourg of Appenzell, an hundred crownes to each of them: vntill such time as Charles shall be growne greater, to gouern these countries himselfe, & then he shal stand bound to confirm the alliance, which accordingly was done. For in the yeare 154. by letters which the Emperour Charles the fift, sent to the Cantons, he confirmed the alliance; insomuch as concerned the house and county of Bourgongne, for his brother Ferdinand was chosen then Duke of Austria.

Charles the fift confirmed the alliance with the Switzers when he came to age.

The conditions and Articles of alliance with Bourgongne, are the very same as them of Austria. To wit, that it shall be lawfull for eyther side, to traffick, and to go and come freely into one anothers countries. Item, that they neyther doe, nor suffer any of the countries, to make warre vpon each other. And if (by aduenture) some enemy would doe violence to one of the two sides: the other (being thereto required) shall be carefull to preuent it without any delay, for feare, leste against right and equity, it should be oppressed.

CHAP. XLI.

Of the Alliances betweene Sauoy and the Switzers.

THE Dukes of Sauoy, (which part was called by our Ancients, the country of the * Allobrogians) long since, and for long space of time, helde amity with the Cantons of Berne, Fribourg, and Solleurre. In the ende, Charles, Father to Philibert, now Duke of Sauoy, made an alliance with all the cantons, for twenty fiue years, in Anno, 1512.

*People of Prouence, containing the Countries of Sauoy and Daulphinie.

The alliance of Duke Charles with the Cantons.

For preseruation of amity.

The first Article treateth of the amity which is to be maintained on either side, without any outrage, or seconding an enemy to passe among the Allies.

The second ruleth the knowledge of Processes and Law-cases, wherein Iudges of equall number are to bee elected on both sides, who shall call the parties into the Towne of Bienna, and there ende the difference. If two sentences be giuen, hauing as many voyces on the one side as other: the Iudges shall elect a subarbitratour in one of the cantons, that shall haue no part of interest in the Processe. As for causes betweene particular persons; they are to be decided by Iudges of the places.

For suites and law-cases.

The third ordaineth, that it shall be lawfull for the subiects of the allies, to goe about their affaires freely, and in all safety, in the countries of Swetia & Sauoy, without being charged with any new impostes, portages, or tolles.

For freedome of commerce on both sides.

The fourth auoucheth, that if any man haue a difference against the Duke, and would haue it referred to the orders spoken in the cantons: if the Duke will not agree thereto, the Switzers doe not stand bound (by any alliance) to assist any such party against the Duke.

For any difference against the Duke.

The fift speaketh, that if the Switzers are assayled and pressed with warre, the Duke shall send them (at his own charge) fixe hundred horse at the leste; prouided, that that hee haue then no warre in his owne country. In like manner, if the Duke haue any warre in his owne hand, & demandeth succour; the Switzers shall send him sixe thousand foot, or more, to each man wherof, the Duke shall pay 6. Liures Trurnois, for wages euery Moneth. If (ouer and aboue this number) hee demandeth some other Switzers, that desire to goe to warre vpon their owne good will towards him: hee shall not stand bound to pay them any wages, but what he will do out of his owne liberality.

The Liure Tournois is two shillings sterling.

The Duke may demand no seruice of the Switzers, in any nauall warre, nor cause them to passe the Seas: but onely to defend the countries, which they possesse at the day of making this alliance.

No Nauall war, or passage of the Seas.

To the end that this accord may bee firmely kept, the Duke nor the Switzers shall meddle with any affaires of strangers, to debate any thing to the preiudice of their alliance: neyther shall they giue right of Bourgesship, to any subiects of Swetia or Sauoye, but onely to such, as shall haue their persons and goods transported into eythers countries.

For preseruation of this alliance firmely.

While this alliance endureth, the Duke shall yearely pay in the Citty of Berne, to each Canton, the summe of two hundred crownes.

Payment of 200. crowns to each Canton yearely.

Vpon the ending of this alliance, which lasted almost 25. yeares, the King of France, Frances the first, despoyled Duke Charles of the most part of his countries. And in this warre, the Bernians taking in hand the cause of their fellow-Bourgesses of Geneua, with them of Fribourg and Valois: tooke all the Dukes places in the countries of Vaut, county of Romont and Yuian. After this time, the Emperour Charles the fift (in the protection of whō the Duke of Sauoy was put) was in war continually in Piedmont gainst the Frēch: and that was the cause of breaking the renewing of the alliance. At length, Philebert, the Sonne of Charles, hauing recouered his countries, by the meanes of peace betweene the Kings of Spaine and France: made a new and perpetuall alliance with the Cantons of Lucerna, Suits, Vri, Vnderuald, Zug, and Solleurre. It is (almost) the very same as the former: but onely that there is no mention made (to my remembrance) of mutuall succour. Soone after, the other Cantons renewed with him, the very same conditions of ancient amity and alliance.

CHAP. XLII.

Of the Alliances betweene the Switzers and the Kings of France.

KIng Lewes the 11. was the first King of France, that allied himselfe with the Switzers, and that assigned rewards & pensions annually to all the Cantons. Being as yet Dolphin, hee led a great Army into Germany, conducted by the Count of Armignac. This he did in fauor of Pope Eugenius, and of the Emperor Fredericke, onely to breake the councell of Basile, as the Pope desired: and furiously to inuade the Switzers, whom the Emperor hated, and to break off their siedge (in meere despight of them) which they had planted before the citty of Zurich, becausse he was allied with the house of Austria. The Switzers had another Army before the castle of Fransperg: 1600 men whereof, they sent thence, to succour Basile & the Fathers there in the councell.

Rewards and pensions yearly allowed to all the Cantons, by King Lewes the 11.

Being about 2 miles from Basile, they did set vpon the Dolphins troops so stifly, as (although in regard of their enemies multitude, who had enclosed them on all sides) they were euery man (almost) slaine in the field: yet notwithstanding, they so weakened the French Army (for there were slaine about 6000 of them) that the Dolphin standing in feare of a further losse, and of the valour of the Switzers; tooke his way suddenly home to France, leauing the businesse vnexecuted, which he came for. It is reported, that the Dolphin seeing his enemies slaine bodies lying on the ground, saide thus. Sometimes with farre lesse forces, and in the space of three houres; I haue broken an Army of thirteen thousand men, without any such paine or danger as I haue met with heere, labouring a whole day toughly, to ouercome a little handfull of men. Neuer hadde I to deale with more valiant and fast enemies; and therefore I will take order, for euer warring any more against them. Which hee most truely and faithfully performed a long time after, euen euen vntill he came to the crowne.

King Lewes a great enemy to Charles Duke of Bourgongne, yet durſt not war with him.

Hee neuer loued Charles Duke of Bourgongne, and yet durſt not make open warre on him, becauſe hee was not well appointed for it: and therefore he laboured by all meanes, to ſet the Duke a iuſtling with the Switzers. But to compaſſe his intent the more eaſily, and haue the Switzers at his command, when he ſhold ſtand in need of their aſſiſtance: he made an alliance with them for ten yeares, giuing as an annuall penſion to each Canton, the ſumme of ſeuen thouſand Liures Tournois. During the warre of the Duke of Bourgongne againſt the Switzers, the King furniſhed them with a great ſumme of money: as fearing leaſt (through want of coine) they ſhould giue ouer contending, and talke of truce. The Duke being foyled at Morat; the King gaue publikely great gifts to the Switzers, and in particular to their Captaines and Colonels. Finally, after the death of the Duke, ſlaine in Lorraine, to ſet an imbarment, that (by right of warre) the Switzers ſhould not poſſeſſe themſelues of Bourgongne, where there were many men that nodded the head at their deuotion: hee bought the country for a goodly ſumme of money. And becauſe he muſt needs make warre, to get into poſſeſſion of the country: hee made vſe of the foote Switzers to ſerue him, giuing to them farre greater wages, then euer any Prince had done before.

Great gifts & preſents to the Switzers for foyling the Duke at Morat.

Charles the eight, ſonne to Lewes, in the yeare, one thouſand, foure hundred, fourſcore and three, renewed the alliance which his father had made with the Switzers: and vſed their ſeruice in the warre, whē he ouercame the Duke of Bretaigne. But principally in the warre of Naples, he diuers wayes made good proofe, that the warlike Switzers, were both loyall and valiant of their perſons. His ſucceſſour, Lewes the twelfth, hauing vndertaken the conqueſt of Millaine, and very deſirous to turne the Switzers, from the amity they bare to Duke Lodowick Sforza; made alliance with them for ten yeares. At the end whereof, he thanked the Switzers, & denyed to pay the rewards and yearely penſions, which he had payed in publike and to particular perſons. Which ſo highly offended this martiall people, as partly of their own inclination, but much more by meanes of the Cardinall of Sion, who ſollicited the principals of the cantons; they made a league with Pope Iulius the ſecond, in the yeare, one thouſand, fiue hundred and ten. Oftentimes afterward, this King laboured to make a new alliance: but the Switzers beeing ioyned with the Pope, would neuer liſten to it. But in the yeare, one thouſand fiue hundred and twelue, they droue the French out of Millaine, and re-eſtabliſhed Maximillian Sforza in the Dukedome. Then the yeare following, they ouerthrew the French at Nouara, and came with a maine Army along into Bourgongne.

King Charles renewed his fathers league with the Switzers.

King Lewes the 12. made alliance with the Switzers for ten years.

The Switzers diſpleaſed with K. Lewes

The Switzers chaſed the French out of Millaine.

Lewes the twelfth, had his Sonne in law Frances de Valois for his ſucceſſour: who wonne a memorable battaile againſt the Switzers, when he ouercame them at Marignano: Hee brought into France, Maximillian Sforza, and made himſelfe Lord of the Dukedome of Millaine. After a victory ſo remarkable, knowing well, how bloody it had bin, and at how deare a price the French had bought it: the firſt thing he did, was (to winne the good fauour of the Switzers) a kinde agreement made with them, ioyning them to his crowne, by a firme and durable alliance. The conditions and treaties of this peace and mutual amity, are comprized in theſe thirteene Articles following.

Frances de Valois ſucceſſor to Lewes the twelfth.

First, all enmities, diſſentions, warres, differences and quarrelles in precedent times, are vtterly brought to nothing: and as for particular variances, which concern nothing in common with the occaſions of warre, they ſhall ſtand vtterly void, by thoſe Articles of agreement, made betweene the Duke of Millaine, King Lewes the twelfth, and the Cantons.

The tenour of the peace made betweene King France the firſt and the Switzers.

Secondly, all priſoners, in what part or place ſoeuer they are deteyned as priſoners, or as ſlaues; they ſhall be releaſed and ſet at liberty, without paying any ranſome.

For free deliuery of priſoners.

Thirdly, if any man at Armes of the Switzers, haue any ſuite againſt the King of France, not for any matter of warre, he may conteſt in iuſtice, according to the Articles following.

For ſuites in law againſt the King.

Fourthly, all ſuch perſons as after the accord made betweene King Lewes the twelfth, and the Cantons,) were and are allied with them, or receiued into the nūber of their Bourgeſſes: ſhall be comprehended in this treaty, and enioy the benefit nefit thereof. Onely ſuch excepted, as are out of the limits of Swetia, that ſpeake not the Germane tongue, and are not ſubiects to the Cantons.

For priuiledges and franchiſes.

The fift Article, confirmeth to Merchants and ſubiects of Swetia, the priuiledges and franchiſes, which the Kings of France haue formerly graunted vnto them.

The kings bounty to the Switzers.

Sixtly, to the end that the Switzers may the better vnderſtand the good will and liberality of the King: hee will pay them downe preſently a great ſumme of crownes, for their great charges at the ſiedge of Dijon, and afterwards in Italy.

For maintainance of loue and amity.

Seauenthly, that peace may bee the more firmely maintained on eyther ſide, and to continue on this begun amity: if any difference happen to be moued, neither the one party or other ſhall vndertake Armes, in that manner to purſue his right; but according to the order before mentioned, is to demaund reaſon by courſe of iuſtice.

No harboring of enemies on either ſide.

Eightly, neyther ſide ſhall giue paſſage, food or harbour to the others enemies: nor ſuffer their ſubiects to vndergo Armes, for ſuch Princes or commonweales, as are enemies to France, or to the Switzers. Such as do the contrary, ſhall be repealed to their country, and puniſhed according as they haue deſerued.

For free permiſſion of traſficke and paſſage.

Ninthly, permiſſion is granted vnto Merchants, Pilgrims, & Subiects, French or Switzers, to trafficke, voyage, goe and come freely, into France and Swetia; without any outrage, or beeing offended by any new tolles or taxes.

Yearely penſions giuen by the King to the Cantons, &c.

Tenthly, the King giueth yearely to each Canton, the ſum of two thouſand Liures Tournois: As much to the Valaiſians, and as much to the Griſons, as was granted vnto them by king Lewes the 12. And moreouer, the ſum of 20000 Liures Tournois. Item, to the Abbot of S. Gall, to the Subiects, and to them of Toggenbourg, the ſum of 600 Liures Tournois: To the citty of S. Gall, 400: To Mulhouſe, 400: And to them of the county of Gruyere, 600.

Priuiledges belonging to particular places.

Eleuenthly, the ancient priuiledges and franchiſes, which they haue (till then) enioyed in the Dukedome of Millaine, the inhabitants of Bellizona, Lugano, Locarna, and the Vale Madia; are to them fully reſerued and confirmed.

A courteſie left by the king to the Switzers choiſe.

Twelftly, the king leaueth it in choiſe to the Switzers, to declare within the compaſſe of a yeare, whether they affect or no: to hold the countries and caſtles of Lugano, Locarna, and of the Vale Madia; or elſe to forſake them, for the ſum of thirtie thouſand crownes of the Sunne. And if they take the money: then they of the Vale of Telina, and of the county of Clauenna, ſhal haue their part in this ſumme, as much as one of the Cantons.

For continuance of this amity.

The laſt Article ordaineth, that this peace and amity betweene the Realme of France and the cantons, ſhal continue inuiolable and perpetuall.

Exception made by the K. of France.

The king excepteth in this peace, Pope Leo the tenth, the See and Romane Empire, the kings of Spaine, of England, of Scotland, of Nauarre, and of Denmarke: The Dukes of Sauoy, of Lorraine, of Gueldres: Item, the Duke & common-wealth of Venice, Laurentius de Medicis, the houſe of Medicis, and the common-wealth of Florence: The Biſhop of Liege, and all the confederates of the king.

Exception made by the Switzers.

The Switzers alſo except on their part, Pope Leo the tenth, the See of Rome, the Emperour and Romane Empire; the houſe of Auſtria; the Dukes of Sauoye, and of Wirtemberg; the family of Laurentius de Medicis; the common-wealth of Florence, the Marſhall of Bourgongne, their ancient alliances; and all their allies and fellow-Bourgeſſes.

The reaſon of theſe exceptions.

The reaſon for theſe exceptions, is, that if the king of France make warre vpon any one of them aboue named, in his own countries: the Switzers may keepe what promiſe or alliance they haue formerly made or ſworne, to thoſe Princes or common-wealths. But if one or more of thoſe Princes or common-wealths, come to aſſault the king in his owne kingdome: the Cantons ſhall not permit any of their Subiects to goe in warre againſt the king; but ſhall countermaund them, as it is ordayned in the eight Article, and which they are to keepe and obſerue inuiolably.

To theſe conditions is added the forme to be kept, in the deciding of ſtrifes and differences. But it ſeemeth to me, that it would bee great loſſe of time and paper paper to inſert it: becauſe it agreeth almoſt altogether, with the accord of Millaine, and other formes of iudgements, whereof we haue ſpoken heeretofore. All this conference and treaty of peace, was made by the Ambaſſadours on eyther ſide, and ſette downe in writing in the Towne of Fribourg, on S. Andrews day, in the Moneth of Nouember, and in the yeare 1516.

The King made a more ſtrict alliance with the Switzers.

The King hauing made pacification with the Switzers, as already hath beene declared: yet hee would needs proceede ſomewhat farther, and allie them more ſtrictly to his crowne. Which alſo he obtayned, and that agreement was paſt at Lucerna, fiue yeares after the fore-mentioned peace. Then all the Cantons (except Zurich) and all their confederates, allied themſelues with the K. of France: and the tenour of that alliance was as followeth,

The Tenure of a more nere agreement, made betweene the King and the Switzers.

Concerning warre in any place belonging to the crowne, and leuye of men.

1. IF any one (whoſoeuer it be) make warre within the Realme of France, in the Dukedome of Millaine, or any other country appertaining to the crown, eyther on this ſide, or beyond the Mountaines: the King may make a leuye of Switzers, when and at what time himſelfe ſhall thinke meete, to wit, of ſixe thouſand men at the leaſt, and ſeauen thouſand at the moſt, except the Lords of the Leagues will permit more.

For choiſe of Captains and Colonels out of the cantons

2. Hee may alſo chuſe out of all the Cantons and confederates, ſuch Colonels and Captaines as he ſhall thinke fit: prouided, that they be men of good fame and credite.

Againſt hindering of men and delay of time.

3. The Lordes of the Leagues ſhall giue no hinderance to thoſe Colonels, Captaines, and Soldiers, neither delay time, or put any caſe in queſtion, to hinder their going: but that within ten daies after that firſt day, whereon the King required ſuccour, they ſhall bee permitted to march away.

For continuance in the Kings ſeruice, except warres be at home in Swetia.

4. They ſhall continue in the Kings ſeruice, vntill the end of the warre; if it ſeeme good to him, and they not recalled home by their Lords: The King ſhall alſo pay them (euery one) his accuſtomed wages. But if there happen warre in Swetia, and that thereby the cantons cannot ſuccour the King, as they otherwiſe wold: In this caſe, they ſhall ſtand quit of their promiſe, and they may ſuddenly countermand home their men; to whom alſo the King ſtands bound, to grant their departure immediately.

When the King ſhall haue occaſion to make war.

5 If the King would make warre vpon his enemies: he may make the ſame leuie of ſixe thouſand Switzers at the leaſt, and ſeuen thouſand at the moſt; chuſing Colonels and Captaines, men of faire and good fame, which are Switzers, or of their Allies.

An Army of Switzers not to be diuided, &c.

6. The King may not ſeparate an Army of Switzers, or diuide them in troops for Garriſons in diuers places: and they are not to ſerue at Sea, but on the land.

wages agreed on for the horſemen, & in what manner it is to be paid, vpon the due of three Moneths pay

7. As concerning the wages for the Gendarmery; it is agreed on both ſides, that the King ſhall pay for a Moneth vnto each Switzer Soldier, foure Florius and an halfe, of them that are called Florius du Rhin. And their wages ſhall begin on the day, when they ſet foorth from their houſes: and then ſhall three Moneths pay be due vnto them, although the King do not vſe them in ſeruice ſo long. And before they part out of Swetia, they muſt receiue the firſt Moneths pay: and the reſt for the two other Moneths, at meete places, according as need ſhall require. If after thoſe three Moneths are paſt, the King will longer retaine the Switzers; hee ſhal pay them the ſame wages euery Moneth, vntill ſuch time as they may commodiouſly returne home to their owne houſe.

Pay for men of higher rank & place, according to their degrees.

8. The Colonels, Captaines, Enſigns, Ambaſſadors, & others that haue charge in the troopes; ſhall bee payed after their accuſtomed manner, and according as the Predeceſſours to the Kings of France haue done.

Concerning ſuccour to bee ſent the Switzers, whē war is made on them.

9. If any war is made vpon the Switzers, the King of France ſhal ſtand bound to ſuccour them at his owne coſt: ſending them two hundred compleat horſemen, and twelue peeces of Artillery, with all their equipage and furniture; to wit, ſixe peeces for battery, and ſixe Canons. Moreouer, hee ſhall furniſh the Switzers (from three Moneths to three Moneths) in the citty of Lyons, with certaine ſums of of money, for expences in the warre. And if the Switzers affect it rather: instead of two hundred compleate horsemen, the King shall giue them all the three Moneths, the sum of two thousand crownes at the least.

Vpon dearth or necessity of Salt.

10. If it come so to passe, that if (thorough occasion of moued warre heere or there) the Switzers cannot haue any Salt: it may be bought for them in France, & so bee conuayed home into their countries.

Against releeuing eyther others enemies.

11. No side or party shall receiue into protection, neyther bestow Bourgeship on any of the others subiects, nor succor, lodge, or defend men banished, or enemies to eyther side: but according to the Articles of peace, shall hinder & expulse them.

The liberality of the King to the Cantons.

12. Finally, the King being willing to make knowne his loue and good will towards the Switzers: ouer and beside the twenty thousand Francks, which he promised to pay them by the treaty of peace, further promiseth, to pay yearely to each one of the Cantons (while this alliance shall continue) the summe of a thousand pounds Tournois. He will also pay to the confederates, the moity of the pension which they had before.

Exception made on the Kings behalfe

The King excepteth Pope Leo the 10. The Romane See and Empire; the kings of England and of Scotland: the Duke of Sauoye, of Lorraine, of Halsatia, and of Gueldres; the common-wealth of Venice, and of Florence; the house of Medicis; the Marquesses of Brandenbourg and of Montferrat.

Exception also on the cantons behalfe.

The Cantons do likewise except Pope Leo the tenth. the Romane See and Empire: the common-wealth of Florence; the house of Medicis; the Duke of Sauoy; the house of Austria; their alliances, their Bourgesses and confederates; the Duke of Wirtemberg; and Octauian Maria Sforza, Bishop of Lauda.

A caueat or generall warning.

Neuertheless, if any of these aboue named, make warre on eyther of these parties, in their countries on this side, or beyond the Mountaines: the other shall giue succour, without exception of any person, according to the tenour of this alliance, which is to endure while King Frances liueth, and three yeares after his death.

This alliance being expired, K. Henry the second, Sonne and Successor to king Frances, contracted a new alliance with the Cantons, vpon the same conditions before named: and that alliance lasted 5. yeares after his death. Now because the Dukedome of Millaine, and some other Prouinces, comprehended in the alliance made with king Frances, were dismembred from the crowne, when this newe league was contracted: It is expressely set downe, that the Switzers shall not stand obliged, to giue the king any succour, for recouery of those countries. But if he can reconquer them by the ayde of another Army, and he shall bee Lord of them againe, as of other Prouinces belonging to his Kingdome: for the better conseruation of them, the Cantons shall furnish him with men, who shall likewise attend him in warre, for the recouery of Bullen, and the county of Bullenois in Picardy.

King Henry the second succeeded his Father King Frances.

Concerning the losse of the Dukedom of Millaine.

A breuiate of the new adioyned Articles.

If the king will goe in person to some warre, hee may make choise (at his pleasure) of Captaines Switzers, and command a leuye of sixe thousand men at the least.

For leuye of men.

He may not disioyne or separate the Switzers Army, when hee is vpon the point of giuing battaile: but out of such occasion, he may plant thē in Garrisons, in Townes and strong places, to defend them.

No sundering of the Switzers army.

As for the wages, rewards, & succors, which the king is to giue vnto the Switzers; it beareth the very selfe-same reason as is in the precedent alliance; and the other Articles doe agree with them before mentioned.

For wages & rewards.

And to the ende, that the treaty of peace, made in the yeare 1516. may remaine firme, when wages rest vnpaide, it is thus ordayned. The demander shall acquaint his Magistrate with the matter, to whom, if the cause seeme vpright; he shal goe or send to the kings Ambassadours, which are in Swetia, or if they be absent, the Magistrate shall write to the king, and require satisfaction for the party. If the king yeelds to reason, the demander is satisfied, but if he refuse to pay according to equity; the demander may then call his cause before Iudges and Arbitrators, and there haue it debated. And if the K. yeelds to reason, the demander is satisfied, but if he refuse to pay according to equity, the demāder may then cal his cause be-before Iudges and Arbitrators, and there haue it debated. And if the King will not yeeld to the Iudges his part, the Switzers may passe on to further knowledge of the facte, and what they appoint, shall be allowed for firme and auaileable to eyther party, euen as if the Iudges on eyther side had therein assisted.

For new taxations.

The Merchants both French and Switzers, according to the articles of peace, shall not be greeued with any new taxes, tolles, or impostes.

If any suite be moued betweene parties on eyther side, the demaunder may pleade before the Iudge, in the place where the defender dwelleth.

For suites in law.

This alliance was treated and past at Solleurre, in the yeare, 1549. All the Cantons (except Berne and Zurich) with their confederates, being bound thereto.

When this alliance was made.

Finally, King Charles the ninth, Sonne to King Henry, renewed this alliance with the Switzers, vpon conditions little differing from the former: and that alliance continueth yet to this day, after the kings death.

King Charles the 9. allied with the Switzers.

THE MANNER OF GOVERNment obserued among the Switzers.

The Second Part.

A breefe discourse of the first Bookes Argument.

WEe haue shewne in our first Part, of what parts & parcels, the common-wealth of the Switzers is composed; for what causes, & with what conditions these people, dwelling in diuers places, allied themselues together, to make vp one body of a Commonwealth. Also with what industry and trauaile, they haue maintained their liberties; and with what Princes and peoples, they haue associated and leagued themselues. In this second Booke, wee shall declare, how this common-wealth is gouerned. And because the confederates haue (each one) their Magistrates, Lawes, and particular gouernment, and that the cantons do make one common-wealth apart, and yet there is a councell in common to the whole Nation, and lawes and ordinances, to whose obseruation all are obliged: First, I will make mention of the Switzers commonwealth in generall; then I will describe the estate and gouernment of the Cantons, seuerally in their places.

A breuiate of this second Bookes Argument.

Three seueral kindes of cōmon wealths, & their hurtfull shadowes

They that haue written concerning common-wealths, doe set downe three sorts.

The first, when all the managing and gouernment of the common-wealth, is in the power of one only, who is called a King, if he gouerne iustly, with consent of the people, and according vnto the lawes; for if he do otherwise, he is a Tyrant.

The second, when a small number of principall men, and more people of good behauiour, do gouerne.

The third, when all the people haue the authority in their hands.

Thus there are three kindes of Common-wealths, to wit, Monarchy, Aristocraty, & Democraty: who haue for their vicious shaddowes, Tyranny, Oligarchy, and Anarchy.

A forme or shape of the Switzers commonwealth.

We cannot compare or sute the Switzers common-wealth, with any of these before named: but as (aunciently) the great Common-wealths of Rome and Carthage, and (in our time) that of Venice may be tearmed mixt and compounded,

A Democraticall kinde of gouernment in ſome of the Cantons.

The other are Ariſtocraticall and Populare.

Affaires of State & differences ended by Ambaſſadors.

The common wealth of the Switzers is not otherwiſe to be gouerned then as it is.

becauſe (in ſome matters) they ſhared or tooke part, with all the three kindes of gouernments; ſo in like maner, the commō-welth of the Switzers is mingled or compoſed of a Seigneuriall, Lordly, and Populare gouernment. For among all the people, of whom the whole common-wealth of the Switzers is compounded: there are ſome, whoſe gouernment is meerely democraticall, & where al things (almoſt) are done by the deliberation of the people. As in thoſe Cantons that haue no cities, to wit, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, Glaris, and Appenzell: yea, euen in Zug, although it is a citty. The other are gouerned by Lords, as cities commonly vſe to be, namely Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Baſile, Fribourg, Solleurre, and Schaffouſe. But becauſe the Soueraignty appertaineth to the people, who doe elect theſe Lords, theſe common-wealths are compounded of two kindes of gouernment: ſo that notwithſtanding, the one is more Ariſtocraticall, and the other more Populare.

So then, the common-wealth of the Switzers beeing compounded of people, that haue not al one, and the ſame forme of gouernment: the order and pollicy alſo is very diuers and mixt. For if vpon ſome dayes of audience, ambaſſadors do aduiſe on matters of the whole common-wealth, or end ſome differences: this appeareth to be a gouernment meerely Ariſtocraticall. And yet neuertheleſſe, becauſe they are (for the moſt part) elected by the people, and that in cauſes and affaires of importance, they cannot go beyond their aduice, but deale according to the peoples command, to whom they muſt render an account of their negotiation: it may eaſily bee noted, that ſuch a kinde of gouernment is not altogether Ariſtocraticall.

Now it plainly appeareth, that the Switzers common-wealth cannot bee better gouerned, for the liberties which they do enioy, was gotten by their anceſtors, not by the induſtry and power of one, or of a ſmall number of particular men: but the people themſelues were imploied therein, and did enfranchize it with the expence of their purſſes, blood, and liues. And therefore it is no more then reaſon, that they ſhould reape ſome fruite of their trauaile. And as concerning, that it ſeemeth incommodious and perillous in a populare eſtate, that all men ſhould deliuer their aduice, but rather, that it ought to be done by them of moſt wiſedome, and men of beſt quality: This danger is not to bee doubted in the Switzers Common-wealth, for they do moſt imploy, and ſend on their dayes of audience, the beſt and wiſeſt perſons of each Canton. And although they haue not power to conclude definitiuely (becauſe it might be a dangerous conſequence, for the peoples liberty) yet notwithſtanding, they are as the cheefeſt councellers, and make a conference of opinions, vpon the State affaires. Afterward, the people giue their conſent, by aſſemblies which they make in Townes and Villages. Now ſuch as are not altogether ſtupid and ill-affected, may know and approue, that which hath bene deliberated in thoſe dayes meetings, for common benefit: conſidering, they giue them plainly to vnderſtand euery thing.

No danger to be feared in the Switzers common-wealth.

The obſeruation among the Switzers.

CHAP. II.

Of the manner and behauiour of the Switzers, in the times of both peace and warre.

The beſt glaſſe to ſhew any common-wealth in his true nature.

FOraſmuch as the right gouernement of a common-wealth, is beſt diſcerned in affaires and managements of peace and warre: it behoooueth vs to ſhew how our predeceſſors haue carried themſelues therein. As concerning exerciſes of war, beſide that which nature hath done, in faſhioning the Switzers fit thereto: neceſſity alſo hath conſtrained them, to apply their paines, and that in good earneſt.

The nature & quality of the country.

The Country is Mountainy, ſharpe, and hard for culture, anciently deſert and ſauage for the moſt part, making the people not onely indurate and hardened for trauaile: but alſo robuſte, ſtiffe, & ſtrong, and ſo (by conſequent) very apt for warre.

Now as natuarally the people of Europe are more magnanimous and warlike, then they of Aſia: ſo the Europeans which which dwell in Mountainous and hard countries, are reputed to be more martially minded then the other. Proofe heereof appeareth, in the histories of the Goths, Vandales, Hunnes, Lombards, Franconians, and other people, who being bred in the very coldest countries of the North; did yet disperse themselues ouer the fayrest parts of Europe, and eyther forraged, or troubled them, treading vnder their feete the power of Rome, sometimes so much renowned through the world. In like manner, as the very coldest countries of the Alpes, do beare the highest and tallest Trees, and haue beasts more fatte and faire then can be desired: so the naturall disposition of the country, and temperature of the ayre, produceth men more robuste and strong then others are. Wherefore, in many Countries, some are men for Armes, others are labourers, and others artezans: but in Switzerland, all are Soldiours borne, euen by a meere manner of desire, and there is not a Switzer, (prouided that hee haue stature and apt disposition) but in him may bee seene the very liues (to life) of a man of warre.

Concerning those people bred on the Alpes, & nature of the country.

All the Switzers are soldiers borne.

And because almost all the neighbors to the Cantons, but especially the Princes of Austria, laboured by continuall warres, to annihilate the liberty of the Switzers, and that for the space of two hundred yeares: meere necessity made the Switzers martiall, beeing compelled to carry weapons daily in their hands, to maintaine their liberty, bridle the headstrong courses of their enemies, & to preserue their wiues and children. And as it was said of Agesilaus, after he was wounded by the Thebanes in an encounter, that he receiued worthy wages, for teaching them the arte of warre: euen so Noblemen that enstructed the olde Switzers, simple peasants, and shepheards, to handle a Sword, and compelled them to vnderstand the trickes of fencing, receiued (in the end) the recompence for their apprentishiip, hauing beene so many times beaten in battailes, and finally driuen out of Switzerland.

The Princes of Austria haue most iniried the Switzers.

A comparison well worth the obseruation.

From hence it ensued, that their lawes & customes were accommodated to the exercises of warre. For whereas in many Countries, the people are forbidden to carry and manage weapons: so on the contrary, there is none so young in Switzerland, dwell he in Citty, Town, Village, or Field, be he a peasant, porter, or of the very baseste condition can be deuised; but he is strictly commanded to haue Arms, according to his quality. And because that in our time, the Harquebuz or Caliuer was in great vse for warre: there was a prize and reward proposed in publike, for such as would exercise, and could dexteriously handle these fiery weapons. Not only in Cities, as was done in many parts of Germany: but also in the most peopled Townes and Villages. Nay, there was a prize and reward appointed for children, that could draw the Bow; to the end, that they might afterward be the better fashioned for weapons of more danger: which prooued to such an expert practise, that from their very youth, they accustomed themselues to discharge the Caliuer.

Prizes & rewards proposed onely for encouragement to handle the caliuer

Their other pastimes also fauored all of war. For they neuer vsed to meete together, were it on solemne daies & festiuals, according to the Churches dedications, or at weddings and other such like occasions, but with Drums and Trumpets for war. And it was (and stil is) a great honor for a Bride-groome, to bee attended on with a great number of Pikes, Halberts, & Shot, who (vnentreated) march before him, or come to honour his feast, in the nature of a muster, marching after the manner of war. Many times also, boyes of 8. or 10. yeares old, and others somewhat more aged, meet together and make musters, with Drums & Ensignes, some bearing Caliuers, others Halberts, & others Pikes: so that to see them march, it might well be said, that they had hearts & hands already, apt to manage those warlike weapons. In this manner, they that neuer vnderstood any thing set downe in the Military precepts of Vegetius, nor of any other, inured from their infancy, without any command: but onely of their owne motion, and by a naturall inclination to Armes, can carry and manage themselues with countenances and steppings fit for Soldiors. In many places, euery yeare, or at certaine times of the yeare, the Lords cause general musters in arms to be made for all their followers, as if they were going to war against the enemy. These musters are somtimes performed at the dedication of Temples, somtimes at Fairs; and in some other places, when the

It is an especiall command to euery Switzer yong and olde to beare Armes.

Good & vertuous examples are terrible to bad minded men.

Subiects take their oath to a Gouernor, ſent newly to ſome Bayliwicke, for then they all muſter, and ſhew themſelues in Armes.

Other agilities and commendable qualities exerciſed by the Switzers in ſeueral kinds.

It is altogether needleſſe, that I ſhould make any long diſcourſe of other exerciſes, which do diſpoſe thē to be the more valiant in war: as to runne, leape, throw the ſtone and barre, to wraſtle, to ſhew all kindes of defence fit for Arms; for which there are prizes publikely appointed euery yeare. Moreouer, I am of the minde, that in all chriſtendome, there is not any people, that do exerciſe themſelues more in ſwimming, then the Switzers: who (with much eaſe) can vſe that Arte, ſwimming thorough great Lakes, Riuers, Streames, and very impetuous floods, where-with the country doth greatly abound. When they are at leyſure, and haue done their husbandry in the fields: they daily follow hunting, ſometimes ouer the higheſt Mountaines and Rockes, almoſt inacceſſable, after wilde Goates, Kids, and other beaſts. At other times they purſue Beares, Wolues, Ounces, & wilde Boares, reputing it as an honour to him that can kil one of thoſe ſauage creatures, and faſten his head at the entrance of his doore; yet ſometimes hee makes a preſent of it to the Seigneury. The Grecians had an ancient cuſtome among thē, to giue the heads of wilde Boares, vnto Gentlemen or Gouernours of the country, as an honourable preſent after hunting.

Their ſports and paſtimes after tilling their grounds

Now we are to declare, how the Switzers doe carry themſelues in warre. Firſt then, I will make mention of their Arms: next, how they chuſe and enroule theyr Soldiours: And conſequently, of other things belonging to the acte of warre. Let me then tell you, that (ordinarily) the Switzers Souldiors are well furniſhed with Armes in their houſes: yet (oftentimes) the Citties and Towns do fit them with Armes, which are kept in their publike Arſenalles and Magazines. Their Armes are commonly thoſe of the Germane Lance-Knights, to wit: the Harquebuze, or Caliuer, or Musket; the Pike of eighteene foote in length; the Halbert: the Courtlace, and Sword made apt for both hands. They weare alſo a long Sword by their ſides, whereas their anceſtors did weare one farre ſhorter on their thighes, proper to ioyne with the enemy neerer hand, and to giue him the Stoccado.

How the ſwitzers do beare themſelues in warre.

What kinde of Armes are moſt in vſe with the Switzers, according to the elder times.

Now adayes, ouer and beſide this long Sword, they weare a large Poniard or Dagger, of three or foure fingers bredth, and ſharpe pointed: which the very meaneſt of them do adorne and enrich, with curious workmanſhip of gold and ſiluer. Some weare ſhirtes of Mayle; others Corſelets, or a good Cuirats for the body.

What they vſe now at this preſent day, in their due order.

The poorer ſort, and eſpecially the Muskettiers, content themſelues with a Murrian or head-peece. Some, in ſtead of Armes plated with yron or ſteele, make vſe of skinnes of Beares or Buffelles: Others weare doublets of linnen cloth, redoubled in iuſt thickneſſe, and made full of oylet-holes, and theſe doublets thus made, are not eaſily to bee tranſpierced. For the reſt, as Polybius writeth, that the braue Parado or Romane Soldiour, vſed to weare a Panache of three plumes, red or blacke, about the length of a foote and an halfe, becauſe this addition to the reſt of his furniture for warre, made the Soldiour ſeeme to be twice greater and higher, then he was indeed, much more comly to looke on, and terrible to the enemy. Euen ſo the Switzers Soldiours, who couet to appeare ſightly among all other, do weare on their heads a Plume of Feathers, one part white, and the other anſwerable to the Enſigne, or Colours of their diſtinct Cantons.

The braue Parado, or Soldiour of Rome in his gallantry of Plumes.

They beare euery man vpon his Arms, a white croſſe, plaine and right, which is the Switzers Enſigne of war: Each man yeelds himſelfe vnder the Standard of his Canton. They ſerue their turne with Drums, Fifes, and Trumpets: yet in ſuch ſort, notwithſtanding, that the Drums of the Switzers are eaſily diſcerned frō them of the Allemanes or Germanes, becauſe the ſound of the Switzers Drum is weighty and deepe, and the other more bluſtring. Particularly, they of Vri vſe in warre, a Cornet made of a wilde Bulles horne. They of Vnderuald do the like. The Lucernians often-times vſe a Cornet of Braſſe, which they ſay was giuen them by Charlemaigne.

The Impreſſe or ſignall on the Armes of the Switzers purpoſed for warre.

Now as concerning the enrollement of their Soldiours, it is done in manner following.

If

How and in what manner they vſe to enroule theyr men for war. If warre be made on them at home.

If warre be made vpon the Switzers, and that they are aſſailed in their owne country; as no perſon was excuſed at Rome, when Hannibàll was at the gates of the Citty; euen ſo (without the leaſt delay) all ſuch as are able to carry Armes, they lay command on, to run with ſpeedy ſuccour, as to a ſudden and dangerous fire, which euery hand ought helpe to quench. Yet in all this, they proceede by good order; for in the time of peace, each Canton hath certaine Captaines, Enſignes, and choſen men, that ought ſtill to be ready vpon any warning. But becauſe it cometh to paſſe more often, that they muſt leade their troops out of their countrie, and all are not meete for marching, neither ought to be drawne abroad, for feare the country ſhould be left naked of men of warre, and ſo remaine as a prey to the enemy: Then one neighbour makes choiſe of another for his companion, and according to the aduice of Xenophon, the very ſtrongeſt Army that can bee imagined, is that which is compounded of friends and companions.

When they march foorth abroad to war

The care of the old Switzers in their enrolement.

The ancient Switzers well knowing this, tooke eſpeciall care, that in their enrolement, friends, and ſuch as knew one another, might be ranked together. And heereupon they ordained, that in warre, Switzers ſhould aide each other, & loue together like brethren, throwing of all particular hatreds, which they could formerly pretend one againſt another. The other Allemaigne Soldiours had a cuſtom to call one another brother: in regard whereof, ſome haue thought, that our ancients named them Germanes, which is as much to ſay, as brethren. Yet notwithſtanding, they were all (almoſt) at the Swords point one againſt another, & (very often) the furious Lance-knights, who by their hackt and ſlaſht faces, ſeeme to breathe no other word but warre: haue receiued more cuts and gaſhes by their friends and companions, then from their enemies.

A reaſon concerning the name of Germanes, and how it came vp at firſt.

A great happineſſe to be among ſuch men, and in ſuch a campe.

On the contrary, ordinarily in the Switzers Campe, there is a very great tranquility, & one louing another (thogh otherwiſe they know not at all) euen as if they were brethren. And when they are the very greateſt enemies in the world: yet notwithſtanding, for the good and quietnes of their country, they renounce all ſpleene & particular quarrels. Whereof I will declare a memorable example, which oftentimes (in my youth) I heard reported by my anceſtors.

A very memorable example of great vertue in the Switzers, appearing by two mortall enemies.

Two Switzers being deadly enemies, to wit, Arnould of Vnderuald, who afterward was a great Captaine, and Zerchintes of Zurich, both of them very valiant men, and meete for war. It came to paſſe, that during the warre of Suaba, they were both at one time in the Camp: when the cheefe Leaders (knowing their enmity) commanded them to be friends, and (as then) to forget their ancient quarrels. It happened in a certaine encounter, that Arnould was round engirt with his enemies: which Zerchintes perceiuing, came with his companions to releeue him, and did ſet him free from the danger wherein he was. In the euening, being returned to the Campe, Arnould went to the Tent of Zerchintes, and called to him by his name. His fellowes and followers, beeing ignorant of that which had happened, were perſwaded by their owne opinion, that he came to challenge combate with the other. Wherefore they ſtept betweene them, & admoniſhed Arnould, to remember the command giuen by the Captains, and to take heede of moouing any trouble in the Campe. He anſwered, that he came with a quite contrary diſpoſition, and ſo acquainted them with all the aduenture. And inſtantly preſented to Zerchintes a very goodly horſe, fit for warre ſeruice, which he had wonne in that daies trauaile. From that time forward, euen to the houre of death, they were very louing and intimate friends.

How the ancient Switzers vſed to diuide ſuch booues as they won in the warre.

As the ancient Switzers ſhewed themſelues brethren, in ſuccouring and aſſiſting their companions, doing as they wold be done to themſelues: ſo did they obſerue the ſame forme, in ſharing and diuiding a gotten booty. For firſt of al, they gaue prohibition on paine of death, that no man of theirs, ſhould bee ſo hardy or bold, as to forſake his ranck & the troops, vntill ſuch time as the enemy ſhould bee driuen in route. Afterward, when the Captaines had giuen licence to rifle and ranſacke; all the booty was brought in common, & diſtributed by the poll. And becauſe the cantons are publikely vnited; euen ſo the publike booty, as Artillery, Caſtles, conquered Countries, Tolles, and other reuennues, are parted among them by equall portion. Albeit there are ſome of the Cantons, that doe furniſh out twice, thrice, and ſome whiles fiue times more Soldiours, then others doe. Neuertheleſſe, extraordinarily and particularly, recompence is giuen, and gifts beſtowed vpon Soldiers, that haue borne themſelues valiantly, & performed ſome braue exploit in the warre, beyond the fortune of their companions: and alſo to thoſe Cantons in like manner, that haue beene more imployed and charged, then the other.

Distribution by equality of portions.

They that deſerue beſt ought to haue beſt.

Foraſmuch alſo, as victuals and other munitions, are in warre to bee eſpecially conſidered: the ancient Switzers ordained, that ſuch as brought victuals, Arms, or other neceſſary things, and came to ſell them in the Switzers campe, they ſhould be fauoured & maintained, in all reſpects as if they were Switzers. There is alſo a perpetuall law, and eſtabliſhed by length of time, that in warre, Temples and other places deſtined for the exerciſe of Religion, ſhould be left intire and vntoucht. And that no outrage ſhould be offered to maids nor women: but onely to ſuch, as ſhall giue Armes to enemies, or acte the parts of Soldiors, by hurling ſtones, or hurting in ſome other manner.

The ancient Switzers order for victuals, Arms, munitions, &c.

Prohibition for violating of Churches, maids, and women.

As concerning the manner of camping, and raunging themſelues in battaile; it is needleſſe for me to ſhew heere, that which the Switzers do in particular, or in common with the other Germans. Only I will ſay, that in our time, and by the memory of our aunceſtors; among all Infantery, the battalion of the Switzers hath alwayes beene highly eſteemed. For being compoſed of Pikes croſſed, it reſembleth a Porcupine, ſo that ſuch as vnderſtand the affaires of warre, doe iudge, and experience hath approoued it, that this battailion may beare head againſt the horſemen. In the battaile of Nouara, the Infantery of the Switzers beeing not couered with any horſe: foiled and droue in route, the French Infantery and Horſemen. Afterward, on the day at Marignano, hauing had battaile againſt king Frances, two ſeuerall dayes, which they loſt, by reaſon of the thundring Artillery, and multitude of their enemies: Neuertheleſſe, though vanquiſhed, yet they returned to Millaine, ranged in battaile, ſo that their retreat ſeemed nothing like a flight; and yet the French (for all their victory) durſt not follow them. It is not long ſince, when on the day at Dreux, in the firſt Troubles, the Reiſtres & the French Caualery, liuely charged the battailion of the Switzers, and ſlew the moſt part of their Captaines: yet notwithſtanding, the Switzers rallied themſelues three times, and kept their rankes ſo well, that euen in that battaile, their enemies confeſſed theſelues, that they were very valiant & warlike men.

But let vs leaue ſuch diſcourſe to men of warre, and ſhew you, how the Switzers buſie themſelues in the times of peace, & how they are ordered from their infancy. Firſt, as concerning letters and learning, which holds the firſt ranke: I freely confeſſe, that the ancient Switzers were not very carefull thereof. But rather they imitated the Romans therein, when they were in warres continually, againſt the Aequi, Volſcians, Veientes, and other neighbouring people. And as they then, with ruſticall ſongs celebrated the valiancy of their anceſtors: ſo in the ſame manner, the olde Switzers had vulgar ſongs, to remember the victories which they had obtained in warre. The Song wherein the day of Sempach is aptly deſcribed, when as Duke Leopold was ſlaine, is very common in Switzerland. As for knowledge of Artes, and of the Latine tongue, men of warre, bruske and vnapt to handle Bookes, rather thought, that ſuch matters belonged to Churchmen. But in our dayes, there are to be found in all the cantons of Switzers, men learned both in the Tongues and Sciences. And as for many that vnderſtand not the Latine tongue: yet they forbeare not to reade Hiſtories of all kindes, either concerning gouernment of life, or affaires of State, or of Religion: And there are Libraries, well furniſhed with Bookes, written in the vulgar tongue.

How the Switzers carry themſelues in times of peace and are trained vp from their childehood.

Letters or learning little regarded among the ancient Switzers.

Many in the Cantons learned in toongs and ſciences.

Now, as concerning Schooles, it is a very long time ſince, that the Colledges of the Abbey of S. Gall, and of Coire among the Griſons, were renowned, as wee haue already ſhewne elſe-where. But within ſome certaine yeares after, letters and learning became quite baniſhed. Thē Pope Pius, formerly named Aeneas Syluius, prouided an Vniuerſity at Baſile, frō whence whence haue come many learned and excellent men: whom it is needles to name, becauſe they are ſufficiently famous, and knowne by their writings. There are alſo diuers notable and publike Schooles at Zurich, at Berne, and one eſtabliſhed at Lauſanna, by the Lords of Berne. Nor muſt I let ſleepe in ſilence, the goodly Printing-houſes at Baſile, Zurich, and Geneua, renowned among them all that are in Germany.

Goodly Printing-houſes.

Beſide the ſtudy of good letters, wherof I haue made mention, there is loue of all vertue, and eſpecially of Iuſtice, which appertaineth alſo to the maintenance of peace. For it is a matter moſt certaine, that the common-wealth of the Switzers is grounded vpon moſt great equity, and hath euermore beene famous, in regard of her iuſtice: as appeareth by the lawes, alliances, cuſtomes, and manner of life among the ancient Switzers, and by many examples, and particular actions. I need not make mention of their lawes, becauſe they agree with thoſe of other common-wealths, that are ruled by good lawes: where crimes and miſdeeds are ſeuerely puniſhed, without any exception of perſons.

Loue of vertue & iuſtice among the Switzers.

The Lawes of the Switzers.

As for their alliances, the Articles of them, reported in the firſt Booke: do declare, with what vprightneſſe, diligence, & faithfulneſſe they are made. The ends of them are, that euery man may enioy his owne peaceably, and that (by a common conſent) all violence may be expulſt and baniſhed. For the better gouerning of this caſe, it is expreſſely forbidden, to goe and aſſault, and make warre one vpon another, either raſhly, or without iuſt cauſe. And therefore alſo, before Armes may be vndertaken, the wiſeſt and moſt diſcreete perſons in all the nation: in a publike aſſembly, muſt examine the cauſes of the warre, and vnderſtand them to be iuſt and lawfull. Then afterward, when queſtion is vrged of repulſing an enemy, it is moſt ſtrictly prohibited to the confederates, that ought to giue aſſiſtance; to vſe therein no fraud nor cunning. But if they be called by letters, or by meſſages, or, admit they could not bee called, the paſſages being fore-cloſed by the enemy: yet notwithſtanding, they are commanded to go and giue ſuccour, euen to their vtmoſt power.

The alliances of the Switzers.

Of vndertaking Armes or going to warre.

In the caſe of mutuall aide and aſsiſtance

Moreouer, becauſe it many times happens, that the recouery of debts and borrowed money, do beget great debates, ſo that ſuch differences betweene particular perſons, doe ſometimes ſet the Cantons at variance one with another: the Articles of the alliances do euery where make mention, what courſe is to bee obſerued in the recouery of ſuch debts, and for taking pawns, to cut off the ouer great licence of lenders, and to ſhunne the fraudulency of borrowers. Whoſoeuer hath beene but a meane reader of Hiſtories, knowes very wel, what troubles haue happned in Rome, in the caſe of debts, at all times, and whenſoeuer the people are oppreſſed by the violence of vſurers, & taxed in great ſummes: then they would mutiny, and demaund, that the vſurers contracts might be torne in peeces, & other made of more honeſt nature. But the prouidence and vprightneſſe of the auncient Switzers, made ſuch an imbarment, that neuer was the abolition of Obligations vrged in Switzerland; although the country is not very great, nor rich, and hath beene troubled with warres continually.

Concerning debts & borrowed monies.

Great troubles in Rome about caſes of debts.

Great care & prouidence in the Switzers.

Becauſe alſo, that men of warre are prompt and ready, to lay hand on their weapons, and (oftentimes) fight vnder a falſe and dangerous pretence, they being men rather quarrellous, ſturdy & outragious, then valiant, yet taking a delight in this forwardneſſe of enduring nothing, as thinking it makes men magnanimous and inuincible: the auncient Switzers laboured to remedy this euill, firſt by impoſition of great fines, on ſuch as began the ſtirre, and to outrage their aſſociates. But becauſe choller is a furious beaſt, and very difficult to be brideled: to hinder him from taking carriere, and obuiate murders; they added another remedy, to wit, that ſuch as were found preſent at thoſe quarrels and debates, if they did not pacifie and hinder their proceeding, and impoſe on them the penalties appointed by the lawes: then themſelues ſhould bee greeuouſly puniſhed by the Magiſtrate. For they would not permit, that men ſhould be ſo ouerſwaied and maſtered by choller, and their lawes (in the meane while) loſe their power and authority. If any man committed a murder, and eſcaped from the hand of iuſtice: hee could not be receiued into any of the Cantons.

An eſpeciall care againſt quarrels and frayes of particular perſons.

A good law to be vſed in other places.

Againſt ſuch as committed murder.

If

If any man were baniſhed, for offending any one of the Cantons, or killing a man: he was to ſtand excluded from all the reſt, except hee could proue by ſufficient witneſſes, that he ſlew his enemy in the mere defence of his owne body.

The Switzers are protectors of the oppreſſed.

Such hath beene, and ſtill is, the equity of the Switzers in doing iuſtice, & puniſhing the faulty from time to time: that many ſtrãgers haue made their recourſe to them, and haue accepted them for Arbitrators in their differences. For they do ſhew themſelues protectors of all ſuch as haue any wrong done to them, and vpon this their comming to them; they haue ſent Ambaſſadours, nay, haue vndertaken Armes, to re-eſtabliſh in their goods and poſſeſſions, ſome that haue bene deſpoyled of them by very powerful Lords.

Examples of diuers protected & holpen to their rights by the Switzers.

The Cantons (in this cauſe) made war on the Princes of Auſtria, to maintaine the right of the Fulachs, Cittizens of Schaffouſe. And for certaine Gentlemen of Stiria, named the Gradlers: & conſtrained the Duke of Auſtria, to reſtore ſuch goods as he deteyned from them. In the like caſe, but of much greater importance they gaue battaile vnto Duke Charles of Bourgongne; to maintaine Renè, Duke of Lorraine, whom Charles had diſpoſſed of the moſt part of his countries. In like manner alſo, many times haue they made warre on certaine theeues, who couering themſelues with the title of Noblemen; robbed and ſpoyled Merchants. To foile theſe theeues, they haue bin faine to make out vpon them, not onely in their owne country of Switzerland; but alſo in countries further off, allying themſelues (to effect ſo good a worke) with thoſe farre off townes. By which meanes, the wayes of Switzerland haue beene made very ſecure: ſo that Merchants, charged with neuer ſo great ſummes of money, goe and come in al ſafety, tranſporting their Merchandizes whether they pleaſe, without any need of company or tranſport. And a pleaſant Prouerbe grew thereon, that if any man carried his purſſe full of gold or ſiluer on his ſtaffes end; hee might ſafely paſſe through Switzerland, and care not how many looked on him.

The Switzers haue made warre vpon theeues that robbed and ſpoiled paſſengers.

Good actions are euermore worthy to bee commended.

Iuſtice ſildome walkes without her companion Liberality, vnder which epithite wee will comprehend hoſpitality, which alwayes hath made the people of Switzerland to bee highly commended. They haue not the delicates of the Italian and French, but they offer liberally thoſe preſents which the earth yeeldes them, as namely, Milke, Butter, & Hony. And who would bee aſhamed, or can deſpiſe this liberality; ſeeing the great Patriark Abraham, entertained Angels with ſuch viands, when they came to ſee him? And yet the country is not without good ſtore of wilde Beaſts and Fowles, with diuers kindes of Fiſhes, both in Lakes & Riuers. And as great men in times paſt, (ſo ſweetly ſung of by learned Poets) honoured men of worth, by giuing them fleſh for their food: euen ſo oftentimes in Switzerland, preſents are giuen to ſtrãgers, and them of the ſame country alſo, paſſing from one place to another, of good and delicate fleſh, namely Veniſon, and alſo of very dainty Fiſh. But principally, the Switzers are liberall and charitable to the poore, in lodging, feeding, & furniſhing them with other needefull things: ſo that there are very few countries, wherein ſo many poore beggers are to be ſeene, as in Switzerland. I do not heere diſpute, whether the Magiſtrate doth well, or no, in ſuffering or ſupporting them: onely I was deſirous to ſhew heerein, the great humanity of the Switzers towards the poore, which reſort thether from all parts.

It is no ſhame to follow vertuous & good examples.

The Switzers are greatly charitable to the poore.

The people of Switzerland (among all other) take pleaſure in Feaſts and publike Banquets. In Cities and Townes, they of one trade, or of one band, haue certaine houſes ordained to aſſemble themſelues in. Euery Village (almoſt) hath a houſe by it ſelfe, which they cal the houſe of good company: becauſe they there meete, onely to maintaine loue and amity. The men doe meete there often, and ſometimes the women are inuited thether, to ſitte and banquet with their huſbands. They do not vſe any ſumptuous diſhes or delicates, but moſt often content themſelues with one or two kindes of meates. Many times euery neighbour bringeth his diſh, and there feed friendly together, on that which was prouided for their owne priuate houſes. And as among the Lacedemonians it was ordained, that aged men and Magiſtrates ſhould be preſent at banquets, to the ende, that euery man ſhould carry himſelfe honeſtly: the very very ſame is practiſed in Switzerland, ſo that all of one Trade, or of one Brotherhood, haue their diſtinct places, and the Magiſtrate, with the moſt auncient men, haue the higher ende of the Table allowed to them.

The Switzers delight not in Muſicke at their meetings

They do not much delight in Muſicke at ſuch Banquets, becauſe they conceiue more pleaſure in conferring together: either of particular affaires, or (oftentimes) of publike buſineſſe. Aboue all, when one of the moſt aged begins to diſcourſe on ſome notable matters, which happened in his youth, or that himſelfe had learned from his predeceſſors; euery one is very attentiue, without the leaſt interruption. And many times, he that hath a good & pleaſing tongue, will ſpeake loud enough on the faire deſeruings of his Anceſtors. The ancient Switzers were very ſober & modeſt in all things, eſpecially at publike Feaſts and Banquets: ſo that it is a matter rare & moſt ignominious, if any man ſhould be drunke in ſuch an aſſembly.

The Author greeued to write that which the peoples folly compels him to do.

But I am enforced to write, and to my great greefe, that although there is more moderation in the Switzers Banquets, euen at this day, then in many other people of Germany: yet notwithſtanding, drunkenneſſe will not be baniſhed, nor ſo vilely thought on, as in elder times it hath beene. And as Xenophon ſaide of the Lacedemonians (whoſe common-wealth hee had moſt highly commended) that hee durſt not maintaine now in his time, that the lawes of Lycurgus were in full force, becauſe in former times, ſober and moderate people, affected rather to liue among them in great continence, then to be Lords in other Cities, where they might poſſeſſe worlds of riches: So now in the time of Xenophon, the Lacedemonians, yea, them of greateſt power among them, contended to haue the gouernment of cities, as fearing they ſhould be compeld to liue in their owne particular condition, glorifying themſelues openly, of their wealth and riches. And whereas their Anceſtors were ſtudious, to make themſelues become honourable, & worthy of giuing command to others: theſe men coueted after dignities onely. So that whereas the Grecians (on their owne meere motion) made requeſt to the Lacedemonians, that they would accept of the gouernment: matters became ſo contrarily changed, that the Grecians prayed & exhorted one another, to reſiſt againſt the Lacedemonians, yea, and to expulſe thē vtterly, fearing leſte they ſhould vſurpe vpon the gouernment.

The words of Xenophon concerning the Lacedemonians.

A ſtrange alteration in ſo rare a gouernment.

It appeareth now to me, that euen as much may be ſaid of the Switzers: for I muſt needs confeſſe, that the frugality & temperance of our auncients, in eating, drinking, cloathing, and in the whole courſe of life, is dead, or as if it had neuer beene at all. The Switzers are not now ſo continent and ſpare in liuing, as heeretofore, when they maintained their liues with the labour both of their mindes and hands, without taking wages of Kings & Princes, ſtrangers to them. And therfore I am much affraid, leſte we loſe that wholy too, which yet remaineth, namely, valiancy and ſtrength in warre, humanity, debonarity, iuſtice, and vprightneſſe. So that one day, they who (heretofore) haue ſo carefully compaſſed amity & alliance with the Switzers: it is to bee doubted, may change their mindes, and ſtudy how they ſhall beſt ſubdue them. I deſire of God, that he will turne from my country ſo deadly a danger; and I deſire alſo, and exhort all them that ought to think theron, to ſtriue to bring in vſe againe thoſe honeſt ancient manners, that frugality, continence, equity, humanity, loyalty, & conſtancy of the olde Switzers in al their actions.

The Switzers are greatly altered from their famous progenitors.

The Authors eſpeciall care of his countries honour, and of his countrymen.

CHAP. III.

Of publike aſſemblies and meetings, or rather of the Councell and Senate of the Switzers.

The three ornaments of any common-wealth.

IN all Commonwealths, three things are eſpecially to be cōſidered, to wit, the Councell or Senate, the Magiſtrate, and Iuſtice; for the Common-wealth of the Switzers hath no common Magiſtrates: except wee may place in that ranke, the Bayliffes and Gouernors, which are ſent heere and there, not by the councell of the Common-wealth, but by each one of the Cantons in it ſelfe. For the reſt, the coun-councell of Switzerland is not alwayes equall in number; for ſometimes, ouer & beſide the Cantons, the other allies and confederates, eſpecially the Ambaſſadors of S. Gall, of the Griſons, and of Mulhouſe, do meete together. And then this is the very greateſt councell, which doe aſſemble but rarely, and to conferre on peace or warre, or of other affayres, which appertaine equally to all the confederates.

The councell of the Switzers not equal alwayes.

The Ambaſſadors of the 13 cantons meet oftneſt together, but not vpon all occaſions.

Ofteneſt of all other, there do none but the Ambaſſadors of the thirteen cantons meete together, to conſult and aduiſe on matters of the Common-wealth. Euery man of them hath a deliberate voyce, as well as the other, and therefore, though one Canton do ſend two Ambaſſadors: yet they ſhall haue but one voyce, & one aduice, becauſe the aduice is collected according to the number of the Cantons, and not to the number of Ambaſſadors. Neuertheleſſe, all the Cantons doe not ſend their Ambaſſadors at all daies meetings; as when there is queſtion of the Bayliwicks, gouerned by the ſeauen or eight firſt Cantons, or of other things on them depending: then ſeuen or eight ambaſſadors onely meete together, & haue their deliberatiue voyces. But if there be any ſpeech concerning the Bayliwicks of Italy, belonging to the twelue firſt Cantons: then thoſe twelue ambaſſadors doe aſſemble. And as for that which concerneth the good of the whole Commonwealth: the ambaſſadors of the thirteene Cantons, do then make a perfect & compleate body of councell.

The Ambaſſadors haue their aſſemblies according to their cauſes.

Factions among the Switzers, about matter of religion.

In our times, ſince Switzerland became diuided into factions, by reaſon of differences happening in Religion, they likewiſe inſtituted particular aſſemblies: ſo that the fiue Cantons of Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, and Zug, that make expreſſe profeſſion of the Religion and Ceremonies of the Romane Church, & are very ſtrictly vnited together, by eſpeciall amity (I know not whether it bee by league or alliance) they meete together more often then the other cantons, and are (as it were) a councell apart. And therefore, when ſpeech is made of the fiue ſmall Cantons, they before named are vnderſtood, and not the fiue firſt in alliance. As alſo in making mention of three, of ſeuen, or of eight Cantons: it muſt be conſidered according to the time and order, when they were entred into league; as thus. Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, Lucerna and Zurich, ſhall be the fiue Cantons. Sometimes they of Fribourg and of Solleurre, aſſemble themſelues with the fiue forenamed, and call themſelues the ſeuen catholike Cantons. Now, although any in the cantons of Glaris and Appenzell, doe belong to the catholike Church, & Maſſe is ſung in their cheefeſt Villages: yet notwithſtanding, they are not rancked among the catholikes, becauſe (for the moſt part) their people walke with them that are of the new Religion. Finally, the foure Citties, to wit, Zurich, Berne, Baſile, and Schaffouſe, haue likewiſe (ſometimes) their aſſembly apart; but yet it is not ſo often as the other.

Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, and Zug, are the fiue ſmall cantons.

The ſeuen Catholike Cantons, that will be ſo diſtinguiſhed by themſelues.

Of what matters the councell of the Switzers vſe to take knowledge.

Moreouer, it is very vneaſie to diſcipher particularly, all thoſe things whereon the councell of Switzers do deliberate: neuertheleſſe, I will touch ſome of the principall articles. The firſt and cheefeſt, is concerning war and peace, as likewiſe mention is made in moſt part of the alliances, that if a great wrong is done to one of the cantons, and it thinketh good to haue reaſon by armes: it muſt firſt bee referred to the councell of the leagues, to the end that the ambaſſadors may regard together, whether the cauſe of warre bee iuſt, or no, leſte warre ſhould bee lightly moued, and vpon triuiall occaſions. Then afterward, if it appeare to bee expedient to begin warre, and for the ſafety of the common-wealth, the meanes muſt next be conſulted on.

War is not to be moued on sleight occaſions.

An example of Rotuille allied to the Cantons, threatened with danger.

It chanced (in my time) that Chriſtopher Landberg, being leagued with many Gentlemen, furiouſly to inuade them of Rotuille, allied to the Cantons: many ſaid, that ſuch ſuccour ought to be ſent to Rotuille, as the inhabitants deſired. But the greater part of the Senatours, and Deputies to the councell of Switzerland, hauing vnderſtood the cauſes of the variance; hindred any ſuch proceeding. For they ſaw plainely, that the whole State would ouerthrow it ſelfe into very great perill, and vpon ſilly occaſion: becauſe there was pregnant apparance, that by inuading Landberg, they muſt therby meddle with the Duke of Wirtemberg his neighbour, to whom the Switzers hadde beene good friends a long time. Nor could they come ſo neere him, without irrita-irritating (by the ſame meanes) many other Princes, that wer his kindred, friends, and confederates. Neuertheleſſe, becauſe they of Rotuille ſhould not complaine, that they were forſaken in ſuch a neceſſity: fifty Soldiors of each Canton were ſent as a Garriſon to their Towne, but they ſtayed at Schaffouſe, and (ſoone after) the difference was pacified by Iudges, choſen for eyther ſide. And as the councell deliberated on the matter of warre, and whether it ſhould be begun, or no: peace alſo was treated on by the ſame councell, and not by the Cantons in particular.

Example of the warre at Suaba, when peace was made at Fribourg.

According heereto, in the warre of Suaba, all the Cantons together ſent their ambaſſadors to Baſile, where they made peace with the Emperor Maximillian. So the councell of Switzerland, aſſembling at Fribourg; made perpetuall peace with the King, and all the Realme of France, in the yeare, 1516. The negotiation of alliances, is ioyned with that of peace: for very often in the dayes of our anceſtors, and in ours alſo, the Cantons (by aduice of their councell) haue made alliances with neighbouring Kings and Princes. Wherin this order is kept ſtill to this day, that no one of the Cantons can bee conſtrained to make alliance with a ſtrange Prince, but is to remaine at his owne liberty. As in the yeare, 1519. when all the cantons allied themſelues with king Frances; they of Zurich refuſed to be bound, and afterward, they of Berne renounced this alliance. In like manner, when Philebert, Duke of Sauoye, obtained to enter league and amity with the Switzers: firſt the fiue ſmall cantons began, and then Solleurre ioyned with them afterward.

No Canton can be compeld to make alliance with a ſtrange Prince.

For the eſtabliſhment of lawes and ordinances.

The ſecond Article, of ſuch things as the councell of Switzerland do ordaine, concerneth lawes and ordinances. Each Canton hath his lawes and cuſtomes by himſelfe, which remaine firme and inuiolable: neuertheleſſe, by a common conſent, our anceſtors deuiſed and eſtabliſhed many publike Edicts and Ordinances. Among which number, are the fore-mentioned lawes of warre: wherewith alſo may the accord at Stantz bee rancked, paſſed betweene the eight firſt Cantons, and whereof we haue ſpoken in the firſt book. Alſo, becauſe Prieſts abuſed their immunities and priuiledges; they were reproued by a publike Edict, containing this in effect. Whoſoeuer of the cittizens or inhabitants of the cantons, be hee Prieſt or no, be he a Counceller, Vaſſaile, or bound to the Princes of Auſtria: he ſhall ſtand bound neuertheles, and promiſe by oath to his canton, to procure & aduance the profite therof, and of all the confederats, and diſcouer ſpeedily and in good conſcience, all that may bring them any damage. This oath ſhall precede all other, and no obligation, how expreſſe ſoeuer it be, ſhall excuſe them, if they go againſt this oath.

Gainſt Prieſts that abuſed their immunities & priuiledges.

Such Prieſts as dwell in Switzerland, and are not of the country, may draw no man into ciuill or eccleſiaſticall iuſtice, out of the country; except in matrimoniall and eccleſiaſticall cauſes. If any one dare do otherwiſe, the Magiſtrates of the canton wherein he dwelleth, ſhall prohibite all men, not to harbour, lodge, or friend him, nor to frequent his company: none ſhall preſume to protect him, vntill ſuch time as hee hath renounced all forraigne iuſtice, and payed the charges of the party, that receiued endamagement by ſuch iuſtice. Whoſoeuer ſhall doe wrong to his neighbour, eyther in taking pawnes againſt order of right, or by any other meanes: he ſhall be puniſhable in body and goods, vntill hee haue ſatisfied the party. He that is not of the Church, and yet hath ſummond his aduerſary, eyther before a Iudge of the Church, or ſeculer, and out of the country: he ſhall pay all the charges endured in that cauſe, in regard hee ought to pleade in the ſame place, where the party dwelleth. No man ſhall aſſigne ouer his action to another, by which meanes he may the eaſier afflict the contrary party.

No Prieſt may commence law-ſuites out of the Country, but with exception.

For puniſhing of wrong done to neighbors.

No ſuite to be pleaded out of the country

If any man ſhall renounce his Bourgeſhip, and therby do wrong to another, by drawing him into ſtrange iuſtice: hee ſhall neuer bee receiued againe into the number of the cittizens, till firſt hee haue made ſatisfaction to the party. All the cantons ſhall take order, that the waies be ſure and ſafe, becauſe both Switzers & ſtrangers may paſſe ſecurely, conuaying their Merchandizes through the country, without any manner of violence done to them: whoſoeuer ſhall attempt otherwiſe, by common conſent of all, and our helpe to the vttermoſt, hee ſhall be compelled

No colour admitted to wrong another.

For ſecure & ſafe paſſage on the high-wayes.

No pawne to be taken but by the Magistrates consent.

pelled to make satisfaction, answerable to the faculties and riches as the party hath lost. No man in any Canton whatsoeuer, shall receiue pawne or pledge of any other, without consent of the Magistrate: neyther shall do, or procure any iniury to be done to his neighbour; but hee that doth the contrary, shall be compelled by them of his Canton, to satisfie the other to the vttermost damage.

An Edict against Brokers for Benefices.

All these things before recited, were agreed on, and ordained by the sixe cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, and Zug. There was another Edict also published, against many Brokers of Benefices, for in regard that such fellowes did oftentimes cause much trouble vnto Priests, made by the Ordinaries of the places, and (vnder colour of some purchased Bulles) were so put in possession of vacant Benefices: It was concluded by common consent of all the thirteen cantons, in the yeare, 1520. that if such people pursued to maintaine the right of such Bulles, they should be imprisoned, where if they did not renounce those Bulles, they should be drowned. I could set downe many other examples, of Edicts & publike lawes, but I thinke it needlesse: and these formerly rehearsed, are to no other end, but to let the Reader perceiue, that the ancient Switzers, who were deuoutly affected to their Religion, and euermore gaue great honor to men of the church, did neuer yet (for all that) leaue the bridle so freely to them, or admit them any such licence, as was contrary to publike liberty and tranquility.

The Authors reason for the Lawes & Edicts alledged

Concerning Embassages sent foorth of the country, or imployment at home on serious affairs.

If any Embassages were to bee sent out of Switzerland, for the appointing of some difference, contracting of alliance, gratifying some Prince, or exhorting some one to this or that, or else to command or declare some matters of import, or to denounce warre: Say also, that it were in Switzerland, to negotiate with some Canton, Citty, Towne, &c: The councell consults and determines what is to be done in this case: as whether it is necessary to send ambassadours of all the Cantons, or of some few onely.

When Alliances are to be contracted.

When there is a question in hand, for contracting alliances or leagues, all the Cantons do then send ambassadors: As when the alliance was made and signed with King Henry, not onely the Cantons, but also the confederates sent their ambassadors to the King. But in many other affaires, they name but foure or fiue Cantons, who send Embassages in the name of all. As the ambassadors of Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, and Glaris went to the day at Ansbourg, & obtained of the Emperor Ferdinand, confirmation of the priuiledges for their owne cantons, and for all the rest likewise. Moreouer, this councell hath charge, with reference to the Lords that assist them, to aduise on what is to bee negotiated, or answering ambassadors of Kings and Princes strangers, and also of other common-wealths, as they are oftentimes met withall, in the publike assemblies of the Switzers.

In other occasions.

Aduice for negotiations, & answering Ambassadors.

Finally, the councell aduiseth to prouide for the Prouinces, which do belong to the Cantons, to the end, they may bee gouerned as best beseemeth. First of all, because that some estates are of great profit, as of Secretaries, Commissaries, Officers, Interpreters, Landmans, & Landweibell in the country of Turgow (wherof the first, to wit, the Landman is Iudge criminall, in name of the ten first Cantons, and the other is as ordinary Proctor or Atturney) the councell commits these estates to certaine men, who cannot (in meane while) chuse Officers vnder them, answerable to their appetite. Moreouer, if some difficult processe or suite happen in a Prouince, and the Gouernors or Bayliffes will not iudge according to their aduice: the whole busines is referred ouer to the councel, where if the sentence of the Bayliffes seeme to bee vniust to eyther of the parties, they may appeale to the maine Senate or Councel of the Switzers.

For prouision & gouerning of the Bayliwicks and Prouinces.

Landmans & Landweibell.

When difficult cases happen in any Prouince.

As for causes in the Bayliwicks and Gouernments beyond the Mountaines; the ambassadors (which are yearely sent thither in the Moneth of Iune) doe take knowledge of them, and end them. But for other suites on this side the Mountaines, the councell of Bada doth iudge them: And appeale also may bee made from the sentence of the ambassadours that haue giuen iudgement beyond the Mountaines, to the councell of Bada; because that authority is greater, and their power more ample. Yet some say no, and that the appeale is to be addressed to the Cantons: that each of them may vnderstand ſtand the matter, and by them the difference to be decided. Alſo the Gouernors and Bayliffes, are to render an account to the councell, of the tolles, reuennues, and fines: the annuall reuennues are diſtributed by equall portion among the Cantons, to whom the Bayliwicks do appertaine. There is the like alſo of the Abbeyes in thoſe Bayliwicks, the protection and gouernment whereof (in temporall occaſions) do belong to the Cantons. In briefe, the councell doth know all things, which concerne the adminiſtration of the Prouinces appertaining to the Cantons; they cauſe the Gouernors to render their accounts; they giue audience to whoſoeuer can accuſe them, and they puniſh them, if they haue deſerued it; eyther by depriuing them of their dignities, or returning them to the Cantons that eſtabliſhed them, to haue ſome other ſent in their ſtead. To ſpeake all in one word, the councell takes knowledge of all matters that concerne the good and tranquility of the common-wealth: as well in the Gouernments and Bayliwicks, as alſo in the Cantons themſelues.

Diſtribution of annuall reuennues.

The capacity and power of the councell, in all matters whatſoeuer that concerne the common-wealths welfare.

Now concerning the authority of calling, and aſſembling the councell, for the demanding of their aduice: it hath belonged (of ancient time) to the Canton of Zurich; which by a very authenticall priuiledge, holds the cheefeſt ranke among all the Cantons. Whenſoeuer then there is queſtion made, to hold a generall councell of the nation: the Lords of Zurich make knowne by their Letters to each of the Cantons, both the time & the place where they are to meete together. If any one, or more of the cantons, do thinke it neceſſary, that the councell publike and general ſhould be aſſembled; firſt they giue aduertiſement to the canton of Zurich, and require by their letters, that the Ambaſſadours of the other cantons may meet together. But if the affairs are preſſiue, and require ſpeedy deliberation, then each canton muſt aduertiſe his confederates, to be in readineſſe for aduiſing (altogether) on that which is to bee done.

To whom the calling & the aſſembling of the councell appertaineth.

The order & obſeruation for calling the generall aſſembly.

Likewiſe the Ambaſſadours from Kings and Princes ſtrangers, do demand leaue of the cantons, to preſent themſelues at thoſe dayes of meetings: & ſomtimes they make requeſt, that one day (extraordinary) may be held for them. But on the dayes of particular meetings, they proceed otherwiſe, becauſe Zurich ſignifies the ſame to foure Townes: and when to fiue or ſeuen catholike cantons; they of Lucerna do aſſemble them. There are alſo daies of and for particular meeting of the cantons allied to the K. of France: whoſe Ambaſſador reſiding at Solleurre, calleth the cantons at the Kings charge. I thinke there is permiſſion alſo, for the ambaſſadors of the Pope, and of other kings, friends, and allies to the Switzers, to demand their dayes: prouided, they are at their Maſters expences.

Of Ambaſſadors from Kings and Princes.

Dayes of particular aſſemblies, according to their order, and for whom they are called.

The ancient Switzers had no perpetuall or certaine place, for holding their daies of generall councell: for I am perſwaded, there is no one of the firſt eight cantons, but they made an aſſembly at ſome times, though moſt often it was done at Lucerna, at Zurich, Bremgarten, and at Bada. In our time, the cuſtome hath beene (not by any law or ordinance purpoſely made for it) that the Switzers kept their dayes at Bada, in the Towne-houſe: and ſo much the rather, becauſe the Towne hath many commodities for ſuch aſſemblies. Firſt, the place is beautified with goodly buildings, and very apt Innes or houſes of lodging. The ſcituation of the place is pleaſant and healthfull, and the neereneſſe of the Bathes yeelde wonderfull pleaſure, drawing thether great reſort of people from farre remote countries. By meanes whereof, the neighbouring people to Bada, (feeling the gaines ſweetneſſe) bring thether all kindes of victuals in great aboundance, which cauſeth the Towne to be well furniſhed with all good prouiſion, and at all needfull ſeaſons.

In what place the councell did aſſemble on their daies of meeting.

The commodious ſcituation of the Towne of Bada.

Next, it is ſeated (almoſt) in the midſt of Switzerland, ſo that the cantons furtheſt off, may appeare there (by neereneſſe of wayes) all at one and at the ſame time. Alſo it appertaineth to the eight firſt cantons, & (by that meanes) the moſt part of the cantons are Lords therof, and haue equall authority in the place. Beſide, the particular aſſemblies of the foure Townes, is oftneſt kept in the Towne of Arow, appertaining vnto the canton of Berne; howbeit (ſometimes) it hath bin of Baſile, when queſtion was made of entring accord with Luther, & that for the cauſe of Strasbourg, that then ſent their Ambaſſadors thether. The catholike Cantons do oftentimes aſſemble at Lucerna, ſometimes at Beckenried, in the territory of Vri, or at Brunen, which belongeth to them of Suits. But when the Ambaſſador of France demandeth (in his Kings name) a leuye of men of the Switzers: the day is ofteneſt held at Solleurre, where he entreateth the Cantons to be preſent: and ſometimes alſo it is at Lucerna.

The meeting of the Catholike Cantons.

The cuſtome is, that (euery yeare) dayes of meeting are held at Bada, about mid-Iune. Then the Bayliffes or Gouernors appertaining to the Cantons, yeeld a reaſon of their ſeuerall charges before the councell, and attend to the ending of ſuites concerning the Prouinces. At the ſame time, the Ambaſſadors of the twelue firſt Cantons, do meete at Lugano, & take an account of the foure Bayliffes for the Prouinces of Italy, and iudge the cauſes of appeale: but yet in ſuch ſort as a man may appeale from them, to the Councell or Parliament of Bada, it being of farre greater authority. The councell ſo aſſembled, they ſit by ordination of the Cantons, to ende ſuch controuerſiall caſes, as were not concluded on at the precedent meeting: for oftentimes cauſes of importance are not ended at the firſt Seſſion, either becauſe they appeare not of ſufficient merit, or want due power of proofe. In regard whereof, they are referred ouer to a further day, and in the meane while, the Ambaſſadors craue aduice of the Lords of their ſeuerall Cantons, to know how they ſhall carry themſelues therein. Sometimes alſo, in an vnexpected accident, or ſome other ſuch caſe of conſequence: the Canton of Zurich, or ſome other, will aſſigne the day, eſpecially, if it be a matter concerning the common-wealth. Now, although the Councell are aſſembled only for publike affaires; yet notwitſtanding, after they haue taken order for them, if any particulars of the Prouinces come, and would haue their cauſes pleaded, they giue them audience. But the particular dayes of the Cantons, and thoſe that the Ambaſſador of France cauſeth to bee held; haue no certainty of time, but according as occaſions offer themſelues, & as it is pleaſing to them that haue power to aſſemble the councell.

At what times the dayes of audience for ſuites are held.

The reaſon of the councels ſitting and meeting.

Concerning ſudden & vnexpected accidents, and ſuites of particular perſons, from the generall buſines.

Particular dayes for the Cantons.

The manner of proceeding on theſe daies of meeting, is thus. At the day aſſigned by the ordinary councell, or commanded to be kept: the day before, the Ambaſſador for the canton of Zurich, ſends the Lieutenant of Bada to all the Innes and houſes of receit, to know what Ambaſſadors are come, to whom the Lieutenant giueth kinde welcome, and receiueth them honourably, in name of the whole Switzers common-wealth, and the morrow after, he calleth thē to come to the Townhouſe. If the Ambaſſadors of all the cantons are come, they are called, and then they treate on affaires concerning all the Cantons together. But if vpon the day named, they for the new Cantons, as for Baſile, Schaffouſe, Solleurre, and Fribourg, are not as yet arriued, as oftentimes it comes ſo to paſſe: then ſeuen or eight Cantons do aſſemble, and diſcourſe on matters only concerning themſelues.

Of the order and manner of proceeding on the dayes of meeting.

The Ambaſſadors are ſeated in councell, according to the order & number of the Cantons, ſo that he of Zurich ſits in the higheſt and moſt eminent place; he of Berne next; then he of Lucerna, & ſo conſequently the other, according to the order of the Cantons. Being ſeated, the ambaſſador of Zurich ſaluteth them all, and hauing made ſome breefe preface & excuſe, according to cuſtome; he declareth ỳ which the Ambaſſadours had in charge on the laſt dayes meeting, and referred them to the next dayes deliberation, as oftentimes they are aſſembled to that effect, and if any thing hath hapned ſince then, he propoundeth it alſo. Then he addeth that which his Lords haue giuē him in charge, touching the Article whereon he is to deliberate: the other ambaſſadors do the like in their ranke, & declare whatſoeuer their Lords commanded them. After that euery one hath made knowne that which they haue in charge to ſay: the Bayliffe or Gouernor of Bada (of whatſoeuer Canton it is) demandeth orderly of each counceller, his aduice concerning the matter that hath bin in queſtion. Thē he of Zurich ſpeaketh firſt, and the reſt after, according to their ranke. Hauing all ſpoken, the Bayliffe counteth the voyces, according to the number of the Cantons and not of the councellers: for ſometimes one Canton ſends two ambaſſadors, who may well aſſiſt in councell, yet they haue but but one voyce, as of one man onely.

Particular causes haue the same order of proceeding, as them in generall.

Thus you see how they proceed in deciding those things, which concerne the publike good: In particular causes also, they follow the same order, giue their aduice, and collect the voyces. But such as haue any causes to pleade on these daies, demand audience first of the Ambassador for Zurich, who assigned their day, & put their names vpon the Role. When they appeare before the councell, sometimes the parties themselues will pleade their owne causes: or haue Aduocates, Procters, or speakers, which they bring with them, or chuse among such as they finde in Bada. For at all times, and whensoeuer these dayes are appointed, there will meet there a great number of such mẽ, belonging to the neighbouring Townes & Burroughs, pentioners of the Switzers. Causes are there debated, not according to the ciuill Law, nor by the aduice of Lawyers; but with equity, and according to the lawes & customes of the people, long time obserued among them.

After what manner their causes are debated.

I know, that many will account this forme of pleading, to be barbarous, especially such as would haue men follow the Romanes order of pleading, for the ending of suites: without which (they say) the very wisest men do wrong themselues often, in the deciding of difficult causes, and matters of importance. As for my selfe, I thinke well of the Romanes lawes, written by men very wise and skilfull in affaires, and I will not infrindge their authority in any manner whatsoeuer. But yet I say, that the proceeding obserued by the Switzers, for ending controuersiall cases, is to be preferred before that which is vsed among other Iudges, that giue sentence according to the Romane lawes. And I am well assured, that mine opinion cannot be reiected, but by ill-disposed & wrangling spirits. For it cannot be denied, that many Aduocates and Atturnies, are much more carefull for maintaining the ciuill law, then eyther equity or right: considering, they do nothing else many times, but tye themselues to sillables, words, and termes of the law, which they expound according to their owne fancy, labouring to circumuent a party, and to take him by the nose, as we vse to say. And surely, they do nothing but for the benefit of their owne purses, troubling themselues ouermuch, to obscure and muffle vp matters; by which meanes, suites are made immortall, to the ineuitable detriment & ruine of both parties, being brought (by them) to extreme pouerty and misery.

The Romans order for pleding law-cases, not so conuenient as that of the Switzers.

The negligence of many Aduocates & Atturnies do oftentimes preiudice very iust causes.

Lawyers make suites to seem immortall.

In which respect, they gaue no very euill language, that tearmed such practitioners and brablers, blood-suckers of the people: for they empty their purses, yea, and sucke them to the bare bones. And if among the Iustices of Switzerland, an error happen to be committed, in the decision of difficult causes, which commeth very sildome to passe: yet notwithstanding, it causeth no such harme, as doth the length and immortalizing of suites. So I may well say, that the manner of proceeding among the Switzers, doth lessen expences, ease the people, cuts vp the rootes of lingring suites and differences: because the sentence doth sooner resolue both the parties, and brings them to agreement: whereas in other places, we see suites encrease day by day, and from one case vndecided, growes a great number of nouel variances.

Errour sildom committed among the Switzers in law-causes, because the suites are quickly ended

CHAP. IIII.

Concerning Sentences and Iudgements, in publike and peculiar differences.

HAuing thus made mention of the councell, and daies of audience among the Switzers; we are now to speake, concerning such sentences and iudgements as they vse to giue. If any suite doth happen betweene particular persons in the Bayliwicks: the Bayliffs or Gouernors are Iudges in those places, or else the Canton (from whence the appellation ariseth) taketh knoledge, and iudgeth thereof. But the Iustices of euery Canton do iudge (each one within his iurisdiction) in the causes & differences of the Subiects. Beside this, there is iustice for publike suites, which are variances, happening betweene two or more Cantons, or betweene some particulars against a Canton: and such condition as the Cantons haue, the same also their confederates haue.

Concerning suites of particular persons in the Bayliwicks.

Publike variances betweene Cantons.

Two Iudges choſen for either ſide.

Thus then, for the deciding of ſuch differences, each of the parties doe chuſe two Iudges for either ſide, who are abſolued of the oath which they haue taken to their Canton: and promiſe to iudge according to right and equity, and labour that the ſuite may bee louingly and very ſpeedily accorded, or iudicially ended.

Places apointed for the ending of ſuites & differences according to ancient cuſtome.

By the ancient alliances, there were certaine places appointed, for the ending of ſuch ſuites. The ſeuen firſt Cantons ſent their ambaſſadors and arbitrators to the Abbey of the Hermitage, to end ther ſuch ſuites as happened among them. By an article of very ancient alliance with them of Glaris, it is expreſſely ſaid: that if they had any ſuite with them of Vri, the aſſembly ſhould be at Merch. If againſt the canton of Suits; the arbitrators ſhold meete at Bergeraz: and at Brunen, if againſt them of Vnderuald. And then the other Cantons, hauing had knowledge of the cauſe, pronounced the ſentence. The Bernians, and the three Cantons of Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald, aſſembled at a place named Daskienholtz. They of Zurich and Berne, at Zofinge. The Fribourgers & they of Solleurre, hauing a ſuite againſt the eight firſt Cantons, or ſome of them, ſent their Iudges to Zofinge; and if they were defendants, to Williſow. As for the cauſes of them of Baſile, Schaffouſe, and Appenzell, they pleaded them at Bada, together with them of theſe Cantons, allied with them of Rotuille and of Mulhouſe. but the differences of them of S. Gall, were determined in the Abbey of the Hermitage: and them of the Griſons, at Walenſtad, which is a Towne at the ende of the Lake of Rine, in the Bayliwick of Sargans.

They that met at one place, went not toanother except by eſpeciall appointment.

Whē matters cannot be louingly ended, what courſe they take then

When then ſome difference happeneth, which cannot bee kindly accorded, and that the entreaty of the Cantons ſerueth to no purpoſe: the arbitrators and ambaſſadours of the Cantons that are in ſuite, do meete at the place appointed, & (with them) the ambaſſadors of the other Cantons confederates, who come thether to atrone the parties, and to make ſome amiable compoſition. The Iudges and Arbitrators beeing aſſembled, after that the parties haue pleaded their cauſes: if the Iudges take reſolution, & giue ſentence, the parties muſt (of neceſſity) be contented. But if they be of diuers opinions (as many times it happeneth) and that there are as many voyces on the one ſide, as on the other; then a fift Iudge or arbitrator is choſen, whom they call Ein obmann, or, Ein gmeinen mann. He giueth no ſentence at all, but onely approueth one of thoſe, which the arbitratours haue pronounced. Sometimes the Iudges themſelues do chuſe the odde arbitrator: yet in ſuch ſort notwithſtanding, that he is a man of one of the Cantons, no medler with eyther party, nor hauing any intereſt in the cauſe.

When voyces are alike on either ſide: then a fift Arbitrator is choſen.

The alliance of the ſeuen firſt Cantons, makes mention of this election and choiſe: as that of Fribourg, that of Solleurre, that of Appenzell, and them of S. Gall and of Mulhouſe. It is added to the articles of the alliance of Schaffouſe, that if the Iudges cannot accord, by choiſe of another arbitrator, taken from one of the Cantons; they ſhall then take one of the Lords of the councell of S. Gall. And in the alliance of Rotuille, command is giuen to the Iudges, to chuſe for an odde arbitrator, one of the Lords of the councell of S. Gall or of Mulhouſe. Sometimes alſo the complainant chuſeth. As if the Bernians haue a ſuite againſt the three firſt Cantons, or any one of them; the Cantons ſhal name ſixteen men, out of which number, the Bernians are to chuſe a ſub-arbitrator. But if they bee defendants, the Cantons will then (for ſub-arbitrator) chuſe one of the Lords of the leſſer councell of Berne. If ſome difference fall betweene them of Zurich, and of Berne; the complainants chuſe for an odde arbitratour, one of the defendants Lords of the councell. The ſame is obſerued in ſuites for them of Baſile, againſt the other cantons; and ſo in the Griſons cauſes.

The addition to the Articles of Schaffouſe

The complainant is alowed ſometime to chuſe the odde Arbitratour.

Thus you ſee how the Switzers gouerne themſelues, in the deciding of controuerſiall ſuites betweene the commonwealths. I know very well, that ſome may diſpute ſubtilly, both for, and againſt this order there obſerued: but I will leaue that diſcourſe to the Readers. For mine owne part, I admire the ſimplicity and integrity of our anceſtors, who by ſuch manner of proceeding, haue often brought to end very great variances, and carefully conſerued publike peace and concord. But they did not regard their owne particular profite, neither deſired any thing more

There is nothing ſo well becomming one place, but it may ſeeme vnfit for another.

Their ends & ours are quite contrary.

more, then to see their country peaceable and flourishing. If now each man had no other meaning, but would aime at that marke: so many suites would not be seene, and easily might those be appeased, that are the hottest attempted.

CHAP. V.

Of those Common-wealths, which are in each of the seuerall Cantons.
And first, of the Common-wealths of Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse.

All the common-wealths of the Cantons referred to three forms

HAuing shewne already, how the whol Commonwealth of the Switzers is gouerned in common: it behoueth now to make mention, of the Common-wealth in each distinct Canton. Now it seemeth to me, that the common-wealths of the thirteene Cantons, may bee referred to three formes. For as there are three names of soueraign Magistrates and Cantons, so haue they likewise as many formes of common-wealths; differing not onely in name, but also in the things themselues.

The cheefe men of some councell called Ammans, in an Estate meerely popular.

In some certaine Cantons, the cheefe Commanders or Heads of the councell, are called Ammans. This is obserued in the Cantons that haue no Cities or Townes, but Villages onely, hauing a popular estate, and the soueraignty appertaining to the people; by whose aduice, the very greatest affaires of importance are decided. Of this number are Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzell.

The other Cantons haue their cities and townes, which haue the soueraignty: yet in such manner, as there are two formes of common-wealths. For the cities and townes, especially such as haue bene built by some Princes, or sometimes haue beene subiected to them: are gouerned by an Auoyer, whom they call, Schultheiz, (who is cheefe of the councell) and by some number of councellers chosen by free election, from and by the whole number of cittizens. The forme of this common-wealth is Aristocraticall among all the other: and in this manner are gouerned the common-wealths of Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solleurre.

In townes or cities, the cheefe man is called the Auoyer, the cheefe man of the councell.

There are other cities and townes diuided by certaine companies, by each whereof, and by voyce of such men as are in euery of them, the Lords of the councell are elected, and the soueraigne Magistrate or cheefe of the councell, who by them is tearmed Burgermeister, that is to say, Master of the Bourgesses, which we in a shorter word cal Bourgmaster. Such are the common-wealths of Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse. Now we are to speake of these diuers formes of common-wealths in order, beginning with the last, first.

Election of the Lords of the councell and the supreame Magistrate, called a Burgermeister.

Townes diuided into two rankes, Noblemen and Yeomen.

First then, all the people of these Townes free and Imperiall, were diuided into two rankes: the one of Noblemen, the other of Yeomen. The Noblemen had a Society by themselues, apart, which the Allemaignes or Germans did call, Ein Geselschafft, and they of Zurich, Ein Constaffell.

Two bands of Noblemen in Basile. The Consull and the Tribune or Captaine of the City, the two cheefe offices

In elder times, in the citty of Basile, which is very spacious, and for the multitude of Noblemen, they were diuided into two societies, bandes, or companies of Noblemen. Oftentimes they were in quarrels, and had the soueraignty: so that out of the one cõpany they chose the Consull, and out of the other, the Tribune or Captaine of the citty, which is the estate of greatest authority, next vnto that of Consull or Bourgmaster.

The Noblemen banished and their posterity depriued.

Neuertheless, afterward the Noblemen lost this soueraignty, or else forsook their right voluntarily. For at the time of the councell of Basile, when Lewes, then Dolphin of France, brought (very neere to Basile) an Army of Armignacks, in fauour of Pope Eugenius, and the Duke of Austria; many Gentlemen of Basile, went and ioyned with that Army, in regard whereof, they were all banished, and their posterity depriued & excluded from all publike honours.

Afterward, when the Burgeſſe (by common conſent) made alliance with the ten Cantons of the Switzers, in the yeare, 1501. the moſt part of the Noble-men, who hated the Switzers: diſlodged from the citty, and withdrew themſelues to Caſtles heere and there, ſo that their authority diminiſhed greatly then, and all the reſt was loſt in the yeare, 1529. For by the Sermons & exhortations of Oecolampadius, the doctrine and ceremonies of the Church were reformed, by order ſent from the councell, againſt which, many Noblemen oppoſed themſelues. And althogh they could not hinder the change of Religion, yet they abandoned and left the citty, and would not abide in it.

Oecolampadius his preaching & the alteration of Religion.

After which time, the two companies whereof we ſpake, entred in againe, and got poſſeſſion of ſome priuate houſes, & as yet they keepe thoſe houſes to themſelues, and they belong to the whole body of the Nobility. And thoſe houſes are called in their language, Zum ſtifftz en vnd zum brunnen, but yet none of thē is of the councell. For although the councell do meete together (almoſt) euery day, and the Gentlemen (hauing forſaken the citty) dwelt moſt part of the time in their Caſtles: by common aduice of the Burgeſſes, they were excluded frō gouerning in the common-wealth, which they had renounced voluntarily. Neuertheleſſe, ſome noble Families that dwell in the citty, & haue had care of the common-wealth with the other Bourgeſſes, are in ranke of the foure firſt companies or ſupporters of the citty, and (in them) are choſen to be of the councell. And therefore, to do them honour, in regard of their condition; theſe Tribes or companies are called herrenzunfft, that is to ſay, the companies of Lords.

Some of the Noblemen got entrance again into the Citty, but wer excluded from gouerning in the State.

The companies of Lords ſo called to do them honour.

Therefore, there are no more companies of theſe Noblemen in Baſile, but thoſe that are diſtinguiſhed with the other Bourgeſſes. But at Zurich and at Schaffouſe, the Noblemē haue their companies apart by themſelues. And they of Zurich haue this priuiledge beſide, aboue the tribes and companies of Tradeſmen, to take the moity, that is, the moſt part of the Lords of the councell, from foorth the company of theſe Noblemen: ſo that they are as a counterpoiſe to the other companies. Notwithſtanding, there is ſome difference among theſe Noblemen, for the Families of race, that are very noble and ancient: they do make a band by themſelues, and they are called Die Stubler, by reaſon of the place where they aſſemble apart by themſelues, by right & eſpeciall priuiledge. To the whole body of theſe tribes or companies, are ioyned many cittizens, which are not of any trade nor traffick: in which reſpect, they may haue place in one company, rather then in another. Porters, Labourers, Burden-bearers, and other ſuch like manner of people, who when warre hapneth, are held and reputed to be of this body of companies, which they call Ein Conſtaffell, and receiue wages: they haue a voyce in electing the Maſter of the whole body of companies, and he is of the Seigneuries councell, in regard of his place.

The priuiledg of them of Zurich in chuſing their Lords of councell.

Porters, Labourers, and toyling men are of the body politique.

Beſide the Society and Company of Noblemen, the people of thoſe cities & townes there, are parted into certaine tribes or companies, which the Germans call Zunfft. The word (it may be) taketh name or originall, of Zamenkunfft, which ſignifieth to meete and aſſemble themſelues in company. Some interpret them to be Tribes, others, Courts, and others, Colledges or Abbeyes: but wee will call them Tribes or Companies. The number of them is not equall in the forenamed Cities and Townes. For there are fifteene at Baſile: whereof the foure firſt are eſteemed more noble then the other, and are called the companies of Lords, as already hath beene ſaid. The firſt tribe or companie, is that of Merchants. The ſecond of Gold-ſmiths, Goldfiners, Founders, and Pewterers. The third is of Merchants dealing onely in wines: with whom the Notaries, Maſters of Hoſpitals, Spittles, and other ſuch like communities are ioyned. The fourth is of Merchants dealing in Silkes, and of Factors for all States: This company is the very greateſt of them all. The other eleuen, are of all ſorts of trades and handy-crafts men.

Of other Tribes and Companies beſide the Noblemen.

Fifteene companies at Baſile, and how they are diſtinguiſhed from the Noblemen.

Now there is a dozen or twelue tribes or companies at Zurich: heeretofore they were thirteene in number, when many Drapers & workers in wooll dwelt there: for that was one company by it ſelfe. But now adaies, the weauers of woollen cloth and other things, are ioyned into one cō-pany with the Fullers and Diars. At Schaffouse there are eleuen companies onely: neuertheleſſe, it falleth out many times, that diuers trades are ioyned together in one company. They haue their meetings by themſelues: as at Zurich, the Millers and Bakers, the Barbers and Chirurgions, the Smiths and Mettall men. So at Baſile, the Fiſhermen and Marriners or Barquers, the Cordwainers and Curriers, the Taylors & Skinners. Theſe companies are diuided, and they are called Gſpaltne Zunfft. For when there is queſtion of cheeſe Trades, and eſpecially workmen in them, their houſes of meetings and aſſemblies are by themſelues. But in things that concern the commonwealth, and when, and where all ought to be preſent, to elect Lords of the councell, or the Zunfft-Maſters, who muſt be alſo in the councell; euery man ſpeaks his minde, and giues his voyce.

Chiefe trades and artezans are diſtinguiſhed by themſelues.

Concerning the election of the councell.

Out of each of theſe companies, ſome men are choſen, as many of one company as of another, to be Lords of councell. In euery city there are two publike councels, which haue the principall authority: as namely, the great councell, when as a good number of councellers meete together, in name of all the people: as is vſed in the affaires of greateſt importance, and which do appertaine to the whole common-wealth. Next, the leſſer councell, who meete together euery day, about the common-wealths buſineſſe, and take knowledge of differences happening among the cittizens. The great councell of Zurich, conſiſteth of two hundred mē: That of Baſile, is of two hundred forty foure: and that of Schaffouſe, is of foure-ſcore and ſixe.

The great councell.

The leſſer councell.

The great councels of Zurich, Baſile, & Schaffouſe.

As concerning the leſſer councell of Zurich, it is of fifty: that of Baſile hath threeſcore and foure: and that of Schaffouſe, hath but twenty ſixe. For out of each tribe or company, twelue are taken for the great councell: except at Zurich, where they elect eighteene of the Nobility. At Zurich alſo each company giueth three men for the leſſer councell: at Baſile, foure; at Schaffouſe, two. Next, in euery of theſe cities, there are two Conſuls or Bourgmaſters, who are the cheefe and Preſidents of councell. Ouer and beſide theſe two, at Baſile there are two Tribunes, who are cheefe in councell with the Bourgmaſters. Moreouer, at Zurich the Noblemen ſend ſixe from among them, to the leſſer councell: the other companies doe ſend each one but three. By the plurality of voyces, choiſe is made of ſixe other men, out of ſuch companies as the councell do propoſe, to fill vp the number.

How many are ſent from each company

As concerning the election of councellers (for ſo will wee heereafter call the Lords of the leſſer councell) it is done in manner following. Euery yeare, about mid-Iune, and mid-December, all the cittizens of Zurich aſſemble themſelues together, euery man in his tribe and company: and thē elelect a chiefe man, whom they call, Zunfftmeiſter, that is to ſay, Maſter of the tribe or company. The cuſtome of theſe three citties, is, that the companies haue two Maſters: but one of them is in eſtate but ſixe Moneths, at the end whereof, the other ſucceedeth him. Neuertheleſſe, it often comes to paſſe, that hee who was Zunfftmeiſter the halfe yeare before, is choſen againe. By this meanes, the leſſer councell is diuided in two parts, to wit, the old & new. Such as haue beene in charge the firſt ſixe Moneths, we tearme them of the olde councell; for although they be called whē the councell is helde, yet notwithſtanding, it is not alwayes ſo done, and there are many matters which paſſe in the new councell onely.

The election of councellers for the leſſer councell, and after what order they elect the Zunfft-meiſter.

Of the old & new councels.

The great councell of Baſile is diuided in the ſame manner, and of twelue which is taken from each company, there are ſixe of the new councell, and ſixe of the olde. Beſide the Zunfftmeiſters, the leſſer councell of Zurich chuſeth one counceller from each of the companies: but the leſſer councell of Baſile chuſeth two. Theſe councellers thus elected, with the other which we haue ſaid to bee choſen extraordinarily at Zurich, are diuided into two bands: whereof the one is the old councel, and the other the new. Theſe two councels are changed euerie ſixe Moneths at Zurich; ſo that at their ending, the olde councell electeth the new. At Baſile, and at Schaffouſe, they continue in the eſtate a whole yeare together.

The great councell of Baſile diuided in like maner.

before the foure and twentieth day of Iune. At Zurich, the Zunfftmeisters are elected by the companies in their houses of meeting: then the councell of two hundred confirmeth this election; but at Basile this confirmation belongeth to the olde councell. The voyce is giuen openly at Zurich, and secretly at Schaffouse. For in each tribe or company, charge is giuen to particular persons, to collect the voice, whereupon they all come to them in order, and tell them closely in the eare, for whom they giue voyce to be Zunfftmeister. The lesser councell assemble at the ofteneſt, three times euery weeke, and some whiles (vpon earneſt occasion) four times. The old and new councellers of Zurich, are seated one by another, & somtimes one among another: but at Basile, the old councellers are aboue the younger. They haue also this custome, to withdraw often into another Hall, to consult together. After resolution is taken, a counceller of the first company, reporteth the aduice to the new councell: and they call the reporter Den Offner.

Of giuing the voyce it is not in all places alike.

The sitting of the olde and new councellers.

The Bourgmaster, whom they call Burgermeister, as much to say, as Master of the Bourgesses, is President of the old and new councels. The great councel electeth him by open voyce at Zurich; at Schaffouse by secret voyce: and at Basile, the olde councell first electeth the Bourgmaster, and the new councell the yeare following. The Bourgmaster is in state at Zurich, sixe Moneths: but at Basile and Schaffouse, a whole yeare together, and turne by turne, the Bourgmasters and Councellers olde and new are changed. They whom at Basile they terme Zunfftmeisters, and Oberstenmeisters at Zurich (as much to say, as Masters of companies and communities) doe second the Bourgmasters in their authority.

Of the Bourgmasters or Consuls, the manner of their election.

Masters of companies & communities, Tribunes of the people.

At Zurich there are three, and at Basile two, who with the two Bourgmasters are called the foure chiefe & principal Lords of the city. Nine other Lords of the lesser councel at Basile, are ioyned to these four in cheese, and by reason of the number, they are called the councell of thirteene. They heare the causes of very greteſt importance, and deliberate on them first, before they propound any thing to the lesser councell: and therefore they may be called Preconsulters, or first councellers. Moreouer, there is a particular councell at Zurich, whom wee may name the Chamber of accounts, for it manageth publike affaires: and is composed of eight councellers, and haue the Bourgmaster of the olde councell for their President. Then is there two Purse-bearers or Tresurers, and the Superintendents for Ecclesiastical goods do assist them, together with foure other councellers, two of the olde, and two of the new councell. They take knowledge not onely of monies employed for the common-wealth: but oftentimes also, the younger councell demandeth their aduice in cases of importance, whereon they consult a while, and then giue their report to the yonger coũcell.

The councel of thirteene men.

The chamber of accounts, & the officers thereof.

To these publike councels, there are alwayes two Secretaries assisting, with their committees, when necessity requireth. The first and chiefeſt is cald Stattschryber, that is to say, Secretary of the citty. At Zurich, the other is called Underschryber, that is to say, sub-Secretary: but they of Basile call him Raatschryber, that is, Secretary to the councell. There is a particular Secretary for the Chamber of Accounts; whom they of Zurich call Rechenschryber. The estate of Secretary in these citties is honorable, and of great gaine. In regard wherof, the Gentlemen striue to keepe it in their owne power, as sildome is it giuen to any other. These men are they (among all other) that know the lawes, customes, priuiledges, and all the secrets of the common-wealth.

Two Secretaries assisting to the councellers.

The office of Secretary, honorable.

Next to the councels publike, are Iustices of the citty. There are two at Zurich, one for ciuill causes, Das Stattgricht, which was in ancient times vnder power of the Nunnes, and the Abbesse elected the Lieutenant, or cheefe man in that kinde of iustice, whom they called Den Schultheissen, and his assessors or assistants: but now the election belongeth to the lesser or yonger councell. Their number is of eight, and they haue their Lieutenant, Secondary, and Serieant. To them appertaineth the knowledge of ciuill causes, Debtes, Hires, Lendings, Borrowings, Sales, and as the Switzers vse to say, they iudge Umb erb vnd eigen. There is no appeale from their sentence: but if there happen any difficult difficult cauſe, they ſend it to the Councell.

The office & authority of the other Iuſtice.

The other Iuſtice, whom they call Das Zinſsgricht, is a Iudgement of proceſſe and ſuites, which happen for rents and yearely reuennues. The Secretary of the other Iuſtice, and two Lords of the younger councell, it ſeemes doe daily aſſiſt for the ending of all ſuch differences. In the bigger Baſile there are two ſuch kindes of Iuſtices, and a third in the leſſer Baſile.

The Iuſtice of greateſt power and authority.

That Law or Iuſtice of greateſt authority, which they tearme alſo Das Stattgricht, is compoſed of ten Iudges; one part whereof is of the councell, and the other, ſuch as the people do name. They take knowledge of all cauſes, ciuill and criminall: but when there is queſtion of teſtaments, wils, contracts, monies borrowed, and other ſuch like things: the Prouoſt or Lieutenant of the citty ſitteth in iudgement. As for cauſes criminall, the Prouoſt of the Empire iudgeth them. And there are three Lords of the councell, who do purſue criminall cauſes, by the ſollicitation of one, who is an ordinary Atturney, named by them, Oberſtenknecht, and keepeth company with the Iudges, hauing an aduocate waiting on him.

Law and Iuſtice for criminall cauſes.

Criminall Iudgements are openly performed.

These iudgements are done publikely, and haue eight open audiences, whereby all are permitted to be there preſent, to heare and ſee whatſoeuer is done. But at Zurich and at Schaffouſe, the new councell doth iudge the criminall cauſes. Neuertheleſſe, the Bourgmaſter doth not then ſit: but it is the Prouoſt of the Empire, whom Rychſuogt, or, Blutrichter, who preſideth and collecteth the voices. Euery yeare the councell chuſeth ſome one of that body, to exerciſe that charge. Proceſſe and ſuites criminall are handled at Zurich, with the doores faſt ſhut: but at Schaffouſe in open Court, ſo that all men may vnderſtand the accuſations and defences. But the councell commandeth all to bee abſent, when there is queſtion of pronouncing ſentence.

Criminall caſes at Zurich not openly heard.

The other orders of iuſtice in great and leſſer Baſile.

The ſecond order of Iuſtice at great Baſile, iudgeth not but in caſes of ſmall importance, which hardly exceedeth the ſumme of ten pounds. But the Iuſtice of ſmaller Baſile, hath a Iudge apart, & taketh knowledge of all cauſes, except of criminall.

There are two Courts, or kindes of Iuſtices at Schaffouſe. The one which they call Das Schuldgricht, is law or iuſtice for debts: for therein onely is ended differences of contracts, debts, and ſuch like things. And if the ſumme whereof queſtion is made, doe amount aboue an hundred crownes, the councell then takes knowledge of it. In this Court are twenty aſſeſſors or aſſiſtants, to wit, one of each Tribe: moreouer, eight other perſons, choſen by the councell. The other order of Iuſtice is named Vogtgricht, or, Buſſengricht, that is to ſay, Iuſtice for fines and amercements: becauſe the Prouoſt of the empire, or Iudge in cauſes criminall, preſideth there, and condemneth all ſuch forfeitures & fines. There are twelue aſſeſſours out of the twelue Tribes, and who are of the great councell. Cauſes criminall of leſſer importance, are debated and ended in this Iuſtice there; as light iniuries, vulgar outrages, and ſuch like. But when wordes do wound honour, and the wrong is not eaſie to bee diſſembled or digeſted; the knowledge of ſuch caſes appertaineth to the leſſer councell.

Two kindes of Iuſtice at Schaffouſe.

The ſecond kinde of Iuſtice at Schaffouſe.

Criminall offences of ſlender importance.

Beſide what hath beene ſaide, theſe three cities haue each one their particular councell, which they tearme Ein Chorgricht, or, Begricht, where they diſcourſe on cauſes of matrimony. For after that the religion was changed, the councels of the three cities eſtabliſhed one councell: wherein were a certaine number of aſſiſtants, elected by buplike ſuffrages, and taken out of the olde and new councels, and among whom were ſome Diuines or Theologians as they cal them. Neuertheleſſe, at Schaffouſe none of the Miniſters were aſſiſtants, but onely ſome learned men admitted to councell, who had each one as his adiunct, ſome Doctour of the Law. Theſe Iudges take knowledge of all matrimoniall cauſes: puniſh whoredomes and adulteries, and haue charge to obſerue the lines & manners of euery one.

The three cities haue peculiar councels beſide the other.

Diuines admitted to be of the councell.

Beſide, in theſe common-wealths, baſtards are depriued of all honours and dignity: nor is it lawfull for them to bee ſeene at the councell, nor in the Courts of Iuſtice. True it is, they are not guilty of that ſtaine to their birth, neither can it bee denied, but that (oftentimes) baſtards haue wonne more commendations for

Of ſuch as are exempted & prohibited, not to be ſeen in the councell, or in any Court of Iuſtice.

for their vertues, then euer could their legitimate brethren: as we haue an example of Iephta, a Iudge of Gods owne people. But to bridle the leud concupiſcences of many, and to conſerue the dignity of ſacred marriage: Baſtards ſtand as branded with infamy, and yrkeſome eye-ſores to well ordered common-wealths.

For time of dwelling.

Next, hee that hath not dwelt tenne yeares within the citty of Zurich, cannot be choſen to be one of the publike councell.

For men born out of Switzerland.

Such as are borne out of Switzerland cannot be of the leſſer councell at Schaffouſe: But if they be Bourgeſſes of twenty yeares ſtanding, they may be brought into the great councell, & into the number of the Iudges.

Againſt ſtrangers not natiues.

I will not tell you that ſtrangers are vnworthy of theſe honors: but it is requiſite firſt of all, that hee who ought to haue charge in a common-wealth, ſhould be particularly affectioned and obliged thereto, and afterward be well skilde and ſeene, in the lawes and cuſtomes of the country.

For natiues.

And me-thinks, cittizens, and ſuch as (from their youth) haue beene bred in a common-wealth; ſhould haue more aduantage therein, then ſtrangers.

Againſt aduancement of ſtrangers and vnworthy perſons.

Moreouer, there is nothing more pernitious to common-wealths, then enuies and deſpights, proceeding from ſuch aduancements to high degrees: as draw on partialities and factions, the danger whereof cannot be auoyded, when naturall borne ſubiects are left deſpiſed, and ancient Families contemned, and charge of publike Officers giuen to ſtrangers, & men of no merit.

Adulterers, murderers, & infamous perſons.

Beſide baſtards and ſtrangers, adulterers, murderers, and men made infamous for any crime: are (by a common law) excluded from councell in theſe common-wealths.

Of publike offices and eſtates.

Publike eſtates and conditions are of diuers kindes in theſe common-wealths, and in great number, according as the citties are peopled: we will make mention of the principals onely.

Treaſurers of the publike monies, & of Cuſtomes and Impoſts.

The higheſt degree, next after the Bourg-maſters and Zunfft-Maſters, are ſuch as haue charge of the publike monies: who are called in many places of Switzerland, Seckelmeiſter, as much to ſay, as Treaſurers or Purſſe-bearers. At Baſile there are three, named Dryerherren, that haue the keeping of the citties treaſures. Beſides them, there are three other, named Ladenherren, who manage the monies of the Impoſts, Cuſtomes, and yearely reuennues of the common-wealth: They alſo purſue criminall cauſes, making themſelues parties, by meanes of the ordinary Atturney. At Zurich there are men (almoſt) in the ſelfeſame charge, whom they call Die Vmbgelter; who manageth the tolle-monies of Corne and Wine, which they cauſe to be gathered by their committees. This tolle or taxation is not but on the Wine publikely ſold, and on the Corne brought in from abroad: but for the wine & corne which the Bourgeſſes eate and drinke in their houſes, they pay not any thing.

The order at Zurich.

Tolle or taxe for corne and wine.

Beſide theſe two Treaſurers of the common-wealth, there is a third at Zurich, for the reuennues of the Church, & he is called Der Kloeſteren obman: he gathereth certaine reuennues of the Abbeyes; wherewith the Miniſters wages are payed, the Churches maintained, and the poore cheriſhed or releeued, and the ouerplus remaining, is reſerued to eaſe the people in times of publike neceſſities. Some yeares paſt, the country of Zurich hauing beene afflicted with an extreme dearth of victuals: the receiuer ſold corne at a meane price to them of the citty, and to moſt part of the Villages round about, bought with the reſerued mony at the beſt rate, and thereby the Subiects of the Seigneury were greatly releeued.

The Treaſurer of churches reuenues.

A great dearth in the country of Zurich.

Next to theſe, there are other Officers, as they that take care of publike buildings, whom the French call Voyers, the Germans Bawherren, and they of Baſile, Lonherren, becauſe they pay the works & workmen that ſerue in publike. Theſe Suruayers haue charge of the waies, Gates, Towers, Rampiers, Bridges, Couduits, and other publike Edifices: taking order that they ſhall bee maintained and kept in their beſt ability. Moreouer, they iudge with three Lords of the councell (who are their adiuncts) ſuch differences as happen for the confines, Gutters, Channels, Windowes, Walles, and ſuch like things, & wherin the neighbours are to be guided by their direction in their building. At Baſile there are fiue Seigneurs, that take knowledge of theſe matters.

Of Schooles & vniuersities

The Vniuersity at Basile, founded by Aeneas Syluius, who was after Pope, called Pius 2.

The reason why so few Schollers are in the Vniuersity of Basile.

There is another degree of them that take charge of victuals. Of this number are the visiters for Bread, to consider if the Loafe carry his full weight, or no. Others view the Flesh in the Butchery, and aduisedly obserue, that they kill not any Beast, the flesh whereof is bad, and dangerous to be eaten; they also set a price vpon the pound, to sell it by. Then there are some that take charge of Fish, and heedfully foresee, that none be taken whē they are spawny, and haue an eye besides to the goodnesse of all other Fish in the Market. Others looke to salt Fish, and to the Market of Butter and Cheese, how it is reasonably sold. There are some other Officers, whose names are sufficient to be noted: as the Patrons of Widdowes and Orphanes, Schirmuoegt, and at Basile, Weissenherren: The Almoners; Visiters for weights and measures; Deputies for questioning of matters; Comptrolers of Ecclesiasticall goods; and Visiters of Schooles.

Moreouer, in these cities there are Schooles very well ordered. At Basile is an Vniuersity greatly renowned, established by Aeneas Syluius, afterward Pope, named Pius the second, who gaue it all the same priuiledges, rights, and immunities, which the Vniuersities of Boulogne, Colongne, Heidelberg, Erdford, Lipsa & Vienne haue. Aeneas Syluius was lodged at Basile, during the time as the councell was kept there. He found the citty so pleasant, the ayre so sweete, with such commodity and abundance of all things; that hee reputed the place apt and worthy to haue an Vniuersity founded in it. In the times of our ancestors, and our owne also, this Vniuersity hath yeelded many wise men, professors of the tongues, in Philosophy and all Sciences, who are needlesse heere to be named. Neuertheless, considering the greatnesse of the citty, and the fame of the Doctours there abiding, there are but few Schollers. Beatus Rhenanus rendreth the reason, and saith; It is occasioned by the smalnesse of reuennues belonging to this Vniuersity, and to many Schooles in Germany. As thinking, that if there were fewer Schooles and Vniuersities, they would bee much more frequented then they are. There is not any Vniuersity at Zurich; notwithstanding, euen to this present day, the tongues haue beene so faithfully taught there, and all good Sciences and Diuinity, that it is very famous, and highly esteemed among all them that study Diuinity.

Finally, these three cities whereof we speake, haue power to stampe and coyne monie: and therefore there are fordging Mints, and Masters of the monies, whose charge is to take order that the money coyned with the stamp of the citty, shold beare full weight, and be of a good allay. Each of these cities hath her mony apart by her selfe. They of Basile do coyne the same mony with them of Halsatia and of Bourgongne, and call it a Rappenmuntz, in regard of a Rauen, which serueth for Armes to many peeces of their mony. Fiue & twenty Sols of this mony, makes a Florin of gold, which is thought to value threescore crutzers. At Schaffouse the mony is of the same allay & price, as that of the Empire. They of Zurich do coyne Dallers, and halfe Dallers, of equall price with them of the Empire: but they haue a kinde of mony, which is their owne in particular, whereof forty Sols makes a Florin of gold. They stampe also another sort of mony, which they cal Baches, whereof sixteene makes a Florin.

In ranke of these publike charges and offices, we may set downe the Watch, & such as take care for prouision against the accidents of fire. There are two sortes of watch, besides the Sentinels in the clock-houses, and the Porters. First the perpetuall guardes at the cities cost, who keepe watch euery night, and diligently search through all parts of the citty, crying at all houres of the night. Ouer and beside these, out of each company are taken a certaine number of Bourgesses, who likewise watch (according to their turnes) with their Armes. This double guard is not done for any feare they haue of enemies: but to auoid the inconueniences of fire, and to take order also, that (during the time of night) al maters may be peaceable and quiet.

The watch may not be forgot among other officers in publike, & tending to the generall good

They that are Committees, to take care of dangers concerning fire, when any such happeneth in the citty, may command the Carpenters, and other men of like quality, to runne for quenching the fire, taking order that all may bee done without confusion, and for the best safety of them that haue the mis-fortune of the fire.

The office of them that are guards for accidents of fire fire. Moreouer, they carry an eye ouer the watch at the Gates, and on the wals; leste any tumult should happen in the city. For it is ordained, that when the fire is in any one place, a certaine number of the Bourgesses (chosen out of each company) make their sudden appearance at the Gates or Ports, and vpon the walles in Armes. Moreouer, the whole citty is distributed into certaine bandes, euery one of them hauing his Captaine & Ensigne to it selfe, vnder whom they go marching in excellent order. The Bourgmaster betakes himselfe to the Town-house, with some of the principall councellers and officers of the Seigneury, to aduise on what is good for the weale publike. And not onely Carpenters, Masons, and their seruants, but likewise most of the Bourgesses meete together, all labouring industriously to quench the fire: and oftentimes the women shew themselues of no meane courage, in bringing and casting on the water. Beside, if the fire happen in some Village out of the citty, the lustiest disposed of euery Tribe (whereof election is made for the purpose) do meete, and issue foorth together, to quench the fire. They are conducted by one of the councell Seigneurs, who is sent to helpe and aduise what is meetest to bee done, but most especially, to comfort them that haue the losse.

The citty distinguished into diuers bands in martiall order.

What care the Switzers haue of the poore.

We haue already told you, that the Switzers take great care for the poore. At Zurich, and in some other Townes, there is a daily distribution of almes to all the poore there, as of Bread and Pulse-pottage. There are a great number of poore Schollers in Zurich, sometimes forty, otherwhiles fourescore, that are thus releeued; some bestowing garments, and other needfull things on them also, vsing the poore in no worse manner, then they of the Abbeyes and Couents in the Seigneury of Zurich are. Vpon the Sundayes and festiuall dayes, an almes collection is made of the people: which Monethly, or at euery two Moneths, by men chosen & deputed to the office, is distributed equally to the poore in the citty, and such as liue abroad in the fields. Beside, in the Citties there are great Hospitals, wherin needy cittizens, aged, impotent, sicke persons, orphanes, and many other are releeued. The Seigneury appointeth diuers honest people, to haue care of the poores necessities: such as are the Master of Hospitals, Procters, Receiuers, & their Committees and Comptrollers.

A collection of charitable almes for the poore.

Hitherto wee haue shewne you the forme and state gouernment obserued in the citties: but ouer and beside these, they haue authority in the neighboring countries, and (among the rest) the canton of Zurich hath more country iurisdiction, and larger Bayliwicks, then eyther Basile or Schaffouse. But in all the Lands and Seigneuries belonging vnto these three cantons, there is one and the selfe-same order of gouernment. For certaine Bayliwicks are gouerned by the councell of the citty, in such manner, as the Bayliffes dwell in the citty, and are councellers of the common-wealth, and yet go to keepe Courts in the Villages. And if there happen any criminall suite, and whereof there is desert of punishment capitall, the councell taketh knowledge thereof. There are other Bayliwicks of farre larger extent, and thether Bayliffes are sent with ample power: so that they iudge not only in ciuill causes, but oftentimes in criminall occasions, and chastise malefactors, according to the greatnesse of the delicts. These Bayliwicks haue their priuiledges and ancient customes: some also haue law and iustice apart by themselues, and are administred by Iudges chosen out of the same places.

The cities extent in gouernment abroad, foorth of the cities limits.

All the Bayliwicks are not alike in their extendure & authority.

The Bayliffes make no change or alteration (of any thing) in these places; but they leaue to the inhabitants, all their rights safe and sound: contenting themselues onely to preside in iustice, and giue sentence according to the lawes and customes of each Bayliwicke. The canton of Zurich hath nine great Bayliwicks, to wit, the county of Kybourg, the Bailiwicks of Groningen, Andelfingen, Grifensee, Eglisow, the free Prouince, Regenspourg, Vadeuille, and Lauffen, neere to the fall of Rhein. There are two and twenty small Bayliwicks or Castle-ships beside: in some of which, there is as large extent of ground, and as great number of men, as in some of the greater Bayliwicks. Moreouer, beside these Bayliwickes, two pleasant Townes, namely Winterdner and Stein, are vnder the protection of Zurichs canton. The Officers of iustice are in the same Townes; but the inhabitants are tyed ed in obedience to the Seigneury of Zurich, to obey their lawes, and to go to war for that Canton; in which respect, the two Townes haue their seuerall Enfignes by themselues.

The Bayliwicks belonging to Basile.

The Bayliwicks belonging to the Canton of Basile, are the Castle of Farnsperg, seated on the top of a Mountaine aboue Rhinfeld; Walbourg, a small towne on the Mount Iura, which they tearme Der Howenstein, in regard of the Rock there cut in sunder; Hombourg, Munchenstein, and Ramstein.

Schaffouse hath the most part of the country of Cletgoew, all about Basile, and sendeth Bayliffes and Chastellaines into the Bourroghs and Villages on it depending.

CHAP. VI.

Of the publike estate and gouernment, of the Townes of Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solleurre: which are not diuided into Tribes and Companies, as Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse are.

Of the second kinde of gouernment without tribes or companies.

WEe haue already said, that the second kinde of publike gouernment, is considered in such Townes, as are not distributed into certaine Tribes or Companies, out of which are equally chosen, the Lord & Seigneurs appointed for Councell and Iustice. In these towns they that are soueraigne Magistrates, or Heads of publike councell, are called Ein Schuldtheissen. The old Alleman word is found in the Lawes of the Lombardes, where it is written, Schuldahis. It seemeth that the word came of debt, which the Switzers tearme Schuld, and of commanding: as much to say, that the Schuldahis commands the debters to satisfie them of whom they borrowed. And in this sence it is found written in the Lombards lawes, vnder the title of debts and wages, in these words.

Schuldtheff. The deriuatiõ of the word.

The words as they are written in the Lõbards lawes.

If a free man who is a debter, hath nothing else wherewith to make satisfaction, but his owne priuate Cattell, as Horses and Oxen for labour, or Kine to the paile: then he that challengeth or demandeth the debt, shall go to the Schuldahis, and intimate the cause, giuing him to vnderstand, that his debter hath nothing else to make repaiment withall, but the matters aboue rehearsed. Then the Schuldahis is to make seizure on the said Cattell, &c.

The same word is found also in the twentieth title of King Luitprands lawes, in significant tearmes, as followeth. If any man haue a cause or suite, and do appeare before his Schuldahis to demãd iustice: if in case that the Schuldahis do him not iustice within foure houres after following (if both the parties stand bound to answer before him) himselfe shall pay to the demander sixe Sols, and to his Iudge sixe Sols.

The words out of King Luitprandes lawes to the same effect.

We may perceiue heereby, that the word Schuldahis signified (among our graue Ancients) a Iudge, that gaue sentence vpon differences concerning debts, made leuey on the debters goods, and compelled them to pay their creditors. Neuertheless, there was no iustice so high, but hee stood in subiection to the county. At this day, the name is in frequent vse among the Princes of Germany: so that the Iudges of Townes and Villages haue no other name. Among the Switzers it is more honourable, for in the forenamed townes, the Schuldahis is lord ouer all. The soueraigne Magistrates of Townes among the Switzers, some haue thought were called Consuls, in imitation of the Romans: others hold opinion, that Bourgmasters and Schuldahis ought to be called Prestors. For mine owne part, I call them Consuls, that are Presidents in publike councel. The French call him an Auoyer, whom we tearme Schuldtheß.

A Iudge that sentenced cases of debts onely.

The cheese Magistrate of any Towne among the Switzers.

Now as concerning the Towns whereof we speak, they are not diuided by companies and trades, because there are lawes which prohibite them from so doing. But although the forme of the Commonwelths of Zurich and Berne are different: yet the one stands bound to succour the other reciprocally, to maintaine and conserue the estate, such as is established in eythers common-wealth. In the meane while, the trades that are at Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solleurre, haue houses established for meeting, for knowledge of the best and cheefest workmen, but not for the election of Magistrates. They tearme those Officers by the name of Gsellschafften, and not Zunfften.

No Trades or companies in these Townes after such maner as at Zurich.

Two publike councels in those Towns: the great and the lesser.

In these Townes there are two publike councels, as at Zurich, Basile, & Schaffouse; to wit, the great and the lesser. The great councell of Berne, is of two hundred men, as at Zurich, although it hath more then two hundred councellers. The lesser councell of Berne, is of sixe and twenty. At Lucerna, eighteen councellers do gouerne the estate, during the space of sixe Moneths, and eighteene other sixe Moneths, or the rest of the yeare. To elect the councell of Berne, the proceeding is in this manner.

Banderet is the Captaine of a quarter in any good Towne.

The third Feries before Easter day, the foure Banderets of the Towne, doe chuse, and take with them sixteene Bourgesses, the worthiest and best esteemed men of all: then these twenty, with the Auoyer, do elect the great councell, wherfore we may well call them Electors. First of all, they consider and examine exactly, the liues and manners of all them that are to be of the councell of two hundred: and if any one of them hath soyled his dignity and reputation, with any bad or villainous acte; they depose him, and in the place, as wel of the deposed, as of the ded, they chuse another, whom they do better like and allow of. In meane while, their election remaineth secret, vntill the euening of the day before Easter, & then the Officers goe, and signifie to all them that are elected for the great and lesser councels: that they are to meete on the morrow morning in the Towne-house.

The manner of electing the councell of two hundred.

The first Feries after Easter, the Seigneurs of the councell do assemble in their houses of meeting, and afterward they conduct them to the Towne-house, that are newly set downe, to be in number of the two hundred, and then all the Magistrates are elected. The election ended, the Bourgesses go to feast in their houses, and after dinner, walke foorth into the fields: exercising themselues there in leaping, running, throwing the Barre, Stone, and other pastimes. But the Auoyer goes againe to the towne-house, accompanied with the twenty Electors; and there they elect the councellers, that are to be of the lesser councell. On the morrow, they are named to the councell of two hundred, and after that their election is approued, they goe and sitte downe in their places. Now in regard that the councell of Lucerna doth command no longer time thē sixe Moneths onely: the election of the Seigneurs both for the lesse and greater councell, is made twice yearely, if there be any vacant places, and that is done about mid-Iune, and mid-December. The new councellers are taken from the lesser councell, that gouerned during the sixe precedent Moneths.

The Seigneurs of the great councel meete in the Towne-house

The election of the lesser councell.

The councell of Lucerna chosen twice yearely.

The Auoyers or Consuls, who are aboue the other Seigneurs, are elected by the lesse and greater councels, & by common voyces. The authority of the Auoyer at Lucerna, lasteth but a yeare, and 2. years at Berne: but yet in such manner, that the voyces are yearely taken for him, and hee againe elected. Next to the Auoyers of Berne, the principall men in the commonwealth, are the foure Banderets, chosen out of foure companies of trades-men onely, or men of handy-crafts, to wit, Carpenters, Curryers, or Leather-dressers (who are distributed in three parts) Bakers, and Butchers.

The election of the Auoyers or Consuls.

The chusing of the foure Banderets out of foure companies.

The Towne of Berne is diuided into foure parts, which are committed (each one of them) to these foure Banderets: who view and ouer-see the Armes of all the Bourgesses, and prouide for the affairs of warre. They continue in their charge the space of foure yeares: but euery yeare on the same day as the Auoyer is elected, they resigne their estates, and deliuer into the hands of the cheese Vsher of the Seigneury, their Ensignes, and all the other markes of their dignity, which are laide on a Table before the Auoyer and the councell: and then the great and lesser councell giues their voyces, concerning the Banderets. If one of them haue continued in his charge fully foure years, or is preuented by death, another is planted in his place: but yet it is thus conditionally done, that if the dead did not finish his foure yeares, his successour must accomplish them in the nature of a substitute, and afterward, execute the same charge foure other yeares.

The diuision of Berne to the foure Banderets.

The time of the Banderets continuing in their office.

In all the Townes of the Switzers, the dignity of Purse-bearers or Treasurers is great. Some whiles, the time of their charge is not limitted at all; but they continue in that estate, so long as pleaseth the councell, and themselues also. There are two of them at Berne, the one receiueth the reuennues of the Towne, and of the Allemaigne country: the Two Treasurers at Berne, and their charge.

the other is for the Romane country, because hee receiueth the reuennues which the Seigneury deriueth from the countries of Vant, and of Sauoye. Those men which we haue so lately named Auoyers, Banderets, and Treasurers, with one counceller of the two hundred, are called at Berne, Die heimlichen Rath, which is as much to say, as the secret or priuy councell. For to them (before all other) matters of most secrecy, of consequence, and which concerne the whole Common-wealth, are reported and trusted.

Concerning the election of other publike Officers.

After that the abouenamed Magistrates haue beene elected, and confirmed by the lesse and greater councels; aduice is vsed, concerning other publike Offices, which is done in some of those Townes the very same day, and on the morrow in others.

As for those estates that haue not any dignity, as Serieants, Executers of iustice, Messengers, Watches, and other such like charges: ordinarily, the lesser councell bestowes them of such, as they know meetest for them.

The election of conncellers at Berne for the lesser councell.

The Bernians hold this properly to themselues, as concerning election of their councellers, that they will not receiue any person into the lesser councell, if he be not borne within the Towne. In elder times, if the sonnes of councellers were borne out of the Towne, they could not attaine to the fathers dignity. Now adayes, when some councellers are absent, about occasions of the weale-publike, and for the gouerning of some Bayliwicke: if they happen to haue any children, they are reputed as borne in the Towne. For the great councell, they may bee elected that are borne out of Berne: prouided that they be Bourgesses, haue houses in the Towne, and are issued of the Switzers country, or of the confederates of the Cantons. For no man is receiued into the councell of the two hundred, if he be borne out of Switzerland: and the same is in practise at Zurich, as we haue already declared. In like manner, bastards, and people of infamous note, are quite excluded from councell.

Election of them for the great councel

The ordinary manner of Iustice at Berne.

There are three Courts or Benches of iustice at Berne, all the Iudges whereof, are elected by the Banderets & Treasurers, and are confirmed by the lesser councell.

The first Court of iustice is called, Das Affergricht. The Auoyer presideth there, but the cheefe Vlher, whom they call Der grosz Weibell, doth (almost) daily keepe the place, and hath 12. Assistants, to wit, the last man elected of the foure Banderets, one of the Seigneurs of the lesser councell, and tenne of the great, with one Secretary, and two Officers. They take knowledge of debts, iniuries & outrages of slender consequence, as if one man giue another a box on the eare, or giues some words to his disgrace. A man may appeale from their sentence, to the lesser councell, and from them, to the sixty men, which is a councell composed of Seigneurs of the lesser councel, and of sixe and thirty councellers of the great councell. From the sixty, appeale may bee made vnto the generall. The Iudges doe assemble euery day to conclude causes, onely Tuesday excepted, which is the Market day.

The first Court of iustice, how and what causes are therein determined.

The second Court is called the Court of appellations, or appeales.

The second Court of iustice, iudgeth the appellations of the country of Sauoy: and therefore it is commonly called, the Court for strange Appellations; Das welsch Appellatz gricht. The Pursse-bearer or Treasurer of the country, sitteth in iudgement there, & hath ten assistants, to wit, two Seigneurs of the lesser councell, and eight of the great, with one Secretarie and an Officer. They end all the appeales for the country of Sauoye, and giue audience to parties at all times, and as oftē as they desire it. Notwithstanding, their ordinary vse is to meete after the day of S. Martin in Nouember, vntill the Moneth of December. All they of Sauoye come thether to the appellations, they onely of Lausanna excepted: but at euery two yeares, the Treasurer commeth to Lausanna with some assistants, and there decideth the causes of appeale.

The ordinary meeting of the Court.

The third Court, the Consistory for mariage-matters.

The third Court or iurisdiction, takes knowledge of matrimoniall causes. It is the Consistory, where there are eight Iudges; two of the lesser councell, who preside or giue sentence there (turne by turne) from two Moneths to two Moneths; two Ministers of the Church; foure of the great councell, and they haue a Secretary or Clearke, and an Officer. They assemble three times in the weeke, namely, on Monday, Wensday, and Friday, then they consider not onely on matrimoniall causes, but also censure such as giue scandales, and put in practise the discipline of the Church. Moreouer, these men and the Iudges of the first court of iustice, doe hold in estate but halfe the yeare, and are changed about Easter, and likewise about the end of September.

The limitation of their authority.

Two Courts of iustice at Lucerna, and what causes are censured in them.

They of Lucerna haue two courts of iustice, the one they call Das nuchengricht, because the Iudges do meete euery weeke, and decide al suites proceeding of debts and contracts. The other is called Das nuer gricht, the iustice of nine: for nine Iudges take knowledge of iniuries and outrages, and accordingly inflict punishment. There is not any Consistory at Lucerna, neither at Fribourg, or Solleurre: because they are Catholiques, and subiected to the iurisdiction of Bishops, by whose Officials the causes concerning matrimony are debated.

Criminall causes concerning life and death.

As for criminall matters capitall, there are not any particular Iudges thereto appointed, neyther at Berne, nor Lucerna. But when question is made concerning any ones life, the great and smaller councels take knowledge thereof, and iudge it. The Auoyers sit in cheefest authority, and censure on the matters. After sentence is resolued on at Berne, the Auoyer goes and sits in a seate of iustice, appointed in some eminent part of the Towne, enuironed with Officers of the Seigneury. Then the Clearke or Secretary readeth out aloud the confession of the offender, & the sentence giuen against him. Afterward the Auoyer enioyneth the hangman to execute the sentence, and commandeth the condemned person to bee deliuered to him. At Lucerna, the councell do iudge in criminall causes, of all the Bayliwicks, and all the Malefactors are punished within the Towne. But in all the Bayliwicks of Berne, there is iustice apart by it selfe, which they call Landtgricht, and thether the Iudges of all the Bayliwicks are called, and giue their aduice in presence of the Bayliwicks, who presideth: and yet in such sort, as the councell of Berne may approue, or change the sentence, if they thinke good.

How they proceed in cases of death.

In the Bayliwicks of Bern

Of the Bayliwicks belonging to them of Berne.

The Bernians haue many Bayliwicks, & are the most powerfull Seigneurs of the Leagues. In some they speak the Alleman or Germane tongue; in other the Romane or Sauoyan. Among the Alleman Bayliwicks, there are foure depending on the Towne, and are euen as Subburbs thereto: whereof the foure Banderets are Bayliffes, and if they were to go to war, those Bayliwicks march vnder the Ensignes of the foure Banderets. Moreouer, there are seuen and twenty other beside, to wit, the vale of Hasell, which hath an Amman, out of the body of the inhabitants, but hee is elected by the councell of Berne, & there rendreth an account of his charge. Vndersée is a Towne so named, because it is at the end of a Lake: thether is an Auoyer sent, but he is of the Towne ef Berne. The vale of Simma, both high and low, do call their Bayliffes Schachtlandt, that is to say, Castilians. Frutingen, Sane and Aelen, do name their Bayliffe, Gouernour. Laupen and Thun are in the same condition as Vndersée.

Next to these, are Signow, Trachselwald, and the Riuers of the vale of Emme. Brandis, that receiues her Bayliffe from the Lord of the place: but he is numbred among the Bourgesses of Berne. Sumiswald, where the Masters of the Teutonicke Order established a Bayliffe. Burgdorff and Pyrnestic are gouerned all alike, as Vndersée, Landhoutt, Arberg, Nidow, Erlach, Bippiũ, Wange, Arwange, Arbourg, Biberstain, Schenkenberg, and Lentzbourg. Moreouer, there are three free Townes in the country of Ergow, vnder the Seigneury of Berne, to wit, Zofinge, Arow, and Brug. There are eight Roman Bayliwicks, as namely, Auanches, Modon, Tuerdun, Lausanna, Morges, Nyon, Orbe, Aille and Veuay. Beside, they of Berne and of Fribourg haue foure Bayliwickes in common; as Mort, Schuartzenbourg, Granson, & Chalanse, whether they send a Bayliffe successiuely at euery 5. yeares end: so that if the Bayliffe be of Berne, his causes of appeale goe to Fribourg, where the reasons of the Bayliffe are examined. There are Prouosts beside, for the gouernment of Abbeyes. The Berninans had nine in the Allemane country, sixe wherof held iurisdiction, and three in the Romane country.

They of Lucerna haue onely two out of the Towne, as at Wiken, and at Sempach: but hee of Sempach hath no other authority in the place, but only the superintendency of the Lake, and of the Fish.

Of the Bayliwicks that belong to Lucerna.

As

As for their other Bayliwicks, they are gouerned by ſome of the Seigneurs of the councell. Thoſe Bayliwickes are Williſon, the Vale of Entlibuch, Rotenbourg, Habſpourg, Berone, and the neighbouring countrie, which they call, Chelampt: Meriſuande, that hath this priuiledge, to chuſe for Bayliffe, one of the Seigneurs of councell in Lucerna, euen whom they liſt, except the Auoyer: Weggiß, Ebicon, Horbe and Krientz. Moreouer, the two Townes of Surſey and Sempach, are in the protection of the Lucernians: Neuertheleſſe, they haue their councell apart by themſelues, who iudge in cauſes both ciuill and criminall. But the Auoyer of Surſey, giueth his oath to them of Lucerna. He of Sempach is elected by the councell at Lucerna: but he is in number among the cittizens of Sempach.

The priuiledg of Meriſuande, and of other places beſide.

The law of likeneſſe or equality, which the Latines tearmed Lex Talionis, is as yet vſed (in ſome ſort) at Lucerna. For if any man kil a citizen of the place, althogh he did it vpon iuſt occaſion, hauing beene prouoked thereto by the other, and in defence of his owne body: yet if hee be taken, they ſmite off his head; or if he flye, he is baniſhed for euer. But if he make ſatisfaction to the children or kindred of the dead, and cauſe them to giue ouer all purſuite: hee may obtaine leaue of the councell to come againe into the towne.

Lex Talionis is as yet in ſome vſe at Lucerna.

Among all the Switzers, there is not any but them of Lucerna, that make vſe of Braſſe Cornets, inſtead of Trumpets. The crooked Cornets, which they cal parſchhoener, giues a frightfull ſound. The Romanes alſo made vſe of Cornets in warre: and thereupon, they that ſounded or winded thoſe Cornets, were called Cornicines. The men of Lucerna ſay, that Charlemaigne gaue thoſe Cornets to thē; becauſe they carried themſelues valiantly in a warre which he had againſt the Sarrazins, and that Rowland, a Lord very highly beloued of Charlemaigne in thoſe times, ſerued himſelfe with thoſe kindes of Cornets long before.

Theſe forenamed Townes do coyne monies, but Berne, Fribourg, and Solleurre, haue one particular kind of coyne: whereof two and forty Sols, and two thirds of a Sol, makes a Florin of Rheine. Moreouer, they ſtampe another more great ſort of money, which the Switzers call Ein Dickenpfenning, and the French a Teſton. Theſe Teſtones are minted at Solleurre for the moſt part; and yet notwithſtanding, are counted of leſſe value, by a tenth part, then them of France. They of Berne coyned firſt certaine money, which the Switzers termed Baches: in regard of the figure of a Beare, which was ſtamped on the one ſide, for they called a Beare Baeren and Baetzen. Afterward, the other Cities and Townes of Switzerland and of Suaba, coyned the ſame money: ſixteene peeces whereof, valued a Florin of gold. The mony of Lucerna commeth not neere to the value and price of that of Baſile, which is more hard and ſtrong: for the Sol of Lucerna valueth but the moity of that of Baſile, and fifty Sols of Lucerna, will make one Florin.

Now we come to ſpeake of Fribourg, which is diuided into foure parts, like vnto Berne: the firſt is called the Borrough, the ſecond, the Iſland, or the Medow; the third, the new Towne; and the fourth, the Hoſpitall. The councellers of the common-wealth are choſen out of theſe quarters. As in the other Townes, ſo in this there are two publike councels; to wit, the great councell, conſiſting of 2. hundred, and the leſſer of foure and twenty. The election is made on the Sunday before S. Iohn Baptiſt day. The leſſer councell manageth the affaires of the Towne, deciding the cauſes of appeales: except of the Bayliwicks of Sauoye, conquered in warre. As for the matters which concerne the whole State, and are of maine importance, the councell of two hundred takes knowledge of them. The Auoyer, who preſideth both in the leſſer & great councels, is elected on S. Iohns day by all the people, and continueth in his charge the ſpace of two yeares.

Next vnto the Auoyer, are the foure Banderets, who are Captaines of ſeuerall quarters in the citty or towne, & althogh they are not of the ordinary number of Seigneurs of the leſſer councell: yet notwithſtanding, they aſſiſt there in name of all the people, and deliuer their aduice, except in appellations. If ſome thing be propounded which ſeemeth to belong to the councell of two hundred; they may ther make their report of it. Furthermore they remaine in authority, three yeares:

and are chosen by the great & lesse councels, as many other Officers are. Then followeth the office of the Treasurer, who manageth the monies, and all the reuennues of the Towne: he hath (as his coadiuter) the Secretary or Clearke of the Towne, or his Committees, who register downe all those summes, which the Treasurer receiueth, or imployeth. His charge also is, to haue an eye on all the publike buildings. Twice euery yeare he renders an account to the lesser councell, and remaineth in his charge, the space of three yeares.

Foure principall Secretaries in Fribourg.

In Fribourg there are foure principall Secretaries: the first is called Secretary of the Towne; the second, Secretary of the councell; the third, Secretary of the country; and the fourth, Secretary of law or iustice. In like manner, the estate of Saultier, or cheefe Vsher, is honoureble both in Berne and Fribourg, where it is named, Groszweibels. He is very often neere to the Auoyer, and when the Seigneurs are set in councel, he is at the door, counteth voyces, calleth the parties, and takes care of prisoners. His charge continueth three yeares.

The Saultier or chiefe Vsher.

The Courts of law and iustice at Fribourg.

As concerning Law and Iustice at Fribourg, they are established in manner following. First, the Court of Iustice belonging to the Towne, called, Das Stattgricht, is a particular assembly of certaine Iudges, to know and decide differences among the Bourgesses. And if there be any criminall processe or suite; their charge is to interrogate the prisoners, to present & deliuer the case in question, and then to relate all to the lesser councell.

The first Court or assembly.

The other assembly of Iudges, is tearmed Das Landtgricht, iudging the causes of dwellers in the country. In each of these iurisdictions, there are two Seigneurs of the lesser councell, and two of the great, and they meet three times euery week. Appeale may be made from their sentence, to the lesser councel. Moreouer, there are twelue Iudges, chosen out of the great and lesser councels, for the appellations of the Bayliwickes, conquered in the last warre against the Duke of Sauoye. They meete together once in euery Moneth, and there is no appealing from their sentence.

The other Court of iustice.

Twelue Iudges for the conquered Bayliwicks.

At Fribourg there are two kindes of Bayliwicks, as in the other Townes: the one of Bayliwicks neighbouring to the Towne, which are gouerned by certaine Seigneurs of the councell, who dwell in the Towne, and come dayly to councell, and of such Bayliwicks there are fiue. The other is, when the Bayliffes are sent to dwell on distinct places with ample authority: and they of Fribourg haue fourteene such Bayliwicks, and foure in common with the Bernians. The Bayliffes are elected by the great and lesser councels, the morrow after S. Iohn Baptists day, and hold in office the space of fiue yeares: but euery yeare they render an account of their charge, before the lesser councell. They enstruct also, and deale in criminall suites: but them they send to the lesser councell with their sentence, which the councell hath power to approue, change, or moderate.

Two kindes of Bayliwicks belonging to Fribourg.

Foure Bayliwicks in common with the of Berne.

Dealing in criminall occasions.

That which at Fribourg is called Trostungen, and in the vulgar, Leistungen, is carefully maintained at Fribourg. By these words is vnderstood a remise or tariance for certaine time, and the charges to be on his owne head; when the debter doth not pay his debt, at or on the day of assignement, as in this manner. When the debter maketh not satisfaction, on the day appointed for repayment, the creditor sendeth one, two, three, or more seruants (on horse-backe) to an Inne or Hostery, whose expences there the debter is constrained to pay (tarry they there neuer so long) vntill hee hath made satisfaction to the creditor. Some say, that the Duke of Zeringen established this Law. Such as infringe or breake it, are punished by imprisonment, banishment, or by the purse. And there is a certaine Iudge, who they call Bourgmaster, that holdeth a strict hand in this case. Moreouer, if action or suite is moued, and a man demand the Trostung three times, if it is not grãted to the demander, it is present banishment. Such as breake the peace, wherein they are enioyned to liue one with another, are banished likewise: and they that (without iust cause) will meddle, or take part on eyther side, when a cause is in pleading.

Finally, the Fribourgers make feasting yearely, with solemne procession of all estates through the Towne, on the second day of March, and on the eight and twentieth day of Iune; which are dayes of battailes tailes giuen, and victories wonne by the Switzers, against the Duke of Bourgongne, at Granson, and at Morat.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Commonwealth of those Cantons that haue neither Cities nor Towns, but dwell onely in Villages.

The author distinguisheth the Cantons according to their qualities of gouernmẽt & situation.

HItherto we haue discoursed on two formes of Common-wealths, concerned in the Cantons of Switzerland, that haue Cities and Townes. There remaineth now a third, which is of those Cantons that haue no Townes, but make their abode in Villages, and for that cause are called, Die Laender. There are sixe of them, to wit, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzell. Zug indeede is a towne, & hath her Officers in the towne, but the soueraignty of the Canton appertaineth to them that dwell in the lands of the Canton, with them of the towne, and are Lords as well the one as other. In all these Cantons, the cheefe of the publike councell, is tearmed Amman, which signifieth a man in office and authority, and that name is attributed to all publike Officers. So that Abbots, and other Ecclesiasticall persons, do call their Iudges, Receiuers, and other such like Officers, Ammans.

Amman is held as a Maior or Bourgomaster among the Switzers.

As the Townes are diuided or parted, by Companies and Colledges of Artezans, or Tradesmen; so the Cantons are distributed into certaine parts and portions.

CHAP. VIII.

Of all the sixe Cantons forenamed, which in this ensuing Chapter we will handle together, according to their seuerall rights & iurisdictions.

The Cantons diuided into certaine portions.

THE whole country of Vri is diuided into ten parts, which by them are called Gnoszamnen, as if a man would say, Participations. It may be in this respect, because they are all partakers in pasturages, goods, honours, and publike charges, and that from those ten parts onely, they are summoned and called, to be present at those assemblies which are yearely made.

The diuision of Suits.

The Country of Suits is diuided into sixe parts, which they call quarters. Because the country (heeretofore) was distributed into foure portions: but the people coming to encrease greatly, they made a new partage into sixe portions, which neuertheless do reteine the ancient name.

Vnderuald diuided in the midst.

As for the Country of Vnderuald, there is a Forest that diuideth it in the middest: and therfore the diuision is thus made to them that dwell aboue and beneathe the Forest. The whole Country taketh name of that part which is beneath the Forest: for Underualden is as much to say, as beneathe or vnder the wood. In elder times, Stants, a principall Village beneathe the Forest, and neere to the Lake, was the prime and cheefe place of the country, and the people were called, inhabitants of the Valley of Stants. But now adayes, because the word Vnderuald is taken for the whole country, the Switzers haue added these words, aboue and beneathe the wood, Underualden ob vnd nidt dem kernwald.

Of the name.

Stants a principall village.

The partition of Zug, the Towne & the Villages.

Now as concerning them of Zug, we haue said already, that they are diuided in two parts; the one is the Towne it selfe, the other the Villages round about, comprehended vnder three assemblies, to wit, the Mountaine, the Vale Egeria, and Barh, a Parish very neere to the Towne.

The diuision of Glaris.

Glaris is diuided into fifteene parts, which they tearme Tagwan. The word signifieth the work of a day, and as much distance or spaciousnesse of ground, as a man can plow in a day. It may be, that these parts were called Iournals, or day-labours: because euery one prepareth & ordereth the way in his quarter, and each one knoweth where he is to labour.

The orders or proportions belonging to Appenzell.

The country of Appenzell is parted into twelue orders or portions, which they call Raden, whereof those sixe conioyned to the Village of Appenzell, they name them the orders within, and anciently were subiects to the Abbot of S. Gall. The other sixe are called the orders without: to wit; out of the Abbots Seigneury,

Election of the councell.

Seigneury; heeretofore partly free, and partly in the iuriſdiction of Gentlemen. Out of theſe parts (by equall number) are choſen certaine men, for the councell of the Canton: in many of them there are threeſcore councellers, beſide ſuch as (hauing beene in office) continue perpetuall councellers. At Zug there are fiue and forty councellers, nine of each aſſembly, for the Towne is counted for two.

The generall councell of Appenzell.

The councell generall of Appenzell, conſiſteth of an hundred forty foure, to wit, twelue of each order. And if matters of importance are to be treated on, and it appeareth needfull to aſſemble the councell of all the people: then they will double or treble the councell in this manner. Each of the councellers takes a man or two with him, if they be to hold a coũcell of three times as many perſons, as ordinarily they vſe to do: and one of the councellers, on Sunday, in the Church after Seruice is done, hath a cuſtome to ſignifie, that on ſuch a day as he nameth, all the councellers are to meete in the Towne-houſe of the Canton, and each man is to bring with him ſuch a one, as he holdeth to bee an honeſt and wiſe man, who ſhall alſo bee there bound to obedience, vnder the oath whereby all are obliged to the common-wealth. Beſide, no man is elected to be a counceller, neither can he aſſiſt in the generall councell, if he be not borne in the country, Ein Landman: And it is much more eaſie to obtaine the degree of Bourgeſhippe, in the Townes of the Switzers, then in theſe Villages. Which proceedeth not of any inhumanity, for there are great ſtore of ſtrangers among them, towards whom they ſhew themſelues very kinde and humane. But rather by a certaine order of aduiſed iudgement, and according to the cuſtome of their predeceſſors: being neuer willing to mingle new commers among olde inhabitants of the country, both to preuent charges, and to preſerue the common-wealth (the more eaſily) in one and the ſame eſtate and condition.

None but natiues can be councelers

The Switzers louing and kinde to ſtrãgers liuing among them.

The councel generall of all the people, & their appointed places of meeting.

The ſoueraignty in theſe ſixe Cantons, belongeth to the aſſembly of all the people. All they of the country, from the age of fourteene, or ſixteene, or vpwards, do meete eyther at the principall Village of the Canton, or elſe at ſome other place in the midſt of the country. As they of Vri meete at Betzelinge, diſtant halfe a dayes iourney from Altorff, the cheefeſt Village of that Canton. The people of Glaris meete at Suanda. The ordinary and annuall aſſemblies of theſe Cantons, is made euery yeare about the beginning of May. They of Suits, of Vnderuald vnder the wood, of Glaris and of Appenzell, do meete the laſt Sunday of Aprill. They of Vri and of Zug, the firſt Sunday of May. In elder times, they of Zug held their generall councel the 24. day of Iune, being S. Iohn Baptiſts day. They of Vnderuald aboue the wood, meete the firſt day of May.

The yearely aſſembling of theſe cantons.

In theſe aſſemblies, firſt of all he is elected whom they call the Amman, in which office hee continueth the ſpace of two yeares. Heeretofore there was no terme of time aſſigned, but (oftentimes) the ſame Amman gouerned for many yeares together. He is permitted to be choſen among all the people, as a man that (for his vertue and wiſedome) ſhall be thought moſt worthy of that dignity and charge, without regard at all, in what place or Village of the Canton hee dwelleth. Notwithſtanding, in certaine Cantons, as at Appenzell, while the Amman is in his office of authority, hee goeth to remaine in the principall Village, where the publike councell keepeth moſt.

The Amman is the firſt Officer choſen in the aſſembly.

At Zug there are three aſſembles of them without the Towne. Next, the Towne hath the power of two aſſemblies and the ammans are choſen by order of each aſſembly. They that are elected of the aſſemblies without, doe dwell in the Towne, during the two yeares that they are ammans. In the ſame aſſembly wher the amman is elected, his Lieutenant alſo is choſen, whom they tearme Statthalter: and ſo are the Treaſurers or Purſſe-bearers, called by them Seckelmeiſters. Next, the Secretaries and Bayliffes which gouerne the Bayliwickes of the Canton: or thoſe which the Canton holds apart with other Cantons. Moreouer, Edicts are there read & confirmed, or abrogated yearely, by the voyces of all the people: ſo likewiſe ſports, and playing at cardes, dice, dancing, exceſſiue drinking, fore-ſtalling Markets of victuals, and ſuch like things.

firmed: but yet this is not done by euery assembly, but each of them ordered by the subiects of the Canton, and by the companies among whom they dwell. Finally, if at some other times of the yeare, there happen affaires that concerne the estate of the common-wealth, an extraordinary councell is held. As if need require, to send Ambassadors to the dayes at Bada, or to some other Kings and Princes; or if there be question of making alliances, be they eyther for peace or warre, &c.

An extraordinary councell holden.

Beside the lesser councell and the generall, composed of all the people; some of the cantons haue a councell more strict and priuate, and courses of iustice for diuision of suites. In the Canton of Suits, which is diuided in sixe parts, the principall counceller of each part is taken: and these sixe, with the Amman, make the councell of seuen, called secret. These seuen do manage and order all the reuennues of the country, and furnish all that is laid out for publike expences. Moreouer, there are two Courts of iustice, the one being called the order of nine, in regard of the number of Iudges, and there the Amman sits as President. In this Court are decided the causes of greatest importance: as of inheritances, outrages, and terrible iniuries, hard to be endured.

The Court of seuen, (so is the other order of iustice called) where the Lieutenant to the Amman sits as President: and those seuen are Iudges in causes concerning contracts, debts, and such like. They of Vri haue (almost) the same gouernment: for there the Court of seuen, with the Lieutenant to the Amman, doe censure and iudge of debts, which exceede not the sum of threescore pounds. There is another iudiciall Court of fifteene, where the Amman sits as President, and concludeth causes ciuill of greatest consequence.

The second of seuen.

The Court of fifteene there.

At Vnderuald also there are 2. Courts of iustice, the one at Stants vnder the wood, and the other at Sarna aboue the wood, and each of them hath an Amman. It is saide, that the country was parted, in the yeare one thousand, one hundred and fifty; when some debate fell among them for paying of a certaine tribute. And whereas before that time, they had but one councell, and one Standard, bearing a double key for the whole country: this partition caused each of the sides to take one key onely, and they that were aboue the wood, retained still their olde Standard, white and redde, because they were the greater part of the Canton. Then they vnder or beneathe the wood, receiued from Popes another Ensigne, which had two keyes in it: for in regard that Stants (long before) had beene the principall Village of the Canton, they therefore kept still the Ensigne, which in those times they had at Stants.

Two Courts of law & iustice at Vnderuald.

But one councell and one Standard till the diuision.

The Pope gaue them another Ensigne.

The Towne of Zug, beside the councell generall of the whole country, hath a councell apart, order of iustice, Magistrates, a Lieutenant to the Amman, Treasurer, Voyer, &c. who iudge the causes of the Bourgesses, and manage all the publike affaires.

The obseruation at Zug.

At Glaris there are two Courts of iustice, one of nine, the other of fiue Iudges, which the councell generall of the Canton do elect euery yeare. They decide law-suites in the Moneths of May, and of December onely. The nine take knowledge of differences concerning inheritances, and dangerous iniuries. The fiue do censure suites of debts and payments, after that the nine (who keepe Court the space of sixe dayes) haue ended.

Two Courts of iustice at Glaris, and their seuerall authorities.

They of Appenzell haue two courts of iustice also, the first is kept in a publike place of the streete; in regard whereof, they call it Das gassen gricht. Therein are foure and twenty Iudges, two of each order of the canton, and their President is the Vsher of the canton, Der Landtweibell, and they meete together weekly euery Thursday: they condemne men in fines, and chastise such as wrong one another. The other court is called Das geschwozen-gricht, iustice of oath: because twelue Iudges sitte there, and take knowledge of differences, which are ended, by giuing oath to one of the parties. Moreouer, from each order of the canton, a counceller is chosen, & many from the orders that are greater. These men make obseruation of such as breake publike ordinances, and deliberate on matters which are to bee propounded to the councell generall. In which respect, they are as Guardians of the lawes, and tearmed cheefest councellers: their charge is perpetuall, and they are called in this canton,

Of the catholike Cantons.

Suits, Vri, Vnderuald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzel, are Catholicke, and vnder the Dioceſſe of Conſtance. And if there happen any difference concerning mariages, they goe to the Officialtie of the ſayde place, but they of the other opinion goe to Zurich.

Puniſhment for adultery.

As for adulteries, they are chaſtiſed in each Canton: ſome, by confiſcation of goods; others (ſometime by the fine of ten Dallers. I haue heard likewiſe, that (diuers times) the councell general of the whole Canton, doeth decide ſome differences concerning marriages.

Iuſtice in criminall cauſes.

Iuſtice in cauſes criminall, is adminiſtred (almoſt in all the Cantons) by the publike councell, and oftentimes doubled or multiplied by the ordinary councellers; the Amman ſitting Preſident, or his Lieutenant. At Zug, in criminal matters, other aſsiſtants are ioyned with the councell or Iudges, choſen out of each diuiſion or aſſembly of the Canton. Suites of Law are diſcuſt in an open publique place, where all may heare that which is ſaid, and know the merite of the ſentence giuen by the Iudges.

The order & diſpoſition of the Baylywicks in theſe Cantons.

Now to ſpeake of the Baylywickes or Gouernements appertaining vnto theſe Cantons, they are carried and diſpoſed in manner following. They of Vri ſend a Bayliffe into the valley of Liuiner beyond the Mountaines: who hath one of the ſame valley for his Lieutenant and Aſſiſtants alſo; with whom he iudgeth cauſes both ciuill and criminall, and continueth in his charge the ſpace of three yeeres. Beyond the ſame Mountaines, they ſend Bayliffes alſo to Bellizona, and to two other places. They of Bellizona haue three Bayliwickes, to wit, Bellizona, the Vale Brune, and Riuiera, where the three Cantons do command in ſuch manner, that each of them hath alwaies a Bayliwicke. Moreouer, the inhabitants of Mount S. Godardo, are ſubiectes to the Canton of Vri; neuertheleſſe, they haue their Councell and their Amman, who are confirmed by them of Vri, & when there are criminal ſuites, two of the councell of Vri do meet there. They haue their Standard likewiſe: but when they of Vri do diſplay that belonging to the Canton, the other hold vp theirs.

Bellizona hath 3. Baylywicks belonging to it.

They of Suites haue ſometimes hadde foure Bayliwickes, to wit, the Marche, the Hermitage, Cuſnach, and certaine ſmall Villages or great Farmes, neer to the lake of Zurich: but the two former haue obtained municipall right, and doe elect a councell and triall of ſuites in their owne bodye. Notwithſtanding, euery yeare, when a councell generall is held at Suits, ordinarily they ſend their Ambaſſadors thether, and require, that they may haue leaue to elect their Magiſtrates; which is granted them, as in verie great fauour, with this exception, that they are to bee modeſt and obedient, for otherwiſe it remaineth in the peoples power of Suits, to ſend a Gouernour thether, whenſoeuer they thinke meet.

Foure Baylywickes heeretofore belonging to Suits, but two of them altered.

Cuſnach hath the ſame condition, but becauſe, within ſome few yeares certaine ſtraungers (cuſtomers for carriage of ſalt and other thinges that way) made their complaint, that they of Cuſnach did them wrong, and vſed them harſhlie vpon no occaſion: the men of Suits knowing the accuſation to bee true, ſent a Bayliffe thether againe, and appointed new ordinations for Cuſnach. Beſides, they haue two Bayliwickes in common with them of Glaris, to wit, Vznac, which is a Towne, and Gaſtall. Thether they ſend Bayliffes, turne by turne, and alwaies there is one of Suits in one of the Bailywickes, and one of Glaris in the other.

What Baylywickes they enioy in common with other.

In like manner, they haue three other Bayliwickes in common, beyonde the Mountaines, in the valley of Liuiner, with the Cantons of Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald. The charge and office of all their Bayliffes laſteth two yeeres, except in the Bayliwickes beyonde the Mountaines, where they holde for the ſpace of three yeares; and they goe not to the other but at certaine times, and to decide law controuerſies.

What time their Bayliffes continue in authority of gouerning.

They of Toggenbourg are not ſubiects but Bourgeſſes of Suits and Glaris, and go to warre for them ſucceſsiuely. They of Zug ſend Bayliffes to Cham, a very little Towne neere vnto their lake. To Saint Andrew, ſometimes a Towne. To Huneberg, Walcheuill, Stein-houſe. To Saint Wolfgang, and to other Villages. They bought this Countie in the yeare 1517. Next, with them of Suites, they ſend (turne by turne) Bayliffes to Vznac and Gaſtal. They of Toggenbourg are their Bourgeſſes, as we haue ſayde already; and go to warre for them, and for the Canton of Suits. Finally, the fiue firſt Cantons are Lordes with the other Cantons, of the Bayliwicks gouerned by them in common: except the men of Appenzel, who ſend a Bayliffe onely to Rhunthal, with the ſeuen firſt Cantons, & in the ſame manner.

Of cuſtomes belonging to theſe ſix Cantons.

Now follow ſome particular cuſtoms of theſe ſixe Cantons, and which are not common to all the Switzers. Whoſoeuer ſhall haue committed a murther, although it was done in the defence of his owne body, hee is conſtrained to forſake the Canton, and it is not lawfull for the leſſer councell to repeale him; but hee may demaund and obtaine leaue of the councell generall to returne againe.

In caſe of murther.

They doe not permit, that Landes and foundations of inheritances ſhould bee pawned or ingaged vnto any one that is not of the Canton; for they holde them to be no longer Lords of their countrey, if once they will becom bound for debts and morgage in ſuch manner their inheritances to ſtraungers. Likewiſe in the Canton of Vri, it is not lawfull for ſtrangers, that haue bene receyued there as inhabitants, to buy any inheritances, but a houſe and a ſmall garden for Pot-herbes onely.

Againſt morgaging of lands and inheritances to ſtrangers.

If any man being drunke, doe commit ſome ſcandalous action, hee is puniſhed by impriſonment; and beſide, hee is forbidden to drinke wine for the ſpace of a certaine time, and vntill the Councell generall haue pardoned him.

Againſt drunkenneſſe

In publike aſſemblies, and in the diſtribution of honourable charges and Offices: hee that is put in election, is preſent, and his parents, brethren, and ſons may giue him their voyces. They giue their voyces by lifting vp their hands on high, and ſome are ſet in an eminent place to count them. If they ſtand in doubt, and cannot ſo decide it, then they haue another courſe. There are two men, who hold two Halberds touching together at the points; they that giue their voyces, do paſſe vnder them, and two other men count them as they paſſe.

For voices giuen at the election of publike offices.

Finally, they vſe Feaſts and Proceſsions, on ſuch dayes as their Anceſtors obtained any remarkable victory. As they of Glaris do yearly celebrate the memoriall of the victory which they wonne againſt the Auſtrians, in the yeare 1387. and in the month of Aprill, I wil declare at large, the ceremonies obſerued by them in this feſtiuall; to the end, the better iudgment may be made of ſuch feaſts as are vſed by others.

Feaſts & Proceſsions for honourable cauſes.

Reade in the former part.

The order of the ſolemne Feaſt and Proceſſion, performed by the men of Glaris, in honor of their victory againſt the Auſtrians.

IN the moneth of Aprill, euerie yeare, on the Thurſday of the firſt weeke (except Eaſter day fall on the Sunday following, for then it is deferred til Thurſday in the weeke after) the Feaſt is celebrated. On the Sunday before, it is a lowde and openly publiſhed in the church, in behalf of the Seigneury, that on Thurſday following, the moſt honourable perſons of euerie Family, eſpecially the men, are to meete and go in ſolemne Proceſsion to Mulhouſere, by thoſe waies, places, and paſſages, where their Anceſtors were in great danger, euen ſo far as the Fountain, and to be warie of deſcending to the Village of Haures, til firſt they haue paſt the other way. Moreouer, that all keepe ſilence while the Sermon is done, and to carrie themſelues (that day) ſo modeſtly in their refection, that no diſorder may bee noted, becauſe the Seigneury will chaſtiſe them ſeuerely that do otherwiſe, and becauſe the whole Canton of Glaris doth ſolemnly feaſt that day. Forbidding alſo, that no man ſhall mount on Horſeback out of the Village of Glaris, ſicke & aged men onely excepted, who are not (being ſo mounted) to goe anie further then Scheneiſinge.

The great Feaſt of Glaris.

Remembrãce of their Anceſtors great peril.

After they are all aſſembled together, and rounded in a ring as it were; the Amman, who is in the midſt, makes a kinde welcome (in name of the whole Canton) vnto ſuch ſtrangers as are come thether. Firſt, to the Ambaſſador of Suits, who is yearly ſent for celebration of the Feaſt: becauſe thirtie Souldiers of Suites were preſent in the battell for which this Feaſt is kept. Likewiſe, he ſalureth the Abbots, Prieſts, & neighbors of Gaſtal, la Marche, Raſperwill and Toggenbourg, giuing them hearty thanks, for comming to celebrate this this solemne Procession, and to thanke & sing praises to almighty God, the Virgin Marie, and their Patrones, S. Fridolin, and S. Hillary.

The order of the Procession in marching, as they passe along to the place where the battaile was fought.

First, one beareth a red Standard, wherein is the Image of S. Fridolin, then follow 4 men, bearing a guilded Toomb, whereon are many faire and holy reliques enchased. Then come the Crosse-bearers, carrying the Crosses of Glaris, Haures, of the Vale of Liuthe, and of the churches neighboring to the Canton of Glaris, as of Schenniß, Wesen, and others. The Crosses are followed with Banners of all the Churches, and the Priests come after them, singing according to their order. The Curate of Glaris is the first, accosted by an Abbot, or else some other man of the Church. Among the strangers the other Priests follow. Then the councell of Glaris, to witte, the Amman, with the Ambassadour of Suits; then the Lieutenant to the Amman, and the other Officers in their order, each guiding or leading one of the most honourable strangers. The women (in great number) follow, to make vp the end and conclusion of the Procession.

The ceremonies in the Procession of Glaris, being come to the field where the eleuen stones are fixed in the ground.

Beeing come to the place where the battail was fought, there are eleuen stones set down in those seueral parts of ground where they began and held on fight with the enemy: for they had partings & meetings againe at hand-blowes, eleuen seuerall times, and at each of those stones the Standards and Banners stay, and all fall vpon their knees in prayer to God. Whē they are come to the sixt stone, they cast themselues round in a ring, and then the Secretarie of the Canton readeth in a paper, the cause and originall of this Procession, the summary whereof is this. War being moued betweene Leopold, Duke of Austria, and them of Zurich, Berne, Solleurre, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, and Glaris; Leopold led his Army to Sempach, where hee was ouercome, and slaine by the Switzers, the ninth day of Iune, one thousand, three hundred, fourescore and sixe, beside sixteene Earles and Barons, and a great number of Gentlemen.

The reason and originall of the Procession, read in particulars by the Secretary

Afterward, in mid-August following, they of Zurich, Vri, Suits, and Glaris, besiedged and tooke the towne of Wesen, & the inhabitants promised perpetuall fidelity to the Switzers. Truce was made, till the beginning of Lent in the yeare following; which being ended, and war beginning againe, they of Glaris sent a Garrison to Wesen, wher the Souldiers thinking themselues to be in safety, and confiding on the oath of the townesmen, were slaine (for the most part) in a night by them of Austria, who entred in the dead of night, by intelligence which they had with certaine of the inhabitants, that machinated this villany against the garrison, and opened the gates to their enemies.

A second reason, vpon the besiedging & taking of Wesen.

Furthermore, that the very same yeare, and the ninth day of Aprill, they of Austria brought an Army of fifteene thousand men towards Haures, and wonne the Fortresse of the Country. But three hundred and fifty Souldiers of Glaris, & thirty which the Canton of Suits sent to assist them, assayled the enemy, and (Gods helps furthering, the Virgin Marie, and their Patrones, S. Fridolin and S. Hilarie) they became conquerors, wonne eleuen of their cheefest Ensignes, and left two thousand fiue hundred enemies slaine in the field, beside them that were drowned in the Lake, and among the rest, many of Wesen were there slaine, that formerly had betraied the Garrison of Glaris. And therefore, in dutifull thankfulnes to God almighty, the glorious Virgin Mary, and S. Fridolin, and S. Hilary their Patrones, and to all the Saints and Sainteſſes of Paradise, & in euerlasting remembrance of so great a helpe and deliuerance, this annuall Procession was ordained vppon those limits, where their Ancestours had suffered many inconueniences.

A third reason of coming with an Army against Haures.

Gods iust iudgement for breach of faith.

After the reading of these seuerall letters, a Sermon is made in the same place; the Priests of Glaris performe their Aniuersary, and followeth the Minister of the new opinion. All their prayers being ended, they go againe to the same stones, in the same ranke and ceremony as they began, vntill they come to the eleuenth, which is placed neere to the Village of Haures, towards Wesen, where they assayled the enemy at the last time. Then they take their way to the Church of Haures; but they of the new opinion return home to their houses. The rest go to the church, where they sing a Masse for the Switzers that were slaine in the battaile: and one reciteth all the names of them of Glaris, that perished there. Soone after this, a banquet is made (at the Cantons expences) for the Prieſts, and all the ſtrangers that came in the Proceſſion. After dinner, the Prieſts ſinging, bring backe againe to Glaris the guilded Toombe, the Banners and Croſſes.

This is the manner of the annuall Proceſſion and Feaſt of them of Glaris, in remembrance of ſo famous and remarkable victory. The other Cantons alſo haue their Feaſts, to celebrate the victories obtained at Morgarten, Sempach, and elſewhere.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Common-wealths belonging to the Confederates. And firſt of all, Of the Abbey of S.Gall.

The Abbot and Abbey of S Gall the firſt confederate.

AFter we haue ſpoken of the thirteene Cantons, and of their ſeuerall Common-wealths; me-thinks now (according to the ſame order) wee ſhould make mention of their Confederates, among whom, the Abbot and Abbey of S. Gall holdeth the prime place. The Abbots of S.Gall, haue bin great Lords for the ſpace of many ages poſſeſſed of great meanes, and numbred with the Princes of the Empire: but I know not well, from what Emperour they receiued this honour and title. Stumpfius noteth, that Conrad de Pfauerts, Annaliſt of Switzerland writeth, that Abbot Huldrich, of the houſe of Altſax, was made Prince by the Emperour Phillip, in the citty of Baſile. Now albeit theſe Abbots are not of ſuch power as heeretofore; yet notwithſtanding, they continue ſtill great Lords, and haue their dominion in large extendure.

Abbot Huldrich was made a prince at Baſile.

What poſſeſſions the Abbot hold in Turgow, and in diuers other parts of the country.

In the country of Turgow they are Lords of Wile, and haue a Pallace and a Vicar in the Towne. Moreouer, in the high country of Turgow, they haue a great Territory, and well peopled, who are all ſubiect to them. The inhabitants are called Die Gottſhuſzlut, the Subiects of the houſe of God, or of the Abbey, and are parties in certaine Regions. Their names are Roſac, Thumbech, Gold, Vndereg, Morſwill, Tablate, Gozow, Waldkilch, Romiſhorn, Summery, Mule, Hotiſchwill, Bernattzell, Lumiſwill, Berg, Wittenbach, Rodtmont, Strubenzell, Geiſerwald, Helbach, Bergknecht, Luzwill, Ziberwangen, Vnd Wiger. Theſe places are diuided into Caſtle-wicks or Preſident-ſhips, and the Abbot ſendeth Prouoſts thether. Moreouer, he hath his Ammans and Officers, that hold meane Courts of Iuſtice in many places. Beſide, he hath a higher Court of iuſtice, whether reſort all appellations, and where cauſes of importance are decided. All kindes of duties, and ſuch as are rendred to Princes, in theſe places are confirmd vpon him.

The Abbots power in the county of Toggenbourg

Beſide this country, the county of Toggenbourg acknowledgeth (as Lord) the Abbot of S.Gall, who ſendeth a Gouernour into the country, and a Iudge in criminall cauſes, which admitteth no further appeale. And yet they of Toggenbourg are Bourgeſſes of Suits, and of Glaris, & haue their priuiledges & franchiſes; by meanes whereof (among other things) they enioy the freedome of Religion. Alſo in the Bayliwick of Rhinthall which belongeth to the cantons: the Abbot holdeth law courts of iuſtice in many Villages, & keepeth Officers there for that purpoſe.

CHAP. X.

Of the Common-wealth in the Towne or Cittie of S.Gall.

Imperiall Townes.

SAint Gall, Mulhouſe, and Rotuille, are numbred among the Imperial townes, and therfore haue (almoſt) the ſame manner of gouernement, as we haue already deſcribed vnto you. But becauſe the cittizens of S.Gall, do hold ſomething in particular; I will here ſet downe a ſummary deſcription of their common-wealth.

Sixe Tribes or Companies in S.Gall.

In the firſt place then, the Towne of S. Gall is diuided into ſixe Tribes or Companies, & the Society of Noblemen. The firſt & principal of theſe Tribes, is of weauers, becauſe of the linnen cloth there wouen, which is made very faire, and in abounding quantity: which afterward is ſold in Germany, France, Italy, Spaine, Bohemia, and Poland, greatly enriching the inhabitants that dwell in S. Gall, and making the Towne much renowned. It hath two councels, according to other towns, to wit, the great and the leſſe. The leſſe is compoſed of foure and twenty, and namely firſt of all, twelue Zunfftmaſters. Each Tribe, Colledge, or Company, hath three Maſters, which gouerne the company a yeare, turne by turne: but there are no more then two, which enter into the leſſer councell; the firſt is of the new, the ſecond of the olde. The thirteenth Zunfftmaſter, is the firſt of the eleuen, which are elected out of each Tribe, to be of the great councell.

Twelue maſters.

The election of the Zunfftmaſters.

The Zunfftmaſters are elected by ſecret voyce in their Tribes, and are confirmed by the leſſer councell. Euery yeare, the councell and officers of iuſtice, are elected about mid-Iune, and mid-December. Beſide the Zunfftmaſters, nine other Senatours do aſſiſt in the leſſer councell, and are choſen as well in the company of Noblemen, as in the other companies. The three Conſuls (with them) make the number of foure and twenty councellers: For there are three Conſuls in S. Gall, the firſt is in charge; the ſecond is called olde Conſull, for hauing gouerned in the very neereſt yeare before; and the third preſideth in iudgement for criminall cauſes, and in other places he is called, Prouoſt of the Empire, Reychuogt. The councell is elected the firſt Sunday of Aduent, not in the leſſer councell, but in the generall, by ſecret voyce, Mit derrun: the Sub-conſull and the Zunfftmaſters, going then out of office, do collect the voyces.

Nine Senators.

Three Conſuls, and how they gouerne.

Election of the Councell.

The great councell is compoſed of threeſcore and ſixe, to wit, twelue of each company: whereby there are ninety perſons in the great and leſſer councels. After the election of the Conſuls and the councell, the ordinances of the Towne are read in this aſſembly: whereon the Conſull and the new councell do deliberate. Then they go (by two and two together) to the great Temple or Church, named S. Laurence, where all the cittizens meete, and after reading of the lawes and ordinances, the Conſull ſweareth firſt to obſerue them, and afterward, receiueth of the councell and whole aſſembly, the ſame oath. This done, the morrow after chriſtmas day, and the day following, the Zunfftmaſters, and the other eleuen Seigneurs of the leſſer councell, do meete together in the Towne-houſe, and elect the Sub-conſull, whom they call Vnderburgermaſter. His charge is to take order for the watch of the Towne, and to appoint Tutors and Ouerſeers for Widdowes & Orphanes, and alſo to examine their accounts.

The great councell, in what manner they are choſen, and what order they obſerue.

The election of the Sub-Conſull or Vnderburgermaſter.

Euery weeke, the leſſer councell do ordinarily meete together twice, on Tueſday and Thurſday; except thoſe dayes be Feſtiuals, or haue Fayres. Alſo the Thurſday before Lent, which they call the mad Thurſday, Den Vnſinnigen donſtag: becauſe once, and on that day, the people mutined againſt the councell, by meanes whereof, it was ordained, that (frō thence forward) there ſhould be nō more aſſemblies held, as on ẏ day. The leſſer councell manageth the Townes affaires, decideth ciuill cauſes, and giueth ſentence concerning inheritances and willes: but medleth with no criminall ſuites, nor differences about Scedules, Obligations and iniuries.

When the leſſer councell do aſſemble together.

The mad Thurſday.

The office of the leſſer councell.

The great councell meeteth together fiue times euery yeare. Firſt, the morrow after chriſtmas day, when they elect and confirme the new Magiſtrates. Secondly, in mid-Lent, to elect and confirme the Maſter of the Hoſpitall. Thirdly, the Friday before S. Bartholmewes day, being the foure and twentieth day of Auguſt, whē they eſtabliſh the Maſters of Halles, and conſider on the tolles and taxes at the Gates. Fourthly, and fiftly, before the Fayres which they keepe, on the morrow after Aſcenſion day, and the day of S. Gall; and then they conſult on the conſeruation, and courſe of Courts for the Fayre.

The fiue meetings of the great Councell euery yeare.

The great councell alſo doth ſometimes extraordinarily meete when they are to diſcourſe on matters, whereof the councell ought to haue knowledge, as concerning ſentences in criminall ſuites. Then the Prouoſt of the Empire ſitteth Preſident, and demandeth each caſe: this is done in the Towne-houſe, and the doores kept cloſe. The leſſer councell electeth the Prouoſt, and giueth him power to iudge. Afterward, the great councell decideth the appellations made vnto him, and receiueth ſuch ſtrangers as deſire to be Bourgeſſes.

Extraordinary meetings of the great Councell.

Election of the Prouoſt by the leſſer Councell.

But this is done more often, in the ordinary aſſemblies of the great councell, and and then also they conclude there on many appeales. Sometimes the lesser councell sendeth affaires of importance to the great councell, to bee considered on.

The three meetings of the Councell generall of all the people, and their appointed times

Euery yeare, the councell generall of all the people, is assembled three times, about publike affaires. First, to elect the Consull. Secondly, the morrow after Christmas day, to take oath of the new Consull, and to binde him to obey the Magistrates. And thirdly, in the Moneth of August, about S. Bartholmewes day, after that the ordinance for tolles and taxes is agreed vppon, to heare the Lecture, which is made before all. Moreouer, the lawes and statutes of the Towne are distributed into three parts; one part whereof is deliuered to the people, in each of these three assemblies.

The cheefest Court of Iustice and authority thereof.

The principall and cheefest Court of iustice, is that of fiue; who are the Consull, the Sub Consull or Lieutenant, one of the new Zunfftmasters, and two of the new councell. They iudge in differences concerning borrowed monies, things laid to pawne, debts that haue no certaine time prefixed, wages that are due, suites concerning victuals, injuries, and fines. They sit on the Wednesday, or Friday, and there is no appeale from their sentence; neuertheless, they may send backe difficult causes, and of importance, to the lesser councell.

The Court of Iustice, called the Towne or Citty Court, and what Officers belong thereto.

Next to this, there is the Towne court of iustice, Das Stattgricht, composed of twelue Assistants, chosen out of the Noble mens companie, and out of the other companies; so that the one is of Zunfftmasters, and the other of the people. The cheefe Officer of this court is called Statamman, Maior of the citty, and is elected with the other Magistrates, about Christmas day, and is confirmed by the great councell. As for the Assistants, they are changed twice euery yeare, and elected by the great councell, on one of the feast dayes of christmas, & by the lesser councell, about S. Iohn Baptists day, in the Moneth of Iune. These Iudges take knowledge of debtes, barterings, and yearely rents, although the summes bee great. They are called together by tolling the Bell, and assemble in the Towne-house on Monday in euery weeke, except it bee a Feast day, or that all the councell doe meete together, for then they referre those causes till Wednesday. A man may appeale from their sentence, to the lesser councell, prouided, that the suite be of no lesse moment then an hundred Sols, or Shillings: and if the appeallant loseth his cause, he is condemned in a fine to the Iudges.

What causes they deale withal when they sit in Courts.

Of the Consistory Court, and Iudges thereto belonging.

The consistory court is composed of eight Iudges, whereof foure are Ministers of the Church, or some other men of learning: next, two councellers of the lesser councel, and two of the great. There sitteth another Seigneur of the lesser councell, as President, who questioneth the causes: and if there be as many voices on the one side, as on the other, hee reduceth both parties to such a course, as hee conceiueth to be iust, and then sentence is giuen accordingly. The consistory censureth matters of marriage, and of diuorces, and no appealing is permitted from sentence. But if there happen any inuolued or entangled variance, or if some colour of pollicy be mixed with the case of marriage; then cause and all, is sent to the councell, where the deciding is suspended, vntill the councell, and some other learned men, haue aduisedly considered thereon.

Concerning intricate and cumbersome cases.

Of publike estates, charges & offices.

As for publike Offices, estates, and charges, this common-wealth is therein gouerned, as the other are; hauing Treasurers, Masters of Halles, Receiuers, and Administrators at the Gates, for customs, tolles, and taxations, Voyers, &c. Such as hold these places, doe render their accounts, first to the Zunfftmasters, next to the lesser, and lastly to the great councell, on the morrow after christmas day. Hauing giuen vp their accounts, the lesse and great councell do elect new officers, or reconfirme the olde: and it is openly read, what the charge is of each one of them in particular, and afterward, in presence of the councell, they sweare to discharge their duty faithfully. But when many are established in one and the same charge, then such rules as they are to follow, are giuen them in writing.

New Officers chosen, or the olde admitted againe.

Linnen cloth the only maine trading of S. Gall.

And because the very greatest trading of S. Gall, consisteth in linnen cloth, and that not onely the people of the towne, but them also in most part of the Villages round about, doe maintaine their liues therby; the councell is diligent and carefull, for well ordering all things in that reſpect, and for the auoyding of fraud and deceit. Firſt, therefore, ſo ſoone as the weauer hath finiſhed a peece of cloth, there are three expert ſworne Viſiters or Ouerſeers, that come to looke vpon it. and according as it is good, or indiffrent, they ſet on ſuch and ſuch markes. If it appeare to be bad and naught, they ſend it to the Zunfftmaſter of the weauers, and to the other eleuen Zunfftmaſters; who condemne the workman in a fine, or cut the whole peece into ſome portions, of eight Elles in length each one, or elſe through the midſt, or if it bee worth nothing, they burne it openly. This view and viſitation is done daily, and there is a Market of linnen cloth, which hath certaine Lawes, for the obſeruation whereof, they that deale in ſuch Merchandize are ſtrictly bound.

A Market of linnen cloth onely.

What is done after approbation of the cloths goodneſſe.

After that the cloth hath beene ſeene and approoued; the ſworne Meaſurers do both Ell it, and marke it. The Meaſurers haue ſome other ſworne men of the Myſtery, to be their adiuncts; and the Merchants haue with them the Ouer-ſeers of the meaſuring. They call them Den teiff, meaſurers of linnen cloth, which are of diuers lengths: but a whole peece conſiſteth of 134. Elles, and may not be of any greater length. There is another view made at the whitſters, wher the cloth is thickened and whited. Theſe Viewers are called Die wyſſen Schower. They looke that the clothes haue their requiſite whiteneſſe, and whether they ſuſtaine any harme in the thickning: and according as they finde, they marke, or condemne the whitſter in a fine. Likewiſe there are certaine Merchants and Weauers, that viſite the whitſters houſes and grounds, to ſee if all things bee fitting and conuenient there: whether they haue ſufficiency of wood and aſhes, that none may be wronged by delay. Euery yeare the Maſters whitſters take newly their oaths, to doe their duties as becommeth them.

Viewers of the whiting of cloth, & how they are thickened.

Linnen cloth reputed fit to be died in colours, & how they deale therein.

As for the clothes which the Viewers (whom they vſually tearme Blaw vnd Schwartz gſchower) thinke fit to ſend to the Diars: the cutters of linnen cloth, named Lynwathſchnyder, do cut them iuſt in the midſt, and there are other committees, to regard that they haue their iuſt meaſure. After they are dyed into colours blew or blacke, if the Ouerſeers finde the dying to bee well taken, they marke the peece, and when they haue plained and ſmoothed it with a Rowler; others come to approue it valuable, and they ſet on the Seale. Contrariwiſe, if it be ſpoyled and viciate in the dying: they cut it, or dip it againe, if it may bee done, and the Plainer and Diar are condemned in ſome fine. All theſe things aboue named, are very carefully obſerued, and if any dare do otherwiſe, hee is ſeuerely puniſhed. For the Towne or Citty of S. Gall hath this priuiledge, to condemne in criminall ſuite; to fetch men out of places of refuge, and to puniſh them that vſe any fraud, in weauing, marking, ſealing, dying, plaining, or miſuſing any Linnen clothes.

Penalty for cloth ſpoyled in dying.

The priuiledg belonging to S. Gall.

Something likewiſe muſt needs bee ſaid, what order they of S. Gall take, to auoid the inconueniences of fire: becauſe they hauing beene heeretofore much endamaged thereby, it hath made them (ſurmiuing) to be the more prouident. Euery euening, for the ſpace of a quarter of an houre, there is a Bell rung, and it is called Die Feurglocken, the Fire-Bell: which admoniſheth euery one, to looke to the hearths of their Chimnies, for feare leſte fire ſhold take in any part. Then are there two Zunfftmaſters, that foure times yearely do viſite the hearths, furnaces, & chimnies in all the houſes; and thereupon are called Die Feurgſchower, Viſiters for fire. They regard alſo, what Armes and prouiſion of foode the Bourgeſſes haue: and whether they be prouided and furniſhed, according to the ordinances of the Seigneury.

What prouiſion they make againſt the inconueniences of fire.

Viſiters for fire.

Beſide, if there riſe any impetuous windes, or any rough ſtormes or tempeſts happen (beſide the ordinary Captaines of the watch, whom they call Die Wachtbieter) there are two other, named Maſters of the watch, Die wachtmaſter, who take with them two men of euery Tribe, well appointed, and goe with the Captaines of the watch, to walke the round through all the ſtreetes of the Citty, to preuent the dangerous accidents of fire.

Againſt troubleſom winds and tempeſts.

Captaines of the Watch.

Euery night, two and thirty men keepe watch on the Towers and Walles, and in other places of the Citty, beeing appointed as Sentinels, by the cheefe Zunfftmaſter, with the Captaines of the watch.

If

When fire takes in any place.

If fire take in any part, some of the Cittizens runne to the Gates, some on the Towers and Walles, some into the cheefest streetes; some keepe company with the Consull, and others labour to quench the fire. There are foure Captaines of the lesser councell, that haue a care of all this businesse, commanding euery one to that which is to be done, and punishing greeuously the disobedient. If the fire be without, and neere the citty, they send foorth a certaine number of men with their Captaines, to prouide against the inconuenience. Others keepe watch at the Portes, upon the Walles, and in other places, where they are by them appointed.

Foure Captaines of the lesser councel

Schooles, Almes-houses Hospitals, &c. spared to be spoken of.

I spare to speake heere of Schooles, Almes-houses, and Hospitals, because they of S. Gall gouerne themselues therein, as other well pollicied citties do, and carry a faire and comely order among them. Likewise, I will not speake of the election of the Ministers of the Church, nor of their establishing and charge, neither what order they hold in their assemblies: because in this worke, we treate on the matters of pollicy onely, reseruing to discourse on the other, at some apter time and place.

CHAP. XI.

The Common-wealth of the Grisons.

Concerning the Grisons in elder time.

THE name and dominion of the Grisons heeretofore was of great extendure: but now wee vnderstande by that word, a people of the Alps, whō the French and Italians haue named Grisons, and the Switzers Grawpundter. In ancient times, they inhabited Rhætia in the Alpes, neere to the fourse or head of Rheine, and of Iun.

The Grisons are diuided into three Leagues. The first is called the League Grise, and hath ten Comminalties, to wit, the Abbey of Dissentiss, which the ancient Cardes or Mappes called Disertine. To this Abbey are ioynd Tauetch, Trumb, and some other places. 2. Walterspourg. 3. Obersachs. 4. Lugnits. 5. Fals. 6. Tlantz. 7. Schlæwiss. 8. They of Laax, Sinis, and them enuironing about the wood. 9. Thænnen. The Grisons call these nine Communities; the part aboue the wood, Die obdem Wald; and the other ten, they call, vndet the wood. 10. Flims. 11. Trimon. 12. Safien. 13. Ratzuns, the ancient abiding of the noble Family of the Barons of Ratzuns. 14. Henltzenberg, and Tusiis. 15. Schopine. 16. Schamps 17. Splugen. 18. Masax. 19. Rufflee.

Three leagus diuided of the Grisons.

The first league, hauing all these Comminalties belonging to it.

In each of these Comminalties, they yearely elect a soueraigne Magistrate, which many of them do call Amman, who with the Iudges or Assistants, elected by the same comminalty, doth iudge suites in law, and condemneth delinquents, according to the exigence of the case. Beside these Ammans, there is a great Prouost of the whole League, whom they call Den Landtrichter, who is chosen by euery one in the generall assembly of all the comminalties, and sitteth President in the dayes meetings for all the League.

A soueraigne Magistrate in each of these Comminalties.

These meeting dayes for this Grise League, is in the Village of Trumb, which is the cheefe comminalty, and there also meet the Seigneurs of the Iusticial court, wherein the Landtrichter sitteth President, who hath fifteene Assistants, one Clearke or Secretary, and one Officer. The Lord of the Castle, and of the Barony of Ratzuns, is yet aboue the Landtrichter, by an ancient prerogatiue, belonging to the race of the Barons of Ratzuns, in whose rights, the Lords of the places haue euermore succeeded.

The Grand Prouest of the whole League, and his order in Court of Iustice.

The second League is called Der Gottshuspundt, The League of Gods Houshold, or of the Cade or League Cathedrall, because of the Bishoppricke and Colledge of Coire: and it hath one and twenty Comminalties, which sometimes were reduced into eleuen much greater. The Towne or Citty of Coire is numbred in the first place, as the chiefe of the League: and alone (among the eleuen Comminalties) is compounded of two lesser. But as the cittizens are encloſed in the ſame walles: euen ſo are they counted but for one Comminalty, and the other twenty reduced into ten, make vp ten great Comminalties. The citty (for ſo we will call it) of Coire, hath a common-wealth apart by it ſelfe, like (wāting but little) to that of Zurich, and to other gouernments of the ſame condition. For firſt of all, the cittizens are wholly diuided into fiue companies, from each of which are choſen fourteene men, who are of the great councell publike: ſo that the great councell and generall, is compoſed of ſeuenty. From theſe ſeuenty men, are choſen fiue of each company, for the leſſer councell: to whom are ioyned the fiue Zunfftmaſters of the precedent yeare, whereby the leſſer councell hath thirty councellers, whereof fifteene called Senatours, gouerne the common-wealth.

The League of the Cade, or of Gods House.

The leſſer councell of thirty.

In the councell there are two Conſuls, who are Preſidents (turne by turne) a whole yeare. The councell and the Officers of iuſtice, are yearely elected on the eleuenth of Nouember, being the day of S. Martin. The thirty of the leſſer councell do iudge in criminall cauſes, and the Gouernor or Prouoſt ſitteth then as Preſident, remaining in that charge a yeare: at the ende whereof, another taketh his place, and they two are (in this Office) as two Conſuls. Next, there is a Court of iuſtice belonging to the Lieutenant, who hath fifteene Aſſiſtants, to witte, the fiue Zunfftmaſters, and ten from the thirty of the leſſer councell. This Court taketh knowledge of ciuill cauſes, and pecuniary actions concerning debtes: there is appeale from them to the leſſer councell, who doe decide alſo matrimoniall matters.

The Gouernour or Prouoſt Preſident

The Lieutenants Court of Iuſtice, and his Aſſiſtants.

The ſecond Comminalty, which wee ſhould count for the third, becauſe Coire takes it ſelfe for two, is named Die vier dorffer, the foure Villages. 4. Bergon. 5. Tieffencaſten. 6. Stalla. 7. Trintzen, with Reamps and other Villages, which with Tieffencaſten, make one iuriſdiction, where the Bayliffe of Reamps iudgeth ciuill and criminall cauſes. 8. Vatz the high, where ſometimes dwelt the Barons of Vatz: this Comminalty is ioyned with the fourth. 9. Furſtnow. 10. Ortenſtein in Tumleſch. 11. Sinnada. 12. Zutz: theſe two are in Engadin the high, and make one of the great comminalties. 13. Ardetie. 14. Scultine. 15. Remuſs: which with two other ſmall comminalties, maketh one of the great. 16. Bergell aboue the Port. 17. Bergell vnder the Port. 18. Peſclaw, or Poſtlaaf. 19. Bruſch, which is ioyned with Poſtlaaf, and maketh one of the eleuen great Comminalties. 20. Munſtertall. 21. Mals. Each Comminalty hath his Ammans, Podeſtats, and vnder-Officers as they tearme them in leaſt authority, vnder whom they are maintained in liberty.

Of the ſecond Comminalty.

Theſe Comminalties are heere counted as they ſtand in the Record.

The third League tearmeth it ſelfe the League of Iuriſdictions, or the league of Rights. The firſt and principall of the ten, is called Tafaas, in regard of a Village ſo named, where the houſe of the League is, and where the dayes meetings for the ten Comminalties are held. 2. Beelfort, or Aluanuw. 3. Churwalden. 4. Langwiſs. 5. S. Peter de Schanſik. 6. The little Abbey in Brettigow. 7. Ienats, or Caſtelſer. 8. Schiers. Theſe eight iuriſdictions doe acknowledge the Arch-Duke of Auſtria to be their Soueraigne. Anciently, the Barons of Vatz were Lords thereof: but all their race fayling, the Counts of Toggenbourg ſucceeded them. And after them, the Counts of Amat, whereof one being named Gaudentius, dying in the yeare one thouſand, foure hundred, eighty nine, left theſe eight iuriſdictions to the Arch-Duke of Auſtria.

The Arch-Duke eſtabliſhed a Gouernor there, which to this day is choſen among the Griſons. The Gouernor dwelleth at Caſtelſer; and preſideth in ſentence of criminall cauſes: he manageth and conſerueth the other rights of the Arch Duke, who hath not the ſame right and equall authority ouer the eight iuriſdictions: but each of them enioyeth his priuiledges & particular cuſtomes, the inſtruments and charters whereof are kept at Tafaas. The firſt and fourth iuriſdiction haue great priuiledges and immunities, farre beyond the other.

The ninth Iuriſdiction is called Malins, by reaſon of a Village ſo named, betweene the Riuer of Lanquart, & Mount Rhætica towards the South.

The tenth is named Meyenfeld. Theſe two laſt did belong ſometimes to the Barons of Vatz, afterward to the Counts of Toggenbourg; then they fell vnto Wolfhard de Brandis, in reſpect of his Wife, who was of the houſe of Werdenberg. Thē they they became ioyned (with the other eight Iurisdictions) to the two Leagues of Grisons, and made the third; reseruing to the Lords of Brandis, the right iustly to them appertaining. Afterwardes, these three leagues together bought these Iurisdictions, and sent a Gouernor thither, who dwelt in the castle of Meyenfeld, and sate President to iudge in criminall suites: he condemned men in fines, and to death, & gathered the tolles, and other publike reuennewes. The ten Iurisdictions allyed themselues together, in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, thirty six, conditionally, to succour one another, & be abiding in all things (iust and reasonable) against enemies, repelling al wrongs that should be offered to any of them, & procure the peaceable enioying of their liberties. Also, all rights and duties appertaining to the Lords, they should be duly rendred, they permitting them to possesse their franchises and priuiledges: all the rest beeing carefull and prouident to preserue the good and benefit of one another.

The Iurisdictions bought by the three Leagues.

The ten Iurisdictions ally themselues together faithfully.

In the same yeare, or the next following, these Iurisdictions made perpetuall alliance with the two other Leagues, and so the three leagues became ioyned as in one body, the particular parts whereof haue bene already mentioned. But in our numbering and setting them downe, we haue rather followed the situation of the place, then the ranke which they holde in the dayes of assemblies, wherin notwithstanding are many opinions: & therefore I will describe them heere, according to the comminalties of the two first leagues, & as they are comprized in their alliance with the Switzers. The Comminalties of the Grise league, are the vally of Lugnitz, Ylants, Oberſaehs, Walterſpurg, Laax, Siniſs, and other places about the Woods, Flims, Schewis, Trimmis, Retzuns, Hemtenberg and Tuſis, Schamps, Rhinuald, Maſax and Rufflee, Saſien, Thannen, Schopine, Fals. The Comminalties of the league of Cade, are in order as they followe, Coire, Furſtnow, the foure villages descending on Aſpremont, Vatz the high, Reamps, Tieffencaſten, Gryfenſtein, Beuio or Stalla, Auers, Bergel aboue and belowe the Port, Zutz, Sumada, Poſtlaaf, Steinſperg, Schuls, Remuſſ, Munſtertal, Mals, Galſen, and Schantzen. As for the ten Iurisdictions, I vnderstand their order thus. Tafaus, the three Iurisdictions of Brettigow, Beelfort or Aluanuw, Chuwalden, S. Pierre, Langwiſz, Malans and Meyenfeld. I know very well, that some doe name these Comminalties otherwise, but that importeth nothing, because in each Comminaltie there are many times notable villages, so that the Comminalty sometime takes his name of one, and sometimes of another. For mine owne part, I haue named the principall places of the Comminalties.

He leaueth his labour herein to due consideration.

Thus then there are three leagues of the Grisons, containing fifty Comminalties, which (neuertheleſſe) doe make but one Commonwealth. For, although many of the Comminalty haue their Iudges lawes, customes, & iustice, aswel ciuill as criminall; yet notwithstanding, the Soueraignty is with the councel of the three leagues (which they name in theyr Language, Ein pundts tag) 5 dayes of meeting or assemblies of Ambassadors, from each comminalty of the Grisons: whether some of them send two Ambassadours, others but one onely. If the councel bee ordinary, the Grise League sendeth thether 28. Ambassadors or councellors; that of Cade 2[illegible]. and from the Iurisdictions, 14. If either one or other doe send a greater number, they haue no voyces there, but according to the aboue-named account. Sometimes also, the councell general of the whole Nation (which was made no long time since) do meet together: but that is very rarely.

Fifty Comminalties in the 3. leagues

The Councel of the three Leagues of the Grisons, and sending their Ambassadors thither.

The fore-mentioned councell, manageth the affayres of the common-wealth: yet in such sort, that the councellers or Ambassadors deale not according vnto their owne best seeming, but as the commaunds and remembrances from theyr comminalties, and which they bring with them in writing on the dayes do direct them, and whereto they conforme their resolutions, which passeth by plurality of voices. The councel of the Grisons is (almost) like to that of the Switzers: for there they treate on the selfesame things which concerne the good of the vvhole countrey; of peace, of warre, of alliances, of Ambassages, lawes and ordinances, & causes of appeales from the Baylywickes. There are three places appointed for thē to sitte in councel, to wit, Ylants in the Grise league, Coire in the league of Cade, and

The Ambassadors are to be guided by their directions.

& Tafaas in that of the ten Iuriſdictions. But ofteneſt the dayes are held at Coire at times of their affaires, which happeneth three times in the yeare: about the ſixe and twenty day of Ianuary, the beginning of Iune, and the eleuenth day of Nouember.

Another principal Councel or Senate for them al.

They haue another Councell or Senate, which they name Ein bytag: whē the principal Magiſtrates onely, and, as being the cheeſe of the three Leagues, do aſſemble themſelues together. Theſe men, are the Iudge-Prouinciall for the Griſe-League; the Councel of Coire for the league of Cade, and the Amman of Tafaas, for the League of the tenne Iuriſdictions. At all times, and as often as neede requireth, to prouide for the publique affayres; and it appeareth not conuenient, to call all the Deputies of the countrey together; then thoſe 3. Principals do meete, with ſome of the cheefeſt of the three Leagues. But they cannot determine abſolutely, onely they referre ſeparately vnto the Comminalties of the three Leagues, whatſoeuer hath beene diſcuſt among the Councellers, and that which is approoued by plurality of voyces, is receyued of all. There is appeal alſo from the councel, to the Comminalties, and then matters are propounded in the Comminalties, whoſe ſentences are ſet downe in writing: and being conferred on, they are gathered to a reſolution and an arreſt, by the pluralitie of Voyces.

The Principals meete together when the other need not.

Appeale from the Councel to the Comminalties.

As concerning iudgements in criminal cauſes: the Griſons doe therein proceede like the Switzers. If there happen any difference among the three Leagues, three or foure Iudges muſt bee choſen on eyther ſide, and diſcharged of the Oathe which bindeth them to their league. They are to accord the difference by kind compoſition, or iudge according to theyr conſciences. If the voyces fal out equall: an Arbitratour muſt bee choſen by voyces and common ſuffrages of the three Leagues. If two Leagues bee in ſuite, they muſt referre themſelues to the third, who ſhal deliuer vnto both the parties, the right whereby they are to bee quieted. If it chaunce betweene two Comminalties of one and the ſame League: they muſt take (as Iudge) the verie neereſt comminalty or Iuriſdiction belonging to the ſame League. But when the Comminalties of diuers Leagues are at difference: the councel of the three Leagues, namely the Iudges, are to prouide therefore.

Concerning iudgments in publike cauſes

When variances happen amongſt the Leagues, how they are then to behaue themſelues.

When one Comminaltie hath ſuite againſt the 3. Leagues.

When one Comminalty, or ſome particular perſon therein, hath proceſſe and ſuite againſt the three Leagues, or any one of them; two or three Iudges of each League are then to be choſen for it. And when two Leagues are at difference againſt the other, ſixe Iudges of the two Leagues, and ſixe of the other alone, are to bee appointed. If they cannot conclude the ſtriſe; an arbitratour muſt bee choſen, by plurality of voyces of the three Leagues. Theſe iudgements are to be deliuered firſt at Ylantz, nexte at Coire: a ſecond time againe at Ylantz, then againe at Coire, and at Tafaas the laſt of all.

The places appointed for iudgements.

It would much weary mee, if I ſhould deſcribe at large the Statutes & cuſtomes of the Griſons: notwithſtanding, I ſhall not greatly diſpleaſe or offend the Reader if heere I glance at a worde or two. Firſt then, it is agreed vppon betweene them, by the conſent and aduice of the vvhole councel, that neyther the Byſhoppe of Coire, or any of the Eccleſiaſtical Order: ſhal elect or eſtabliſh any ciuile Magiſtrate, nor aduance a Gouernor or Amman, for any Comminaltie or Iuriſdiction whatſoeuer; but that the people of the Griſons (by theyr ſuffrages onely) ſhal elect, and chooſe theyr owne Magiſtrates.

Concerning ſom ſtatutes & cuſtoms amōg the Griſons.

For election of Magiſtrates

Such as haue obtayned any Offices of the Byſhoppe, may not be accepted into councel, ſo long as they do remaine in his ſeruice.

For Miniſters of the church.

As concerning the Miniſters of the Church, euery Pariſh electeth their owne: may depoſe them, pay them their Wages, which are too little in many places.

For admiſsion to Councel.

Thoroughout the countrey of the Griſons, no ſmal Tythes are payed, and as for the great, they pay but the fifteenth part, and giue nothing in the fielde, but they giue it in the houſe, and alwayes after the haruеſts both for their Grapes and corne.

For paying of Tythes.

All they that are of a comminaltie, may fiſh in al the Riuers and Pondes, and hunt both Beaſts, and flye Fowles freely, within within their sayd Comminalty.

For weight and measure.

Thoroughout all the countries, one weight and measure of things licquid and dry, is to be vsed, to wit, the weight and measure of Coire. And it is not lawful for the Bourgesses of Coire to alter any thing therein, without the consent of the other Leagues.

Of their Gouernmenrs & Baylywickes, and how they stand in the Grisons country.

For our conclusion, we are to speak of Gouernments and Bayliwickes, wherein the three Leagues of the Grisons do command equally. On this side the Alps nere to Coire, they send a Gouernor to Meyenfeld and to Melantz. On the other side the Alpes beneath Bergel, toward the riuer of Maire, the Gouernment or Baylywick of Plurs first presenteth it self, which is a great village in the field neighbouring to the Alpes and on the bankes of Maire riuer, and euen as sightly to bee lookt on, as if it were a good Towne. In this place, there are digged infinite Chauderons of Rocke-stone coales, which serue as fewell for the kitchin; and it is faithfully reported, that the nature of this stone-coale is such, as when Fish commeth to boyling, they make them mount and leape out of the kettle into the fire; these coales are very abundantly sold in Italy. All the villages round about, are answerable and like to Plurs, where the Gouernour (whom they terme Podstat) decideth causes, & is soueraigne in that place in name of the Grisons, and deputed by them.

Coales called stone or rock-coales in wonderful plenty.

Next is the Towne and county of Clauenna, whereon Plurs in elder times depended. Clauenna is a Towne aboue the Lake of Coma, about fiue miles, as Antonius obserueth it also, in his booke of the wayes. The Grisons call the Gouernor of Clauenna, Commissary: & he is the most apparant, next to him of Sondria. The third more spacious and noble gouernement is that of the vale Telina, famous for the excellent wine, which there is made in extraordinary plenty, and is thence transported into Switzerland and Germanie. The whole vale of Telina, is diuided into sixe Bayliwickes. The first is that of Bormia a Towne aboue the valley; towardes the Mountaine of Braull: this Bayliwick hath many priuiledges and franchises, farre beyond the other. The second is the towne of Tiran. The third is Tel, wherof (as some thinke) the vale Telina first tooke name. It is a Towne seated in a very high place, & appearing to be so naturally: & it is counted to be the best fortresse of all the Prouince. Sondria, the most renowned town of all the vale Telina, maketh the fourth Baylywicke. It is the most rich & powerfull among all the rest, and he that is Gouernor thereof, is called Captain, because ouer and beside the Bayliwicke, hee hath an eye to the whole valley when it is chief in Armes. He hath his Lieutenant, who iudgeth with him the ciuil causes of the the Bayliwicke. Hee iudgeth also the criminal matters of all the vally, hauing lawyers and learned men to his councel, and giuing sentence according to the Lawes and Statutes of the vale Telina: which neuertheless) may be moderated & made milder in the Bayliwicke by the Podestats. Beside all this, all causes may be appealed to the councel of the Grisons Signeuries, or to them that they haue ordained commisaries, and sent to iudge: or finally, to the couucel of the Comminalties, who haue the soueraigne power. The fift Bayliwicke is called Morben, and the sixt Trahon, which is last of al.

4. Sondria.

The Gouernor of Sondri ais calld Captaine, and iudgeth in causes both ciuill and criminal for the whole vale.

Appeal to the Seigneurs of the Grisons Councel.

5. Morben.
6. Trahon.

This is the order of the Baylywickes of the vale Telina, yet some doe not set the Bailywick of Bormia in this ranke, but diuide the whole vale into three partes; whereof the first comprehendeth Tiran and Tell: Sondria maketh the second; and Morben and Trahon are the third. In electing the Bayliffes, they follow the order of the Leagues and Comminalties. As for example; if the Grise League establish a Captaine at Sondria for two yeeres, the League of Cade sends one thether for the two following years: at the end whereof, the League of the Iurisdictions sends one for two other yeares, this order is obserued in each League of the Comminalties. And sometimes the Comminalties, vvho should send a Bayliffe by their turn, vvould elect him only: but now the councel of the Grisons makes the election. The byshop of Coire, and the City, do stampe money. The Abbot of Dissentis hath the same priuiledge also, amongst many other.

CHAP. XII.

The Commonwealth of the Valaſians, or people of Valois.

The diuiſion of the country of Valais or Valois, the higher, & the lower.

THE whole countrey of Valois is diuided into two parts The higher Valois from the ſourſe or ſpring of the riuer of Rhone, ſo farre as the riuer of Morſia, which vniteth it ſelfe with Rhone, ſomewhat beneath Sion. This was the dwelling of the ancient Viberines and Seduſians. The lower Valois, is from the riuer of Morſia, ſo farre as Saint Mauris, and this was the countrey of the Veragrians.

Seuen Iuriſdictions in the higher Valois

The higher Valois is diuided into 7 Iuriſdictions, which they call Dixaines, wards, and Zenden in the Alleman tongue. I know not whence this worde is deriued, for it cannot produce the number often, becauſe there are no more Iuriſdictions. A friend of mine told me, that the worde intended ſo much, as Dioceſſes, becauſe that euery Ward hath his Dioceſſe or Iuriſdiction, his Common-wealth, and priuiledges apart by it ſelfe. Others do hold that the word Zenden commeth of another word, ſignifying, an Hundred: as in the Lawes of France, the Offices of the Earledomes or Counties, the Vicariates and Hundreds are number; and in ſome places of Germany, they are called Zendgraues, the Iudges of ſome certaine Iuriſdiction. But without ſtanding ſo ſtrictly on the words originall: wee may verie fitly tearme them Dioceſſes or Comminalties. So then, there are ſeuen Comminalties in the higher Valois, to wit, Goms, Brighe, Veſpie, Raron, Leuck, Siders, and Syon. Theſe ſeuen Comminalties haue thirty pariſhes. The lower Valois hath ſixe Comminalties, which they cal Banneries: becauſe each one hath his particular ſtandard, and foure and twenty Pariſhes ſo numbred.

Hundreds or Bannies, or the account of ſo much land.

The names of the ſeuen Comminalties.

Six Banneries in the lower Valois.

Long warres betweene the Veragrians & Viberines.

The Veragrians or lower Valaſians, had (in times paſt) long warre againſt the Seduſians and Viberines. In the end, after foureſcore and thirteen yeares, they were ouercome and ſubiected; ſo that the Seduſians and Viberines ruined ſixteene Caſtles, the old pitifull foundations whereof, are yet to be ſeene, and it is not lawful for any to builde them againe, for feare they ſhould prooue hurtfull to the countries liberty. And therefore the higher Valois ouer-ruleth the lower, and ſendeth Gouernors thether to iudge in cauſes, & manage the affayres of the State. The Byſhop of Syon (whom ſome call Count & Gouernor of Valois) is Prince of the countrey. Hee is elected by common ſuffrages of the Chapter of Syon, and of the 7 Dixaines of higher Valois.

Higher Valois ruleth ouer the lower.

The Byſhop of Sion Prince of Valois.

The Annales of Valois do declare, that Charlemaigne gaue the County and Gouernment of Valois, to Theodoſius, Biſhop of Syon, and to his ſucceſſors: with power to beare a ſword, in ſigne of ciuill Iuriſdiction, and other priuiledges of Princes of the Empire. Becauſe that Byſhop (by reuelation of an Angel) had declared to Charlemaigne, that ſome ſecret ſinne (I know not what) was forgiuen him. Howbeit, there are ſufficient circumſtances to call the county into ſuſpition, as we haue already made more ample mention in our deſcription of the country of Valois. Notwithſtanding, it is certaine, that the Emperors which came after Charlemaign, accorded & confirmed the fore-named priuiledges to the byſhops of Syon: namely, the Emperour Charles the fourth, then Charles the fift renewed & increaſed them willingly, at the requeſt of Mathew Shiner Byſhop and Cardinal of Sion, from whom he had deriued many good and gracefull ſeruices.

Charlemaign gaue the Gouernment of Valois to the Biſhop of Syon.

The priuiledges of Valois confirmed by the Emperors

Afterward, the Byſhop had another grace granted, that the next moſt excellent eſtate to his, ſhould bee that of the captaine or Bayliffe of the whole country whom they vſe to call Landts Hauptman. He iudgeth in ciuill cauſes, and continueth in his charge the ſpace of two yeeres: being elected by the Byſhop, and by the Ambaſſadours of the Dixaines or comminalties. Afterward, he is confirmed by publike approbation and conſent of all the comminalties, which haue each one his Magiſtrate, whom they of Goms, Raron, and Leuck, call Maire, the others Caſtillian. He iudgeth all ſuites, eſpecially them criminall, with the councellers which the comminalties giue him as aſſiſtants. There be Ammans alſo (who are ſo-

The Councell of Valois, and their meetings and how farre theyr power extendeth.

Appeale may bee made from the sentence, which is giuen by the Iudges of a comminalty, to the councell of Valois, who are called Den landts rath; and according to the custome of theyr Ancestors, they assembled twice a yeare, in the months of March, and of December. At which times, two or three Deputies of each Village, do meete at Syon, in a Castle named Maierin. The Byshop assisteth there, and the Bayliffe cals for the causes; and then they treate on affayres of the Common-wealth, election of gouernors and publike Officers, & such as shal iudge in the last power, of causes that concerne appeale.

The Barons of Raron, and their successors.

The Barons of Raron, were sometimes great Lordes in the countrey of Valois. Their successors were the Lords of Chiuron, who are Marshalles of the Bishoppricke of Syon, Vicount of Syon, and Stewards of Valois.

Of the Maze.

As for the Maze, which they tearme Mutzen, it is a particular inuention of the people of Valois, to oppose thēselues against the power of great and rich men. Wee haue made ample mention in our description of the country of Valois, and there declared, wherefore it was putte in practise, and how it began.

Of the Comminalties that are in the lower Valois.

We haue told you, that the Byshop & the seuen Dizaines of the higher Valois, hold the soueraignety of the whole country in their handes. The lower Valois is subiect to them, and is parted into sixe Comminalties, viz. Gundes nere to Syon, is the chiefe Castlewicke or comminaltie of lower valois. Heeretofore it appertayned to the Canton of Berne, but in the war which the Switzers made on the Duke of Sauoy, in the yeare 1536. the Valasians did there recouer it, in exchange of another country. 2. Ardon, 3. Sallion, 4. Entremont, 5. Martinach, 6. the Towne of Saint Mauris in Chablais, where the mountains seeme as if they ioyned together. So that all valois, is shut or lockt vp by a Tower, & two gates (as it were) at both the endes of a bridge, vnder which the Rhone glydeth. In the yeare, 1475. the valasians brake down the wals and fortresses of the fore-named places, except that of Saint Mauris. Without the country of valois, the valasians possessed themselues of 3. Bayliwickes, during the warre of Sauoye: as namely, Montey, Tuian, and Hochtall. Neuertheless, some few yeares after that they surrendred Yuian to Emanuel Philebert, Duke of Sauoye, and retained both the other.

The Common-wealth of Bienna.

Bienna made alliance with the Bernians.

THE Towne of Bienna made perpetuall alliance with the Bernians, as wee haue already sayde: and it happened in the yeare one thousand, three hundred, fifty two. Thirty yeares after, it contracted perpetuall Allyance with Solleurre; and in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, and seuen, with Fribourg, so it became allyed with three cantons of the Switzers. It acknowledgeth as temporall Lord, the Byshop of Basile, because as concerning the Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction, it is the Dioceese of Lausanna: but it is a long time, since it was no more subiect to the spirituall gouernement of the Bishop, as in like maner were the citizens of Zurich and Berne.

The Ecclesiastical Iurisdiction of Bienna

The soueraign Magistrate of Bienna, & his authoritie in criminal causes.

Afterward, when it came to passe, that the Bernians got the possession of the Bishoppricke of Lusanna, they enfranchised Bienna of the Ecclesiasticall subiection. The Byshop of Basile is Lord thereof very peaceably, in temporall power, and establisheth the soueraign Magistrate, whom they call Maire: but hee is chosen out of the number of the Townes councellers, and the Maire giues oath to the councell, and they to him. Hee taketh knowledge (with the councell) of criminall causes; & sitteth as President in censuring them. The moitie of fines, amounting to aboue 3. Liures Tournois, apertaineth to the Byshop, with some tenths, and other reuennewes: but the ports, tolles, customs, and such like, belong to the Towne only, and not to the Bishop. For hee is not permitted to impose any charge whatsoeuer vpon the Bourgesses, nor to engage the Towne: but the Bourgesses are bound to goe go in warre for the Byſhop, and at theyr owne expences, yet no further then a dayes iourney from the Towne. If hee would haue them march any further, hee is bound to pay their wages. Yearely, there is repetition made to the Councel, what priuiledges Byſhop Immer Ramſtein gaue to the Town, in the yeare one thouſand, three hundred, foureſcore, & three. They of Bienna haue as ample priuiledges as in the greater Baſile.

The priuiledges giuen by Immer Ramſtein.

The Common-wealth of Bienna is gouerned in maner following. All the Bourgeſſes are diuided into ſixe companies or brother-hoods: yet in ſuch order & carriage, as no one man whatſoeuer may ioyn himſelfe with two or more of the companies, who haue each one two Maſters, & a ſeruant attending. The Councell publike is choſen out of the number of theſe Bourgeſſes. The leſſer councel is compoſed of foure and twenty: and the greater, of thirty councellers. The election is made at the yeares ending, and at the beginning of the yeare following, theyr names are openly publiſht in the church. There is choiſe made of ſome Electours, out of the great and leſſer councell: who (in preſence of the cheefe Secretarie), do confirme the ancient Councellers, or elect new, if there be any ſuch need.

The gouernement of the Common-wealth of Bienna.

He that ſitteth Preſident in the councell generall, is called Bourgmaſter, and is elected by the great and leſſer councell. He is next in office to the Maire, & when they deliberate on affaires of the Common-wealth, and queſtion is vrged concerning ciuil caſes: the Maire and Officers to the Byſhop depart, and leaue the Bourgmaſter Preſident. Next to him are the Treaſurers, Banderets, Voyers, or Surueyers, the Iudges of the Conſiſtory, the Hoſpitaliers, and others elected in publike charges, by the great and leſſer councell, who are not aduanced to ſuch Degrees, but as they are knowne apt and able. The Banderet onely, is choſen by all the people. Hee hath charge not onely of bearing the Towns banner; but alſo (with the Bourgmaſter) is protector of Schollers, taking care that they may haue diligent and faithfull Teachers and Ouerſeers, and to take their accounts. The leſſer councel aſſembleth three times euery weeke, to wit, on Monday, Wedneſday, and Saturday; but if any man doe deſire to haue a cauſe extraordinarily decided, paying a Florin to the Maire, the councell ſhall be then aſſembled. Bienna hath no other particular Iuriſdiction, but the Councell iudgeth all cauſes ciuill and criminal.

They of Bienna, are Lords of the Valley of Saint Immer, for ſo likewiſe is the Seigneury of Ærgua called, and is diuided into many Comminalties, vvhich haue (each one) their Maire or Amman elected and confirmed euery yeare, in the moneths of May and September. But they of Bienna haue not any bayliffe, for the Comminalties haue their courtes of Iuſtice, and when the parties cannot bee agreed, the cauſe is ſent to the councel of the Towne, who ſend ſometimes aſſiſtants to helpe in the country pleadings, and to end their ſuits: but appeale may be made from their ſentences to the councel of the Towne. The inhabitants of this valley, do march in warre vnder the Standardes of Bienna.

At Frawenfeld.

Hee of Frawenfeld, is elected by the Councell generall but in ſecret voyce. The Councell of theſe Townes doe elect Treaſurers, Voyers, and other Magiſtrats: for the Townes haue priuiledges, to prouide for publike charges, and haue likewiſe treaſuries, and good round ſums of ready gathered monies in them, for their condition and extendure, becauſe the cuſtomes, tolles, and taxes do belong vnto them.

The priuiledges of the Townes.

Neuertheleſſe, in the towne of Bada, which is the paſſage of Germany into France, the cuſtome belongeth to the towne; but the tolle for Merchandizes tranſported that way, appertaineth to the Cantons. The leſſer councell of theſe townes, prouide not onely for the townes affaires, but alſo do decide ſuites: for they haue no other Courts of iuſtice, except at Frawenfeld, & they haue likewiſe both ciuill and criminall iuriſdiction.

The cuſtom at Bada is the Townes, but not the Tolles

Bremgarten commandeth ouer ſome Villages neighboring to the town, which they call the Bayliwicke of Cella. This country is in the gouernment of the free Prouince, appertaining to the Cantons: but it was engaged ſometimes to them of Bremgarten. When the Emperour Sigiſmond did put them of Zurich in poſſeſſion of the free Prouince, he gaue them priuiledge, to diſengadge the country: but they of Bremgarten entreated them, that in regard of the amity, which had til then continued betweene the two townes, they would leaue the country to them, which was eaſily granted them. Wherefore at that time, by the liberality of them of Zurich, who gaue it them by Letters: they of Bremgarten were put and confirmed in poſſeſsion of the country, in the yeare one thouſand, foure hundred, and eighteene.

Concerning the Towne of Bremgarten.

Long amitie between Zurich & Bremgarten.

Neuertheleſſe, they of Zurich reſerued to themſelues the ſoueraignty, & the puniſhment of Malefactours deſeruing death. The yeare one thouſand, fiue hundred, twenty eight, a difference happened betweene them of Zurich and Bremgarten; to wit, about the cauſes of appeale, and to whom it belonged. The ſeuen Cantons ordained thereupon, that the Bayliwicke of Cella, might appeale to the councell of Bremgarten, and from them to Zurich: but as concerning ſuites mooued at Bremgarten, the appeale was to bee brought before the eight Cantons.

The reſeruation of Zurich

The ordination of the ſeauen Cantons.

The towne of Frawenfeld, beſide the councell apart by it ſelfe, hath an aſſembly of twelue Iudges, who decide ſuites among the Bourgeſſes, and country people in the Villages, that are vnder the townes iuriſdiction. But as for criminall cauſes, and variances touching inheritances, and ſuch like things; the knowledge of them belongeth vnto the councell. Theſe Iudges execute their arreſts, in condemning of certaine fines, and making ſeizure on the goods of condemned perſons. Appeale may bee made from them, to the ſeauen Cantons: but there is no appeale from the councels ſentence.

An aſſembly of xii. Iudges at Frawenfeld

No Appeale from the councels ſentence.

For the preſent, by permiſſion of the councell, the Amman of the country is cheefe of thoſe Iudges; but anciently, and about an hundred yeares ſince, it was to the Apparatour of the towne, and afterward to the Agent or Prouoſt of the Empire.

When any one is ſentenced to death

VVhen any Malefactour is to be condemned to death, the Iudges make choiſe (as pleaſeth themſelues) of twelue other men of the towne, or of the villages reſorting thether; and then theſe foure and twenty men may condemne to death. Frawenfeld obtained this priuiledge of the Emperour Sigiſmond; and therefore they haue priſons purpoſely. From the time of the Auſtrian Princes, they hadde power to put criminall perſons to death; now adayes the Cantons conſerue and maintaine the rights to Frawenfeld: and although condemnation of death appertaineth to tenne Cantons, yet Frawenfeld ſtands excepted, which dependeth not, neither is ſubiect but to the ſeauen firſt Cantons, the priuiledges reſerued.

Frawenfeld ſubiect to the ſeuen firſt Cantons.

Moreouer, this Towne hath ſome particular rights, touching teſtaments and inheritances, and the Bourgeſſes may exact their debtes thorough all the country of Turgow (annuall reuennues excepted) according to the rights of Iuſtice of the Prouince, and may (without puniſhment) lodge ſuch as haue beene baniſhed by the lawes; but they cannot bee drawne into any ſtrange iuſtice, but the demander muſt come and pleade at Frawenfeld.

Particular rights belonging to Frawenfeld.

The Abbey of Auge the rich, hath ſome rightes at Frawenfeld, whereto the Bourgeſſes ſtand obliged, and (anciently) the moſt part of them wer ſubiects to the Abbey: but afterward, they enfranchiſed themſelues from all charges of ſeruitude, and now adayes, before giuing any Oath vnto the Abbot, they receyue Letters from him, whereby hee promiſeth them, not to ſel, engage, nor alienate the rights which he hath at Frawenfeld, by reaſon of the Abbey; and beſides, that hee will conſerue and keepe all their ancient Priuiledges, Franchiſes, rights, and good cuſtomes.

The ancient power in time of warre.

Finally, in the times of war, anciently, the Seigneurie of Frawenfeld elected the Captaine, the Ambaſſador, the Enſigne, and other cheefe offices of warre: which all the countrey of Turgow followed, and tooke Oath to them. Alſo, the Standard of the Towne is adorned with Images of Saints, like to the Standardes of the Catholique Cantons, to wit, with a Crucifixe, and two croſſed Keyes; and on the other ſide, is the picture of Ieſus Chriſtes face, as in a Linnen hand-kercher. But within ſome fewe yeares they of the Prouince of Turgow obtayned leaue, to haue their particular captaines and Standards. In meane while the Towne of Frawenfeld, and the places that are of her Iuriſdiction, haue theyr Captaines, Enſigne-bearers, and their auncient Standards.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Baylywickes or Gouernments.

The cuſtome obſerued in moſt part of the Cantons for their Baylywickes.

WE haue already formerly ſet downe, how many Baylywickes or Gouernements the Switzers haue, to what Cantons they appertaine, and how they becam Lords of them. The Cantons do ſend their Bayliffes turne by turne, and in the moſt part of the Cantons, the cuſtome is; that the charge is giuen vnto one of the Councellers of the leſſer councell. The Bayliffe continueth in his charge two yeares, and then giueth place to him that is ſent by another Canton. They gouerne the Bayliwicks according vnto the Lawes and cuſtomes of the people: neuertheleſſe, in the Baylywickes on this ſide the mountaines, the Bayliffe doth not iudge alone in criminal cauſes; but hath (as adiunctes or aſſiſtants) the Iudges of the Prouince; in regard whereof, they do call this courſe of Iuſtice, Ein Landgricht. They take knowledge of all ſuites of importance, and eſpecially, thoſe criminall, and giue ſentence; Notwithſtanding, the Bayliffe is ſoueraigne, for he ſitteth Preſident, and hath power to moderate the ſentence.

The cuſtome on this ſide the mountains

But in the Bayliwickes of Italy, or beyond the Mountaines, the bayliffes onely condemne to death: they may vvell call ſome learned men for councell, but thoſe Councellers haue no power in the ſentence. Finally, euery yeare about midde-Iune, they render an account of theyr adminiſtration; they on this ſide the mountaines, at Bada, they beyond, at Lugano; before the Deputies, which the twelue Cantons then ſend thither, and then they iudge the ſubiects cauſes of Appeale. If ſome ſtraunge enemy make warre on the Switzers: all the Bayliwickes ſend theyr people, who march vnder their particular Standards, and euery bayliwicke ioyneth with the Canton, vnder whoſe power it is that yeare. As in the warre of Bourgongne, they of the baylywicke of Turgow ſerued the Canton of Zurich. But if ther e happen any ciuill warre in Switzerland, becauſe the baylywicks do ſtand as much obliged to one Canton, as another: they are not bound to giue ſuccor, if the moſt part of the Cantons do not commaund them.

CHAP. XVI.

Of Bada.

THE Gouernement or Baylywicke of Bada, is much more magnificent then the other, becauſe the dayes meetings and aſſemblies of the Cantons are held there: for the bayliffe of Bada euermore helpeth there, demaunding for the cauſes in order, and ſea-ſcaleth with his Signet, ſuch things as are written in the name of all the Councell. Moreouer, if the voyces be equall vppon either ſide: hee maketh that auayleable, where he ranketh himſelfe, and by that meanes endeth all variance. This Bayliffe hath no authoritie ouer the Towne of Bada, but ouer the Countie, which is diuided into many Villages and ſmall Iuriſdictions: where hee hath his Lieutenants and Officers, who hold their pleadings with Iudges of the Village in name of the Bayliffe; exact the Fines, and render him an account, and ſometimes alſo himſelfe is preſent in thoſe Iuriſdictions. But when there is queſtion of condemning a Malefactor vnto death, foure and twenty Iudges of the whole Countie of Bada, meete together, and the Bayliffe electeth them: but the cuſtome is, that after they haue beene once thus elected, they continue all their life time afterward in that charge, if ſome lawfull impeachment doe not preuent it: and when any one of them dyeth, or is diſmiſſed, then the Bayliffe putteth another in his place. Theſe Iudges, giue ſentence according to the Lawes: neuertheleſſe, the Bayliffe (who hath the ſoueraignty in his hand) may mittigate their ſentence. Next to this eſtate of the Bayliffe, is hee that is called Secretary of all the Prouince: for, beſide the dignity, hee hath profite, becauſe all the Cantons ſerue him, ſo long as the dayes are kept. Moreouer and beſide, hee hath a Lieutenant, who is cheefe of al the Officers belonging to the Bayliffe.

Many villages and Iuriſdictions commanded by the Bayliffe.

In caſes concerning life & death.

The Secretary of the whol Prouince.

The Bailywicke and Countie of Bada, hath two ſmall Townes vnder it, the one named Clingenow, and the other, Keyſerſtoull; but the Byſhop of Conſtance ſendeth Bayliffes thether, and hee of Bada hath nothing to looke to there, ſaue onely, the acknowledgement of cauſes criminall appertaineth to him, and the people of thoſe places, are comprehended with the reſt of the County of Bada, when they goe to warre, with, or for the Switzers. Betweene theſe two little Townes, is a great Village, neere vnto the Rheine, named Zurzach, inhabited as if it were a good great Towne, ſubiect vnto the Byſhoppe of Conſtance, and depending on the Baylywickes of Clingenow. I muſt needes ſay ſomewhat concerning the policy thereof, becauſe it is a place greatly renowned, in regard of two great Fayres very goodly and commendable, which are there kept euery yeare. Many Merchants, not only of Switzerland and Germany, but alſo of France and Italy, meete there, albeit each Fayre laſteth but one day.

Two little Townes, belonging to Bada, Clingenow, and Keyſerſtoul.

Zurzach a great Village.

Two great Faires yearly at Zurzach.

Many do hold opinion, that this village is the place, which Ptolomy calleth Forum Tiberij; and that on this occaſion, theſe Fayres are very ancient, as hauing beene ordained by Tiberius. It ſeemeth to haue taken this name of M. Iunius Certius, a famous Romane Souldier, buryed in that place, as is teſtified by an ancient inſcription. The Iuriſdiction of this village is one of the dependances of Clingenow: the Bayliffe electeth an officer yearly, in the Moneth of Ianuarie, and eyght Senatours, foure whereof, are in ſeruice a whole yeare, and they are called ſworne Senatours; and then the other foure doe ſucceede them, hauing foure Iudges giuen them as aſſiſtants. Theſe twelue, with the Bayliffe of Clingenow, who preſideth, iudge the cauſes, and meete once in xv. dayes; but if any man requireth (in the meane time) that the Iudges ſhould meet together, they doe; the party paying thirteene Shillings of the Money of Lucerna.

The Bayliffe of Clingenow

Moreouer, the Bayliffe to the byſhop of Conſtance, cannot condemn any greater fine, then the ſumme of tenne pounds; but if the crime appeare to deſerue more rigorous chaſtiſements, to witte, corporally; then the Officer to the Bayliffe of Bada, executeth the ſentence, and puniſheth the faultie. But out of the Fayre times, Malefactors are examined, firſt, at Clingenow; after they haue confeſt theyr fault, and are conuinced of capital crime, they are deliuered into the handes of the Bayliffe of Bada. At the times of the Fayres, to witte, the firſt day of September, and the firſt Holyday of the Weeke, after Pentecoſt, the day before the Faire, all the Iuriſdiction of the Byſhoppe ceaſeth, and belongeth vnto the bayliffe of Bada, who hath ſole power and authority of commanding and forbidding, euen vntil the end of the Faire. For in regard that a great number of people doe aſſemble there, our Auncеſtors were deſirous, that theſe Fayres might be in the ſafegard and protection of such as were soueraignes, and had meanes to bee strongest in these places then. In former times, the Princes of Austria, were Lords of the Countie of Bada; but now it belongeth to the eyght first Cantons. As for the gouernment of Zurzach, it is managed by sixteene councellers, to wit, the twelue before mentioned, and foure assistants. But if there be any businesse of importance, it is referred to the councell generall.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Turgow.

AMong all the Bayliwickes of the Cantons, there is not any more plentifully peopled nor of larger extendure then Turgow, which hath more then fifty Parishes. The seuen most ancient Cantons send thither a Bayliffe, & to them appertaineth the Seigneury and ciuill Iurisdiction of the countrey. If Switzerland be assaulted by a stranger enemy, they of Turgow ranke themselues with the seauen Cantons: but the knowledge of criminall causes, and such as are capitall, belong to the tenne Cantons.

Turgow the greatest of all the Bayliwicks

Beside, there are many Noblemen, & Ecclesiasticall persons, that haue meane courts of Iustice in diuers villages of Turgow, yet in such sort notwithstading, that all the villages are subiects to the Bayliffe of the whole country. The inferior Seigneurs may condemne fines of twentie shillings, and sometimes so farre as tenne poundes: but the moity of the fines belongeth to the Bayliffe, according to the ordinances well vnderstoode, and established among them.

Mean Courts of iustice in the villages of Turgow.

Condemnation of fines.

All they that haue Iurisdictions, are called Grichtsherren. The Ecclesiastickes, are the byshop of Constance, who hath his Prouosts in Turgow, to witte, at Arbonna, Tanneg, Guttingen, and Gottliebe. The Chapter of Constance hath Iurisdiction within Altnaw. The Abbey of Auge the rich, nowe vnited and incorporated with the Byshoppricke of Constance, hath great reuennewes, and many Iurisdictions in the countrey of Turgow, to wit, Stekbure, Bernange, Mannebach, Ermatingen, Tribeltingen, &c. Many Gentlemen are vassailes to this Abbey. The Abbot of the Hermitage, is also Lord of Eschentz. In like manner, the Abbey of S. Gall, hath Iurisdiction in some Villages: as also the Abbeyes founded in the countrey of Turgow haue, as Tobel, the Commanderie of the Knightes of Saint Iohn, Fischinge, the Abbey of Benedictines, Ittinge, Chartrouse, Munsterlinge and Tennikon. The Abbey of the Monkes of the Cisteaux order. Also Veldbach. Calchere Saint Katharine du Val, nere to Dissenhow; and some other Prouosts in one or two Villages, and sometimes in many, haue Iurisdiction.

The Ecclesiasticall persons and what Iurisdictions they haue.

The Abbey of Auge.

The Abbey of Benedictines.

There are great store of Castles, appertaining vnto diuers Gentlemen, who dwell there, and enioy their ancient Iurisdictions: the names of which Castles I will recite, together with the Lords vnto whom they belong. The Lords of Vlme dwell for the present time at Wellenberg and Griesenberg. Herdere and Burgelle are to the Lords of Landberg. Wengie belongeth to the Lords of Giel. Spiegelberg, to the Lordes of Montprat. Vinfeld vnto the Lords of Schelneberg, and of Gemminge. Vpon the limites of the countrey, there is a Towne belonging to the Count of Oberstein. Nuuenbourg and Mammer appertaine to the Lords of Tum. Salenstein and Blidec, to the Lords of Hanuille. Clingenberg, to the Lordes of Herdneheimer. Ottlishouse, to the Lords of Schenck. Epishouse, to the Lords of Hagenuille. Liebenfels, to the Lords of Lanz. Clinge, to the Lords of Brum. Neusere, to the Lords of Stocker. Sonnenberg, to the Lords of Gutenson. There are many castles also ruined the most part of whose Iurisdictions, doe belong vnto Ecclesiasticall persons: but other some of them belong vnto Gentlemen dwelling in other castles, and also vnto some particular men of the Countrey.

Of Castles belonging to Gentlemen.

A Towne on the limites of the country.

Castles ruined and defaced.

Beside, the Abbey of Rinow hath iustice both ciuill and criminal in the towne of Rinow, which appeareth to be very ancient, although it hath no store of beautifull buildings. Some are of opinion, that the Romaines planted theyr campe there heeretofore, to encounter with the Germaines.

The Abbot of Rinow.

In

The Isle within the Rheine.

In the Isle which is not within the Rheine, the Abbey of the Benedictines is to be seene, one of the most ancient in all Switzerland. The Abbot is Lord of the Towne; neuertheless, if any Malefactor be condemned to death: he is deliuered vnto the Prouost or Amman of the Prouince, and his goods remaine seized and confiscated to the seuen Cantons. They of Rinow haue their standard, vnder which they march in Warre for the Switzers. Moreouer, there are some Towns in Turgow, which continue in the Switzers protection, and haue their Franchises & priuiledges verie ample, & Iurisdiction particular.

The Standard of Rinow.

Bischoffzel, or Episcopalia.

There is another Towne, named Bischoffzell, at the meeting of two Riuers, called Sittera and Tur, which is well into the countrey of Turgow: and it hath his Standard, where vnder the souldiers goe to Warre for the Switzers. But the Gouernour of the countrey is onely but to bee seene there, and can commaund nothing of the inhabitants, who are subiect (in some things) vnto the Byshoppe of Constance, yet hee gouerneth according to their ordinances.

The Byshops Bailiffe in the towne Castle.

The Byshop hath a Bayliffe in the Castle of the Towne, to whom appertaineth the moitie of the Fines: but the Townesmen doe elect the Councel, and the two Presidents out of them, whom they call ancient Senatours, that gouerne the Common-wealth with the Councellers.

The Councell and two Presidents.

One of the two, iudgeth in criminal causes, and there is no appeale from the sentence of the Senate: neither is it lawfull to draw a Bourgesse before any other Iustice then that of the Towne. The Impost of Wine, and other Reuennews belong to the common-wealth.

The Byshop taketh oath of the townsmen

When the Byshoppe taketh his Oathe of the Townesmen, hee promiseth first himselfe, neuer to diminish in any manner whatsoeuer, their auncient Priuiledges and Franchises.

The auncient towne of Arbonna on the Lake of Constance.

Arbonna is an ancient Towne, on the Lake of Constance, whereof Antoninus maketh mention in his guide of the waies It is vnder the dominion of the Byshop of Constance, who hath there a Bayliffe: but they of the Towne doe elect theyr Amman and Councell, who manage ciuil causes. The Switzers haue some Seigneuriall rights in that place: for the castle is open to them in the times of warre, for best accommodating themselues, and the Inhabitants are theyr Souldiers for seruice.

Diessenhow on the Riuer of Rhene.

Diessenhow, a Towne vpon the Rheine, betweene Stein and Schaffouse, as also of the countrey of Turgow, and besides the seauen Cantons, who are Lordes of this countrey: Berne and Schaffouse haue some right in the domination of Diessenhow.

Oath to eight Cantons only

Neuertheless, the Townesmen giue Oath onely to eight Cantons, and haue great store of priuiledges: their councel and Auoyer haue the Iurisdiction of some Townes about it. But all are esteemed to bee vnder the gouernment of Turgow, and goe to warre with the other for the Switzers: but yet vnder the Standard of Diessenhow.

The Iurisdictions of the county of Turgow.

But besides the Iurisdictions of the Ecclesiastickes, and of the Gentlemen: there are many Villages, wherof the Cantons are entirely Lords, and they are called the Iurisdictions of the county of Turgow, and the Officers of the Bayliffe, do holde the pleadings in these Villages. Heeretofore there were diuers formes of pleas, and manie customes: but the seauen Cantons (by aduice and consent of the Lords of the Iurisdictions) ordained and established a common manner of pleading, thoroughout the whole countrey of Turgow.

Order for the suits and pleas in Turgow.

Beside, if a particular man haue a suite against the Lord of a Iurisdiction, he presents it to the Bayliffe or Gouernor of the country, and of him demandeth iustice.

Law or iustice termed Prouinciall.

There are two kindes of Law and Iustice (in the highest degree) in Turgowe: for they must pleade before the Iusticiary bench of the Prouince, or else before the Bayliffe and his assistants. The Law or Iustice Prouinciall, it appertaineth not onely vnto the seauen Cantons, who establish a Gouernour in the countrey: but likewise they of Berne, Fribourg, and Solleurre, haue therein their part, whereof wee haue giuen a reason in our former booke.

Sometimes this court of Iustice was held at Winterduer, when as the countrie of Kybourg was ioyned to the countrey of Turgow; afterward, it was helde neere to Constance, when the Emp. Sigismond had engaged Winterduer to the Bourgesses of Costance, & somtimes in other places: but now it it is fully reſolued on at Frawenfeld, and the Cantons haue concluded, that it ſhal neuer bee tranſported any whether elſe heereafter.

The election of xii. Iudges, by the Bayliffe

Twelue Iudges are choſen by the Bayliffe, foure of Frawenfeld, and four of Turgow: the Bayliffe ſits Preſident in name of ten Cantons; or the Amman of ỹ country, eſtabliſhed by the Cantons; or the Lieutenant whom the Bailiffe ſubſtituteth in his place. The cauſes of appeale, concerning the whole countrey of Turgow, are decided in this Prouinciall Court of Iuſtice, together with the ſuits in matters of debt, the knowledge whereof may appertain to this court: alſo the cauſes of iniuries, crimes, and other offences deſeruing death. The Bayliffe and his aſſiſtants (who moſt often are the Amman of the country, the Secretary, and the cheefe Vſher) do cenſure alſo in the ſame ſuites: & it is at the diſcretion of the plaintiffe or demander, to make choiſe before which of the two courts he will pleade.

Cauſes ended in the Prouincial Court.

Power of the Plaintiffe in his plea.

The Bayliffe cauſeth the ſentences and ordinances to bee executed, with impoſition of a fine of ten poundes, payable by him, that ſatisfieth not the ſentence in ten dayes. The Prouinciall court of iuſtice, impoſeth no fine of mony, but baniſheth: onely reſerued, that it condemneth him in a fine that pleadeth his owne cauſe in perſon (becauſe the cuſtom is, to take one of the Iudges to declare the fact) and enters it into the Court where the Iudges vſe to ſit. He that is accuſed to contemne the ordinances of the Bayliffe, is impriſoned.

Difference between the Bailiffes Court, & the Prouincial Court.

A man may appeale to the Cantons, from the ſentence giuen in either of the Courtes; and, according to the importance of the cauſe to the ſeuen Cantons, or to the ten in taking knowledge. Likewiſe al Fines (as the goods of perſons put to death, confiſcations, and fines impoſed on ſuch as are acceſſaries to crimes deſeruing death) doe appertaine partly to the ſeauen, partly to the ten Cantons. Heere may be alledged (for example ſake) mighty and horrid iniuries, yet not meriting death: violence done by any man to him that is ſtrictly commaunded to liue in peace with his aduerſary, outragious acts committed to a man vpon the publique high way, by wounding, robbing, or offering him any ſuch like violence. Alſo, if any man vſurpe, encroach vpon, encloſe, or appropriate to himſelfe any part of the high-way, tranſpoſe or alter boundes, markes, and limits; or change any goods layed to him by way of pawning, or giuen him in truſt to keepe; if he violate Fayth, or forſweare himſelfe openly; or if he cary himſelfe inſolently toward the Bailiffe or Iudges, &c.

Appeale from both the Courts to the Cantons.

Beſides, all ſuch as the Prouinciall court of Iuſtice declareth guilty of death: are ſent vnto the other Iudges with theyr cauſes, to haue the ſentence pronounced on them. Theſe Iudges are in number foure and twenty, and heretofore the cuſtom was, that the Bayliffe ioyned twelue Iudges, to the twelue of the Prouinciall Iuſtice, and choſe them thoroughout the countrey, at his owne diſcretion: but now adayes (and oftner then any other) the Iudges of Frawenfeld doe pronounce the ſentence of death. This is to cut off charges, which would be farre greater vvithout compariſon, if the Iudges ſhould bee called from diuers parts of the country, it being of ſo large extendure.

Concerning ſentences of death.

A cuſtom vſed in former times, but otherwiſe prouided, and vpon good reaſon.

There is no appeale granted from this ſentence: neuertheleſſe it is permitted to the Bayliffe, to moderate the Iudges ſentence, or to alter the manner of the puniſhment vpon the Offender; or elſe to ſaue the condemned mans life; but hee may not (by any meanes) aggrauate, or make heauyer the condemnation.

A great power granted to the Bayliffe.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Sargans.

Concerning the Originall of Sargans, taking name of the Riuer Sar

THE Countrey of Sargans, hath heeretofore had Countes or Earles, that gaue it the name, and ſold it vnto the Switzers Countrey. Thoſe Counts were of the houſe of Werdenberg, by reaſon of the Counties thereunto belonging, and alſo of Montfort, being then diuided into many families: but the countrey ſtandeth ſeparated by a certain ſmal Riuer, named Sar. Part of it, aboue the Riuer, hath ſome villages; the cheefeſt whereof whereof is called Regatz, where the law pleas are held: as also the Abbey of Pfauertz, the Abbot whereof hath iurisdiction in those quarters. It seemes that this part was heretofore diuided from the other, so as the name of Sargans belonged to them that dwelt beneathe the Riuer, and whereof (vndoubtedly) they borrowed their name. For there is another Sargans, or of Sarunets, whereof Pliny maketh mention, which at this day is called Engadin, and neere the sourse or spring of Rheine: but they which dwell aboue the Riuer, may bee of the quarter of the Rhegusces and Rhucans, at this day tearmed Rhinthall and Rhuchenberg. They haue their court of iustice by themselues, and other weights and measures, then they beneathe the Riuer.

Of them beneathe the Riuer Sar.

Another Sargans or Sarunettes.

The towne of Sargans is small, and hath a Castle, wherein the Bayliffe dwelleth, and it is the cheefest of all the Bayliwicke. There is a councell at Sargans, and an Auoyer, whom the Switzers (beeing Lords there) do establish: as also in another Towne of the same Bayliwick, named Walhenstat, on the Lake of Riue. But the lower court of iustice belongeth to them of Sargans, as likewise the principall Villages haue their Court. The last or latest appellations, for causes criminall and capitall, are held at Sargans; where Iudges are chosen, both of the Towne, and from the whole Bayliwicke. Oftentimes, in stead of the Bayliffe, the Amman is President of the country. The Bayliffe himselfe pleadeth against the offender, and hath a Secretary and an Officer. If criminall persons are prisoners at Walhenstat; then iudgement and execution to death is done there: but the Bayliffe sitteth President, and not the Auoyer of Walhenstat.

Of the Bayliffe & Councell of Sargans & their Auoyer.

The Amman gouerneth sometimes in stead of the Bayliffe.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Rhinthall.

THE Bayliffe of this Valley (which taketh his name of Rheine, and is vpon the left bancke thereof, aboue his entrance into the Lake of Constance) maketh his abiding in a small Towne, called Rhinek, somewhat below the Valley.

Rhinthall taketh name of the Riuer of Rheine.

The whole Bayliwick is diuided into certaine portions or fee-farmes, which they tearme Hoef, and these are their names: Alstett, a little Towne, Marpach, Bernange, Taall, whereon Rhinek dependeth, and Oberriede. Each hath his iurisdiction by it selfe, and two Ammans; whereof the one is enstalled by the Bayliffe of the cantons, and the other by the Abbot of S. Gall. The moity of the fines belongeth to the Abbot, and the other part to the Cantons. Neuertheless, at Alstett the fines are diuided into three parts, whereof the third appertaineth to the inhabitants. Some say, that the higher and lower iurisdiction of this place, belongeth to the Prince of Austria. The lower court of iustice of Lustenow (which is a Village in the Bayliwicke of Rhinthall) appertaineth to the Counts of Amsa. The acknowledgment of criminall causes, belongeth to the cantons: and their Bayliffe causeth the sentences to bee executed in those places where the delicts were committed, hauing Ammans for their Iudges.

The Bayliwicks diuision and their seuerall iurisdictions.

The diuision at Alstet.

Acknowledging of criminall causes.

The inhabitants of this Valley doe principally imploy themselues in husbandry about their Vines, and spinning linnen yarne, which they sell at S. Gall, & liue very commodiously by these meanes. Also they of S. Gall haue store of lands, and many vineyards in this Valley, with plenty of Vine-dressers and Barne-keepers: in regard whereof, they set a taxation on the wine with the inhabitants of Rhinthall, and set downe a price to be payed by the Masters and others, who buy it before vintage time at publike sale, and pay the mony to the Vine-dressers. This taxe bindeth not them who haue not solde their wine before that time. When the vintage draweth neere, the Deputies of each Village do meete at S. Gall, and the Seigneury appointeth one or two of the councell to sit with them; and then they (altogether) set a price vpon the wines. If they cannot agree, but that there are as many on the one side, as on the other: then the Village, whose turne it is to bee Arbitrator, sets downe the determination. For euery Village (in his rancke and place) hath the right and priuiledge of arbitration, when as the taxers cannot, or will not agree together. The price agreed vpon, then they begin to cut and gather grapes for the vintage: but it is not lawfull

CHAP.XX.

Of the Barons of Altſax.

The ſituation of the Seigneury of Altſax.

BEtweene the Bayliwicke of Rhinthall, and the county of Werdenberg, you may ſee the Seigneury belonging to the Barons of Altſax. Now, although the Barons are ſoueraigne Lords; yet notwithſtanding, in regard of the ſcituation of Rhinthall, I was not willing to paſſe any further, without making ſome mention thereof.

The Antiquities of the Barons of Altſax

The race of the Lords of Altſax is moſt ancient, and hee that hath written concerning Iuſtes and Tournaments, declareth, that the Emperour Henry, ſirnamed the Faulconer or Fowler, made choiſe among all the Gentlemen of Suaba, of Frederick, Baron of Altſax, to preſcribe to others, the order to be obſerued in thoſe Royall paſtimes. They of Miſauk in the Griſons country (whom Pliny calleth * Hirſaces, at the Trophee of Auguſtus) were ſometimes ſubiects to the Barons of Monſax: to whom the Emperour Sigiſmond gaue the name and dignity of Counts, and Wolffe, Baron of Monſax was in the warre againſt the Obotrites, in the yeare nine hundred, thirty fiue. Some ſay, that thoſe Counts deſcended of the houſe of Altſax, and that there are many Gentlemen (of very ancient race) in the country of the Griſons, deſcended of the firſt Rhætians, who were of Tuſcany, and vaunt themſelues alſo to be iſſued of the Romanes.

* So named of the Foreſt of Hircinia running thorough Germany.

Gentlemen deſcended of the firſt Rhætians.

The Valley of Lengs.

In Antiquity, the Lords of Altſax dwelt in the Griſons country. For neere to the Valley of Lengs, where they inhabite, who (among all other) vaunt and glorifie themſelues, to bee of moſt noble and ancient race; there is the Village of Obierſax, which retaineth yet the name of that Family, and it hath a Caſtle of the ſame name. I am of the minde then, that the houſe of Altſax is Griſon by originall, and deſcended (with many other of the Griſons) of the Tuſcanes, who were before the Romanes. Alſo the country, whereof they are Lords to this day, was heeretofore reputed to be of the Griſons: conſidering, that Strabo extendeth the Griſons limits, ſo farre as the Lake of Conſtance.

The originall of the houſe of Altſax of the Griſons.

This Baronny hath had heeretofore two ſtrong Caſtles, to wit, Sax (which was burnt before the warre of Appenzell) and Fortege, builded afterward, vpon the warranty of Vlrich of Altſax, Abbot of S. Gall, at ſuch time as the Barons were in warre againſt the Counts of Montfort. There are many Villages in this Valley, ſubiect to the Barons of Altſax. If any warre threaten Switzerland, they chuſe their moſt valiant Soldiours, which they ſend to their ſuccour. Alſo Huldrich, Father to Huldrich Phillip, now Baron of Altſax, fought valiantly for the Switzers, in the warre which they had againſt the Emperour Maximillian, and the league of Suaba: and as a recompence and acknowledgement of his valor, the Cantons gaue him diuers peeces of Artillery.

Two ancient Caſtles belonging to the Baronny.

When war is menaced againſt Switzerland.

It is a long time ſince the Barons of Altſax haue beene Bourgeſſes of Zurich, the reſt of the Cantons neuer had any dominion ouer the Barons of Altſax: but themſelues were ſoueraigne Lords, and no man might appeale frō their ſentence, to any other iuſtice. At this day, there is no more of this race of the Barons of Altſax left, but one, namely, the Lord Huldrich Phillip: but by the grace of God, it is now augmented, becauſe this lord hath had (by two wiues) fiue ſonnes, already of good ſtature, and which promiſe faire hope, namely, Albert Iohn, Thibault Iohn, Phillip Iohn, Iohn Chriſtopher, and Iohn Huldrich.

CHAP.XXI.

The Bayliwicks or Gouernements of Italy.

THE firſt and principall of the foure Bayliwicks of Italy, is called Lugano, and the Bayliffe is called a Captain, commaunding ouer all the foure, if any warre doth happen vnexpected.

Lugano the firſt Bayliwick

The ſecond is that of Locarna, almoſt of Locarna the ſecond.

of as great and large extendure, as Lugano. I will ſet downe in this Chapter, an exact deſcription of the Bayliwicke and Towne of Locarna, made (at my requeſt) by M. Thaddeus Dun, Phyſition, and a natiue of Locarna, my very good friend. For therby may be knowne, what the gouernment of the other Bayliwicks is, which althogh they are not of the like extendure, neither haue the ſame policy, yet notwithſtanding, they are gouerned in the ſame manner, in reſpect of the Bayliffe, and dominion of the Switzers.

A mã of great experience & knowledge.

The Towne of Locarna, is called Luggari by the Germanes, and Locarno by the Italians. Some do hold it to be ſo named, as being a place of fleſh: becauſe in al the country round about, there is no meane number of cattell. It is ſeated on a plaine, betweene the foote of an high Mountain, and the Banck of the Lake Maior. Towards the Eaſt it hath the head and beginning of this Lake: to the South, the neck of the Lake, and the high Mountaines. It extendeth and ſhooteth it ſelfe out along the middle of the Lake, to his fall, and towards the North are alſo very high Moũtaines. To the Weſt, and againſt the lands belonging to the Bayliwicke of Bellizona, is a plaine of great length, yeelding yearely a plentifull Hay-harueſt, & thwart it paſſeth Theſina. Neere to the Towne, betweene this plaine, the Towne it ſelfe, the foote of the Mountains, and the Lake bancks, is a fruitfull parcell of Land for Corne and Wine, and a great goodly field, abounding with graſſe; which heretofore hath beene much more ſpacious, but the neighbouring Riuer (by vndermining it) hath borne away a great part therof. The Mountaines of long extendure, are very aptly husbanded, hauing goodly and faire vineyards in them.

The deſcription of Locarna, and how it is ſcituated by euery way. The fleſhy Territory, or where fleſh is in great plenty.

Heereby we may coniecture, that Locarna is great, by reaſon of the Families therein, to the number of foure hundred, or thereabout: and there is not any greater Towne about the Lake Maior, neyther are there more Gentlemen in any towne of that quarter, by which reaſon, it is the cheefe and principall Towne. This deſcription doth demonſtrate, how pleaſant the place is, the ayre alſo is there temperate, ſweete, and healthfull, euen as much as can bee deſired. The windes of the South do blow there very little, and euen as tired, broken, and ſpent, by reaſon of the Mountaines defencing before it. The North winde is there alſo ſweet enough, becauſe the high Mountaines doe couer the Towne. From the Eaſt to the Weſt, the windes breathe at their eaſe: and there is not a Pond, or Marſhy plot in this quarter, ſo that to ſay all in a word, the place is ſufficiently pleaſing.

Great Families in Locarna, and ſtore of Gentlemẽ.

Locarna appeareth to be very healthfully ſeated.

Heeretofore, the towne of Locarna had a great & ſtrong caſtle, of very goodly ſhew, in regard of the many Towers & Turrets, and well engirt with ſightly Ditches. It was ſometimes the principall dwelling of the Counts of Ruſque: and the French were Maſters there, the ſpace of thirteene yeares, but yet could not expell the Counts. There is a Pallace within the ſaide Caſtle, which is the Bayliffes houſe: there alſo abideth the Trucheman or Interpreter, and the two Switzer Archers of his Guard, of whom wee ſhall make more ample mention heereafter: within the walles encloſure of this Caſtle, there was a goodly Hauen or Port, where the Ships for warre were kept.

The ancient goodly Caſtle of Locarna.

A Pallace in the old Caſtle and how it is imployed.

The Caſtle was ſquare and quadrangular, beautified with Towers at each corner, and had a very ſtrong wall about it. At that time, the Lake Maior waſhed the foote of the Caſtle, ſo that the Ships were eaſily ſent forth vpon the Lake. But now, the Riuer of Madia hath gathered ſuch aboundance of ſand and grauell, as the place is become farre enough off from the Lake. Since the yeare one thouſand, fiue hundred, thirty one, the Switzers wholly ruined the Caſtle, except the Pallace; the foundations are yet to be ſeene, and the walles of many houſes, for there was not any caſtle ſo ſtrong in all the country. Alſo it was munited with Artillery of all ſorts, and other furniſhments for warre, in great plenty. Frances Guicchiardine maketh mention in the fift Booke of his Hiſtories, that fifteene thouſand Switzers got themſelues together, to go and aſſault this caſtle; thereof he ſpeaketh againe in the eleuenth Booke, and at the end of the twelfth.

The ſingularity of the ancient Caſtle.

This goodly Caſtle was quite defaced by the Switzers.

Guicchiard in Lib. 5. 11. 12.

Long ſince, in the times of the Dukes of Millaine, the whole country was commanded by the Bayliffe of Locarna (except the towne of Briſag) and it was a county, wherof the Ruſques were Lords, they beeing Gentlemen of marke in the towne towne of Coma, whereof alſo they were Maſters ſometimes, but after they ſurrendred it to the Duke of Millaine, in the yeare one thouſand, foure hundred and ſixteene. But afterward, this county was diuided in two parts, and the Vale Madia ſeparated from the Bayliwicke of Locarna.

The extendure of the Bayliwicke of Locarna.

The County of Locarna diuided in twaine.

At that time alſo, the Vale of Verzaſche and Gambaron (whereof ſhall be ſpoken heereafter) obtayned leaue, to elect their Podeſtats. The extendure of the Bayliwicke of Locarna, may bee knowne by the Pariſhes, whereof there are twenty and more.

Of the fertility of the country, and encreaſe of their Vines.

The foote-ground of the Mountains of Locarna, and a great part of the Territory, yeeldeth plenty of very good wines. In the Hilles and Mountaines, the Vines are bound high, and ſtore of good graſſe groweth vnder them. On the plaines they ſhoote vp about Elmes and other Trees, as Hops do about Poles; alſo the twigs as being wouen together, and bound at the ends, are extended from one Tree to another. But if they ſtand too farre off, where the branches come too ſhort, then they fixe poles in the midſt, whereto they faſten the branches, for feare leſte they ſhould hinder the Cornes encreaſe, or the other ſorts of pulſe, which are alſo there ſowne. The Vines are of great and incredible yeelding, the grapes huge, and very ripe, which cauſeth an extraordinary plēty of wine.

Of the Fields and Meddow grounds about Locarna

The fields cannot be very ſpacious, in regard of the ſo neere neighbouring Lake and Mountaines: yet notwithſtanding, they are very fertile, by reaſon of the grounds goodneſſe, which the husbandmen do fatten and labour very diligently. For becauſe there are no great ſtore of fields and meddowes, and the towne is ſufficiently peopled; their paines are performed at the better leyſures. Many times they render twenty graines for one, and they haue two Harueſts in one yeare. In the Moneth of Iune, they reape and gather Wheat and Rie: In the Moneth of October, they haue the like of Millet, Panicke, and other Pulſes ſowed in Spring time.

Two harueſts gathered in a yeare continually.

The Mountaines and Vallies are furniſhed with cattell in great aboundance, eſpecially Goates. Alſo there is plenty of Partridges, Phezants, Larks, Hares, Conies, Butter, Cheeſe, and admirable ſtore of Cheſtnuts, for the nouriſhment of country people. At the beginning, they eate them rawe, then dryed, and afterward boyled, roſted, and fried. Alſo they make Meale of them for Bread, and that Meale ſerues thē to diuers vſes: but Gentlemen eate cheſtnuts among their other delicates.

What fleſh, Fowles, and other helpfull food the country afoordeth.

When therefore there is a good ſeaſon of cheſtnuts, the dearth of other victuals is not great in that country: wher alſo is ſtore of good Figs, variety of Apples, Peaches, Peares, Cheries, and other dainty fruites, as Plums of diuers kindes, Pomgranets, Citrons, Oliues, Oranges, and other fruites in great plenty. The Lake aboundeth with Fiſh, dainty and good; eſpecially Trowts, whereof ſtore are brought & ſold in Millaine. In briefe, the country is enriched with all good things, for the maintenance of life; yet ſometimes there is ſcarſity of Corne, by reaſon of the countries narrowneſſe, and Salt is brought thether from other places.

Variety of all kindes of fruites, and of dainty fiſh.

All bleſſings for the life of man.

Euery Thurſday there is a great Market at Locarna, where meete no meane ſtore of people. You ſhall ſee many boats arriue there, from all the Townes of the Lake Maior, from whence come diuers Merchants, rather to buy, then ſell. They come thether alſo from ſundry parts of the Dutchy of Millaine, from Lugano and Bellizona, neighbouring Bayliwicks: as alſo from Miſauk, and the Valley of Liuiner, not ſpeaking of them about Locarna, and the vale Madia: It is one of the goodlieſt Markets in all thoſe countries. There is a very ſpacious place neere to the Lake, where the Merchants ſet vp Tents, to defend them from raine, and ſuch like accidents.

A market at Locarna euery Thurſday.

The people of Locarna are diuided into three degrees, to wit, Noblemen, ancient cittizens, whom they call Bourgeſſes, and the inhabitants, deſcended from diuers parts, and whoſe anceſtors began to dwell at Locarna, more then an hundred yeares before.

Noblemen, Bourgeſſes, & Inhabitant, the three degrees of people in Locarna.

There is a fourth race noble, as of the Aurelles, Muraltes, Magorians, and Duns. That of the Duns is the moſt auncient, and before the other: their houſes and goods beeing partly at Locarna, partly at Scone, which is a Towne neere neere to Locarna, but not ſo wel peopled, ſeated on a plaine neere to the Lake. At ſuch time as the Counts of Ruſque commanded, the Duns were fauoured and honoured, more then the other Nobles, and aduanced to great eſtates. And the Arms of the Counts of Ruſque, magnificently illuſtrated, are yet to bee ſeene (outwardly) on the Duns Pallace at Locarna. Next, vnder name of the people, are reckoned all them that dwell in the Vallies and Villages, dependants on Locarna. The whole body of the Seigneury or Bayliwicke, is called the Comminalty.

A fourth deſcent of Noblemen.

In memory of former receiued fauours.

As for the Bayliffe, whom they call Commiſſary, hee is choſen by the twelue Cantons, and ſent to Locarna euery yeare, by one of the ſaid cantons, as it is then in rancke, according to their lawes and alliances. This commiſſary is Soueraigne, and hath full power to chaſtiſe the faulty, yea, to condemne to death, if the caſe do ſo require. His cuſtome is to take wiſe & vnderſtanding men, expert in the lawes and manners of the country, to bee his councellers. Hee is not receiued into his charge, til he haue firſt ſolemnly ſworn and promiſed, to keepe the lawes and ordinances, which the inhabitants tearme municipall rights. Which being done, the people there preſent, do acknowledg him for their lawfull Gouernor; with ſolemne and publike acclamations, & ſwearing faithfully to obey him.

The Commiſſary, and how he is elected.

The Commiſſaries power and authority.

Municipale ius, the priuate law of euery Citty.

Now, becauſe the commiſſiary ſpeaketh the Switzers language, and the people Italian; the Lords of the Leagues do allow him a Truchman, who vnderſtands and ſpeakes both the languages, to whom they pay wages. By entremiſe of the Trucheman, the commiſſary, the parties that plead as Atturnies or Aduocates, do vnderſtand each other, and ſo debate the cauſes: which the Secretary or Prognotary writeth downe in Latine. The commiſſiary medleth not with the affaires of the common-wealth, becauſe the people haue full power to elect Magiſtrates and Officers, to ordaine of all things concerning the publike eſtate.

A Trucheman allowed to the Commiſſary to be his Interpreter.

The people haue power to elect Magiſtrates.

Moreouer, they elect an ordinary Atturney, who purſueth criminall cauſes, & keepeth the fines adiudged to the common purſſe, which they call, The fines Chamber. The Lords of the leagues giue order for the election of this Atturney; who is one of the Bourgeſſes of Locarna, and continueth as long time in that Office, as pleaſeth the ſaid Lords.

The election of the Atturny.

They eſtabliſh alſo the Receiuers of the taxes. For euery yeare, in Summer, when the twelue Ambaſſadours of the Cantons come thether: they giue the farming of the taxe (mittigating a certain ſumme) to one, or to many Bourgeſſes, who then alſo receiue ample power, to exact the taxe, and at the yeares end they pay it.

The Receiuers of the taxes & tolles

The Commiſſary chuſeth (oftentimes) a Switzer Officer, who walketh daily attending on him, with an Halbert and a Sword. He is the cheefeſt of the Serieants, that arreſteth men, and guardeth offenders. When the Ambaſſadors come to Locarna, hee is their Vſher: alſo, they pay him his wages, as well as the Trucheman.

The Officer waiting on the Commiſſary.

The ſame Commiſſary electeth his Lieutenant, ſome one of the Bourgeſſes, fitte to decide ſuites and criminall cauſes. This Lieutenant giues attendance in the Commiſſaries abſence, or when hee is with-held by ſickneſſe, or any other hinderance: hauing (in thoſe cauſes) the ſame power and authority, as the Commiſſary hath.

The Lieutenant to the Commiſſary.

Moreouer, the councell (of whom we ſhall ſpeake preſently) makes choiſe of ſome Serieants among the people. Their charge is to ſerue the Common-wealth, and to execute the commands of the cõmiſſary.

The Seriants and Officers.

The Bourgeſſes and inhabitants that are of this County and Comminalty, do meete together according to their cuſtome, which yearely is the firſt day of Ianuary, and then they elect the one and twenty councellers of the Common-wealth. Twelue among them are of Locarna; three of the towne of Scone, which is neere: the other ſixe are of the Vallies and Villages round about. As concerning the twelue of Locarna: ſixe of them are Noblemen, foure Bourgeſſes, & two inhabitants; yet ſometimes three, and fiue Nobles. The three of Scone, there is one of the family of Gentlemen, called Duns, and the two other are of the body of the people. The other ſixe, whom I haue ſaid to be of Villages and Vallies, are of ſuch places, as acknowledge no other Gouernour, but the fore-mentioned Commiſſary.

Of the councell, their mãner of meeting, and orders obſerued among them in their election of councellers.

A contrary kinde of gouernment & Officers.

ſary. This I ſpeake in regard of the towne of Briſag, the Valley of Verzaſche, & Gãbaron: which haue their Podeſtats or Lieutenants, and ſome rights apart by themſelues, as we ſhall ſhew anon, and they do not elect any councellers.

What charge the councell do vndertake

The councell of the Bayliwicke of Locarna, hath charge to watch and waite on the affaires of the common-wealth: to conclude on needfull expences & wages: to diſpoſe and ſet in order, whatſoeuer ſeemeth for the good of the weale publike fit and conuenient.

Of the ſeuen Attorneyes, & what their office is,

Seuen Procurators or Attornies are added to the one and twenty councellers, who giue order, that the decrees of the councel may be effectually executed, and that euery man do his duty thoroughly & faithfully. They ſtand alſo in ſtead of Voyers or Suruayors: becauſe they take charge of publike buildings. In like manner, there is a Secretary whom they call Chancellor; and he ſetteth downe in writing, all things whatſoeuer that are concluded on by the councell.

The Secretary or Chancellor.

A Treaſurer euery yeare elected.

And foraſmuch as the Commonalty lockes not vp any of the publike monies, there is yearely a new Treaſurer elected, who exacteth and collecteth of conſuls and communities, ſuch ſummes of money as are impoſed by the councell. For euery community or pariſh hath his Conſull (ſo called, becauſe they councell and aduiſe that which is neceſſary for the communities welfare) and is in Office as a Receiuer. They leuye vpon euery Father of the Family, or on each houſe, the money whereat they are aſſeſſed by the councel, and afterward bring all to the Treaſurer. The manner of aſſeſſing theſe ſummes, is according to the eſtimation of goods, & the number of houſholds in euery community.

Conſuls appointed, and their office.

The ſum of one of the leaſt aſſeiſements.

There is not any Pariſh nor Family (how little ſoeuer it bee) but iuſtly knoweth, how much it is valued at in the aſſeſſement. One of their cottiſations amoũteth to an hundred pounds of the Empire: which make ſeuen and twenty Florins of gold, or thereabout. The Conſuls do firſt collect this ſumme of the Families, and then deliuer it into the Treaſurers hands, and he afterward paies it to the Seigneurs of the annuall accounts. Then it is payed out in wages, to the Bayliffe, to the Phyſitions, to Maſters of Schooles, Officers, and other perſons, who are al at wages of the common-wealth: And beſide, it acquitteth all other publike charges. The yeare being expired, hee yeeldeth vp his account to the councell, or to the Procurators. If there be more omitted then receiued; his ſucceſſour diſburſeth it himſelfe. Contrariwiſe, if the receipt doe ſurmount the ordinary charge, the remainder is deliuered ouer vnto his ſucceſſour. Moreouer, the fore-named Magiſtrates make choiſe of two ſufficient men, to haue a care of food and prouiſion. And other two are elected by the councell, to ſee the wayes and ſtreetes duely and decently repaired and well kept.

The Treaſurers account to the Councell.

Now in regard that the country is enuironed with Mountaines and Vallies, repleated with woods of extraordinary taul trees, exquiſite for their beauty and braue branching (among others the Pine, which produceth very excellent Agaricke, and the Firre-tree, notable for building, and whereof they of Locarna make very great benefit) the Merchant dealing in wood, do elect a Iudge or Maſter of the Foreſts, who decideth all differences proceeding in ſuch caſes. When the taule trees are cut, they bring knowledge therof to him, and then he ordereth their leſſer cutting, for more commodious conuaying them through the narrow paſſages and vallies, as alſo the Rocky crooked windings, to the Lake Maior. When they are there ſhipt in apt Barques and Boats, they paſſe along the Lake, and then on the Theſsina to Millaine and Pauia, in great Trunkes, Beames, Ioiſts, and long Planks; together with great quantities of wood-coales, and other bruſh-wood, for heating Ouens. Afterward, they deſcend with them from Pauia, by the Riuer Po (wherein Theſsina diſchargeth it ſelfe) ſo farre as Cremona, and Plaſentia, and may goe alſo to Ferrara, Mantua, Venice, and to the Adriaticke Sea. The trunks of the trees haue their length and thickneſſe iuſt, and the Merchants marks on them. The valley of Verzaſche, the vale Madia, and other neighbouring places, doe alſo ſend away Trees very aboundantly, when the Riuers ſwell higher then their vſuall wont.

and is but foure miles distant off from Canobio. It hath also to the East, the Vallie of Verzasche, taking his name of a Riuer so called, and thence descending: Also Gambaron to the South, and on the Lake Maior. These places haue their Podestats, who iudge in ciuill causes: for as concerning them criminall, the knowledge of them appertaineth to the Commissary of Locarna. There is appeale granted from the sentence in ciuill causes, if it seeme good to the party condemned. They of the Valley of Verzasche, and of Gambaron, do chuse (among themselues) such persons as they please, to be their Podestats: but the people of Brisag haue not that authority, but yearely doe elect a Lieutenant, who is of the Family of the Aurelles. Gentlemen of Locarna. The Inhabitants of this place are not cottised or sessed, as the other Communities be: but onely pay their part of rentage due, to the Lords of the leagues, and of wages to the Commissary. Beside, they furnish towards the charges that are in their Villages and Communities.

Brisag differing in authority from Gãbaron.

Of this Towne of Locarna thus described, are descended the Locarnians dwelling at Zurich, and in other places. It is not aboue thirty yeares since, that some Cittizens of Locarna, yet liuing, affected to the new Religion; tooke knowledge thereof, by the reading of certain books, and afterward enstructed it to many of their Townesmen. From the yeare one thousand, fiue hundred, forty two, vntill the yeare one thousand, fiue hundred, fifty foure, the zeale and number of them began to encrease, and notwithstanding the persecutions, embraced it the more earnestly. The most part of the Seigneurs and people, not willing to suffer it, expulsed (in the yeare following) about thirty Families: namely all such as would not forsake that new opinion, and returne againe to the Romane Church. There were people of all kindes in this troope, Nobles, Gentles, and Yeomen; learned and vnlearned; rich and poore; great and small; husbands without their wiues, and wiues without their husbands; fathers without their children, & children without their fathers. The men of Zurich receiued them very louingly, and did, and yet do many kinde courtesies to them: so that diuers of thē are embraced as Bourgesses, and the rest maintained at the expences of the Seigneury. At the beginning, they receiued a good sum of monie, sent by them of Berne, and another collected at Basile, and in some other Townes of Sauoye, where with the poore people haue bene long time maintained.

CHAP. I.

Of the Kingdome and Court of Spaine; the Lawes, Customes, and manners of the people, as also the diuision and scituation of the Country.

SPaine, so tearmed of * Hispalis, or of * Hesperia, or Hesperus, by being a part of Europe, and neerest to the VVest; hath her Confines in this manner. On the East, the Mediterranean Sea: On the VVest, the Ocean: On the South, the streights of Gibraltare: And on the North, the Pyrenean Mountains, which make diuision of France & Spaine. The principall Riuers in this Prouince, are sixe in number: Myuo, Duria, Traia, Guadiana, Guadalquabir, and Iberus. This Kingdome (by our Auncients) was diuided into three parts, to wit; Bætica, Lusitania, and Tarraconia. At this day, Bætica contayneth three Regions, namely, Granata, with her Citty Royall, which is called Granada; Andalusia, with the City of Siuill; and Estramadura, with the City of Menda. Lusitania hath two Regions, to wit, Portugall, with the Citty Royall, named Lisborne: and Galicia, with the citty that is called Compostella, where the body of S. Iames is saide to be. Tarraconia hath nine Regions; as Arragon, with the citty of * Sarragossa; Nauarre, with the citty of Pampalona; Cathalonia, with the citty of Barcellona; Biscay, with the city of Vilucro; * Castile the elder, with the citty of Burgos or Braga; Castile the newer, with the citty of Tolledo; Leupusca, with the citty of S. Sebastiano; Valenza, with the citty of Valencia; Murgia, with the citty so called. In the kingdome of Granada, ther is an Iland named Caliz, which hath a citty also called by the same name. In the Ocean Sea, and in the Mediterranean, there are three seuerall Islands, subiected to the gouernement of Valencia, to wit, Ieniza, Maiorica, and Minorica. The Portugals vse their nauigation into the East Indiaes; and the Spaniards of Siuill and Caliz, into the West. The circumference of Spaine, is about 1893. miles. The kingdom of Portugall, frō the South part, beginneth at the citty of Leppe, and on the North it extendeth to Baiona of Galicia. The most notable Ports or Hauens of Spaine, on the North part, are S. Sebastiano; the Port Galette; the Port Andrea; the Port di S. Vincenzo; the Port of Ribadeo; the Port Ieroll; and the Port delle Grugne, or of the Groyne. On the VVest part, are the Port di Monuedra; the Port of Portugall; the Port of Lisborne; & the Port Secuball. On the South part are the Port di Siluas; the Port of Siuill; the Port of Calix; and the Port of Caliz in the Island; and the Port Beger; & the famous Port Cartagenia. On the East part is Port Calibre, now called Porto venere.

Spaine hath seuen Arch-Bishoppricks, and the residence is made in Tarraconia, in Sarragossa, in Tolledo, in Compostella, in Braga, in Lisbona, and in Granata. Vnder the aboue-named Arch-Bishopricks, are many Citties and their Bishops; as Barcellona, Girona, Ierida, Tortosa, Valenza, Maiorica, Ostia, Monuedro, Burgos, Salamanca, Corduba, Legiou, Tariffa, Almaria, Siuiglia, and others.

This Country (in many places) is not reduced to tillage & husbandry, because the ground consists of a very stony earth, and is much squallide and filthy through desertnesse: notwithstanding, in respect of Affrica, it is very fertile, and this ensueth through the ouer-great heate which is in in Affrica. It aboundeth in all those things that are necessary for man: as in VVine, Corne, Fruites, Oyle, Cattell, Line for all garments, yron mettals, VVaxe, Hony, VVaters well stored with Fish, and such other like things. They make no Salt by boyling or seething, but dig it out of the earth. And they haue not so many windes as France; neyther are they so stored with marish and fenny grounds, whereby the ayre is much corrupted. There is not found any Gold, Siluer, or Yron, so good and approued, or in such plenty, as in Spaine, and the gold is taken not only out of the Mines, but also out of the Riuers, which when they encrease by much plenty of raine; they doe produce sandes of gold, & especially the Riuer Tagus. There are found out in many places, diuers wels and springs of hot and cold water; marualously good for the helpe of diuers & sundry infirmities, which happen to the bodies of men. There is likewise great abundance of Beasts, both wilde and tame; and especially of swift horses, which were supposed by our Elders, to bee conceiued by the windes. They haue no hurtful creatures in any great store, Conies onely excepted, who making their caues vnder the ground, doe much harme to the rootes growing in the earth. Their Riuers glide away very gently, for hardly can their motion be discerned; and therefore they do not ouer-flow, or drowne the fields, being also well stored with Fish, because the Sea (by helpe of the Riuers) doth not send any plenty on land. Galicia is much commended for the Mines there breeding, and sometime it happeth in this Region, that by plowing vp the ground, the people finde little graynes of gold. The language of the Spaniards, is not much different from the Italians; from whom they receiued it, whē they were subiected to the Romane Empire. On the Northerly part, the Prouince is not so colde as in that climate of France: for it sendeth into France, Oyle, Hony, Waxe, Saffron, Madder, Barly, dying-coulors, Chuchinelo, Snger, Oliues, Lemons, Dates, Cedar, Pomgranats, and other things; but especially many thousand weights of wool, & muchwine, dried plums or pruins, rasines, almonds, chesnuts, bay-berries, salted salmon, and other things, which are sent into Italy, & frō thence transported to France.

The women of Spaine, their attire and behauiour.

The fame for Military seruices, of no long antiquity among the Spaniards.

The temperature and complexion of the Spaniards, is much more hot and dry, and their coullor more dun & foggy, thē that of the French: because they are more cold and moist, hauing their flesh more soft, and their coullor whiter, & the French women are more gentle, and apt to conceiue children, then the Spanish are. The Spaniards are more raw-boned men of body, thē the French, and in war they feed with councell and arte, being silent by nature; as men that know most exquisitely, how to dissemble their owne intentions, walking very grauely, and vsing much ceremonious behauiour in their customs & qualities. They drinke wine temperately, liue with great respect, & are of acute vnderstanding & knowledge in their words. In Spain there are a great number of Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, & Barons, and euery one of them hath the reuenues and profits, from 50. to 60. thousand Ducates yearely. The Marquesses are 20, beside the like reuennues. The Earls are 60. with reuenues from ten, to twenty thousand Ducates. Then there are Viscounts, Gouernors, and Barons, which are called Adalantadoes. There are great Masters of the Orders of knighthood; as of S. Iames, of Alcantara, of Calatraua, of S. John of Ierusalem, of the Rhodes, of Montese, and others; who dispend (each one) about 50. thousand Ducates in reuennues yearely. The women go pompeously apparelled, wearing rich eare-rings of Pearl & Gold, hauing their garments plaited, after the manner of Italy. When they walk abroad out of their houses, the men-seruants goe before them, and the maids follow after. The most part of them do willingly drink water, and so paint their faces with white and red, that it is most lothsom to behold. They are discreet in speech, yet prettily wanton and lasciuious, & deliuered with effectuall gestures, especially in amorous matters. It is not many yeares since, that the people of this Prouince, hath gotten a great name of military seruice, as men that are most patient in labors, suffering most valiantly both thirst and hunger, and being matchlesse for subtilties in Soldier-like affaires, quicke and nimble of body, both for pursuit & flight. They haue conquered many countries, bringing thence very honourable victories, especially vnder Charles the fift, Emperor.

Of the Maiesty Royall.

THE Kings of Spaine, as great in power, and valorous, in regard of Military prouision, were alwayes held in no meane reuerence among their people. For men bearing ordinarily affection to their Soueraigne, their beneuolence is so much the more encreased, by how much the King liueth vertuously and iustly, according to the ordination of his owne lawes, for so shall hee be both loued and serued. And in conclusion, the worthy deeds of his Lords, that are enriched with vnderstanding and iudgement, doe highly support him: euen as the wicked actions of such as know not how to rule and gouerne, doth ruinate & ouerthrow him. The Kings of Spaine haue possessed this Prouince many yeares peaceably, though it was (a long while) nested by the Moores; whom at length they expelled, and reduced the whole politicke body to a quiet condition, and greatly deuoted to the catholique church, whereon the King attained to the title of Catholique King. The king then is the cheefe Ruler of the kingdome, and ordereth matters as best him pleaseth: but heere it shall not much differ from our purpose, to sette downe some other obseruations, concerning the originall & succession of this kingdome.

The loue and beneuolence of subiects is much encreased by the life of the Prince according to his lawes.

Spaine subiected to the Moores for many yeares.

Spaine in her yonger daies was held by sundry petty Kings and Tetrarches, & afterward became diuided into many commonwealths, six in number, as some haue written. The Carthagenians, a people of Affrica, hazzarding their fortune thether: held one part therof, and possessed themselues of many Citties, Townes, and places; vntill they were expelled thence by the Romanes, in the time of the Punicke wars. Since when, it was continually subiect to the Roman common-wealth, & reduced into forme of a Prouince onely, in the reigne of the Emperour Augustus. So it remained till the Emperour Honorius in whose dayes, the Vandales (a people of the North parts) broght it vnder their command. But they (were soone after) chased thence by the Gothes, who established there the seate of their kingdome; which they maintained (in that kinde) for the space of aboue 200 yeares. Nor were they then called kings of Spaine, but kings of the Gothes. In the reigne of Roderick, king of the Gothes, the Moores entred Spaine, in the year 715. they being broght thither by one named Iulian; in very despitefull indignation, and to shape out a way to his bloody reuenge, because king Roderick had dishonoured his Sister, or as others say) his Daughter, wherof heretofore we haue spoken more largely. And so did the Moores possesse themselues of all Spaine, seizing the citty of Tolledo, which was then the capitall citty. So ended the kingdome and name of the Gothes in Spaine. Nor rested they thus, but pursued on their conquest still, & there remained but Gallicia, the Asturies and Leon: which countries king Pelagius, Vnkle and Successor of Roderick, had fled too for refuge, & there shut vp himselfe, in regard that those places were enuironed with Mountaines, and might well defend and shelter him for some time. But his Successors being hardly pressed by the Sarrazins, could no longer resist: wherefore, vnder the reigne of Alphonsus the second, they were forced to craue the helpe of Charlemaigne, king of France, by whose valour and vertue, the Moores were beaten thence a great way, and had bin quite cast out of the country, if the Spaniards mallice had bene no hinderance thereto. Afterward, the kings of Leon and Gallicia (for such were then their onely titles) being so formerly preserued, began somewhat to encrease in power. And in regard of this expeditiō performd by the French, the strength of the Moores was so weakened & diminished, that many other kingdomes were establisshed in Spaine, as that of Nauarre, by Enocho, Count of Bigorre, in the yeare 950. which hee tooke away from the Moores and Sarrazins, by a very valiant conquest of them. And afterward, in the yeare 1116. was Arragon reduced to a kingdome, by the will and testament of Sanchio the great, fourth king of Nauarre; for loue to Ramyrus his naturall Sonne, who was the first king thereof. This was the same Sanchio, who being Earle of Castile, in the kingdome of Leon, tooke on him first the name of King of Castile, which he left vnto his Sonne Ferdinand.

The kingdome of Portugall was also conquered frō the same Moores, by Earle Henry, Sonne vnto the Duke of Lorraine; who held it first of all vnder tytle of an Earle, in the yeare 1110. but quickly after, he brought it to be a kingdome. Spaine did did continue ſo (in this kinde of ſtate) for a long time, diuided into many kingdoms: & the Moores had alſo their abiding ther, poſſeſſing ſtill a great part thereof; till ſuch time as Ferdinand, the fift, king of Arragon (who was married to Iſabell, the onely heire of Caſtile) wholly expulſed the Moores out of Spain, in the year 1492. In no great diſtance of time after, he poſſeſſed himſelfe of Sicily and Naples, inuading alſo the Eaſt Indiaes. But fraudulently he vſurped the kingdome of Nauarre, againſt Iohn d'Albret, who was (indeede) the lawfull King. And it is this Ferdinand, and Iſabell his wife, in whom onely wee may truly ſay, that the kingdome of Spaine had her firſt beginning. They left one only daughter, named Ioane, who was married to Philip the firſt, of Auſtria, Sonne vnto the Emperour Maximillian, and Mary of Bourgundy: he ſucceeded in this kingdom of Spaine, and other countries beſide. He was likewiſe Earle of Bourgundy; of Flaunders, and Lord of the Low-countries, in the right of his Mother. In this his marriage, was borne Charles the fift, who was afterward Emperour. He reigned nine & thirty yeares, preſeruing his Prouinces very happily: and hee left for ſucceſſion (both in Spaine, and the more part of his other countries) his Sonne Philip the ſecond, who reigned three and forty years, hauing ioyned to his other eſtates, the kingdom of Portugall, in the yeare of our Lord, 1580. and ſo (conſequently) al that which the Portugals held in the Eaſt Indiaes, and elſewhere; as in Affrica and Braſile, which came vnto him by the death of Henry the Cardinall. He died, aged ſeuenty yeares, the thirteenth day of September, 1598. No long time before his death, hee had made peace with the mighty and moſt chriſtian King of France, Henry the fourth. Philip the third, his Sonne, ſucceeded him, and reigneth as yet to this day. He married Margret, daughter to the Arch-Duke of Auſtria, by whom he had a Sonne, in the Moneth of Aprill, 1606. Now let vs returne where we left before, concerning the king of Spaine, who being a good king, and liuing orderly; therfore on him doe depend the following councellers, who are ſpeciall members of gouernement, both in the Court and elſewhere.

THE ſupreame aſſembly of Spaine, which is the very ſame, that (in effect) hath the gouernment of moſt important affayres in their power; is the Royall or Kingly Councel, ſo tearmed of the vocable king; becauſe they are (among all other councellers) as the King himſelfe among his greateſt Lords. Theſe councellers doe prouide for the peoples liuing, in all things that appertaine to a well ordered ſtate: becauſe from them do proceed all meanes and deliberations, concerning matters of Graine, taxations, cuſtomes, prouiſions, and other ſubſtantiall occaſions for ſafe being; but euermore aſſiſted by the Princes authority. Theſe councellers are in number twelue, all principall men of the kingdome, & noble by blood, hauing a Preſident as their cheefe. And from theſe Noble-men, being aſſembled together, do come all orders, wherby the whole Realme of Spaine is gouerned: and the appellation of three Audiences, called the Chanceries of three kingdomes, do all reſort to this councell.

IN regard of the conqueſts which the Moores (in former times) made of this kingdome, reformation of the people was thought moſt conuenient, by bringing them to holy Baptiſme, and procuring by all carefull meanes, that Religion might endure no danger throughout the country: this councel was firſt created, and called, The ſacred Councell of Inquiſition. Whereof there is a Preſident, and hee is alwayes an Eccleſiaſticall perſon, as the Arch-Biſhop of Tolledo, or the Arch-Biſhop of Siuill. He is aſſiſted by twelue others councellers, who doe altogether deale in matters appertaining to religion. They giue chaſtiſement to heretiques; haue care of catholique affayres; and peruſe all Bookes before they be imprinted, to auoyd them of offence or corruptions. Other the like buſineſſes are referred to their charge, for the better preſeruation of holy faith.

The Councell of the Orders.

IN Spaine there are three ſeueral degrees of Knights, all honourable gentlemen, containing euery one by themſelues, one proper & peculiar Order of knighthood, introduced in former times by diuers Kings of the Land. The firſt and principal among all the other, is that of the knights of S. Iames: the second, the Knights of Calatraua: and the third, the Knights of Alcantara. These three Orders haue (each one to it selfe) many Cities and Castles vnder their gouernment, gotten and obtained in diuers times: and because their managing is great, and as if it were a kingdome within it selfe, therefore this Councel of these Orders was ordained. Whereof there is a President, with foure Councellers, and these meeting all together, do prouide Magistrates of the Orders, of Lawes, and of all other things that appertaine to the foresaid Orders. The King is the great Master of these Orders, & when any expedition is to be performed by the Order of S. Iames, the King in his Letter, next vnto the ordinary stile or title that is vsually giuen him, writeth; And perpetual Administrator of S. Iames, &c. Next vnto the King, followeth the great Commendator of Leon, as being Commendator of the Order of S. Iames; and after him, the Commendator of Castile. These altogether with the King, do dispense the commendums of spirituall liuings: but for that, looke in our Booke of the originall of Knights.

The Councell of the Indiaes.

WHen it pleased God, by the means of Don Christophero Colombo, to open (in our time) that part of the world, which formerly was shut vp from all of vs now here dwelling, and whereof the kings of Spaine haue (in part) bin Patrones: for gouernment of that part (as necessity required) a Councell of the Indiaes was created, consisting of twelue Councellers, with one President. These then do attend vpon all such matters, as appertaine to the gouerning of India. And therefore they haue their full power, sending thether Gouernors, Officers, and all kinde of prouision, as is fit for those kingdomes, which are vnder the Crowne of Castile.

WHen it so falleth out, that any matter of action is to be vndertaken, eyther for defence of themselues, or any new acquisition, the Councell of Warre do meete together: among whom are the Lords of the Councell Royal, the great Commendator of Leon, the Commendator of Castile, with other cheefe Rulers.

The reason of this Councels negotiation.

The secret Councell.

LAst of all is the Councell for matters of secrecy, wherin the King is present, the great Chancellor, the great Commẽdator of Leon, and the third part of the Councell Royall, with the President. Being set together, they giue dispatch to matters of greatest secrecy, and which do most import the King, as appertaining properly to the State.

They haue the charge of priuate and secret occasions.

Three Iudges, and the Rector.

FOr causes incident to ciuill and criminall iudgement, three Iudges are ordayned in criminall occasions, who, as being Tribunes of the common people, do dispatch all criminall occurrences. And when the ordinary Podesta, or cheefe Officers are there present; thẽ they attend on ciuill affaires: but if it fall out, that hee cannot be there in person, the three Iudges doe then take order in ciuill matters. These are alwayes in those Citties, where the appointed Courts are kept.

After the ancient manner of the Roman Tribunes.

The three Chanceries.

OVer and beside the fore-named Coũcels and Offices, the King hath three Courts of audience, called three Chanceries, placed in three kingdomes, diuided the one from the other. One is in Vallidolid, consisting of twelue Councellers, and with one President. These do sit euery morning separately in foure Halles, three in each Hall. The second is in Granada, the principall citty of the kingdome of Granada, as being the first and cheefe. The third and last is in Galitia, beeing neyther more or lesse in power, then the two former. To this Court of audience go all the causes of Spaine, and they may each of them (by themselues) expedite their causes, without any interuention one of another. The appeales and chalendges of the Rector of Granada, doe passe to the audience of Granada: and those of Castile, to Vallidolid, and so from hand to hand. But in regard that they haue superiours, and for better satisfaction of the people, such as finde themselues greeued in the fore-named Audiences or Chaunceries, may appeale from them to the Councell Royall. Arragon the principall kingdome of Spaine.

BEcause Spaine (as formerly hath bene said) is diuided into diuers kingdoms, the cheefe or principall whereof is Arragon: the King hath and doth vsually send into those kingdomes, Deputies, or Vice-Royes, to gouern there in his name. They are elected and made choyse of by him, beeing first affirmed by the councell Royall, to be Princes of the country, men of vertue and valor, and deseruing aduancement to so high degree. Valencia hath her Vice-Roy, who gouerneth the kingdome of Valencia, by the same authority as was receiued from the former Kings of Arragon, and by the ancient lawes and orders of the kingdome. In Barcellona likewise, the principall citty of * Catalogna, ruleth another Vice-Roy, making vse of the lawes, customes, and ordinances of the kingdome of Barcellona. In Arragon also is another Vice-Roy, who maketh his residence in * Sarragossa. This Vice-Roy gouerneth by the ancient lawes of Arragon (as other Vice-Royes do by the Castillian lawes) because it is the head of the other kingdomes. The kingdome of Nauarre hath also her Vice-Roy, abiding in Pampalona, who ruleth this kingdome according to the lawes thereof, and those of the crowne of Castile, because it was last of all conquered by Don Ferdinando, the catholike King. Hee hath foure Contadories or Auditors vnder his command, who doe gather and collect the monies from the people, and bringing them vnto the Treasurer, payments are continually made foorth, as command is giuen by the King to the Treasurer.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kingdome of Portugall; the beginning, continuance, and present estate thereof, with the Customes, Lawes, and administration of Iustice therein obserued.

THE kingdome of Portugall began in the yeare of Christ, one thousand, fiue hundred and ten, and after this manner. Henry Earle of Lorrayne comming thither, performed many valiant deeds against the Sarrazins, and his high deseruings mooued Alphonsus the sixt king of Castile, to giue him a Bastard daughter of his in marriage, named Tiresia. And in way of dowry, he assigned also vnto him that part of Galicia, which was then contained in * Lusitania.

How the kingdome had her first beginning.

* The third part of Spaine now called Portugall, parted on the North from Tarracon, by the Riuer Durius, on the South, from Bætica, by the Riuer Anas.

Of this marriage was Alphonsus borne, who was the first that euer stiled himselfe king of Portugall: and hee was the first also, that tooke the citty of Lisbone from the Sarrazins. For he hauing conquered fiue of their Kings in seuerall battailes; caused his Armes to bee adorned with fiue seuerall Crownes & Coat-Armors, which euer after continued the Ensigne of the kings of Portugall, in perpetuall memory of his valour. But he quickly stayned this faire fame, with cruelty vsed by him to his owne Mother. For after her second marriage, he caused her to be imprisoned, and albeit the Pope laboured the matter greatly, by the meanes of his Legate; yet could he neuer compasse his grace and fauour for her deliuerance. Which sinne was seuerely punished on him afterward by his enemies, who tooke him in battaile. And then his Sonne Sancio succeeded him, and after Sancho, diuers other, to Iohn, who was the tenth king in direct and naturall line.

The succession in the kingdome after Alphonsus the first.

This Iohn was (at the first) expulsed from his kingdome, and made a Knight of S. Iohn of Ierusalem: but at length hee was re-called to his kingdome, where hee made very honourable proofe of his valour, and (among diuers famous deeds) he tooke from the Sarrazins the citty of Septia. Hee had seuen Sonnes, among which, Ferdinand (for integrity of life) was was termed a Saint.

Henry another of his ſonnes, was the firſt that found Noua Inſula, in the Atlanticke Sea. Hee being very skilfull in the Mathematickes, liued continually vvithout a wife, and made his dayly abiding in a Promontorie, which was called the Cape of Saint * Vincent, and there he died, in the yeare, 1460. But Edward, who was the eldeſt Brother, was made King; and he added to the kingdome of Portugall, by meanes of his warres, Zelia, Tegea, and Alcazar in Affrica. Hee had two daughters, or ſiſters (as ſome ſay) named Ioane and Leonora; the firſt was marryed to the King of Caſtile, and the other vnto Frederick the third, Emperor, of whome was borne Maximillian the firſt, who was afterward Emperor, and Grandfather to Charles the fift. He had alſo a ſon, named Alphonſius, who ſucceeded him in the kingdome, and begate Iohn and Emanuel, that was the fourteenth King of Portugall. Emanuel had Iohn, who tooke to wife the ſiſter of the fore-named Charles the fifte, Emperour, called Katherine, and begate Lodwicke, that dyed an infant, and Iſabell who was wife to the ſaid Charles, and had another daughter alſo, which was married to Charles Duke of Sauoy. After theſe ſucceeded Sebaſtian, who (in our time) fighting againſt the Moores, was ſlain, & the King of Morocco with him, beſides diuers other great Lords of the Moores.

Henrie, Vncle to the deceaſed King, followed him in ſucceſsion, he being then a Cardinall, and very aged, holding the kingdome ſome few months. But he dying, Phillip King of Spaine, entred on the kingdome; withſtanding the claime and title of Don Anthonio, beeing a Brothers ſonne to the dead King Henrie, & ſo outwearied him with troubles, that he could neuer attaine thereto in full poſſeſſion, and ſo it remaineth ſtill in the Spaniards power.

Concerning the gouernement of this kingdome, it hath the very ſame forme & obſeruation as all the reſt of Spaine hath, as being a part of that Prouince. For, there is a high Conſtable, and a Lorde Great Steward, with all other dignities elſewhere related. By the Title and name of great Lords, there is the Duke of Braganzia, the Duke of Colimbra, the Duke of Viſco, the Duke of Traſcoſſa, the Duke of Barcella and the Duke of Auaria. There is alſo the Marqueſſe of Villa Reale, the Marqueſſe of Torra Nuoua, the Marques of Monte Maggiore, and the Marqueſſe of Ferrira, with an infinite number of Earles. There is likewiſe the Order of Knight-hood, called the Knights of Chriſt, honoured and eſteemed much aboue all other, and whereof the King is the Great Maiſter.

Among theſe honourable perſons in this Order, as an approoued man of valour, moſt ſignale for many vertues, liberall minde and courteſie, beſide ſpeedyeſt intelligence in matters of Military diſcipline; is the Lorde Flaminio Zambeccaro, Lord of Caſtella in Campagnia, who liueth at this day in Florence, and highly affected of the Duke.

CHAP. III.

Of the Antiquity, Originall, Cuſtoms, Lawes and adminiſtration of Iuſtice, obſerued in the kingdome of Naples.

THE Cittie of Naples, beeing moſt ancient and Noble in all reſpectes, giueth the Title of kingdome vnto all the Prouinces which it holdeth and poſſeſſeth, euen by hir owne proper name. Therefore wee may thence frame our argument, what the greatneſſe of that Citty hath formerly beene, in regard that all the parts by it poſſeſſed, deriueth from thence the Title of a Kingdome; which I do not holde to be of any great antiquitie, becauſe the Normanes tooke it from the Græcians, who poſſeſſed the Prouince in diuers partes thereof, and then it vvas tearmed the County or Earledome of * Puglia, or Apulia, as ſome do yet call it.

How the kingdome claymeth that title by the Cittie name.

* A part of Italy, bording vpon the Adriaticke ſea.

Robert Guiſcard, a verie valiant and worthy man, hauing expulſed (in a manner) all the Grecians thence, & taken Sicily alſo from the Sarrazins; would needes ſtyle himſelfe Duke of Apulia and of Calabria, and Earle of Sicily. In no long time after this, his Nephevve Ruggiero or Roger, hauing conquered the Cittie of Robert Guiſcard the valiant Norman.

of Naples, which till that time had beene in the Grecians gouernment) obtayned the title of King of both the Sicillies, by Anacletus the Anti-Pope, in the yeare 1130. which afterward was confirmed to him in good and lawfull manner. And from that time, it was called the kingdom of Sicily, on this side [a] Pharos; vntill the reigne of Charles the first, when it becam diuided from Sicily, by occasion of that famous accident, called Vespro Siciliano, the Sicilian Euening, wherein so manie of the French were slaine. I finde moreouer in many good Historians, that this kingdome hath had 3. seuerall Names, to wit; the kingdome of Naples, the Kingdome of Apulia, and the kingdom of Sicily, on this side Pharos, the bounds or circumference whereof, at this day is thus described.

A description of the whole kingdome in length and breath.

First of all, by Land-way, measure of the Line, and the Confines of the whole Kingdom, with the Sea-shores & stronds; as also Campagna di Roma, sometimes called Latium, which (at this day) terminateth the riuer of Offento, on this side Terracina, and from the mouth of the sayde Riuer, where it entereth into the Terrene Sea, proceeding on still towards the Appenines, with Latium, and part of Sabina: then passing the Apennines, with part of Vmbria and of Picenam, now called Marca d'Ancona, vnto the Confines thereof, is the Riuer Truentus or Tronto, where it entereth into the bosom of the Adriatick maine. Which Scale or Lone, because it doth not directly extend it selfe forth, but passeth on by turnings and windings, euermore from one of the forenamed Riuers to another, by the terminations of those Regions, it containeth about an hundred and fifty miles in length. Passing on thence from [c] Terracina, by the confines of the kingdome, to Ponte Corno, and Ceperano, and by the confines of Rieti, thorow the country of Tagliacozzo, to Interdoco, and Ciuita Reale, then to Matrice, and thence (by the riuer) to Ascoli, till we come to the mouth of Tronto, the Line heere being directly extended, will containe about an hundred thirty miles in length, or little lesse. By the sea-coasts along the banke and shore, the whole kingdome windeth about, like vnto an Island almost round engirt with water, as towards the middest of the Terrhene Sea, and so on to the Sicilian sea. On the East side, from the Adriaticke sea, and so vnto the North, part of the Ionian sea, so farre as [d] Monte Gargano, or Santo Angelo, and part of the Adriatick bosome, from Gargano to Tronto, the Kingdome extendeth it selfe, and imparteth her boundes with the saide sea: all which circumference, from Offento to Tronto, and in length by the sea-shores, containeth in all 1418. miles, in this manner.

b That part of Italy which is betweene the mouths of Tiber and the Circeians: so called of Latinus In it standeth the Citie of Rome, whereof it is now called Campagna di Roma.

From Terracina to Naples, are eighty two miles. From Naples, to the heade of the gulfe of Policrasto, an hundred fortie seuen miles. From the head of Policrasto to Rhegium in Calabria, an hundred eighty three miles. From Rhegium to the head of Spartinento, so to Capo delle Colonne, now called [e] Lacinium, an hundred and ninety miles. From Capo delle Collona, to Taranto, two hundred miles. From Taranto, to Capo di Leuca, now called Salento, thirtie miles. From Capo di Leuca, to Capo d'Otranto, sixe and twenty miles. From Capo d'Otranto, to Capo S. Angelo, now called Garguno, two hundred two and twentie miles. From Capo S. Angelo, to the vttermost confines, which is the riuer of Tronto, two hundred miles. All which sums in this roundure (by the sea boundes) do make one thousand, foure hundred, and eighteene miles. Whereunto adioyning the foresaid hundred & fiftie miles, which is the space of the Land by measured line, wherewith if wee ioyne to the other part of Italy, from Offento to Tronto, it summeth vp, one thousand fiue hundered sixty eight miles. And this is now (at this day) the dimension or measure of the kingdomes circuit.

The just account or numbering of the miles fromone place to another thorough the kingdome.

e A Promontorie in the furthest part of Italy, deuiding the Ionian and Adriaticke Seas, where Hercules built a Temple to Iuno, and cald it Lacinia.

These following Regions and Prouinces, are contained and embraced within the whole bodie. Latio Nuouo, that is one part, so much as is from the Riuer of Terracina, reaching to Garigliano. For, one part of the true Latio, which anciently extended it selfe so farre as the Riuer [f] Liris, that now adayes is called Garigliano, beginneth from Offento vppon the Terrhene sea. And although in these times, there are three partitions made of all the Regions which lye betweene Teuere, Sabina, the Apennines, and Terracina, and termed by three seuerall names, to witte, Latio, Compagna di Roma, and [g] Maremma: yet notwithstanding, in elder dayes (so farre farre as Garigliano) was called all by one name, to wit, Latio Nuouo, or new Latium. And in this Region the chiefe landes and Cities, are Formella, Fondi, and Gaeta.

Olde Campania, which ſtretcheth from Garigliano, ſo farre as the riuer[h] Sarnus: therein is Naples and Capua, a moſt noble Citty, as well in auncient as moderne times.

Picenum, or where the Picentines inhabite, holdeth on from Sarnus, to the Riuer[i] Silarus, and the moſt famous Cities therein, are Sorrento, Nocera de Pagani, & Salernum.

Lucania, called ſomtimes Sao, containes it ſelf betweene the riuer Silarus, and that called[k] Saprio. And therein the Cities of moſt note are Pontecaſtro & Saleo: in elder times alſo there were Peſtum and Buxentum, and among the mountaines are many Caſtles.

Where the[l] Brutij do liue, it confineth with Lucania, and runneth along the riuer Saprio vppon the Terrhene ſea, ſo farre as the Promontory of Lencopetra, at this day called[m] Capo dell'arme in the Sicilian Sea, where the Apennine Mountaines do end, which beginning at the Alpes, run all along through the midſt of Italy, and the verie toppe ouer the ſaide Cape, is now adayes called by Marriners, Punta di Tarlo, the point of Tarlo. In this part, the moſt principall places are Coſenza, and Rhegium on the Sea, otherwiſe tearmed Iunio, as a difference and diſtinction from that Rhegium which is in Lombardi, ſo named by Lepidus.

[n] Magna Grecia, or Great Grecia, runneth along from Capo dell'arme, turning Northerly towardes the Promontorie of Capo di Spartinento, now called[o] Herculanium, by the Seacoaſt ſo farre as Taranto, where it entreth into the Adriaticke ſea. In it, are Squillace, Taranto, and Cotroni.

The countrey of the[p] Salentines, is on the breaſt of Taranto, ſo farre as Capo di Leuca, now called the Salentine Promontorie. In it are ſcituated Callipolis and Vgento.

Calabria it ſelfe, which hath ſo continued, turneth vnto Capo di Leuca Northward, ſo farre as[q] Brunduſium in the Ionian ſea. The famous Citties therein, are Lecci, Brunduſium, or Brandizzaum, and Hydruntum, now called Otronto. Theſe two Regions (I meane Salentinum & Calabria, which is that part of Land which extendeth towards the Eaſt, betweene the Gulffe of Taranto and the Ionian ſea;) being ioyned together with one name, now adayes termed Terra d'Otronto, was called by our forefathers) Lapigia and[r] Meſſapea. And it is an Iſland round engirte with waters; for from Taranto to Brunduſium, which are vpon the two ſeas, there is not in firme land aboue 35. miles.

Apulia[t] Pucetia, betweene Brunduſium & Offento, vpon the Ionian Gulfe, is now adayes (along the ſea-coaſt) called Terra di Bari, and Louenazzo, & lyeth betweene the ſandy countries.

Capitanato, of plain Apulia, with his extendure betweene Offento and the Riuer called Fortore, paſſeth on, on the Ionian Gulffe, ſo far as Capo S. Angelo, & thence vpon the Adriaticke boſome to Fortore. The places of moſt note, are Salupis,[u] Siporto, and Manfredonia, a new citty builte by King Maufred. It is alſo between Terra Luceria, or Nocera de Saracini, and Canoſa.

Frentani are a people liuing from Fortore to the Riuer[x] Sagrus, or Sagra, now called the bloody riuer, on the Adriatike Gulfe. Chiefe cities therein, are Eſtonni, ſomtime cald Iſtonium, Larino, & Lâciano.

The Peligni dwell betweene the Riuer Sagra, and that called[y] Peſcara, ſometime Aternus. The faireſt citty, between Terra[z] Sulmona, and Pentina on the ſeacoaſt, is Ortano.

The[a] Marucini do inhabite from the riuer of Peſcara, ſo farre as Tronto, the vtmoſt ending of the kingdome, along the ſea-ſhore on the Adriaticke gulfe. There is a Sea-Cittie, which is called Francauilla or[b] Frentana, and a Land-city called Chieti.

Aboue the Marucini, between the land of the Apennines, and where they do take beſt rooting, beginning at the confines of the[c] Peligni, ſo now called, and turning towardes Marca d'Ancona, are three other people in order, to witte, the Veſtini, whoſe Citty was named Pinna, and now called the citty of Penna; the Amterni and Furroni, of whoſe ruines the citie of[d] Aquila was builded, ſome ſmal diſtance off.

With these might bee ranked that of [n] Sicily, an Italian Island, great & wealthy: but that it is an Isle of it selfe, & at this day deuided from the kingdome. Notwithstanding, it did sometime partake in name with the kingdome of Naples. For some Kings, as Fredericke the eleuenth, Manfred his sonne, Charles the first of Anion, and Alphonsus the first of Arragon, possessing both the one and other, wrote their titles both on this side, and beyond [o] Pharos. Of the Principalities in the kingdome

It is alſo to bee noted, that the Title of Prince is greater in this kingdome, then that of Duke. And the Principalities ther are ten in number, to wit, of Aſcoli, of Biſignano, of Euoli, of Melſi, of Molfetta, of Monchercole, of Squillati, of Siegliano, of Sulmona, and of Venoſa.

Of the ſeuerall dukedoms being 23. in number.

Of Earles, Lords, and Barons in their ſeuerall numbers.

There are in like manner, 54. Earles of State, 15. Lords, and 443. entituled Barons. And it is verily ſuppoſed, that in any kingdome of the world, there are not ſo many great Princes and Lordes, as in this, becauſe they are (by nature) of high and lofty courage. And nowe I call to minde, in this matter, that I haue read in ſome Regiſters, bearing date of the yeare 1521. that the Emperor Charles the fifte, ſold many Titles and Lordſhippes in the kingdom, & that many Gentlemen ſold their goodes at ten in the hundred, and bought theſe Lordſhips at three in the hundred.

This kingdome ſo highly ennobled, full of worthy Princes, moſt rich and fertile, as more cannot bee wiſhed; was for long time gouerned by diuers kings. For beſide the Normans, who helde it manie yeares, and (as hath beene ſayde) wonne it the title of a Realme; it fell at length to Fredericke the ſecond, Emperour, who had it of Henry the ſixte his Father: after whom ſucceeded Corrado Emperour, ſon to Fredericke; and after him it came (by reaſon) to Corradino, Nephew to Corrado. But Maufredo the baſtard ſon to Fredericke, feigning that Corrodino was dead vſurped the State, and made himſelf king. But Pope Vrbane the fourth (beeing enemy to Maufredo) excommunicated him, and depriued him of the kingdome: inueſting therein in Anno 1266. Charles the 1. of Aniou, Brother to Lewes the eight, K. of France; who (firſt of all) ſlewe Maufredo, and afterwardes cauſing Corradino to be beheaded, tooke it in full poſſeſſion.

CHAP. IIII.

Of a Law obserued amongst the Rhodians, which enioyned and commanded Fathers (setting aside all other businesse and affayres) to marry their daughters with all possible speed.

Greece the Mother of ancient Lawes.

THere are very fewe people, (in mine opinion) that are ignorant of the Romaine Lawes, which came first forth of Greece, and are continued to this day: surpassing al other nations whatsoeuer, in the actions of Iustice and Policy, and among them haue many Common-weales flourished, not onely in Military and warlike affaires, but also in good manners and policies. Among the rest, that of the Rhodians is to be esteemed; which not onely established great store of Lawes, to render euerie man what belonged to him, & preserue the weaker sort from oppression; but also concerning the marriage of their daughters, becausе no inconuenience should ensue to them, as to too many elsewhere happened. The Law then made for marriage of their daughters, was breefely set downe in these words.

The Rhodians establisht manie good Lawes.

WE command, that a Father doe not torment himselfe one onely day, for the marriage of ten sonnes, if hee should haue so many: but rather to labour and trauayle tenne yeares, for the marriage of one onely daughter, being vertuous. That hee stand in water vp to the mouth; That he sweat great drops of blood, and labor in the ground, drawing like a Horsse; That he do rather disinherit all his Male-children, leaue all his welth and riches to vtter abandoning, yea, and his owne proper life; onely to prouide safetie for his daughters chastity.

The words of the Rhodians written Law, for the marriage of Maides

This Law had bene worthy of obseruation in the countries heereabout, where if it had liued in the like force and vertue; so many famous Families had neuer bin dishonoured, by the shameleſse immodesties of ouer-many maidens, as haue remained to very wofull example. For, it hath bin noted, that Fathers (oftentimes thorow greedy couetousnesse) would not allow Dowries to their daughters, answerable to their meanes and qualitie: in regard whereof, they haue caused them to be forsaken, and not sought vnto by any person. Sometimes also they haue giuen them greater estates then either was conuenient, or stood with their owne power, to the ruine and ouerthrow both of the one and other. Wee haue obserued likewise, some ill aduised fathers, who haue neglected their daughters marriages, being ouer-swayed with affection to theyr sonnes, and bearing no respect at all to their daughters; eyther suffering them to enter too farre into yeares, or else to bee shut vp in Religious houses (by not affording them money meete for Marriage) where all their time they haue liued miserably, and (many times) as vnchastly, and with much lesse honour then they could haue done, if they had remaind at liberty.

A verie great error and iniurie in Fathers towards their daughters.

Fathers that loue their sonnes more then their daughters.

The common Prouerb is, that ther are three things, which if men do them not, they will be done of themselues: And the third of them is, that if men do not marry their daughters, then they wil marry themselues, and oftentimes, to such as are of bad life, or poore, or not agreeing with their owne quality, to the great dishonor of of themselues and their parents. When this doth happen in any Commonwelth, alliances loose themselues, and there is nothing but reproch on the one side and other; whereby (too often) great quarrels do arise, suites in law, and other desperate inconueniences.

Toller them run to seede like herbes vngathered.

To auoyd all which dangers, Fathers ought to be aduertised, that it is not good to keep their daughters too long vnmarried; For as one saieth very well; It is a merchandise, which beeing kept, there is nothing gotten by it. Prouision therefore (in this case) should be made, when theyr daughters begin to enter into their puberty, which is, at 13. yeares of age, or (at the vttermost) at 16. or 18. and to make no longer delaying, if possibly it may be don: for then they are ripe, and ready to yeeld fruite. If they be kept any longer time, for the most part they lose their beautie, and faireſt graces. They affoord (according to common naturall instinct, as well in beasts, as in men, throwing all reason and respect behinde them) their affection to some such, whom their Parents doe not thinke meete and conuenient, and (in the end) worke some taint or blemish vnto their owne modesty. Or if they doe not; by reason of their frequent familiaritie with men, they shall be sure talked of verie strangely, which now adaies is grown so common and reproachfull, that euen the verie chasteſt that liue, haue worke enough to doe, to exempt and cleare themselues, from badde fame and ill reports.

Meete time for marriage in Maids

The manie harmes that do ensue, by the deferring of marrying maidens.

Moreouer we daily behold, that when Parents doe prouide for their daughters, such as are somewhat entred into yeares, they will refuse the men that are thought meete for them, and made offer of to them in good discretion. Alledging that they haue already giuen their liking vnto another, and (as many times it comes to passe) to such a one as is vtter enemie to their house; compelling their parents either to forsake them, without any choise at all, or else (with much sorrow) to consent thereto, onely to auoide the woorst, whereby both Fathers and mothers remaine discontented so long as they liue. These warnings do speake themselues, as well vnto great persons, such as are not onely Emperors, Kings, Princes, and other illustrious bloodes, but also to Plebeians, and men of vsuall ranke, who do stand no more exempt from ill husbanding their children, then the other do, but are euen as ready to faile therein, yea, and many times sooneſt. Which I will approoue by some Histories, deriued from Bandello the Italian, and the Annalles of France.

The folly of some daughters in disliking the Election of theyr parents.

Adelasia, daughter to one of the greateſt and most vertuous Emperors, named Otho, third of that name, that reigned after Charlemaigne, vntill his time, hauing listened vnto many Kings and Princes, who sought his Daughter Adelasia in Marriage, as well for her extraordinarie beautie, as her other excellent Graces, and Royall extraction: yet hee aspiring (as it should seeme) at some greater and more nobler match, or a party of more worth (in his opinion) for his daughter, by means of these delayes, brought incomparable misfortune to his Imperial house which else had flourished in no meane happinesse. Adelasia grew enamored of a young youth, a Sonne to the house of Saxony, and both of them being secretly married, furnished with some small store of money, beside a few Iewels and precious stones; betooke themselues to trauaile, attired and disguised like Pilgrims, Adelasia in the habite of a youth, with full deliberation, to make their abyding in some strange countrey, far enough from Allemaigne.

Alexane, one of the yongeſt sons to the Duke of Saxony.

Thus wandering as fugitiues, to satisfie their owne voluptuous desires: at the length, they were robbed on the Highway, and so by that meanes, were constrained (after long and importunate begging, trauersing manie Countreyes) to retire into a great Forreſt, scituated betweene Asi and * Sauona, in Italy; where (thorough great necessity) they began to exercise the labour of Colliars, enduring many stormes and hard afflictions, for the space of eighteen years together. In the end, it pleased God to be satisfied with their humility & repentance, and to make them better knowne, by the meanes of one of their sons, named William, who following the nature of his extraction, betooke himselfe to make one in the Imperiall Armies in Italy, & greatly resembling in fauour the Emperour Otho, whereby he was imagined to be issued of Adelasia: which being found to fall out true, and the poore retreate of the Colliars (his parents) made knowne, the Emperor pardoned them; & calling them home into Allemaigne, gaue them great and liberall meanes; but much blamed himselfe, that he hadde not marryed his daughter in such time as was fittest for her. The like happened to that far more puissant and great Emperour (his predecessor) Charlemaigne; whose eldest daughter was found paillardising with one named Eginhard, his Secretary, or (as some say) Chauncellour vnto the saide Charlemaigne.

The history of Iudith, daughter to Charles the Bald, king of France.

Some Kings of France haue also bene payed with coine of the same stampe, as well as these fore-named Emperors; witnesse Iudith, daughter to Charls the Bald, second of that name. Her Father refused to giue her in marriage to diuerse young Allemaigne Princes, of great extraction, as Dukes, Marquesses, and others: affecting (much rather) to giue her in wedlocke to a King of England, who had formerly beene an Archbyshop, a man aged sickly, and impotent, with whome she remained eight months only, and without any hope of yssue. Repassing the sea, to returne home into France, she sent vnto Baldwine, Gouernor of the colliars countrey, then termed Pais Charbomieres, but now adayes called the countrey of Flanders, a poore Prouince, wherto no other Lieutenants or Gouernours were giuen by the King, but such as were of smal and slender renowne. This Baldwine had clandestinely promised marriage to Lady Iudith, before shee was sent into England, he being a goodly person, faire and of absolute forme, as many of that country oftentimes are, yet of no great discent, a Gentleman in the midst of many necessities, who surprized her on the seas (she being willing enough to be so taken) & carried her home with him into his gouernment. The King was so displeased heerewith, & that iustly, that he appointed diuers forces to goe punish the rauisher of his daughter, being his owne disloyal subiect. But he was round engirt with so many Wars, as well against his Nephewes, as his Brothers, and the Danes, that he was sodainely enforced to defer his intention for that time, dying not long after, bearing no meane greefe for this rape (with him) to his graue. By means wherof Baldwine & she liued a long while as priuate persons, not hauing any great store of meanes for their maintenance.

Charles the Bald, mollested with many warres, dyed.

Lewes the Stammerer, purposed reuenge vpon Baldwine and Iudith.

Lewes the stammerer, successor & brother to Charls the Bald, as much offended as the father of Iudith, persisted in resolution to punish these two louers. Neuertheless, by the humble entreaties made vnto him by diuers worthy Church-men, of holy life & vnstaind fame, beside diuers other great personages of his kingdome, (who deliuered liuely representation to him of the yong yeares wherin they then were, subiect to the prouocations of nature, who hath not alwayes reason for her guide, and laying the blame on hir deceased father, that would not admit her to marry, when she was so sought and sued vnto:) he pardoned them, giuing vnto his Neece Iudith and her heires, the country and Forrest of the Colliers, whereof Baldwine had formerly bin Gouernor; yet afterward depriued, & thus restored. And albeit it was a matter of small moment in these times; yet he reserued the homage thereof to the crowne of France, which homage the kings of France successiuely enioyed, vntil the taking of king Frances, first of that name, who quitted the foueraignty therof to Charles the fift, and Emperor. At this day it is a goodly & wealthy country, populous; hauing great store of faire Cities and Towns, and greatly merchandized; in regard of the sea, and diuers faire riuers which adorne the Prouince. But let vs nowe see, if Gentlemen haue stoode free from this disaster, more then Emperors and Kings haue done; it shall not be amisse therefore to alledge some, as well of Italy, as of France.

At what time the countrey of Flanders was brought to yeelde homage vnto France.

The great difference from former times, in the condition of Flanders.

In Verona, a famous City of Italy, liued a yong Gentlewoman, named Iulietta, of the noble house of the Montesches, or Montacutes. Her father being not willing that she should marry, when both the decency of time, and aptnesse of her yeares made tender of themselues: therefore (in her faireſt flower) shee espoused her selfe, vnknown to her parents, to a gentlemans son of another house and family, cald, the Capelets, whose name was Romeo, and the Capelets were mortall enemies vnto the Montesches or Montacutes. This mariage sorted vnto the lamentable death of both the louers, as you shall briefly hear in this manner. They being secretly maried, and by the hand of a Cordelier or Franciſcan Friar, a man moſt expert in the ſecrets of nature, who tooke great compaſſion on their earneſt reciprocal affection & dayly torments between them indured: it happned on a certain day, that an vncle to Iulietta, in regard of the inuetred hatred between both the families, drew vppon Romeo, who (defending his owne body) ſlew the ſaid Vnckle, whereupon he was baniſhed, or inforced (at the leaſt) to be abſent from Verona. The wofull Gentlewoman hauing made her moane vnto the honeſt minded Friar, vnder the ſhaddow of confeſsion, concerning the irkſom abſence of her beſt eſteemed friend; he gaue her aduice to receiue a little potion when ſhee went to bed, which ſhould cauſe her to ſleep for more then 30. houres, ſo that ſhe ſhold be verily ſuppoſed to be dead. She boldly aduentured on his counſel, & her parents imagining her to be dead indeed cauſed her to be buried in the Tombe or vault belonging to the houſe of her predeceſſors. From thence the Friar purpoſed to fetch her, at a certaine houre of the night, & to conduct her (in the habit of a Nouice) to baniſhed Romeo, who liued in the land of another iuriſdiction, yet no far diſtance from the city. All this was poſsible & eaſy to be performed, for it was and is a common cuſtome there, not to burie deceaſed bodies in graues, as it is obſerued among vs, but in Grottes or vaulted caues. While theſe things were framing themſelues according to premeditated purpoſe; it fortuned that a ſeruant belonging to Romeo came to Verona, to bring Letters of recommendation to Iulietta, & being returned back to his maſter, reported the certaine tidings of her death, and that himſelfe was preſent at her interring. Romeo, confounded with greefe & extremity of paſſions, found the meanes (in a diſguiſed habit) before the ſhutting vp of Verona gates, to enter the city. In the dead time of night alſo hee compaſſed his intent, entering the Church with a lighted Torch in his hand, hauing opened the doores by the help of his ſeruant, and alſo the tombe wherein ſhe lay incloſed. Hauing commanded the abſence of his ſeruant, he entred into the vault, & after kiſſes infinitly beſtowed by him on Iulietta, whom he verily conceited to be dead, he dranke a moſt deadly poyſon, which hee had formerly bought of a very needie Apothecary, and which immediately fel to operation, ſo ſlept hee (for euer) by the body of Iulietta. After her drinke hadde wrought his full power, ſhe awaked; and by meanes of the burning Torch perceyued her Romeo to bee quite dead: whereat enraged with greef, and ſnatching a ponyard that hung at his girdle, ſhe preſently there ſlewe her ſelfe. The honeſt Fryar came, and (as he thought) at ſuch a conuenient houre, when Iulietta ſhold awake from her artificiall ſleepe, that truely repreſented the ſhape of death: but when he beheld that tragicke wofull ſpectacle, let his ſorrow be cenſured bythem of beſt iudgement. On the morrow after, the death of theſe two Louers was diſcouered, and all matters rehearſed by Fryar Laurence, for ſo was the Cordelier nam'd. All which mournfull diſaſter happened, becauſe Iuliettaes father would not ſuffer her to marry when reaſon required. Now I will declare another French Hiſtorie, which happened within the compaſſe of mine owne memory.

Damoiſelle Geneuiefue, Daughter vnto Monſieur Megrelin, a Gentleman in ordinary in the Court of King Frances the 2. eſpouſed her ſelfe by word onely, & without knowledg of any in hir fathers houſe, to one that was Schoolemaſter vnto her brethren, named Medard, a Piccard by nation, borne in Laon, a yong man of paſſable handſomnes, and of indifferent knowledge for his time, being abour 23. yeares old. She found her ſelfe to be conceiued with child, and fearing the diſpleaſure of her mother more then the frowns of her father, becauſe ſhe was a very ſeuere woman, forſooke her Fathers houſe, and the goodly city of Paris, accompanied vvith none but her troth-plighted husband the ſchoolemaſter. Trauailing thorow the countrey, they made their ſtay in a great Borrough town of Champaign, where likewiſe he becam ſchoolmaſter, taking great paines to ſupply their neceſsities. Within ſom few months after their reſiding ther, Medard dyed; and ſhe fiue dayes after the death of her husband, one Euening after ſupper, in a publike place, declared to all ſuch as gaue fauour to heare her, the whol Hiſtorie of their fore-paſſed Loue, her marriage by promiſe, her extraction, want of gouernement, and the iniurie done done by her to her seruants, desiring (very heartily) pardon both of God and thē. So, feigning as if she intended to goe to bed with her young infant, which was about six weekes old; shee went and hanged her selfe that night, on a beame end of a poore Cottage, which they had taken vpon hire; of which mishap, the people of the Towne soon aduertised her parents. For mine owne part, in the same manner as I haue set it downe, it was reported to me by the forenamed Monsieur Megrelin, who made no small account of my friendship, and dyed with verie great greefe; often saying vnto many, that this misfortune thus fell vnto him, by refusing his daughters marriage with a yong Aduocate, one of sufficient wealth, and that had requested her many times to bee his wife, which still hee denied, intending to bestow her on a Gentleman.

The death of her Father.

The history of Paulo and Lucrecia, two Roman louers

In the Citty of Rome, no long while since, there was a young maiden (named Lucrecia, daughter to a rich Marchant) secretly espousd to a yong man, called Paulo, sonne also to another Merchant, the two fathers beeing vowed enemies, and both alike enuious of each others Fortune. The father of Paulo perceiuing how fast aged yeares came stealing on him, determined a marriage for his son, acquainting him therewith, that he hadde made choise of one meete for him, commaunding him also to fashion himself to good liking thereof, because hee would haue it accomplished within very few dayes. The sonne deferred it off so long as vvell hee could; yet to declare some obedience to his father, hee craued respite to consider thereof: but in the mean while, it was generally noised thorow the City of Rome, that Paulo must be married vnto another. These newes comming vnto the eares of Lucrecia, she dissembled her inward conceyued displeasure, verily imagining the matter to bee already done. Paulo comming, as oftentimes he did when fit time fauoured him, to visit his Lucrecia in the night time, so iocond and merry as at no time more; after accustomed kindnesses passed betweene them, Paulo fell into a very sound sleep. Lucrecia beholding him in that fearlesse estate, with a great Knife she gaue him so many stabbes and deepe wounds, both in the brest and belly, that he fell downe starke dead, and afterward committed the like violence on her selfe. This act, so full of sorrow and sadde mischance, came to the eare of Pope Paulus the fourth, who would not allow them to haue Christian burial. But a learned diuine, a Iacobine by Religion, made so excellent an Oration to the Pope, agaynst the vnkinde parents of the deceased Louers; that Obsequies were granted, & buriall giuen them. And an aged woman, a seruant to Lucrecia, who had beene the meanes of their priuate marriage, was (by authority of Iustice) burned aliue, because she had not aduertised the parents thereof.

Another marriage purposed for Paulo by his Father.

Lucrecia, a Daughter of Rome, slewe both her husband and her selfe.

If these Emperors, Kings, Gentlemen and those of meaner condition, had obserued the Law of the Rhodians, which I haue alledged in the beginning of this chapter; they neuer had falne into those dreadfull mischeefes, which theyr owne wilfull folly brought vpon them. They may also serue as a good warning to Fathers at this instant, and such as shall bee heereafter, how to auoyde so enorme an error. I will giue aduice likewise to such Maidens, as hauing past the age of fiue and twenty yeares, if either auarice, or any other bad humor in their parents doe make them negligent of their marriages, when men of meet match and quality are offered to them, to be bold of their owne liking and choise in marriage; prouided, that they first make it knowne vnto theyr parents. And then if they will not yeeld consent, they may proceed on further: alwayes prouided, that they are equall in quality, and no way infamous. And least their Fathers should disinherit them, the Emperor ordained thus in the authentical rule; Sed si post. C. de inofficiosa testa. The like ordinance is to bee found in the French Code, in the chapter of clādestine Marriages, made by king Henry the second. And there may bee noted another inconuenience, which vnaduised fathers do incurre themselues, that in due time, and vppon iust reason, will not yeelde to theyr daughters marriages.

How all these dangers might haue bin preuented in all the alledged histories.

CHAP. V.

That Tyrants do liue continually in feares: and that their ends are most miserable.

Tyrants at all times and in all places are full of feares.

THE life of a Tyrant is full of hatred; euery man detesteth him; all are offended at him, and he is subiect to infinite perils. What was the life of Aristippus, to whom the very walles were dreadfull? What that of Alexander Pheræus, who liued in an hourely suspition of his owne wife? What that of Dyonisius the Syracusane, who neuer durst trust his Barber, for feare least in trimming his beard, hee should cutte his throat. Hee had the carnall knowledge but of two women onely, Aristomada and Dorida, and yet he would neuer let them come neere him, vntill they had put off all their garments. The Chamber wherein he vsed to sleepe, was round engirt with a wide deepe ditch, and there was no entrance to it, but onely by a draw-bridge.

Tyranny is the Nurse of feares. Cicero in Tusc. lib. 5.

All things whatsoeuer, are continually suspected so much by Tyrants, that it was not spoken without good aduice; That Tyranny is the Nurse of feare. For it commonly cometh so to passe, that such as liue till men feare them, doe also feare them by whom they are feared. This kinde of life, so full of care and dread, Dyonisius the Tyrant discouered to his Oratour Damocles, of whom the History followeth in this manner.

The History of Dyonisius the Tyrant, & his flatterer Damocles.

Damocles defending in an Oration, which hee deliuered in the presence of king Dyonisius; that neuer was any man more happy then he, for his inumerable wealth & treasures, beside the abundance of all things in his kingdome. O Damocles (instantly said the Tyrant) seeing my life is so well liked by thee, I desire that thou wouldst presently but taste and experiment my fortune. Whereto Damocles consenting, the Syracusane king caused him to sitte vpon a stately & sumptuous bed, richly embroydered with gold: and before him stood Tables and Stooles in magnificent manner, all couered with vessels of Gold and Siluer. He was serued by many young children, endued with singular beauty, & the seruice was extraordinarily magnificient, with all kindes of delicious and exquisite viands. The golden Hall, which glistered round about him, was perfumed with vnguents of excellent odors, beside Flowers, Chaplets, and curious Nosegayes. To be short, in this so triumphant and royall furnishment, Damocles helde such a proud, enflated, and swolne vp countenance, euen as if in Maiesty Royall: King Dyonisius called to him, and bad him lift vp his head, to behold what was instantly ouer it. There he shewed him a fayre bright Sword, which he had caused to be fastened to the plancher, directly ouer the head of Damocles. He seeing the naked Sword, which hung but by one haire of a horses maine, ready to fall on the least occasion; considering thereon with deliberation, and perceiuing that death was his present companion; he began to dispraise the royalty and riches of the King, desiring to bee deliuered from that kinde of felicity.

Damocles in all his pompe and pride was dismated with a sudaē sight.

Heereupon Dyonisius said vnto him, Doest thou not see, O Damocles, how greatly thou art deceiued in thine owne opinion? Such is our life, which (not long since) thou heldst to be so happy: but now thou plainly perceiuest, that eminent death is alwayes attending. By which example we may easily iudge, that he can neuer be happy, that is daily afflicted with feare. To this purpose Horace writ these verses.

Dyonisius his words to Damocles.

Not the fine fare of Sicily,
Will sauour sweet and daintily,
Nor the rare sound of the Lyre,
Nor the sweet Birdes in their quire:
All these affoord no pleasure can,
To that wofull wretched man,
That beholds aboue his head,
A naked Sword to strike him dead.

Verses translated out of Horace.

And as Iob saith, The sound of feare and dreadful affrights is alwaies in his eares: and although peace be certaine, yet is hee daily doubtfull of close ambushes. Tyrants loue not any body, and therefore (vpon iust occasion) learned men tearmed them to be cruell beasts, and plagues to mankinde. In the human figure of whō is so much sauage cruelty, that Salomon saide directly; A wicked Prince is a roaring Lyon, and an hunger-starued Beare ouer poore people.

And

And yet God hath and ſometimes doth permit, that Tyrants ſhall reigne, for the chaſtiſement of wicked men, ſaying; I wil take vengeance on mine enemies by mine enemies. God (ſaith Iob) maketh the hipocriticall man to reigne, in regard of the peoples ſinnes. And in Hoſea God ſpeaketh thus: I will giue thee a king in my fury. And in Eſay; Aſſhur is the rod and ſtaffe of my fury, I will ſend thee to a deceitfull people. Neuertheleſſe, they are not acceptable to God, who throwes them at length into the fire, as a father doth the rod, when he hath therewith beaten his childe. And it hath alwaies ſo falne out, that all theſe Tyrants, or the moſt part of thē, haue ended their liues miſerably, & oftentimes by violent death, cauſed by their owne friends; and approoued by conſent of all the people. But becauſe the examples of tragicall endes in ſuch Tyrants, are handled in a number of other Treatiſes, & experience hath made it daily manifeſt vnto vs; I may the ſooner conclude this Chapter.

CHAP. VI.

A moſt horrible cruelty vſed by the Numantines againſt the Romanes; and in the end vpon themſelues.

SCipio hauing continued ſiedge before the Citty of Numantia in Spaine, the ſpace of a yeare and ſeuen Moneths, and neuer ceaſſing: munition and victuals began to fayle among the beſiedged, ſo that very many died with famine. Wherupon they made a vow to the Gods, that the firſt morſell they would eate euery day, ſhould be the fleſh of ſome Romane: and that they would drinke neyther wine nor water, till they had ſwallowed the blood of ſuch as they ſlew.

Extremities are the occaſion of deſperate vowes & promiſes.

The Numantines hauing all ſworne to this vow, they iſſued foorth of the Citty, and like men, more then deſperate, chaſed the Romanes, euen as if they had beene brute beaſts: and ſuch as they ſlew or ſurprized, immediately they killed and broyled inhumanely, or being ſliced in peeces, they ſolde thē by weight in the Shambles or Butchery. So that a Romane taken by them, or ſlaine, was of farre greater price and eſtimation, then to liue and pay his ranſome. Finally, the Numantines perceiuing, that they had no more meanes of ſupportation, beeing oppreſſed with famine, and encloſed on euery ſide: they conſulted among themſelues to kill all their aged people; yea, all the women & children in the Citty; which (without any feare or reſpect at all) they put in execution.

Extremity ſtill waiteth vpon extremity, and begetteth daily worſe and worſe courſes.

When they had done thus, all the wealth and mooueables of the Citty, the Iewels & Treaſures of the Temples, were broght together in ſpacious places, & there conſumed with fire, yea, and all parts & quarters of the Citty, without leauing a houſe ſtanding, ſuffered the very ſame conſummation; and euery man tooke a ſudden & ſpeedy diſpatching poyſon, whereby they might the ſooneſt dye. Thus the Temples, houſes, goods, and perſons of the Numantines, which had continued in proſperity foure hundred, ſixty & ſixe yeares, had finall concluſion all in one day. A ſight moſt horrible it was to behold, that the Numantines did thoſe things liuing, ſo full of gaſtly terror, and not be remooued from them at their houre of death. For they left not to Scipio, any goods as booty or pillage, nor ſo much as a man liuing, for a Trophee or Triumph.

The proſperity of 466 yeares conſumed all in one day.

Scipio ſeeing Numantia flaming, and afterward entring thereinto, beheld all the buildings demoliſhed, and turned one vpon another, all the Inhabitants burned; he grieued very greatly, and being vnable to containe himſelfe from teares, cryed out thus: O moſt happy Numantia, to whom the Gods appointed, that thou ſhouldſt rather remaine deſtroyed, then conquered! Numa Pompillius, king of the Romans, cauſed this Citty of Numantia to be builded, & Scipio the Romane, being aged then but two and twenty yeares, ſaw the ruine of it.

CHAP. VII.

That a valiant Generall or Captaine, ought firſt to embrace wiſedome & prouidence, before he do make experiment of his fortune: and alſo that after victory, he ſhold be milde and pittifull.

TO be a Captain or Generall, is an Office very honorable, but yet attended by by many dangers. For notwithstanding he shall performe but what hee may and ought, yet if misfortune be present in giuing the battaile, and returne him off with out victory; hee shall neuer satisfie the vulgar, but the people will hold him in bad reputation, although it value his life in the aduenture. Let euery man bee of what quality and wisedome hee may, or would wish to be, & vse the best carriage he can possibly deuise; yet we shall neuer heare a conquered Captaine called wise, or him temerarious, that gets the victory. It is a good thing that Captaines should be wise, but yet much better to be fortunate.

The saying of Scipio Affricanus.

Scipio Affricanus vsed to say; That all things ought to bee essayed in warre, before they lay any hand to weapons. And (in truth) he saide well, because there is no greater victory in the world, then that which is wonne without effusion of blood. Cicero writing to Attica, saith; That the Captaine which conquers his enemies by councell, ought to be no lesse esteemed, then hee that did it by the sword. Silla, Tiberius, Caligula, and Nero, they neuer knew any other course, but to command, and kill: whereas contrariwise, Augustus, Titus, and Traiane knew no better way, then to entreate fairely and pardon, so that by pardoning, they conquered more, then the other could do by bloody fighting. If Captaines would but consider these things, perhaps they wold not be so ready, in opposing their Armies to such multiplicity of dangers: whence oftentimes ensueth, that in thinking to be reuenged on their enemies, they (in the ende) become vanquished themselues.

Cicero ad Attic.

A great difference in mens natures.

Theodosius the Emperour, when hee besiedged any Citty, he would not suffer his Souldiers to erect any scaling Engines, or make any battery, vntill ten daies were fully past: during which time, hee offered no offence to the Cittizens, but daily admonished them, saying. I grant ye the tearme of ten daies, wherein yee may preuaile with mee by fauour and mildnesse, rather then hazard the triall of my power. When great Alexander saw the dead body of Darius: Iulius Cæsar the head of Pōpey; when Marcellus burned Siracusa, and Scipio beheld Numantia flaming; and in our later times, when that heroycall Emanuell Philebert, Duke of Sauoye, & Prince of Piedmont, beheld the illustrious & magnanimous Prince Frances of Burbon, Duke of Anguien, lying dead vpon the ground at the taking of S. Quintins: All these great persons could not refraine from teares, although the other were their deadly enemies. For albeit their generous soules were well satisfied with obtayning victory, yet notwithstanding, such great and weighty losses did much discontent them, considering their cases might haue beene the like.

A noble mind in the Emperour Theodosius.

A signe of a most honorable dispositiō in such Generalles.

Pitty and clemency neuer lost the victory in warre; but on the contrary, the Captaine bloodily minded, cruell, and reuendgefull, hath eyther beene slaine by the enemy, or betrayed by his owne followers. Therefore it was not without great reason, that Iulius Cæsar carried immortall renowne among all Princes and Captaines of the world, not for beeing more faire, more strong, more couragious, and fortunate; but onely because far greater was the number of enemies, to whom he frankly affoorded pardon, then those that hee had vanquished and slew with the sword. The famous Captaine Narses, who subdued the Gothes, vanquished the Bactrians, and domineered ouer the Allemaignes, neuer vndertooke a daies fight against an enemy, but the night before, hee kneeled and wept to himselfe in the Temple. Trogus Pompeius recordeth, that the most signale victories of the Romanes, were not wonne in regard that their Armies were mighty and strong; but because their Captaines were dexterious, actiue, and gallant, in all seruices they vndertooke.

The reason why Iulius Cæsar was so highly renowned.

He was Generall to the Emperour Iustinian.

It is expedient also, that the Generall or Captaine (aboue all other things) should be vigilant, & procure, that among the Captaines of his Army; affaires (concerning warre) should be kept secret: because the highest enterprizes neuer can haue good successe, when they are discouered before they can be effected. Suetonius declareth, that it was neuer heard said to Iulius Cæsar; Must wee do this to day, or shall we do that to morrow? Only he would answer; Doe this instantly, & to morrow wee shall see what is then to bee done. Plutarch writeth in his Moralles, that Lucius Metellus beeingrequested by one of his Captaines, to know on what day he would giue the battaile; made him this this anſwer. If I wiſt that my ſhirt knew the leaſt thought of the things my hart intendeth, I would immediately burne it. It is wel done to conſult on matters of war with many: but the reſolution of them is not, neyther ought to bee imparted but to very few; otherwiſe, they may bee publiſhed before they are fully concluded. And eſpeciall care is to be taken, that no conſultation be had with ſuch men, as are eyther obſtinate in their councels, or raſh and headſtrong in their actions: for in caſes which happen ſometime in war, it is leſſe harme to retire, then run wilfully on loſſe.

Alcibiades, a valiant Captaine among the Grecians, vſed to ſay: Men of magnanimity and courage, ſhould ſometimes rather flye then tarry; becauſe honour commands attendance, and wiſedome wils flight. For in greateſt perils, it is better that men ſhould ſubmit themſelues to reaſon; then that they ſhould be commanded by fortune. A Captaine ought to be councelled in all things, except when he meetes with a dãger not foreſeene. For many Captaines at diuers times in warre, haue loſt themſelues by no other occaſion: but becauſe at ſuch time as they ſhould haue brought to effect ſome notable deed, which admitted not the leaſt minutes trifling; they ſtood then muſing, & idely called a councell to no purpoſe. It is neceſſary alſo, that a wiſe Captaine, after he hath obtained a victory, ſhould vnderſtand how to vſe and enioy it. For if Hannibal, on the day at Cannas, could haue told how to haue vſed his fortune, Scipio the Affricane had neuer conquered him.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Salique Law, the originall thereof, and who were the firſt Authors and Inuenters of it.

See a Tract written by Iohn Ferald, and I.C. theron.

IN the time of Pope Boniface, the firſt of that name, and of the Emperor Honorius, in An. 420. the Franconians hauing forſaken their Country, came to inhabite along the Riuer of Rheine, which hauing paſſed, they remained for ſome time at Treues. Now as theſe people were of barbarous manners, liuing vnciuilly & without law; Pharamond their firſt king, Son vnto their Duke Marcomir, choſe foure cheefe and principal men of the Sicambrians, who by their councel and determination, might giue a law to the people. The names of thoſe foure men, were Vzucaſt, Lozocaſt, Salgaſt, and Viſogaſt, who by authority of the king and people, ſet downe a Law in writing, which Pharamond approoued and publiſhed, cauſing it to bee called Salique; eyther by the name of the place Salethani, wher it was made, as ſome ſay, or elſe by the name of the ſaid Salgaſt, who was Chauncellor to Pharamond, and cheefe of the foure.

How the Law came to be called Salique.

This Law contained the forme of ſucceeding in the kingdome of France, & the manner of reigning; and it hath euer ſince bin obſerued by the kings of France, and their people vntill this preſent. Among other articles therein contained, women are declared vnable to rule the kingdome, and depriued of ſucceſſion to the crowne, although they are the ſole & only daughters to the King: nor can they haue any portion of inheritance in the Gallician Lands, but onely vſe and profites by the owners conſent, implying neceſſarily, that after their deaths, thoſe allowances returne to the Crowne againe. And this Law is conformable to the Roman Law, cald Voconia, which was made at the time betweene the ſecond & laſt war of the Romanes with the Carthagenians, and which was pronounced by Voconius, Tribune of the people. And Aulus Gellius ſaith, that there is nothing more profitable to the common-wealth, then the ſaid law, which debouteth women from ſucceſſion; which Tit. Liuius ſaith, Marcus Cato (a graue mã) perſwaded in an Oration made by him.

And althogh it may be ſaid concerning this Law, that it containeth no equity, becauſe it toucheth the ſucceſſion of priuate perſons: yet on the behalfe of the kingdome, for which it was ordayned, it is iuſt and reaſonable, and by diſpoſition of womens right, they ought not there to ſucceed in the kingdome, nor rights of the crowne, except there be ſome priuiledge or cuſtome to the contrary. So noteth Iohn de Imola, on the Chapter Grandi, tit. de ſimplici neglegen. prela. to the ſixt. And for this was made the tenth chapter, Qui feoda poſſ. ſſ. hoc autem. C. dilecti, de arb.

This Law containeth no equitie for women.

Baldus

Baldus is of the ſame opinion, ſpeaking expreſſely concerning the kingdome of France, and ſaying, that the king of England, Sonne to one of the daughters of France, in regard of this law, might not pretend any right to the Crowne, and ſaith, it is cleare and certaine, as hee quoteth on the firſt law. ff. de Sena. And as I haue formerly ſaide, it hath euermore bin ſo obſerued and held in France.

Baldus in Leg. de Sena.

The ſucceſſion in the Crowne of France, after the death of Lewes Hutin, in a continued deſcent.

For example, when Lewes Hutin deceaſed, he left one daughter, wife to the Count d'Eureux: Philip le long, his Brother, ſucceeded him, (neuertheleſſe) as well in the Crowne, as in all the Landes thereto belonging. And after the death of Philip le long, although hee left foure daughters; yet Charles le Bel (his brother) ſucceeded him, as well in the Crowne, as other inheritances. And after the deceaſe of Charles le Bel, notwithſtanding hee left one daughter, named Blanche, wife to Philip, Duke of Orleance, his couſin: yet Philip de Valois ſucceeded him. In like maner, after the death of king Charles the eight, Lewes Duke of Orleance, his couſin ſucceeded him, before Madame Anne of France, his Siſter, wife vnto the Duke of Bourbon, and this was king Lewes the 12. who although (by his deceaſe) he left two daughters, Claude and Reree: yet neuertheſſe, Frances Duke of Valois and of Angouleſme, the very neereſt in the line collaterall and maſculine, ſucceeded him as well in the Crowne, as alſo in the Dukedome of Orleance, albeit the ſaide Lewes the twelfth, Charles his Father, and Lewes Duke of Orleance his Grandfather, had held the Dukedome of Orleance, by the gift and inheritance which Charles the 5. had made to the ſaid Lewes, Duke of Orleance his Sonne.

Coucerning ſuch lands as are once vnited and incorporated to the Crowne of France.

For right and iuſtice requireth, that all Lands which are once vnited and incorporated to the Crowne of France, ſhall be of the proper nature, quality and condition as the ſame Crowne is; as well in regard of ſucceſſions and acquiſitions, as other cauſes. For at all times, and as often as a Land is vnited to the Crowne, it taketh the nature of the kingdome, and muſt be gouerned in all things, according to the conditions thereof. For the kingdome is an vniuerſall thing, which comprehendeth many other in particular: as it is ſaid in the Law Peculium. ff. de Legatÿ.

And not onely the Salique Law is kept in France, but alſo it is found in many ſtatutes in Italy, and elſewhere, prohibiting women to ſucceed, which is done, ſaith the Text of the Law, * Fauore agnationis conſeruandæ, vt dignitas familiarum ſalua ſit. And Baldus ſaith, that a woman is not the head or Prince of the Family, but the ende thereof.

* Lib. 1. ff. vi public. ff. de ventre inſpic.

Paulus de Caſtro, on the Law Maritus. C. de procur. ſaith, that the linage and family beginneth in the males, and is conſerued by the males. And ſo it ſeemeth, that the Etimologie of the word Soror declareth, which Labeo Antiſtius giueth in Aulus Gellius. Soror appellata eſt quod quaſi ſeorſum naſcitur ſeparatúrque ab ea domo in qua nata eſt, & in aliam familiam tranſgreditur. That is to ſay. A ſiſter is ſo called, as ſhe that is borne almoſt apart by herſelfe, and is ſeparated from the houſe wherein ſhee was borne, and changing the place, goeth to dwell in another family.

Examples of ſome Letters contayning ſecrecie, and ſent in ſuch manner, as they might not be knowne, but onely to ſuch whom they eſpecially concerned.

A Letter ſent in the belly of a Hare.

HArpagus writing to Cyrus, concerning the treaſon of King Aſtiages, hauing cunningly vnbowelled a Hare, put his Letter therein, and after hee had ingeniouſly ſowed it vp againe, deliuered it (with the Hayes or Nets) to one of his Huntſmen, the faithfulleſt of all his houſhold, and hee carried it to king Cyrus.

Writing on the skull-skin of the head.

Hyſtyæus, deſirous to write to Ariſtagoras, did ſhaue the head of one that was his truſtieſt ſeruant, and wrote vpon the skull-skinne what hee would, containing three or foure Carracters, and afterward kept him in his houſe, vntill the haire was growne ouer as thicke as before, and then he ſent him to Ariſtagoras, willing that he ſhould cauſe him to be ſhauen againe, ſo ſoone as he was come vnto him, and ſo he vnderſtood the others minde.

Aulus Gellius reporteth, that Iulius Cæſar

How Iulius Cæsar wrote his Letters of especiall intelligence.

Cæsar sometimes sent him Missiues, when he had any vrgent occasion, and to some peculiar places: and in them were letters formed onely, without any sillables annexed to them. So that when they were lookt on and questioned, no word could be collected to any purpose, but by himselfe, and him to whom they were intended, being a mute and secret inuention, yet familiar to such as vnderstood them.

Frontinus in lib. 3. cap 13.

Many (saith Frontinus) being desirous in actions of warre, to send their letters missiue secretly, to haue their inuentions known, and yet to auoide all meanes of discouery, haue written within the Scabbards of their Swords, and sent them as acceptable presents whereby they haue cleanly escaped.

Small Tablets of wood couered with Waxe.

Demaratus desiring to make knowne to the Lacedemonians, how king Xerxes was armed and prepared for his iourney against Greece; did write the councell of the king in small Tablets of wood, which he couered ouer with waxe, and in that manner sent them to the Lacedemonians, who taking off the waxe, read all the contents there written.

The cunning of Hirtius in conueighing his Letters.

Hirtius the Consull sent letters written vpon Lead (but not knowne how to be read, being intercepted) to Marke Anthony, besiedged at Modena; they were carried by an honest Soldiour, who wore them as bracelets about his wrists, & with them swom ouer the Riuer Scultena. The same Hirtius likewise tyed letters about the necks of certaine Doues, which hee kept close lockt vp in a conuenient place, where no light was to bee seene, neyther did he giue them any food; that when he should let them loose neere to the walles of the Citty (as easily he could doe) they being greedy of light and food, might mount aloft vpon the houses, where beeing taken by Brutus, and by the meanes of food, purposely appointed there for thē, he vnderstood what he desired.

A Letter sent into the enemies Campe by an arrow.

Paradine, in his history of our times, writeth, that when as Rhodes was besiedged by the Turke, a traytour named Friar Andrew de Merail, a knight of Portugall, making a shew of carefull looking to the Watch; shot a letter (bound about an Arrow) into the enemies Campe, wherby he gaue them aduertisement, in what estate the Citty stood.

Frontinus in lib. 3. cap. 13.

Frontinus hath many other examples of secret Letters, in matters of loue, of which I will relate two only, remembred by Aeneas Syluius Picholiui Pope Pius the second. Pachorus a young man (saieth he) sent a loue-letter in a Nosegay of Violets to Lucretia, whom hee dearely affected. And finding no successe, wrapt another in a pellet of waxe, which he couered as a snow-ball, and so threw it in at his Mistresses Window.

CHAP. X.

A Discourse concerning the originall of the Normanes, what valiant actes haue bin performed by them: and of Robert Guiscardo.

THE Normanes are anciently descended of the Gothes, and vsurped that great half-Island, somtimes called Dania, and since Dacia: whereby the kings of that Prouince, were named kings of the Danes, and of the Gothes. They had a custome, that the kingdome came to the eldest Sonne, and therefore sent the other Sonnes to seeke their fortune. It came so to passe, that Lutrocus their king (who was not a Christian) hauing two Sonnes; according to the precedent custome, sent the youngest named Biergostus, out of the kingdome, albeit he loued him very dearely, and therefore cōmitted the care of him to a Gentleman of his Court, named Astengus, to whom he gaue in charge, that he should furnish him with a troope of valiant men.

Vide Sabellicus Ennead. 9. cap. 2.

Biergostus sent to seeke his fortunes abroad.

An indifferent Army beeing giuen him, they came vppon the confines of France, and entring Picardy, possessed thēselues of most of the Townes and Bourroughs, burnt Saint Quintins and Noyon, and for the space of forty yeares, did infinite harmes to the Realme of France. For after that Biergostus was dead, they elected (as their cheefe Commander & Captaine) a very valiant and gallant Knight, called Rollo, who made three Campes, which entered France on three seuerall sides: the one mounted vp the Riuer of Seyne; the other along the Riuer of Loyre; and the third by the Riuer of Gerunda, sometime called Garona at Bourdeaux, and so so scattred thēselues throughout France, rauaging and burning whereſoeuer they came. Which being perceiued by Charles the third of that name, and called the simple king of France, and knowing also, that he had no meanes to resist them; he treated a peace betweene Rollo and him, by the Arch-Bishop of Roane, named Franquon, which was concluded neere to the Riuer of Epta, the King being on the one side of the Riuer, and Rollo on the other. Therein was an appointment made, that Charles should giue his Daughter, named Giletta, in mariage to Rollo, to whom he assigned as her Dowry, and an inheritance for the children borne in this mariage, and not otherwise, the Province of * Neustria, which Rollo caused afterward to be called Nortemania, which signifieth a Northerne people. For Nort (in the Dacian tongue) is as much to say as North, and man implieth Homo, so interpreted of it selfe, from whence, by a corrupt kinde of speech afterward, it was called Normandie.

A peace made betweene Rollo and Charles the Simple.

* That which is now called Normandie.

The king created that Country to be a Dukedome, and gaue his Daughter in marriage to the said Rollo, as formerly it was concluded, yet with this condition, that Rollo should become a Christian: whereto he condiscending, he was baptized in the yeare 900 and 12. & by Franquon, Arch-Bishop of Roane, beeing then named Robert, by Robert, Count of Poictiers, who was Godfather to him at the Font. And by the example of Rollo, all the Normans that were Pagans, caused themselues to be baptized; which caused Duke Robert to do homage to king Charles, for the Country of Neustria, then conuerted to be Normandy.

Rollo is baptized and named Robdert, marying with the daughter of King Charles.

Historians doe report a pleasant and ridiculous acte, which Rollo did on the day when hee came to performe his homage to the king, for some aduised him to kisse the feete of his Maiesty, according to a custome in that case obserued. But hee disdayning to fall on his knees, tooke the kings foot, lifting it vp to reach his mouth, and so ouer-high, that the king fell backward from off his seate. Wherat the Normanes fell into a great laughter; but the French were offended and vexed, taking this behauiour in very ill manner. Neuertheless, this deed was imputed to simplicity, because Rollo, in making his excuse, auouched, that such kinde of kissing the foote, had beene an ancient custome in his Country. About a yeare after, Rollo seeing himselfe peaceably possessed of all Normandy, repudiated his wife Giletta, & put her to a pittifull kinde of death, not hauing any childe by her, in which respect as well by right of forfeiture, as by other conditions contracted in the marriage, without all question, the Country and Dukedome should haue returned to the Crowne of France again, as at the first.

Duke Robert performed his homage in homely manner.

The Duke diuorced his Wife, and put her to death.

Long time before Rolla became a Christian, hee had carnall knowledge of the Daughter to Berengarius, Earle of Beaunais, she beeing named Pompeia, by whom he had a Sonne called William, that afterward was tearmed Long-Sword. Hee being borne in vnlawfull and sinfull copulation, out of marriage, and the acte committed by a Christian with a Pagane, was consequently disabled from succeeding in the Dukedome. But howsoeuer it came to passe, the Normanes finding thēselues so strong and dreadfull; possessed this William of the Dukedome, and the kings of France were enforced (by reason of hauing so slender meanes in those times) to endure and suffer all. So that the Successors of Rollo or Robert, enioyed still that Country, though by corruption of faith, and no true tytle thereunto.

William Long-sword the bastard sonne to Rollo, became his successour in his Dukedome.

Of this William came Richard, sirnamed Long-shankes; and of that Richard a second Richard; and of this second Richard a third Richard; who was Father to Robert, that was Father to William the Bastard, which conquered England. Whereby it very plainly appeareth, that of the fore-named Rollo or Robert, the Dukes of Normandy, and three Kings of England receiued originall.

The line and succession from Willam Long-sword.

Three Englishe Kings of the Normans race.

Now concerning Richard, the Sonne to William, Sonne to Rollo or Robert, hee had two Sonnes, the one named Robert, and the other Richard also, who beeing desirous of glory and fame, went into Sicily with great troopes of men, and there they made war successefully many yeares together. These two brethren beeing dead, the Normanes beeing then in pay to the Duke of Salerne; made choise of a new cheefe Commaunder or Captaine named Tristam Cistello, who hauing slaine a Serpent, and beeing in-infected with her poyson, dyed thereof. After him succeeded Raymond, and some other (afterward) elected for their Captaine, William Ferrabach, Sonne to Tancred, Comte de haute ville, who had twelue Sonnes, to wit, Darno, Godfrey, Drogon, Tancred, William, called Ferrabach, that is to say, Armestrong, Haufrey, Robert, firnamed Guiscardo, Roger, Pictard, Godfrey the second, or younger, Frumentino, and Mulloger.

Tancred with his twelue Sonnes, continued among the Normanes in the exercise of Armes, and Michael Catalaitus, Emperour of Constantinople, held then by vsurpation Pouilla and Calabria, vnder the gouernment of Malocco, one of his Captaines, and Lieutenant for him in those Countries. Some other places also were inuaded by the Sarrazins, who possessed Sicily, continually molesting the saide kingdome. The valiant and generous William, being created Captaine of the Normanes, made a league with the Princes of Capua and Salerne, and also with Malocco, Lieutenant to the Emperour. All these passed together (with their Armies) into Sicily against the Sarrazins, and hauing vanquished and expelled them thence, diuided the prize equally among them. But Malocco surrendred the lands of that Isle to those Gouernors which the Emperour had sent thither before the warre. Whereat William being offended, yet dissembling his anger and intentions, marched with his Army towards Pouilla, where hee possessed himselfe of many places, and entring Melphes, there strongly fortefied himselfe.

When Malocco heard these newes, he departed from Sicily, and suddenly went with his Army to Melphes; but William being come foorth of the Towne, gaue such a valiant assault vpon Malocco, that killing the better part of his followers, & chasing him from the greatest iurisdictions of Ponilla; hee fully enioyed it, and made himselfe Earle thereof. After the death of William, Drogon his Brother obtained the Seigneury of Pauilla, and being a man of great valiancy, as also very well experienced in Arms, fought three times in one day against the Grecians, and ouercame them, encreasing his Countries daily more and more.

About seuen yeares after, Drogon died, and Haufrey or Hunfroy his Brother succeeded; and after him, Godfrey, who left Balegard his Sonne successor in the Earledome. But Robert being a most valiant young man, displeased that his Brother Godfrey had not left the place to him after his death; expulsed his Nephew by force of Armes, and so helde the Countries of Pauilla and Calabria; annexing also Troy thereto, which (till that time) had continued subiect to the Romanes. This is that Robert, who for his excellent spirit & witty prouidence, was firnamed Guiscardo, which in the Norman Language, signifieth ingenious and cunning: although some others say, that such a firname signifieth errant and wandering, because the Normanes went wandering thorough many Countries. Afterward in the time of Pope Nicholas, second of that name, hee was created the first Duke of Calabria, & of Pouilla, in the yeare one thousand and sixty.

Robert expelleth his Nephew Bagelard.

The valiant Robert, firnamed Guiscardo Duke of Pouilla and Calabria.

In the ende, Robert hauing by his prowesse, and with his Brethrens helpe, wonne (in eighteene yeares) the whole Isle of Sicily, and many other Regions in Italy; fought moreouer to make himselfe Emperour of Constantinople, for which he leuied a mighty Army, and fought with the Venetian and Imperiall Armies twice, and vanquished them. But being retired to Cassiopolis, a Promontory in the Isle of Corfue, and there surprized with a most violent Feauer, hee finished his dayes in that place, in the Moneth of Iuly, in the yeare one thousand, eighty two, hauing liued gloriously (and won many victories) for the space of threescore yeares.

Robert sought to make himselfe Emperor of Constantinople.

This most noble Family of the Normane Guiscardoes, had a lamentable ending, in the yeare one thousand, one hundred, ninety fiue, in William, whom the Emperour Henry the sixt caused to bee guelded, to the ende hee should haue no ability of producing any more issue by him. And moreouer, he made him to lose the sight of his eyes, by Basons extremely heated, which hee constrayned him to looke vpon so long, vntill the reuerberation of the heat, had vtterly depriued him of sight. This impiety, and more then barbarous cruelty, did the Emperour vse vnto him; because none of that race (afterward) should hinder his enioying the kingdome of Sicily.

CHAP. XI.

Of two young youthes of Paris, that trauailed to the Indiaes, to cure themſelues of the Neapolitane diſeaſe, or French Pox.

The Chapter heere mentioned, is inſerted hereafter.

Anthony du Verdier, Lord of Vaupriuaz, in his Booke of diuers Readings, hath well deſcribed the originall of the Neopolitane diſeaſe, otherwiſe called the great pox, & how it was brought from the Countries of the new found world, diſcouered firſt by Columbus, in thoſe Iſlands which the Indians call Haity, and Quiſqueia. And as this diſeaſe is very familiar in thoſe lands; ſo is the remedy therof alſo found there, by the meanes of a wood, called Guyaicū, whereof there are diuers Foreſts, and by the vſe thereof it is eaſily healed. Many people in theſe parts, who haue read the fore-named Chapter, haue highly contraried it: eſpecially ſuch as haue had, and yet at this preſent, do finde no eaſe thereby, albeit they haue drunk euery morning and euening of that decoction, hauing afterward ſoundly ſweated twice a yeare, in thoſe two temperate ſeaſons, the Spring time, and fall of the leafe, nay moreouer, haue drunke no other drinke (with their meate, and without) for a whole yeare together.

From whence firſt came the Neapolitane diſeaſe.

Contradiction made againſt that Chapter.

The authors iuſtification of Verdier.

Many haue bin deceiued in the Guyaicum heere ſolde.

For mine owne part, I dare maintaine, that the ſaid Lord of Vaupriuaz, hath ſaid nothing but the truth, and if the greater part of ſicke perſons, infected with that diſeaſe, haue found no remedy by the wood; the fault is in ſuch as ſell it, & haue not wel ordered it, not hauing knowledge what kinde of Guyaicum ſhould be vſed, nor the place, nor the climate, nor by whom it is brought thence, being ignorantly perſwaded, that there is but one kinde thereof onely, againſt the opinion of ſome that will meddle with preſcriptions, not hauing bin in the country where this wood naturally groweth. Wherefore I purpoſe to make good what I write, by a hiſtory of two Pariſian youths, who were healed by the vſe of Guyaicum; not ſuch as is brought hither to vs, and how it hapned, I will ſet downe the whole diſcourſe.

The Author ſpeaketh this Hiſtory of his owne knowledge.

I being at Paris, in the yeare 1563. I had great familiarity with the two youths, being both borne in the Citty, of good and worthy houſes; but I conceale their names, by reaſon of their infection with that veneriall contagion, it beeing moſt commonly taken by diſhoneſt dealing with leud women, and ſo by conſequent, carrieth ſhame with it. This ſicknes they concealed ſo long as they could, but in the end, it made it ſelfe to be knowne, by loſſe of their haire, by red puſhes appearing in the fore-head, by aches in the bones, both of their armes, legs, thighes, and ſhoulders, as alſo in the former part of their heads, from the beginning of night, till break of day the next morning, with other ſuch like ſignes; as paine in the throate, being ſcarſely able to ſwallow any food. Now, albeit that all theſe euidences are not ſeene, in all ſuch perſons as are touched with that diſeaſe: yet it plainly appeared, that in both theſe young bodies, all the fore-named teſtimonies, and many more beſide (which I let ſleepe in ſilence) were apparantly noted.

Outward apparances of that wicked diſeaſe, wherby beſt note of the ſicknes is obſerued.

In regard of theſe rehearſed accidents, which were ſo manifeſt, the Parents to them both had intelligence, that they were touched with this diſeaſe; and yet for more certaine aſſurance therein, they cauſed them to bee viſited by very skilfull Phyſitions and Chyrurgions, who performed all that which arte could permit, and yet they were not able, neither could they cure them. A ſecond time, other Phyſitions were called to this buſineſſe, who applyed likewiſe the vttermoſt of their knowledge; but all in vaine, and the diſeaſe it ſelfe grew worſe and worſe, riſing into knots and tophies in the foremoſt part of the head, and in the bones of the armes, thighes, and legs, they procured inſupportable nightly paines. For when night drew neere, and all the time while it continued, they cried and complained inceſſantly, ſo that the neighbors (on all ſides) heard their pittifull lamentations, by meanes whereof, their bodies became wholly dried vp.

Helpe ſought for to skilfull Phyſitions & Chyrurgions.

A ſecond attempt by phyſicke, but preuailing like the firſt.

the diſeaſe. For theſe two young men came nothing neere to one another in conſanguinity, but were of diuers temperatures and complexions. For the one was delicate, ſoft, merry, whitiſh, and of tender diſpoſition: but the other was of blackiſh coulor, ſtrong, hardy, and many times addicted to penſiueneſſe. Neuertheleſſe, contrary to the common order of nature, and all the Apiomes in the arte of Phyſicke; their diſeaſes ſeemed conformable, which neuer hapneth to other perſons, offended with the ſame contagion, becauſe ſome haue accidents farre different and contrary to other. Heereupon the Phyſitions referred the cauſe of this diſeaſe (ſimpathizing ſo directly, yet in ſuch different bodies) to the venome of ſome paillardizing women, that had infected them.

The iudgement of the Phyſitions concerning their diſeaſe.

The young men giuen ouer, as no way to be cured.

But to make ſhort, after theſe youthes had endured much extremity of paines & anguiſh, as well by Phyſitions and Chirurgions, as Empericks that had charge of them: the harme had extended ſo farre in expences, and no meane heart-greeuing of the Parents, al which notwithſtanding, they were giuen ouer as incurable, & becauſe there was no likely-hood of theyr healths recouery, they daily deſired the ſeizure of death. Matters ſtanding in this lamentable eſtate, God tooke compaſſion on them and their Parents, becauſe they were deuout perſons, & gaue almes very liberally to the poore daily, preſenting them remedy in this manner. The Lord of Chantonnay, a Gentleman of Burgundy, and of the Franche Comte, was ſent (by the King of Spaine) Ambaſſadour to Charles the ninth, King of France, who ordinarily made his reſiding at Paris. This Ambaſſadour was lodged directly ouer againſt the houſe, to one of the Fathers of the ſicke yong men, and both their chambers being outward, on the ſtreetes ſide; it cauſed the ſaid Lord Ambaſſadour (who was none of the ſleepieſt men) to heare the greeuous moanings, which the poore ſickly Neapolitan continually made, whervpon hee entreated his Hoſte to informe him, whence proceeded thoſe wofull lamentations, thus nightly made by the ſick young man. His Hoſte hauing tolde him nothing but the truth, the Ambaſſadour wrought ſo by his Hoſte, that hee might come to ſee the ſickly youth; which accordingly he did, in the company of his Mother.

The Lord of Chantonnay, well vnderſtanding whence the diſeaſe proceeded, & thoſe nocturnall heauy greeuings, ſaid, that he had ſeen many in diuers Prouinces, as in Bourgundy, Germany, Flanders, Italy, & Spaine, afflicted with the ſelfeſame ſickneſſe; and notwithſtanding all curious and carefull attending, yet they could not any way be cured, but onely by going to the Indiaes. For inſtance hereof, he called for his Secretary, who preſently came thither, and had (as wel as his Lord) paſſed the voyage, therefore hee was the better able to confirme his ſpeeches, and related at large, how euery thing happened.

Cure obtayned by going to the Indies

The Mother to the ſicke youth, after ſhe had thanked the Lord Ambaſſadour for his aduice, withdrew herſelfe, and acquainted her husband (who was Maſter of the * Chamber of Accounts) with all that the Lord of Chantonnay had ſaid vnto her. He being a very learned and wiſe Gentleman, conferred further (concerning this matter) with the Secretary to the ſaid Lord Ambaſſadour; whom hee found to be a man of good iudgement, & one that had paſt through the Pikes, as we vſe to tearme it.

* The Exchequer or Chequer Chamber.

The Sonne to the Maſter of the Accounts, imparted this matter vnto his ſickly Companion, who aduertiſed his Mother alſo therof, and ſhe her husband, who was a Merchant trading in ſilkes, and furniſhed the houſe of the Queene, Catherine de Medicis, then Regent in France; and heereupon both the Fathers conferred together. In breefe, they concluded to hazard their Sons in the performance of this voyage, perſwading themſelues, that ſeeing they reputed to bee incurable; it might ſo fall out, that changing the ayre of the climate, and by their paſſage vnder the * Equator, vnder which, ſuch as ſayle, doe oftentimes become ſicke, and dye in the voyage, making the Sea their graue, as the moſt part doe, of them that aduenture to the Indiaes, to which fortune they freely committed their Sons. But if it came to paſſe, that they might there be cured, as diuers others formerly had beene; they ſtood bound in the greater thankfulneſſe to God. For they being daily in their ſight ſo diſeaſed, to their no little diſcontentment and ſhame, beſide the charges attending thereon; they could not determine on any eſtate for them, neyther make mention for their marriage, the reaſon of their ſickneſſe being ſo noyſed quite through the Citty of Paris. Thus theſe two Fathers reſolued to ſend their Sonnes to the Indiaes, eyther for their vtter loſſe, or healthfull recouery.

A ſtrange reſolution in two Fathers.

Now becauſe it was not lawfull for any to paſſe thither, without permiſſion from the King of Spaine; Queene Mother, vnderſtanding by her Mercer (Father to one of the ſicke youthes) the purpoſed voyage of his Sonne; wrote vnto her Daughter, then Queene of Spaine, for her aſſiſtance to the poore paſſengers, to fauour them with Paſſe-ports, and recommendations vnto the Kings Lieutenants in the Indian Countries, to ſuch as were Captaines of the Seas, and other. Being aſſiſted by two men, who had formerly voyaged both by Land and Sea, and peace being accorded with the Proteſtants and Catholiques, they trauailed to Spaine, and there preſented their Letters.

No paſſage to the Indiaes, without the King of Spains permiſſion.

The arriuall of the young men in Spain

The Queene immediately ſollicited their licence and diſpatch: but firſt they were viſited, to know whether they were Spyes or no. For it was no long time before, that the Spaniards had ſlaine all the French, which were to be found in that part of Breſile, called by the Tonoueinambouts, ſaying, that all the Indiues appertained to them, by due right granted to them by the Pope. When they were found to bee diſeaſed perſons, they were diſcharged, and going on to the Port of Sinill, fortune was ſo fauourable to them, that there they found a Fleet of Shippes, ready charged with men of warre & Merchandizes, bound alſo for that part of the Indiaes, whereto theſe ſicke men intended to go; which was the Iſlands of Haity and of Quiſqueia, named by Columbus, Hiſpaniola, and afterward the Iſle of Saint Dominico.

All the Frech in Breſile ſlaine by the Spaniards.

Good fortune in ſo great neceſſity.

They went aboord a Merchants Ship, hauing agreed for threeſcore Ducates, both for their paſſage thither, and their returne backe againe. The voyage ſucceeded ſo well, that although it contayned aboue eighteene hundred leagues by land; yet within two Moneths, they arriued there, landing in the Iſle of S. Dominico, where the Vice-Roy lay. To him they preſented their Letters of fauour and recommendations, who gaue charge to a Gentleman of his Court, to ſee that the young men and their company ſhould be kindely entreated, ſending them vnto Phyſitions, that remained there in the Country at the Kings pay. But they thought it more conuenient for them to paſſe thence to another Iſland, which was called Saint Iohn de Porterico, where the women there dwelling, were verye skilfull in curing that malady, and when they were come thither, thus it ſucceeded to them.

Their remouing to the Iſle of S. Iohn de Porterico.

First, the Gouernour of the Iſland, by commaundement giuen him from the Vice-Roy of the Indiaes, lodged the young men ſo well as hee could in that ſauage Country: which was in a Lodging made with paliſadoes, or a wall of Pales, which beeing but badly ioyned together, was filled vp with bundles of leaues.

The Roofe conſiſted of leaues of Trees, ſo were their Beds alſo, and in ſtead of Feathers, they were filled with Cotten: their Sheetes being of plaine Fuſtian, and all their vtenſilles of wood, or of earth.

Their ordinary feeding was on Cow-fleſh ſomewhat tender, of great Serpents roaſted, which ſerued highly to their healing, and alſo on ſtrong Tortuiſes, as great as an indifferent Porket.

Their ordinary viands in the Iſle of S. Iohn.

Their bread was Biſcuit, and is much better in that Country, then elſewhere; for within the ſpace of foure and twenty houres, it will grow mouldy, and if it be eaten hot, it is indigeſtible. But howſoeuer it were, the Spaniards gaue them courage, not to greeue themſelues, and brought a Muſitian vnto them to delight them, whoſe Inſtrument was made of the bone of a mans thigh. They likewiſe ſent a woman to attend them, that made little or no account of them; but tolde them, ſo ſoone as they were cured, ſhe did aſſure herſelfe, that they would very well content her.

The kindneſſe of the Spaniards to them.

This Woman ſo affrighted our young Pariſians, that they could verye willingly there haue dyed, as neuer hoping of any helpe by her meanes. For ſhe went ſtarke naked, her skin being of an Oliue-coulour; flat noſed, like to a little dog: her breaſts hung dangling downe, like to the dugs of an olde Sow. Her head was ſhorne cloſe before, but behinde, the hayre hanged ſo low as her heeles, all friſled, and like to the tayle of ſome ill-fauoured Cow. The nayles of her hands and feete, exceeded halfe a fingers length, and were bowing crooked. She had no haire where nature commonly affordeth, neyther in her arme-pits; and her teeth looked of a hew betweene red & yellow, long, cleare, and wide enough aſunder. At each of her eares hung a Stone of violet coulor, the leaſt of them weighing aboue two ounces: her vpper lip was ſlit in the midſt, in the top whereof ſtood another ſtone of grayiſh coulor, and thence paſſed her ſpettle continually. All the other parts of her body were round & fat, and in indifferent faſhion, ſweete, faire, & affable enough for a ſauage creature.

Such a ſight could be ſcarcely pleaſing to ſickneſſe, and in a place ſo deſert and vncouth.

This woman prepared a drinke, which ſhe made of the little loppings of a yong Guyaicum tree, hauing firſt bruiſed them betweene her goodly teeth, thẽ afterward ſhe boyled thẽ in an earthen veſſell, without any thing to couer it, and contrary to all courſes obſerued in our Countries. This drinke ſhe cauſed them euery morning to take, each of them to the quantity of a * Paris Chopine, at two or three draughts. Then they muſt walke a while, exerciſe Fencing, or ſome other cheerefull ſtirring of their bodies; or elſe trauell to a Mine of gold, which was not far off frõ the Village, ſo to weare out the ſpace of two houres. Then returning backe againe to the houſe, all ſweaty, they would change onely their ſhirts; and going to dinner, they muſt drinke of no other water, but of a much-troubled ſtanding Poole, wherein was nothing but raine-water. The Spaniards would offer them Gallypands or Cocks of India, which they did eate ſodden for the moſt part. But after they had bene vſed to it eight or ten dayes; they could eate Toads, Serpents, and Lizards euen as well as other, and found them very ſauory meate; beſide diuers kindes of fruites, the like whereof hath neuer bene ſeene in theſe parts. About three houres in the euening, they muſt drinke as much of the Guyaicum, as they did in the morning, and vſe the ſame exerciſes. And without any other ceremony, remedy, or deuiſes vſed to them, they found themſelues to bee throughly healed, iuſt within the ſpace of ſix weeks: onely their gums excepted, which were become ſwolne and enflamed. But they were made ſound, with a ſharpe-pointed bone of a Fiſh, by pricking and piercing them therewith in many places, and they thus healed, were perfectly recouered. The knots and bumps on their bones, vaniſhed away, all their nightly afflictions ceaſſed wholly within fifteene daies: appetite came afreſh tó them both, and their haire being loſt, was reſtored againe in more firmer manner then before. And now there remained, not ſo much as the print of any puſh or blaine, eyther in their fore-heads, or on their breaſts, likewiſe all vlcers which they had in their ſecret parts, dried vp and were gone.

The young men were cured in the ſpace of ſixe weekes, and their former ſtrength perfectly recouered.

They perceiuing themſelues to be thorowly cured, were willing to content the woman with golden coyne, as hoping they did well therein: and this they did, by the aduice of a cunning crafty Spaniard, relegated to that place, and to worke in the Mines. He very well knew, that the Indians, making no account of Gold or Monie; purpoſed to begge it of her, not doubting but eaſily ſhe wold giue it him. But it fell out farre otherwiſe, for ſhee refuſed the Gold, and would by no meanes touch it, but ran into the houſe, and took a Bow and Arrowes, intending to kill them, but that they fledde away from her. Perceiuing this, they called another Spaniard, who had alwayes made ſignes of amity towards them, and cauſed him to ſpeake to the woman, becauſe they vnderſtood not her language. Conference by ſignes hauing paſt betweene them, the Spaniard learned of her, that ſhee would be payed in ſome ſmall wares or trifles. They not knowing where they ſhould ſo prouide themſelues, the Spaniard tolde them, that there dwelt a man in the Village, who made profeſſion of ſelling ſuch things; and of him, for the value of two Ducates (which amount heere but to twenty Solz) they bought theſe following trinkets. Six very bigge Combes, ſix little kniues, ſold for a Sol a peece in Paris, with their ſheathes, ſix ſmall looking-glaſſes, a dozen of points, ſixe needles, a glaſſe ſpoone, & a dozen of Ballads. She presently sung a Song, after her countrey manner, made them a Feast, wherin were serued foure small Guinny hennes boyled, two Toads very fat, vnbowelled and roasted. They dranke a Beuerage, made of Turky wheate, passable enough. And afterward, she gaue them halfe a dozen of Bowes, and some store of Arrowes, to beare away with them homeward; beside she gaue to each of them, fiue Hand-kerchers of Cotton, properly made.

The Sauage womans thankfulnesse to the two young men.

They returned thence to the Island of Saint Dominico, where they presented themselues vnto the Vice-roy, who was most ioyfull to see them recouered; and there they remained one moneth more, not feeling any sickenesse by the change of ayre, or of the climate, whereat each one greatly meruailed. In this time, the Merchants made them ready for their return, and some bands of soldiers, who went to refresh themselues in Spaine. Being entred their ship, within two other months they arriued happily in the Port of Siuill. Thence they went to Madrille, humblie to thanke the Queene, who gaue them Letters and Passe-portes, for their more secure arriuing in France. Being come to Paris, they were most louingly entertayned by their parents and friends, who did conceale their voyage and sickenesse, so much as in them lay.

It was my hap to finde them there, and to me they reuealed the whol aduenture, euen in such maner as I haue set it down; to the end, that such as fall into the like inconuenience, & being forsaken of Physitians heere, may trauaile for their recouery, as these two yong men did. At this day they are prouided of great and honorable Offices, the one being officer for the Finances, and the other a worthie Commander in Armes, hauing performed many signal seruices, in the last wars of the vnion to his Maiesty. And becaus this Chapter should not seeme ouerlong: I will heereunto adde another Discourse, concerning the Tree of Guyaicum, which healed these two young Parisians.

CHAP. XII.

Why there is not found so much vertue in the Guyaicum that is brought hither, as in that whereof the Indians themselues do make vse, against the Neapolitane disease, and the description thereof.

AS God hath beene, is, and euer-more declareth himselfe to bee good & mercifull, knowing the inhabitantes of the whole Countrie of India fore-named, to be naturally subiect to this infection of the Pox; so hath he giuen them the Tree of Guyaicum, by the meanes whereof they can cure themselues, which they attayned vnto, onely by experience; for they haue not anie knowledge of Letters. The Spaniardes which had conquered those countreyes, hauing co-habited carnally with the naturall Women there abiding; receyued from them this disease. For at certaine seasons, this malady possesseth the Indians; as Fellons or VVhitlawes, and Feauers do seize on vs. And hauing perceyued that they recouered themselues by Guyaicum, our Merchants brought some of it hither; which in the beginning, rotted of it selfe, by reason they brought thence the very youngest: which to preuent, they brought then of the oldest that in regard of his solidity could not rotte or perish. And our Physitians (by their own report) appointed the receipt of that, to such as (in these parts) were so infected; but to little effect; for beside the breuage or drinke made thereof, they fayled in annointing (oftentimes) the diseased body, with hotte Oyntments, compounded with Quick-siluer, wherby some of good habitude, perceiued themselues to be cured, and others not.

Now, by that which I coulde gather, from the discourse of these tvvo young Parisians, the olde Guyaicum, vvhich is brought hither to vs, is of the grosse trunk and strong bodie of the Tree, that hath no vertue against the disease, neyther doe the Indians any way vse it. And our deceiued Physitians, appoint the receipt of this this blacke Guyaicum, which is of those great trunkes, and call it, the heart of Guyaicum. They also perswade themselues that there are two kindes of Guyaicum, to wit, one that is wholly blacke, and the other nothing blacke at all. Neuertheless, they are both of one tree, insomuch as that which hath no blackness, is of the branches, and euermore the oldest, albeit they take it for the yongest. These young Parisians, beeing of good and apprehensiue spirits, did well perceyue, that that which men brought hither to vs, had very little power or efficacy: for they had made many diets, without receyuing the least ease thereby.

Trial of Guyaicum by the Parisians experience both heere, and in India.

But the other of India, which was yong, somewhat tender, hauing hardly attained to two yeares growing, and no higher thē the stature of a man, did heale very easily. For in the making thereof, there would bee selte and perceiued, a very delicate and Grape-like gumme, pleasing vnto the heart, which is not to bee found in that made heere among vs. And they concluded, that the drineſſe and coldneſſe of the trunkes of the trees, then which there is no other brought to vs, is the only cause, why such an irkesome disease cannot bee cured.

Some vertue in the olde Guyaicum, & how it is to be applyed in that il disease.

Yet do I not inferre heereby, but that the aged Guyaicum brought hither to vs, hath some power and vertue: as in preparing the bodie (to receiue the vnguents fit for the disease) that is of a cold or melancholly nature, and hauing made vse thereof eight or ten dayes, then to take the Vnguents. Or else, when one is supposed to haue that sickneſſe, and there remaineth paines or aches in some parts of the body, or some Vlcer is feared: some haue beene obserued, that by the vse of this old Guyaicum, within three weekes they haue appeared to be found. Some also haue beene sore afflicted, yea, diuers times left in deploreable condition; yet hauing made vse hereof for a year or two, as in their ordinary drink, and their bread commixed with a decoction of Guyacum, and their meate boyled in like manner, they haue bene cured, and (among other) an Atturney of the Parliament at Rouen: but this is very rare and extreamly painfull.

Some forsaken, yet soundly cured by the olde Guyaicum.

The voyage to the Indiaes seemeth not so dolorous, nor yet so greatly chargeable: for these two young Parisians, of whome wee made mention in our precedent Chapter, it cost but three hundred Crownes betweene them, yet each had a man of honor with him, and a groome or seruant to attend them both.

The Parisians charges in their voyage.

The decoction of the Guyaicum which is heere among vs, doth not serue onely for the Pox, or those offended therewith, but likewise for all persons ouer-abounding in moysture, or that haue diseases caused by some cold humors. Also for such as haue opilations in the Liuer, Spleene, and other of the bowels, causing them to sweate after the receite. Many haue found great comfort and ease also thereby; as some touched with palsies; others that haue had swolne legs; others with vlcers subiect to certaine times; and defluxions, deafnes, catarrhes, rheumes, and other imbecillities, they haue found themselues thereby to be released. But people offended with hectique Feauers, must keepe themselues from any way vsing it. I will now describe the forme of this Tree.

Concerning the decoction of Guyaicum, and how it auaileth for diuers other diseases beside the pox

A Description of the tree called Guyaicum according to the diligent paines of the Author

The Tree of Guyaicum is great and grosse, as are the Oakes in these our countries, hauing the Barke or Rinde of blackish coullor, thicke, gummy, and fat. The wood thereof is much harder then Ibony, and the rinde separateth it selfe very easily from the trunke, when it is dry. The Leaues doe appeare like those of Plantaine, but they are much lesse, and more hard. It beareth a yellow flower, and the fruite is as big as a Nut, hauing within it stones, like to those of a Medlar: no vse hath beene made of the fruite, so farre as I can learne, and yet there must needs be some vertue in them. Thus you perceiue what I know, and haue vnderstood, concerning the Wood called Guyaicum, in the vertue whereof, many heere among vs haue found themselues to be deceiued; by thinking that it had the selfe-same faculties, as that which is young and tender, and found in the Indiaes.

CHAP. XIII.

From whence it proceedeth, that Graine or Corne is not so long time preserued in our Countries, as it hath beene, and still is in Egypt. Also in what maner our Lands and Vines should be corrected and qualified, without dunging. With many remedies, for the preseruing of our Corn from corruption, and being eaten with diuers kinds of Vermines.

Coniectures concerning the long Keeping of Corn in Egypt.

SOme haue supposed, that such seuerall kinds of corn as were kept for the space of fifteene daies, or thereabout (safe and soundly) in the royall Granaries of Egypt, by the aduice of Ioseph, to prouide agaynst the dearth of Graine, which should for seuen yeares after follow, according as he Prophetically foretold; came to passe as by matter of miracle, and extraordinarily. I must needs confesse, that there was there both great abundance, and as great sterrility of Corne, in the seuen consecutiue yeares, and all thorow the extraordinary power of God. But for the conseruation of them, it is a matter ordinary to Egypt, that Corne should be kept there fiue and twenty yeares in pure goodnes, yea much longer time. Alwayes prouided, that it bee not transported from place to place, and be not made subiect to any heating: neither that it should bee eaten by anie Vermines, as many times our Corne is heere in our Countreyes, and the cause thereof I will declare vnto ye.

The Grain or Corne of Egypt may bee kept sound 25 yeares and more.

The reason why our Corn cannot be preserued for any long time.

The reason for it, is, that the Egyptians neuer vsed to fatten their groundes, but contented themselues with such manurage, as the soyle it selfe, and Nylus ouerflowing them, onely affoorded: neuer vsing any dung, as heere we do, neyther Vrines, Leystals, and other excrements of beasts, which is the onely cause, vvhy our Graine cannot be preserued; but is subiect to Wormes, VVeeuilles, Mites, and other small creatures, that doe great harme thereto, whereby it yeeldeth no sauoury taste, neither can bee kepte in goodnesse for any long time. Hippocrates seemeth to be of the same opinion; affirming, that such as vse breade made of Corne, which any dunged ground hath yeelded, they cannot liue so healthfully, neither so long a time, as others, feeding on the contrary. Hip. in l. 5. c. 17.

Lands that are dunged, doe not yeeld such plenty of Corne, nor so sauoury, as others.

Some one may say vnto me, thē what shall we do in these countreyes, where if our fieldes be not manured and dunged, the Land will yeelde nothing, or (at the best) very little? Is it not apparant euery where amongst vs? That there are verie good meanes whereby to franke and fatten grounds, with other things then dung and filth, Hesiodus plainly enstructeth vs; for in his Booke of Husbandry, he sayth: There is nothing better, to cherish & fatten a leane and meager Land, then the strong straw of * Lapines, the chaffe of Chiches, of Beanes, of Tares, Lentilles, and other such like, vtterly reiecting all vse of dung, which many haue charged with blamefull imputations. Hesiod. in lib de Agricult cap. 5.

*A kinde of Pulse, so called

Of this opinion also, Lieband appeareth to bee, in his Booke called Maison Rustique, or the Countrey Farme, where he saith; Insted of dung, they may vse the straw of Lupines, hackt or cut small: Or else to sowe the ground with Lupines, and other Pulses, and afterward when they beginne to grow, to labour then the land ouer and ouer, and this will serue for dung, much better then that of any beast. Lieband in 4. lib. de Maison Rustique, cap. 10

Another maner of manuring ground, by Heath, Broome, Bryars, &c.

There is mention also made, of another kind of manuring the ground, which is not so good as the precedent, alledged by Hesiodus; but approaching somewhat neere it, as thus. To cut some store of Heath, Broome, Briars, and Thorns, and all other kinds of shrubbes that haue bushy stalkes, or vnder-woods, and then to couer all those Lands therewith, which are intended to be sowen: there let these seuerall matters ly drying about the space of ten or twelue dayes, or longer time if neede require it. Then in the night time, let them bee set on fire, and so carefully tended, that they may bee altogether reduced into ashes, by kindling the fire stil where it would not fasten. Afterward, let those grounds be Tilled after one maner onely, and then sowed and couered. This kinde of Husbandry wil cause great quantity of Corne, which the poore make vse of in many places, where they haue no Cattle:

Cattle: and it cauſeth the earth to yeeld a great moyſt graine, which is not ſubiect to corruption.

How the Egyptians doe manure their grounds that are not neere to Nylus.

Here it is to be remembred, that where I ſay in Egypt, the grounds are not manured: I meane none but thoſe that lye along the current of Nylus, on eyther ſide three or foure Leagues in largeneſſe, or little leſſe on either ſide. But in other parts, as in the mountaine countreyes, they manure their Lands, though they be greatly fruitfull: yet not with dung, but with ſtraw of diuers Pulſes, according as I haue formerly ſayd. Howbeit they haue great Heards of Oxen, and Flockes of Sheepe, alſo their fields are almoſt couered with flights of Pigeons, which after their owne manner) manure the grounds, and it is verie excellent good in that Nature.

Dungs doe engender many wa[illegible]e and vnwholſome hearbes by ſmothering the earth, rather then nouriſhing it.

As for the dungs heere in our Countreyes, they are very laborious to bee made: for ſome dung muſt lye rotting a whole yeare together, before it can bee well imployed. And then it is (oftentimes) full of ſeedes of wilde or ſauage Hearbes, which fall into the Hay, that beaſts of labour eate, and ſo paſſe thorow in their excrements vndigeſted, or elſe are found among the ſtrawe, whereof they make their litter. Whereby enſueth, that the earth (oftentimes) produceth more ſtore of bad Hearbes and VVeeds, then of good Corne, becauſe they take away his true vertue of nouriture, and do meerely ſmother it.

Knowledge in the diuerſitie of dungs, & for their good neſſe or badneſſe.

Beſide all theſe things fore-named, eſpeciall care is to be hadde, in knowing what dungs are good or bad; and for certaine groundes, and for ſome peculiar ſeeds. For Horſſe-dung will ſerue well in one place; that of Oxen and Kine in another; and likewiſe thoſe of other Cattle, Sheepe, Goates, Swine, Pigeons, and others beſide. It may not be forgotten alſo that ſome grounds are to bee fattened in certaine quarters of the Moone, and others in other ſeaſons: which is not any way to be obſerued, in thoſe other kindes of manuring, whereof I haue formerly written.

Concerning the husbandrie fit for Vines.

Heere I muſt not ouer-paſſe, to write ſomewhat concerning the husbanding of Vines, which ſome vſe to dung, albeit to much leſſe purpoſe, then grounds bearing Corne. As about Paris, in the lower Lymoſine; about Lymoges, and elſe-where. The dooing heereof is a great deale leſſe tollerable, becauſe it is a matter very difficult, that a ground nouriſhed and made fat with dung; ſhould not ſtill retaine in it, the ſauour of the ſayde Dung, and ſo (in the end) impart it to the wine. For, our people are verie ill aduiſed, to charge their Vines euery yeare: by reaſon it is the cauſe, that their wines (for the moſt part) haue an vnpleaſing taſt, and becomming fat and Oyly, are eaſie to turne of themſelues. Moreouer, dung maketh our Vines to waxe aged immediately, and ſoone to grow barren; becauſe they are too liberall of their goodneſſe in the firſt yeares.

Dung is verie hurtfull for Vides.

Seruius hath leſte written vnto vs, in thoſe Commentaries which he made on the ninth Booke of the Æneides, that the man was named Pituuius, who inuented this manner of manuring groundes by dung. And therefore he was called Sterquilinium, that is to ſay, a dung-hill carrier. It is to be preſumed, that he was bred in the Latines countrey, in ſome place that was neuer fertile. Theſe few notes I haue ſelected out of verie good Authors that did well vnderſtand themſelues in Husbandry, concerning the manuring of grounds & Vines, but they neuer approued the vſe of dung.

Seruius in Com. ſup. Eneid. cap. 7

The Authors excuſe on their behalfe, that deſpiſe his Councell.

Now, becauſe I know verie well, that whatſoeuer Heſiodus, thoſe other authors and my ſelfe alſo haue written, that our grounds and Vines ſhould no longer bee manured in ſuch ſtinking, foule, and groſſe manner, but to follow thoſe other inſtructions, moſt ſweete and wholeſome: in excuſe of their neglecting ſo good aduice I will ſay with them, that that which hath taken roote for ſo many thouſandes of yeares, can hardly be taken away vppon the ſodaine.

Therefore, I wil now ſet downe vnto you ſome certaine receipts and aduices, for the long conſeruation of our Cornes ſafe and ſoundly, and that they may not bee any wayes bitten or eaten with Vermine, becauſe it will bring exceeding great healthfulneſſe vnto the people. For, without all doubt, when Corne and other nouriſhments of life haue any corruption whatſoeuer, they doe dailie encreaſe and augment diſeaſes amongſt the people.

First

Of bringing Corne in sheaues into the Barne.

First of all then, men ought to be very circumspect, that before they bring their Corne in sheaues into the Barne, the said sheaues be very dry, and free from al moisture. Next, not to lay them on the earthen floore, without there bee some dry boords betweene the Corne and it. Then that there bee no muck-hill, or Iakes, either in the Barne, or neere it: for ill sauor will soone communicate it selfe to the Corne; and aboue all, let the Barne bee very well ayred.

Of places where no Barnes are vsed.

If it be in such a place, where they haue no vse of Barnes, as in the most part of Languedocke; then order must be taken, that the Stacke of Corne be (at least) so wel couered and enclosed, that no raine may get power of entrance, for otherwise, the Corne will sprout it selfe, and afterward rot, corrupt, and putrifie.

What care is to be vsed for prouiding a good Garner, or Corne-loft.

After that the Corne is threshed, and meete to bee laide vp in the Garner or Corne-lofte, choise must be made of one that receiueth the bright splendour of the East, breathed also moderately with the North and West windes: but the Southerne blasts, and those leaning that way, by no meanes to enter it.

For the roofe.

The couerture ouer head, need no great costlinesse, because of the ayres easier entrance thorow the Tyles, or other sheltring, that the Corne may not be heated or chafed.

For the floore and walles.

The floore may bee of earth, or paued tyles; and the walles of whited morter.

Corne-heapes

You must bee respectiue, that your Corne-heapes bee not great or thicke, to auoyde ouer-heating, remouing and changing them from place to place, at two Months and two Moneths.

Scituation of the Garner.

The Garner must be farre enough from moist places; especially from houses of office, which yeeld a noysome sauour, or any such vnfit being; from Stables of Oxen, Horses, Swine, & such like.

How to auoyd vermine that do great harm to Corne.

The planchers and walles of the Garner, wherein you purpose to house your Corne, must be washed with vineger, or such water, wherein hearbes, or some bitter drugs haue beene boiled; as Wormewood, Southernwood, the leaues of wilde Cowcumbers, the pithe or graine of Coloquintida, or of Lupines, or Oxe gaules; without all question to the contrary, these haue bene truely tried, that no Weeuils, Mites, or Wormes can bite or touch the Corne, where they haue bene vsed. And they that scorne to take this paines, may lay some wormwood vnderneathe, aloft, and about their Corne-heapes, or Southernewood, or dried wilde Marierome. Or else annoint the walles and planchers of the Garner, with Lye made of the oyle of Oliues; or if it may not be had, with Sheeps vrine. To salt-powder the ground vnderneathe the Corne, with ashes made of Oaken wood, it is the present killing of all Mites and Weeuils.

An easier way for such as can take no paines.

Now to keepe the Corne from heating or warming, ouer and beside our forenamed remouing, let there bee layde vnder euery ten Bushels of Corne, one of Millet; or if it be mingled therewith, it is easily separated afterward with a raunging Siue. Salt-Niter and the scum thereof, is very good for Corne-heapes, and preserueth them wonderfully, as also frō sprouting: many Sea-Merchants haue made vse thereof, to their no meane profite. In breefe, a good and charitable man shall neuer stand in need of so many remedies, if he keepe his Corne with intention, to helpe and lend to the poore, and without interest. For God saith by his Prophet Ezechiell, That hee will preserue the goods of them that keepe them to helpe the poore. And contrariwise; That he will suffer them to rot, and their Corne shall bee eaten with vermine, that hoorde them vp, to get great gaine by them, and hurt the people vexed with famine.

How to preserue the Corne from heating and chafing.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the great difference, which both Ancient and Moderne Writers, haue obserued to be betweene the Royall title of a King, and the disgracefull name of a Tyrant.

A necessary obseruation in the Author.

BEfore I begin to describe the difference, that is betweene a King and a Tyrant; I hold it to bee a matter most conuenient, to set downe a definition both of the one and other, to the ende, that the deportments of them both, may the better be knowne.

A King is such a man, that yeeldeth himselfe as obedient to the lawes of Nature,

The definition of a King, or him that holdeth the estate and dignity Royall.

ture, as he desireth his Subiects to bee towards him: forsaking naturall liberity, & a propriety in the goods of any man. I obserue in this definition, that Subiects ought to bee obedient to the Royall Monarch, to declare thereby, that in him consisteth Soueraigne Maiesty. The King also ought to bee obedient to the Lawes of nature, that is to say; to gouerne his Subiects, and to guide his owne actions by naturall iustice, which maketh it selfe to be seene as cleare and brightly, as the splendour of the Sunne. It is likewise a Royall marke or note, when the Prince sheweth himselfe as milde and pliable to the lawes of nature; as hee wisheth his Subiects to be obeysant to him. Which he may easily do, if he feare God aboue all things, be pittifull to the afflicted, prouident in his enterprizes, hardy in exploits, modest in prosperity, constant in aduersity, firme in his word, wise in his counsell, carefull of his subiects, succourable to friends, terrible to enemies, courteous to good men, dreadfull to wicked persons, and iust to all.

The note or marke of royalty.

What things are possible in a King.

A Tyrant is such a man, as defileth the lawes of nature with his feete, abuseth the liberties of free-borne Subiects, euen as if they were his slaues, and maketh the goods of other men to be his owne. The name or word Tyrant, is Greeke in his owne propriety, and was honourable, signifying nothing else in times of antiquity, but a Prince that had possessed himselfe of the State, without the consent of his Cittizens and Subiects, and of a companion, had made him his Master. Such a man was called a Tyrant, although he were a most wise and iust Prince. In like manner, Plato writing to Dionysius the Tyrant, gaue him this quality as his honour: Plato to Dyonisius the tyrant, health. The returne and answer was: Dyonisius the tyrant, to Plato greeting. And to declare that the word tyrant, was as well attributed to iust & good Princes, as them that were wicked, it euidently appeareth heerein: because Pittacus and Periander, two of the seuen Sages of Greece, were called tyrants, for hauing seized the Estates of their Countries.

The definition of a Tyrant, & what the signification of the word Tyrant implyeth.

Who were called tyrants in elder time.

But such, as eyther by power, or else by cunning had inuaded and obtained the Soueraignty, perceiuing that their liues were exposed to the mercy of their enemies; were constrained (for the better security of their liues and goods) to haue Guards of strangers about their persons, & strong Garrisons in Castles, for whose paiment of wages and maintenance, great tributes & impositions were leuied. And when they saw, that their liues could not be secured, hauing but poore friends, and potent enemies; they did eyther put to death, or banished some, to please and enrich others: and they that stood in desperate condition, they made rape both of their goods and wiues. And this was the reason, that tyrants were extremely hated and malliced. For wee reade, that Dyonisius the elder tyrant, of one part of Sicily, had daily ten thousand Soldiers for his Guard, and ten thousand horsemen, and foure hundred Gallyes, readily hyred and armed. And when he could not make vp this account among so few Subiects as were vnder his seruice; he wrung & griped his people in so small an Island, whereof hee gouerned but in part onely, and contained no more then six hundred and sixteene Italian miles in all.

Gryping and insulting Tyrants were compelled to entertaine Guards for their owne safety.

The cause why Tyrants were mortally hated.

Now because euery one hath not the iudgement to distinguish a good King from a Tyrant, calling him a Tyrant, that (for great store of good reasons) maketh himselfe formidable, and stood in awe of, beside that which I haue already sette downe, I will make him some-what more easily to be knowne.

Weakenesse in some iudgements betweene a good King & a Tyrant.

The most notable difference betweene a King and a Tyrant, is; that the King coformeth himselfe to the lawes of nature, and a tyrant trampleth on them with his feete, that one maintaineth piety, iustice, and faith, the other hath neyther God, Law, nor Faith. The one maketh whatsoeuer he doth, serue for the weale publike, & tuition of his Subiects: the other doth not any thing, but for his owne particular profite, reuenge, or pleasure. The one enforceth himselfe to enrich his Subiects by all the best meanes he can deuise: the other will not build his owne house, but with the ruines of theirs. The one reuengeth the iniuries of the publike Estate, and pardoneth his owne: but the other reuengeth cruelly his owne iniuries, and pardoneth them that are done to others. The one spareth the honour of modest women: & the other triumpheth in their shame. The one taketh pleasure to

to be aduiſed in all freedome and liberty, and will be wiſely reprehended when hee faileth; but nothing is more irkeſome to the other, then the counſell of a graue and vertuous man.

Of generall vnity. The one ſtriueth to maintaine his Subiectes in peace and vnitie; but the other mooueth dayly diuiſions, to make the one part ruinate the other, and then to fatten himſelfe with their Confiſcations.

Of affability. The one, delighteth to bee ſometimes ſeene, and heard of his Subiectes; but the other euer-more hydeth himſelfe from them, as from his enemies.

Of Loue. The one, maketh reckoning of his Subiectes Loue, but the other of their Feare.

Of Feare. The one, neuer feareth, but for the wel-fare of his people: but the other dreadeth nothing more then them.

Of Taxations The one, will not charge his ſubiects more then needes muſt, remembring alwayes the publique neceſſity; but the other drinketh their blood, gnaweth theyr bones, and ſucketh the verie Marrowe of his people, onely to weaken them.

Of honeſt ſeruices. The one ſearcheth out men of beſt condition, to imploy in publike Offices; but the other imployeth none but Theeues, and moſt wicked perſons in his ſeruice, like to Spundges.

Of free-giuing Offices. The one maketh free gifte of eſtates and offices, to auoide concuſſions, and crowdes of people; but the other ſelleth them at as deare rates as hee can, for their better meanes of enfeebling the people by Thefts; and then (afterward) cuttes the Theeues throates for theyr vvealth, becauſe he would be reputed a good Iuſticer.

Of Law. A King meaſureth his actions and maners, by the foote of the Law: but the tirant maketh the Law to ſerue his maners.

Of peoples loue. The one is beloued and reuerenced of his people: and the other generally hated of them all.

Of Warre. The one hath no other recourſe in war, but to his ſubiects: but the other, will make no warre but with them.

Of Guardes. The one, hath no Guards or Garriſons but of his owne people: but the others defence is onely in ſtrangers.

Of Peace. The one delighteth in an aſſured repoſe and tranquility; but the other languiſheth in perpetuall feare.

Of happy life The hope & expectation of the one, is euerlaſting life in bleſſednes: but the other cannot auoid eternall puniſhment.

Of a happy death. The one is honored in this life, & deſired again after death: the other is infamous in this life, and torne in peeces with ſhame after death.

But becauſe the continuation of this chapter might ſeeme ouer-tedious to the Reader, if I ſhould verify al theſe relations by hiſtoricall examples, I wil referre ſuch as are willing to take the paynes, to reade the hiſtories themſelues, both in Greeke, Latine, & other languages, wher they ſhal find that to be moſt true, which hath bin ſpoken of Kings and Tyrants. The Concluſion.

CHAP. XV.

In what high account and eſteeme, Philoſophers, & other men of knowledge (in what Sciences ſoeuer) were held in elder times, by Emperors and Kings.

WE need not now complaine, that in theſe dayes of ours, there is ſuch want of excellent ſpirits, in all kindes of Arts and Sciences: but if we ſuruey with more wary iudgment, we ſhal plainely perceiue, that there are learned men enow, who may iuſtly find fault, that neither they are in ſuch eſteeme, or any way ſo well recompenced of Princes in theſe times, as many worthie men vvere heretofore, by Emperors, Kings, Princes, and great Lords, in thoſe famous daies of reuerend antiquity. Inſted of concluding, and acquainting yee with the iuſtice of their reaſon, I will lightly paſſe ouer; & in ſted of long ſpeaking, onely remember ye with ſome hiſtories and examples of Famous Potentates in former ages, who wer Friends, and Nurſing fathers to Philoſophers and Schollers; to the end that their actions beeing compared with thoſe of theſe dayes, it may bee knowne, whether they haue cauſe to complaine, or no, in a caſe ſo highly importing. A great cauſe of diſcouragement to learned men.

And firſt of all, I will beginne with the excellent and renowned Captain Pompey, who (as we read) after he had vanquiſhed the puiſſant king Mithridates, & obtained many other victories and aduentures in war, coming to Athens with al his warlike furniſhment, ſuch as the Roman Conſuls and Captaines vſed to haue borne before thē: he was aduertiſed that Poſidonius the Potentates & Princes of elder times. Pompey, his victory againſt Mithridates.

Philoſopher lay ſicke in his bed. Being deſirous to go and ſee him, he would not onely honor him with his perſonall Viſitation; but when he came neere the door of the houſe, he cauſed his Standards and Imperial Enſigns to march in before him. For it was euermore his ſaying; That Kingdomes and Empires ought to obey vertue and Learning. Thus he behaued himſelfe to this poore learned man, which hee would not haue done to the greateſt Potentate then liuing.

Dyoniſius the Tyrant, king of Syracuſa.

Dionyſius the Tyrant, king of Syracuſa, hauing obtained of Plato the excellent diuine Philoſopher, that he would come & ſee him in Sicily; when hee heard of his neere approching, he went to meete him on the way, cauſing him to ſit with him in his owne Chariot, drawne with white Horſſes. Such was the reputation which wiſe and learned men had in thoſe times.

Alexander the Great.

When Alexander the Great, had determined the vtter ruine & ſubuerſion of the Thebans, he gaue eſpeciall charge firſt of all, that no man ſhould touch the houſe of the Poet [l] Pindarus, but to leaue it wholly ſtanding. If I ſhould tell yee, how highly Virgill was honored and eſteemed by Octauianus, it is a matter ſo perfectly known, that it needeth no report of mine. According to Pliny in his ſeuenth Booke, whenſoeuer he entred into the Theater, there to deliuer ſome of his Verſes, all the people would ſtand vp on their feet, and offer as great reuerence to him, as if it had bin to the Emperor. And that which is much more, Silius Italicus, a Spaniſh Poet, did yearly ſolemnize the day of his Natiuity, and with farre greater deuotion, then hee did his owne. The gifts and preſents daily giuen him by Octauian, Mecænas, and many more, were ſo great, that Seruius (who writeth of him) ſaith, that his goods (in very ſhort time) amounted to the value of ſixe thouſand Seſtertiaes, which ariſe vnto two hundred and fiftie thouſand Crownes. He had in Rome a very honorable Palace; in regard whereof, Iuuenall in his 7. Satyre ſaith, That he was one of the richeſt men in thoſe dayes.

Vpon a day, in the preſence of Octauian, and Liuia his wife, the mother vnto [m] Marcellus, Virgill vttered certaine Verſes of his bookes Æneidos, and comming to the end of the ſixt Booke, where hee diſcourſeth moſt elegantly of Marcellus, lately dead before; the hart of the mother became ſo ſtrangely and paſſionately moued thereat, that ſhe fell into a ſwound, not hauing any power to heare the reſt. But being reuiued to her ſelfe againe, ſhe cõmaunded, that for each of thoſe whereof ſhee had loſt the hearing, Virgill ſhoulde haue ten Seſtertiaes giuen him. The remainder (which ſhe heard not) being one and twenty verſes in number; the valewation of his reward, contained the ſumme of 5000. Ducates, of our inſtant money.

m Not he who had bene fiue times Conſul, but young Marcellus, that ſhould haue bin heyr to Octauian.

It is found faithfully recorded, that the Syracuſanes had ſome Athenian priſoners, that could rehearſe (by heart) certayne verſes of [n] Euripides the Greeke Poet, and dayly pronounced them; by which occaſion only, and in honor of the Poet, they were deliuered, & permitted freely to go home to their owne countrey. Scipio the Affrican, during his life time, had alwayes with him (in his wars) the Statue of [o] Ænnius; and when he died, he tooke eſpeciall order, that it might be buried in his owne Sepulcher with him. The Emperor Domitian, cauſed [p] Silius Italicus (an excellent Poet, and borne in Spaine) to bee made three times Conſull of Rome, as Martiall witneſſeth in one of his Epigrams, beginning, Auguſto Piathura.

But I know not what to ſay, of our moderne and later times; or what our late liuing Princes haue done, either to Poliſian, Pontanus, or Sannazar; and to ſpeak of our Modern Frenchmen, as Ronſard, Bellay, and other excellent Poets. But perhaps you will anſwer me, their hopes may bee to come heereafter, becauſe ſome of them are yet liuing, young in yeares, but old in wiſedome and vnderſtanding, and worthy to bee equalled with many of former times. But becauſe I ſee ſo little reſpect, let vs goe backe againe to thoſe renowned Ancients. King Mithridates held Plato and his learning in ſo high reputation, & being deſirous to haue his ſtatue; ſent to find out [q] Syllanion to performe it, becauſe he was a moſt excellent workeman. For in thoſe dayes, the greateſt honour that could be, was (in publike places) to erect Figures & Statues: yet none might be permitted, except it were of ſome worthy man, made famous, and knowne by ſome vertuous deeds, or for his dignity in learning. For this cauſe the men of Athens made one of Demoſthenes, with a title of the Ioſephus the Iew, being one in number amongſt the captiues of Ieruſalem, was brought priſoner to Rome; & yet notwithſtanding, in regard of the Bookes hee had made of the Iewes Antiquities, they reputed him worthy to haue a Statue. The Athenians conſidering the wiſedome of Demetrius Phalereus, ſcholler vnto Theophraſtus, cauſed his ſtatue to be erected in thirty places of this City. Now if men of merit were ſo highly honoured, doubtles they were as well rewarded. For Atheneus writeth in the 9. book of his Gymnoſophiſts that Ariſtotle for his Booke de Animalium receiued of Alexander 800. talents: which of the currant money now in France, valeweth foure hundred & foureſcore thouſand Crownes, which is verified by Pliny in his eight book. There he declareth, that Alexãders deſire was ſo great to haue this book performed by Ariſtotle, that he ſent many thouſands of men thoroughout all Greece and Aſia, with letters and expreſſe commandement, that they ſhold be obedient to whatſoeuer hee required, touching the manner of hunting and flying of Fowles, Fiſhes, and all the like exerciſes, becauſe they ſhould know & vnderſtand, the nature and properties of all kinde of Beaſts, Birds, and Fiſhes, & then to aduertiſe Ariſtotle thereof. Vndoubtedly if Homer, the very beſt of Greek Poets, had liued in the time of Alexander, it is to bee preſumed that he wold haue bin as bountifull and beneficiall to him, as hee was to Ariſtotle. Becauſe when a cheſt or Casket was preſented vnto him, wherein K. Darius kept his moſt precious Vnguents, the Cheſt being very pleaſing to him, he ſaid; I will make this Cheſt the keeper of far richer treaſure: and preſently hee did put thereinto the Workes of Homer, which he euermore tooke great delight to reade in continually.

Nor were theſe learned men thus honoured during their life time, but alſo after their death. As may bee noted by Ptolomy, who was King of Egypt, who made a Temple and Statue to Homer, as he did to his other Goddes. For Virgil likewiſe, there was a Statue erected in Mantua, long time after he was dead. But heere, if any man ſhall obiect vnto me, that wiſe and Learned Seneca dyed by the command of Nero; I anſwere, it was moſt bloodye Nero that did it, not any defect in his learning, and before his death, he attained to great dignities and honours in Rome, onely by the meanes of his Learning. It is an olde, but a true Prouerb; That Honors and gifts, are both the makers and maintainers of Arts. Therefore wee finde, that in thoſe times when Emperors and Kings fauoured ſtudies and learning; there wanted then no ſtore of Learned men. That Learning is not onely neceſſary in Kings and Princes: but alſo for Generalles, Captaines, and Commanders, that follow the Exerciſe and Art Military.

I Could alledge manifold Hiſtories, beſides true, good, and ſufficient Reaſons, that Princes (in ancient times) found no better forme, or directe rule for their orderly gouernment, then Learning, and Knowledge. And becauſe the euidence heereof remaineth ſo plaine and pregnant vnto vs, I will obſerue ſome fewe examples, tending to this purpoſe. When King Phillip vnderſtood the birth of his ſonne Alexander, and knowing Ariſtotle to liue then in Athens, he ſent a very notable Letter vnto him (recorded by Plutarke, and Aulus Gellius) wherein hee thanked the Goddes, not ſo much for the ſafe birth of his ſonne, but becauſe hee was borne in the life time of Ariſtotle. By which few words, may be apparantly diſcerned, how much the King thought lerning and knowledge fitte for his ſonne, to the end, he might proue to be ſuch a King and Captaine, as hee was indeede afterward. Whereupon, when hee grew vnto yeares meete for the embracing of ſtudie; he made Ariſtotle his Mayſter, ſent him great gifts, and (in meere loue to his ſon) builded a Cittie, which he had formerly deſtroyed, and erected alſo a Schoole (admired for coſt and curious worke manſhip, ſuch as no time before had afforded) wherein his ſonne might receiue inſtruction.

ANtigonus a King, ſendeth greeting to Zeno the Philoſopher. I know very well, that in worldly goodes, fauours of Fortune, and the reputation of ſuch things, I doe farre exceede thee. Neuertheleſſe, I know withall, that in true felicitie, knowledge, diſcipline, ſtudies and liberall Artes, thou reacheſt a higher pitch then I can doe. In regard whereof I deſire, that thou wouldeſt come and liue with me, which I pray thee to yeelde vnto; that I may enioy thy company and conuerſation. In the doing whereof, be well aſſured, that thou not onely ſhalt be maiſter of me; but ſhalt alſo be a teacher to all my Macedonians. For he that inſtructeth the King, making him to become vertuous and good: teacheth thoſe vertues likewiſe to all his Subiects. To prooue the trueth heereof, it is commonly ſeene, that ſuch as the King is, ſuch are his vaſſailes, and ſuch as the Captaine, ſuch his Souldiours. Farewell.

A notable teſtimonie, of loue to learning, in ſo mightie a potentate.

Words beſeeming a vertuous King.

These Letters being receiued by the venerable Philoſopher; in regard of his deepe ſteppe into age, it was not poſſible for him to condiſcend thereto, or (in perſon) to ſatisfie the Kings earneſt requeſt. But he ſent him two of his Schollers, excelling the reſt in knowledge & learning, by whom he was worthily taught and inſtructed.

What the philoſopher himſelfe could not doe, he did by his Schollers.

The learning of Ariſtotle, vnder whom Alexander was tutourd fiue whole yeares together, tooke ſuch roote and efficacie in the Scholler; that he became ſo excellent a King, as no one in the world was able to compare with him. Being in the midſt of his Armies, he would not giue ouer ſtudy, but euermore layd (with his Sword) on the pillow of his bed, the Iliades of Homer, and other bookes. And it appeared, that ſuch was his loue to Learning, that he could as eaſily apprehend it, as he conquered kingdoms by force of Armes. Plutarke, Aulus Gellius, and Themiſtocles doe affirme, that Alexander had publiſhed certayne bookes of naturall Philoſophy, whereof he had been an Auditor vnder Ariſtotle; in regard whereof, he wrote a Letter vnto him.

Alexander was Scholler to Ariſtotle fiue yeares together, and loued Learning earneſtly.

When this was vnderſtoode by Ariſtotle, to comfort and pleaſe ſo puiſſant a Prince, he commanded that his Bookes (formerly common) ſhould be ſo obſcured, that it was not poſſible to vnderſtand them, but by his owne interpretation. Pirrhus that excellent Captaine, and king of the Epirotes, who maintained great warres againſt the Romaines, and diuerſe times ouercame them; did exerciſe himſelfe, not onely in the reading of the Sciences: but alſo compoſed ſundry books, among which was his precepts of warre. What ſhall we ſay of Iulius Cæſar, the firſt Emperour, and (without all compariſon) the very beſt Captaine of all them that had the managing of war? We may truely ſay of him, that he was no leſſe inclined to Learning, then to Armes. For he made himſelfe a Scholler, before hee was a Souldier: and afterward as often as he had any leyſure, he frequented the Academies of the Poets, and in walking, he would both reade and write. Vppon a time, being at Alexandria in Egypt, to ſaue himſelfe from an imminent perill, he aduentured ſwimming, bearing the bookes which he had written in one of his hands; declaring thereby, that he affected them as dearely, as his owne life: hauing as much care to ſaue the one, as the other; and what his learning was, his Commentaries (yet remaining with vs) can ſufficiently witneſſe.

Not onely Cæſar, but all the Romanes alſo, do beare witneſſe of that which wee ſay, who (in my poore opinion) were reputed and knowne to be good Captaines and Gouernors. For, the firſt thing which they vndertook for their children in their infancie, was to haue them well enſtructed, and therefore prouided good ſcholmaſters for them, which they chargeably ſent for out of Greece. Both the Catoes were knowne to be excellent ſchollers, & ſoldiers. The great Cenſor was wonderfully addicted to learning, as the Bookes written by him do plainely teſtifye: hee was a worthy Orator, Hiſtorian, and endued with many vertues, and euen toward the ending of his dayes, hee learned the Greeke tongue. The other Cato, ſtyled of Vtica, though he was not of ſuch a ſharpe and ingenious ſpirite in apprehenſion of Sciences; yet notwithſtanding, hee kept company with moſt excellent Schoolemaſters; among whom was the Philoſopher * Antipater. And he gaue his minde ſo much to ſtudie, that Cicero ſayth, in his Booke De Finibus, he did nothing elſe but reade; yea, whenſoeuer he ſate in the Senate houſe, hee alwayes had ſome Booke or other about him, to reade at all times when he pleaſed.

We haue formerly read, that Dionyſius the Tyrant of Sicily, had Plato to be his Schoolemaſter, and kept company alſo with many other learned men. Afterward, when hee was expulſed out of his kingdome, one (in mocking manner) demanded of him, whereto now ſerued the Philoſophy which he had learned of Plato, to whom hee returned this anſwer, It ſerueth mee to ſupport my preſent neceſsitie with patience. Themiſtocles, a moſt excellent Captaine, declared himſelfe to be no leſſe diligent in learning, then hee was in Armes: his Maſter was [a] Anaxagoras, the Mileſian. Epaminondas, and the other Captaines of Greece, were all ſtudious and worthy Orators. Mithridates, in the warres which he had againſt the Romanes, for the ſpace of forty years together, notwithſtanding all the furious aſſaults, deſiſted not from his ſtudying, hauing euermore diuers ſchoolemaſters and Philoſophers with him.

And before this Emperour, there was a famous Captaine, named [b] Lucius Lucullus, who during the wars, gaue himſelf to ſtudy; & when the wars ceaſed, hee applyed all his diligence, in cheriſhing and maintaining learned men. Paulus Æmilius, victorious ouer the king of Perſia, ouer & beſide his beeing a very learned man, endeauoured alſo that his children might bee the like; ſo that at his inſtant requeſt, the Athenians gaue him [c] Metrodorus to bee their Schoole-maſter. But wherefore do I take ſo much paines, in naming ſo many one after another? Pompey, Quintus Fabius Maximus, Marcus Brutus, Traiane, Adrian, and Marke Anthonie, were al learned men, and compiled Bookes, Orations, and Letters of great learning, and memorable example.

c A Philoſopher, Scholler to Epicurus.

In briefe, if I erre not greatly in my iudgement, it may plainly appeare, that few Captaines are found of ancient times who were excellent in nothing ſo much as by their learning. There are two only, of whom wee finde nothing remayning written, expreſſing whether they were lerned, or no: the one being named Caius Marius, and the other Marcus Marcellus. And yet I reade, that Marcellus highlie loued and fauoured men of knowledge: whereby it is to bee credited, that ſurely himſelfe was learned, though nothing (to that effect) bee written of him. And it may the more manifeſtly appeare, by the prohibition he made (as we haue formerly alledged) at the ſurprizall of Syracuſa, that Archimedes ſhould not bee ſlayne.

No Captains in elder times but they were famous for Learning.

And althogh he miscaried, notwithstanding his strict command to the contrary: yet it was not without great greefe of the said Marcellus.

Let then the Captaines of these our dayes, say what they list, that learning is not so expedient for them (I meane such as thrust the stile of Captaines on themselues) coueting with their owne opinion, or rather obstinacy, to cloud and couer their dulnesse and ignorance. It is sufficient for vs, that wee see how highly our graue Predecessors esteemed Bookes and Learning, equall with the courage and manhood of infinite Captaines, worthily affected and addicted to learning; as we finde it vnpartially set downe, in that iudicious Booke of warre, written by Robertus Valturinus.

CHAP. XVII.

Of diuers secret naturall properties, being in the Viper: and how he may be fed on, and eaten, without any danger.

THE Viper is a kinde of Serpent, sufficiently knowne to many: and although it bee little, yet notwithstanding it is very venomous, for with a little pricking, it can kill a man. But as our Lord God made not any thing but to profitable vse: euen so this creature, with al his venome, serueth man for diuers medicines and maladies, especially for any paine in the throate. It is a thing very excellently good (by a secret property in nature) to beare the head of a Viper about a man: for liuing, it killeth, and dead, it healeth. Tiriacle, or Treacle, as we vse to terme it, is properly good against venom: but in the making thereof, and in the confection, there is necessarily required some part of this beast, to the end it may be the more perfect, and of the greater efficacy. And it was named Tiriacle, because that the worde Thirion in Greeke, signifieth a Viper or venomous Beast. Some (and not vnfittingly) doe giue another etymologye, and reason for this name. But before we report the benefits ensuing by the Vipet, me-thinkes it were not amisse, to remember what is said by Pliny, Isidorus, and Aelianus. They report, that when this Serpent conceiueth, the Male putteth his head in at the mouth of the Female, wherby shee receiueth such immeasurable delectation; that with her ouer-sharp teeth, she byteth off the head of the Male, becomming thereby widdowed, yet violent in assaulting. The matter conceiued by her, groweth to bee Egges, which forme themselues within her body, according as the spawne of fishes doth: and of those Egges do Vipers ensue, at such time as she is to deliuer her young ones, yeelding euery day, one, till they amount to twenty. Now because they are so many in number, they which remaine behinde, hauing no power to attend their fit time, do teare the belly of their Damme, so that by her death, they enter into the world, and liue. If it be so, surely it is a matter very marualous: for it should seeme thereby, that (euen naturally) the children do reuenge the death of their father.

God made all things for the profitable vse of man.

Of the vertue of Tiriacle or Treacle, and how at first it took name.

Plin. in l.9. c.62 Isidor in lib.11. de Etimolog. Aelianus in lib. de Animal.

The conception of the Female Viper and deliuery of her brood.

With this opinion of Pliny, do many other Authors consent; as Plutarch in his Treatise against Scoffers. Neuertheless, there are a great many other, who do contrary it, denying that the Viper dyeth in her teeming: with which opinion, I also rest resolued, because the other seemeth to me not naturall; neyther haue I seene the experience thereof, or know any person that hath seene it. In like manner, Philostratus is flatly against it, in the life of Apollo Thyaneus, introducing Apollo himselfe, who reporteth, that hee had seene a Viper, that after she had fully yeelded all her young ones; licked them very louingly, and liued healthfully. As much may be gathered from the words of Aristotle, who setteth them downe thus. The Viper onely (among all other Serpents) deliuereth her young ones, because she first formeth them in her body of Egges, as the spawne of Fishes is. Afterward, when they are formed, they remaine three daies wrapped vp in a tender thinne skin; which breaketh at the limitted time, and so affoordeth the young ones liberty (in regard whereof, Apuleius, in his Apologie, calleth them Ouiperes, and not Vipers, as much to say, as engendered of Egges) and very often it happeneth, that that wrapper breaking (of it selfe) in the Dammes belly; they issue foorth euery day one, to the number of twenty and more: these are the very words of Aristotle. ther place, I meane in his third Booke of Beasts, speaking of the teeming of Serpents, he saith: Before the Viper yeeldeth her young ones, she formeth them within her body of Egges. And I am perswaded, that hence ensueth those speeches, of the young ones tearing the belly of their Damme. For it seemeth to them that stand in defence thereof, that when Aristotle speaketh of this first fawning or teeming: hee purposed to say, that they did then breake or teare the belly of their damme.

Aiist. in lib. 3. de Animal. c. 12

The Authors coniecture of this controuersed point.

But leauing these circumstances, I say that the viper, how dangerous soeuer it be, yeeldeth great helpe and succour to man. Dioscorides saith, that the flesh of a viper, being boyled or sodden, may safely be eaten: being very medicinable for the nerues, and for the sight. But in preparation to the eating thereof, the head and taile must be taken away: then being fleaed and well dressed, it is to be tempered with strong Annise-seedes. He saith also, that there is made of this flesh, a certaine kinde of Salt, or salt-powder, excellently auailing to procure a good appetite, being prepared in this manner. You must take a new earthen pot, and put the viper thereinto, vsed as formerly hath beene declared; then put Salt and stamped figges to it, with a competent quantity of hony, and the pot being well couered, let it boyle and bake a long while in an Ouen. Which being done, beate and reduce it into a powder: and whosoeuer afterward will make vse thereof with his other meate, shall finde it very pleasant and profitable for the stomacke.

Paulus Aeginetus saith also, that the flesh of a viper is singularly good against leaprousie and meazeldnesse; making therefore great esteeme of the Salt-powder fore-mentioned, and affirming with Plinius, that a certaine nation in India, eateth the flesh of the viper. Dioscorides auoucheth, that whosoeuer will eate the flesh of the viper, shall liue long time, and very healthfully. Against the byting of this Serpent, there are store of remedies, whereof Theophrastus maintaineth one, saying, Whosoeuer is bitten thereby, mellodious sounds and songs doe greatly benefite him, because Musique is very medicinable, as we haue already, and shall proue hereafter. Galen saith, that this beast eateth not any thing all the time of winter: but hideth her selfe (as dead) in the earth; and whosoeuer then findeth, toucheth, and handleth her, she cannot bite him: but when summer cometh, she then resumeth all her forces. The like affirmeth Plinie, of Lizards, Snakes, and all other kinde of creeping creatures.

Aristotle saith, that they containe themselues three or foure moneths, without feeding on any thing. Aelianus auoucheth, that those vipers which breed in the Prouinces of Arabia, although they doe bite, yet their biting is not venimous; because they doe feede on the Baulme tree, and sleepe vnder the shadow thereof. Aristotle further saith, that they are very desirous to drinke wine; and many people doe take them, by setting vessells of wine in the places where they resort: for they will become drunk by drinking, and after they take them sleeping. There are many things more to be spoken, concerning the qualities and properties of the viper, which I doe purposely omit for breuities sake.

Of the admirable property of a little creature, the biting whereof is healed by the sound of Musique: likewise of many other infirmities, which are onely holpen by the same Medicine.

THat which we haue sayd in our precedent chapter, vnder the authority of Theophrastus, concerning the biting of the viper, and that it may be cured by Musique; will make our present report to be the better credited, because it tendeth to the same purpose. Alexander of Alexandria, in his book of Veniall dayes, and Petrus Gellius, a moderne Authour, doe affirme and say, that in Apulia, a Countrey of Italie, there is a kinde of Spider, which the Inhabitants doe tearme Tarantula. P. C. Rodianus calleth it Phalangium*, which at the beginning of summer is so venimous, that whosoeuer is bitten or stung thereby, except he be very suddenly succoured; he looseth all

The affirmation of good Authours as eye-witneſſes.

The iudgement of Authours hereon, ſpeaking as eye-witneſſes, and hauing ſeene the proofe thereof, is thus. So ſoone (ſay they) as any one is bitten or enuenomed, the beſt helpe is, to bring inſtantly before him, ſuch as vſe to play on Vialles, Flutes, and other Inſtruments, to play diuers Leſſons, & ſing many Songs: which Muſique being heard by the party wounded, he will preſently begin to daunce, deliuering variety of geſtures and motions with his body, euen as if all his life time he had well inured himſelfe to dancing, in which fury and power of dancing, he continueth, vntill ſuch time as the venome be diſſipated. Alexander Alexandrinus proceedeth farther, affirming, that he beheld one wounded by this Spider, to dance & leape about inceſſantly, and the Muſitians (finding themſelues wearied) gaue ouer playing: whereupon, the poore offended dancer, hauing vtterly loſt all his forces, fell downe on the ground, as if he had bene dead. The Muſitians no ſooner began to play againe, but hee returned to himſelfe, and mounting vp vpon his feet, danced againe as luſtily as formerly hee had done, and ſo continued dancing ſtill, til he found the harme aſſwaged, and himſelfe entirely recouered. Heereunto he addeth, that when it hath happened, that a man hath not beene thorowly cured by Muſique in this manner; within ſome ſhort while after, hearing the ſound of Inſtruments, hee hath recouered footing againe, and bene enforced to hold on dancing, and neuer to ceaſſe, till his perfect & abſolute healing, which (queſtionleſſe) is admirable in nature.

A ſtrange and wonderfull working in nature, by the power of Muſique.

* Aſclepiades writeth, that the ſound of Inſtruments, and voyces ſweetly ſinging to them, hath wrought extraordinary cures on Lunaticks and mad men. We reade alſo, that * Eſmeneas the Thebane, healed many diſeaſes and infirmities, only by his ſweete and melodious playing on Flutes. Theophraſtus and Aulus Gellius ſay; that Muſique appeaſeth the paine of the Sciatica, and of the Gout. We likewiſe finde it recorded in the ſacred Scripture, that Dauid (by Muſique) eaſed Saul of the paſſiō, which the euill ſpirit wroght in him: ſo great is this property, proceeding from the entire amity, which the nature of man beareth to Muſique. And if good conſideration be made heereof, wee ſhall not account it ſtrange, that infinite infirmities haue bene cured by the means of Muſique. For it hath euidently beene ſeene, that there are diuers beaſts and other creatures, that kill by laughing, others by weeping, and others in ſleeping; according as Plutarch writeth of Cleopatra, and as diuers other good Hiſtorians haue faithfully affirmed.

CHAP. XIX.

Of a ſtrange medicine, whereby Fauſtine of Rome, wife vnto the Emperour Marcus Aurelius, was cured of an infirmity of diſhoneſt loue: and of many other remedies againſt that powerfull paſſion.

COncerning that affection, or impriſonment of the will, as we may iuſtly terme it, which ordinarily is ſtiled by the name of Loue; whether it be a powerfull paſſion, working wonderfull effects in the ſoule or no: there need no further queſtion to bee made, but examination of ſuch mens iudgements, as (by good experience) haue knowne it, and whoſe examples remaine notorious to vs. More eſpecially, of very worthy and excellent perſons, who haue ſuffered their wils to be ſo ſtrangely tranſported thereby, that extremity of death hath enſued thereon. Iulius Capitolinus, among diuers other examples, reporteth what happened to Fauſtine, Daughter to Antonius, and VVife to the Emperour Marcus Aurelius, who became ſo exceſſiuely enamored on a Fencer or Sword-player; that by ouer-abounding in deſire to enioy his company, ſhee fell into ſuch a conſumption, as very greatly endangered her life.

Loue is the thraldome of the will.

for this extraordinary folly. In the end, it was concluded, that the Fencer ſhould be put to death, and ſome of his blood bee ſecretly giuen to Fauſtine to drinke, and after ſhe had thus ignorantly drunke therof, the Emperour her husband ſhould company with her in bed. This remedy wrought very wonderfully, for it quite tooke from her that fantaſticke affection, ſo that (neuer after) ſhee did ſo much as once remember him. And the Hiſtory ſaieth, that of this her companying with the Emperor, Antoninus Commodus was begotten, who became ſo cruell & bloody, that he reſembled rather the Fencer, of whoſe blood his Mother had drunke before his conception; then any iote of Marcus Aurelius, to whom he was Sonne indeed; in regard wherof, Commodus was a daily companion with the Gladiatores or Fencers, as Eutropius witneſſeth, in the life of the ſaid Commodus.

The conception of the bloody Emperour Antoninus Cõmodus.

Eutropius in vit. Commod.

Phyſitions among the Greekes and Arabes, do reckon this diſeaſe of Loue with the moſt greeuous infirmities of the body, and thereupon haue diſputed many remedies. * Cdamus the Mileſian (according as Suidas reporteth, in his Booke of Collections) wrote a Booke diſcourſing on perticular remedy, whereby vtterly to expell this dangerous ſickneſſe of loue: as Ouid alſo hath ſaide ſufficiently, in his remedies againſt loue. Wherefore among all other remedies, which Phyſitions haue aduiſed againſt this infirmity, this is one; that the patient endangered, ſhould vndertake ſome great affaires, importing highly his owne honour and profite, onely to this end, that his ſpirit being buſie about diuerſity of things; hee may the better retire his imagination, from the party by whom he is offended. They do moreouer wiſh him, to ſhun and forſake all embracings, or ouer-kinde conuerſation with other women. Pliny ſayeth, that againſt this enflaming heate, it is very good to obſerue where a Mule hath tumbled or wallowed, and to gather the duſt of that ground, which muſt bee caſt vpon the amorous party, and powder his garments therewith, or elſe with the ſweate of a well heated Mule, as Cardanus alſo auoucheth, in his Booke of Subtilties.

Phyſitions likewiſe haue taught the meanes, whereby may be obſerued, which perſon is beloued of the amorous party. And that is the ſelfe-ſame rule, whereby * Eraſiſtratus, Phyſition to king Seleuchus, vnderſtoode the loue that Antiochus did beare to Queene Stratonica, his ſtep-mother. For hee beeing ſicke, euen to the vtmoſt extremity, and affecting much rather to dye, then any way to diſcouer the cauſe of this diſeaſe, and that it proceeded from the loue he bare vnto his Fathers wife: Vpon a ſudden ſhee entred into the Chamber, euen as the Phyſition was thē feeling the pulſe of his patient, which mooued ſo ſtrongly vppon the Queenes entrance, that Eraſiſtratus euidently gathered thereby, that not onely he was enamored of her, but alſo, that it was the maine cauſe of his deſperate diſeaſe. Heereupon, he practiſed how to acquaint the King therewith: which at length (by good and acceptable means) he did, that would require too long time heere to relate, becauſe the Hiſtory is ſufficiently knowne.

* An excellent Phyſition of the ſtock of Ariſtotle.

The extreme loue of Antiochus to Stratonica his ſtepmother.

The caſe being likewiſe experimented by the Father himſelfe, and he perceiuing the danger wherein his Son was; thought good (although it went quite againſt his Sonnes intention, who deſired death, rather then to bee recouered by his Fathers loſſe) to depriue himſelfe of his Queene, and giue her vnto his ſickly Sonne. And to ſpeake vprightly, the age, beauty of the Lady, and equality for marriage, agreed much more conformably with the youthfull Sonne, then the ouer-aged Father. And this was the cauſe, that Antiochus liued healthfully and pleaſantly (for many yeares after) with his beſt beloued Stratonica; as the Hiſtory more at large declareth, being recorded by Plutarch, in the life of Demetrius. And this is the reaſon, why Phyſitions do aduiſe to taſte the pulſe of any amorous perſon, and to recount diuers names to him or her, among which, may be the name of the party affected: for ſo ſoone as that is once vnderſtood, the pulſe wil beate apace & ſtrongly, by which meanes, the party beloued is knowne. By diuers other ſignes, it may be perceiued, when any one is in loue, and to whom the affection tendeth: which ſigns I ceaſſe to ſpeake of, becauſe they are knowne to too many.

The king himſelfe made triall of the Phyſitions iudgement.

CHAP. XX.

Of the ſtrange and furious loue of a young Athenian: and of the ridiculous loue of King Xerxes: and how Beaſts haue many times affected both men and women.

Naturall loue is euer allowable.

FOR a man to loue a woman, and a woman a man, it is a matter conformable to nature, and worthy to be beleeued and embraced: but whē blinde-fold folly attaineth to ſuch a head, as thoſe things wherof I am inſtantly to ſpeake; it may well appeare to be impoſſible, and no way deſeruing any credite. Very learned and good Hiſtoriographers, haue written and recorded for truth, that in the City of Athens there liued a young man, deſcended of an honeſt parentage, of competent wealth, and ſufficiently knowne; who hauing oftentimes earneſtly obſerued a Marble Statue, moſt curiouſly and ingeniouſly wrought, and erected in a publike place of Athens; became ſo extremely enamored thereof, as he had no power to abſent himſelfe frō the place where it was fixed, but would hugge and embrace it very affectionately, & alwayes when he was forſ by it, hee found himſelfe very ill and ſickly diſpoſed. At length, this paſſion grew to ſuch extremity, as hee ran to the Senate houſe, and there before the reuerend Senatours, he made very liberall offers of money, humbly entreating thē ſo much to fauour him, that hee might haue the Statue in his owne poſſeſſion. This ſeemed no way pleaſing to the Senate, neyther could their authority ſtretch ſo farre, as eyther to giue or ſell a publike Statue. VVhen he perceiued his requeſt to be denied, hee became much afflicted with greefe and anguiſh of minde, & repayring to the Statue, enriched the head thereof with a Crowne of gold, and the body with garments and iewels of vnualuable price. This being done, hee would ſtand amorouſly beholding it, and many times fall on his knees before it, offering all worſhip and adoration thereto: and ſo long he continued in this vnreproueable folly, till (being ſtrictly commanded the contrary by the Senate) he ſlew himſelfe before it with rage and anger.

The Hiſtory of the young Athenian.

A ſtrange kinde of doting loue, yet agreeing to ſuch inſolēce, that it came to the Senate.

Folly exceeding all compaſſe of beleefe.

A deſperate concluſion of a brain-ſicke loue.

Doubtleſſe, this was a caſe very admirable, and yet I muſt acquaint yee with another, much more ſtrange & ridiculous, yet credibly auouched by ſo many good Authors, concerning the loue of King Xerxes; as it may well be ſaid, that hee exceeded all men of the world in folly. He grew enamored of a Platane, or Plane-tree, a Tree ſufficiently knowne, except in ſome few parts; and he would kiſſe & embrace it with like affection, as if it had bin a beautifull woman.

The ridiculous loue of King Xerxes to a Tree.

If theſe acciendents haue happened among men endued with reaſon; what ſhall we ſay then of brute Beaſts, that haue affected both men and women, and the ſame confirmed by great and famous Hiſtorians? As of Clauce ſo extremely affected by a Ramme, that it would neuer bee from her: and Dolphines alſo haue bene very admirably affectionate towards mē. Ælianus reciteth in his Booke of Beaſts, a matter well deſeruing to be related. He ſaith, a Dolphine eſpying young children playing on the Sea-ſhore; one among all the reſt, which ſeemed to him the moſt louely and beautifull, hee became ſo enamored of, that at euery time when the Dolphine ſaw him, hee would draw neere to the Banck, and ſhew himſelfe vnto the childe, who (at the firſt) was much affrighted, and fled away from him. But afterward, by the perſeuerance which the Dolphine vſed from day to day, expreſſing manifeſt ſignes of entire loue to the child; he grew the leſſe timorous, and by the paſtimes which the Dolphine continually made before him, hee waxed bold and hardy, and would venter into the water to him, not fearing to mount vpon his back, making a ſigne, and commanding (as it were) the Dolphine, to ſwim a great way into the Sea with him, and then (vppon a contrary ſigne or command, and when he was weary) to returne backe againe with him to land. In this pleaſure and paſtime, diuers dayes were ſpent, for the Dolphin euermore would be ready at the Bancke, when as the childe came to make vſe of this delight.

Which when the Dolphine perceiued, and the blood of the dead childe trickling downe his ſides; he tooke vp his deare lou'd childe ſo well as he could, and returning backe to land ſuddenly, euen as if hee intended to reuenge this offence vppon himſelfe; hee ſwam furiouſly on land out of the water, and preſently dyed by the childe.

The death of the Dolphine.

This Hiſtorie is alſo recorded by Pliny, with many other examples of Dolphines, that haue declared great loue and kindneſſe to men. Particularly hee reporteth one, in the time of the Emperour Octauius, that a Dolphine (in the very like manner) tooke delight in an infant, on the Sea-coaſt, neere to Puteoli, and whenſoeuer this childe, beeing named Simon (for it is ſaid, that Dolphines will ſuddenly runne to the very ſound of that name) came to the ſhoare; the childe would mount vpon his backe, and be carried into the Sea, paſſing and returning alwaies ſafely to land. He ſaith moreouer, that the childe dying by ſickneſſe, & the Dolphine often comming to the vſuall meeting place, & not finding the childe there, dyed with greeſe and ſorrow. The younger Pliny, Nephew to great Pliny, declareth many meruailes of a Dolphine, in the 9. Booke of his Epiſtles: eſpecially in that Epiſtle which beginneth, Indici in materiam veram.

Of a man, that by receiuing a wound at his enemies hand, was deliuered from a deadly danger, wherein he had long time liued: With ſundry other examples to the ſame purpoſe.

WEe haue formerly related, that Muſique hath beene the meanes of curing ſome diſeaſes, and no way to be reputed incredible: conſidering, that wee finde by other ſtranger meanes, very great infirmities haue likewiſe beene holpen. Plutarch, in a notable Treatiſe by him compoſed, declaring how men may deriue profite or benefite from their enemies, reporteth; that a man had a certaine enemy, named Promotheus, who hated him extremely, and ſought all the meanes he could deuiſe to kill him. It fortuned, that meeting with him on a day, hee gaue him diuers hurts, and among the reſt, hee chanced to wound an olde vlcer, that had long lyen in the fleſh, couered ouer with skinne, a matter of great danger to his life, and (for which) all helpe was vtterly denyed him. Neuertheleſſe, this wound prooued the onely meanes of his helpe, and ſafe deliuerance from the former dãger: for in thinking to kill him, and ſo to quench his malice, hee gaue him life and ſoundneſſe of health. Valerius reciteth the very ſame hiſtory (among other noteworthy matters) in his Booke of miracles: but he affirmeth the mans name that was healed by this wound, to bee Iaſon Phereus.

Pliny writeth of another man, named Phalereus, who had an incurable diſeaſe, in regard of a fluxe of blood, continually flowing out at his mouth, cauſed by breaking a veine within his body. And finding himſelfe in deſperate condition of any curing; he entred ſuddenly into an Army, without any Armes for his defence, that being there ſlaine among the enemies, his hope and helpe might both finiſh together. It came to paſſe, that receiuing a dangerous wound vpon the breaſt, there iſſued forth ſuch an abundance of blood from that hurt; that the fluxe (hauing formerly his vent at the mouth only) ceaſſed, and Chyrurgions afterward, with the aduice of skilfull Phyſitions, conſolidating the broken veine, hee remained ſoundly healed of all harmes.

Wine the profitableſt of all other liquors.

IF all the fruites which the earth yeeldeth (I mean thoſe wherof liquor is made) there is none (in my iudgement) more profitable then good wine; prouided, that it be temperately taken. For this cauſe was it that Anacharſis ſayd, The Vine produceth three Grapes: The firſt of Pleaſure: The ſecond of Drunkenneſſe: And the third of Teares and Sadneſſe. So that hee which paſſeth the firſt Cuppe, that is to ſay, a little, and moderatly receiued, proceedeth on to ſhame and danger.

Prophane Authours, that neuer had any vnderſtanding of the ſacred Scriptures, doe name vs diuerſe inuenters of wine. Diodorus Siculus, in his fourth book attributeth the inuention of wine, and firſt planting of the Vine, to Dionyſius the ſonne of Iupiter, named Bacchus, and Liber pater, ſo ſtyled, for the liberty of wine. For this inuention a Temple was erected to him, vnderneath the Capitoll at Rome: where they celebrated his Feaſtes, which were called Dionyſians, or Bacchanalians, very diſhoneſt, and full of great lubricity. That the inuention came from theſe Dionyſians, Virgill giueth aſſurance, at the entrance into his ſecond booke of Georgickes. Howbeit, Marcianus Capellus ſaith, that Dionyſius only inſtructed the Greeks, in the manner of making wine. Others ſay, that Icarius father to Erigone, firſt taught the induſtry of making wine to the Athenians: and becomming afterwards drunke thereby, the people ſlew him. In Italie, they ſay, that Saturne did firſt plant the Vine there, and brought the yoong ſuckers and plants from the Iſle of Candie thither. And Plutarke writeth, that Arrus Hetruſcus brought Vines firſt into France. But the trueth of hiſtorie, is, that the firſt inuenter of wine, was Noah, and the firſt that made himſelfe drunke therewith: whereof are Authours (beſides that which is recorded in the ninth chapter of Geneſis) Lactantius, Firmianus, and Ioſephus. Noah, at his comming forth of the Arke, planted the Vine with his owne proper hand, and drunke the iuyce of the raiſin, whereby he became drunke: and diſcouering his nakednеſſe in ſleeping, it happened to him by his ſonnes, according as we reade in the ſame chapter of Geneſis.

The odour of wine commended by natural philosophers. commended (beyond all other odours) by our naturall Philosophers: because it is very comfortatiue, giueth great vigour to the spirites, and is exceeding liuely and piercing. But yet wee must consider withall, that the chiefe vertue of wine is euermore vnderstood, when it is qualified and made temperate.

Wine denied to women and children. Valer. Maxim. in libr.2. Plin.li.14. ca.8. The ancient Romanes did wholly take away the vse of wine from women and children: as Valerius sayth, speaking of the customes and lawes of the Romanes. So that, as Plinie affirmeth, at such time as Romulus reigned in Rome, a husband slew his wife, because shee had drunke wine; and in regard that the murder followed vpon this occasion, Romulus pardoned it. The vice of drinking wine, was held to be so odious in women, that Fabius Pictor in lib.3.cap.9. Fabius Pictor reporteth, because a Romane woman had deceiued the Clarke of a celler, onely to drinke wine which was kept therein; her parents caused her to be starued to death. And heereupon grew the

The causing of parents kissing their childrens mouths. custome of fathers and mothers kissing their children on the mouthes; onely to perceiue therby, whether they had drunk wine or no. We finde it in good record, that N. Domitius being Iudge of Rome, he depriued a woman of her Dowry, because shee had drunke more wine, then was allowed her for her health. Salomon

Prou.31.4,5. in his Prouerbs sayth, It is not for Kings to drinke wine, or Princes strong drinke, lest he drinke and forget the Decree, and change the iudgement of all the children of affliction. And yet we reade, that the Kings of Ægypt were permitted to drinke wine, so it were moderately, and in a certayne measure.

The words of Romulus king of Rome. Auic.in lib.3. Vpon a time, Romulus beeing then King of Rome, and inuited to a bountifull banquet; he would drinke but very little wine, saying; To morrow I am to determine a matter of great importance. Auicen sayth; In giuing children wine to drinke, it is an addition of fire to fire. Aristot. in lib.9 Plato in lib.2.de Legibus. Aristotle expressely forbad the giuing of wine to children, and likewise to the Nurses that gaue them sucke. Plato by the laws which he made in his Booke, for the common-wealth, although he seemes in the first book, to admit a tolleration of wines, yet in the second he sayth; A man ought to drink a litle, and well qualified. This allowance stretcht

From forty yeares vpward, hee permitted that a little more then hee had formerly demaunded, should be giuen him; to make the colde and melancholy disposition (of that age) the more temperate; and yet it must bee doone in a certayne measure too. It was Auicen vbi sup. Gal. in tract.1. consenteth. Alexander Aphrodiseus sayth in his Problemes, Hee which drinketh nothing but water onely, hath his sight and other sences more liuely, then he that drinketh wine.

Alexan.Aphrod. in Problem. Now, as concerning in what fashion and maner, wine should be tempered and qualified; there are many rules, and diuersities sities of opinions. Hesiodus the Greek Poet saith, That in one quarte of wine there should be three quarts of water mingled. Atheneus sayth, that the auncient Greekes vsed to put fiue partes of water into two partes of wine, and most times three parts of water, into one of wine, which is the rule of Hesiodus. Heere also is to be obserued, that the Greekes did not put water into their wine, but wine into water, and Theophrastus assureth vs, that by this way, both the one and the other are much the better mingled. Moreouer, auncient men did not onely moderate wine in this manner, but albeit it was thus tempered, they would drinke very little thereof. Eubulus the Greeke Poet doth affirme, introducing Bacchus, to speake thus vnto the Sages: I will neuer make more then three giftes of wine: The first, for health: The second, for taste: And the third, for sleepe; the rest sauoureth of disorder and drunkennesse. Apuleius Paniasis, who wrote of meates, deliuereth the like Iudgement, attributing this maner to three seuerall daughters. The first, to the Graces: The second, to Venus: And the third, to shame and danger. Iulius Cæsar was very temperate in drinking wine: as Suetonius witnesseth by the testimonie of Cato, who was vtter enemie to Cæsar. Demosthenes, the excellent Oratour, was the like. And Apollonius Thyaneus of whom so many famous things are written, did neuer drinke any Wine, or feede vpon flesh.

In our Christian Religion, temperance (in drinking) is much commended. Saint Iames the lesser, did neuer drinke wine, or strong drinke, nor did euer eate any flesh; immitating Laint Iohn the Baptist. Wee finde the like affirmed of Saint Stephen, King of Portugall. Iosephus in his Antiquities commending the holinesse of the Esseans, (who helde one of the three Sects amongst the Iewes, whereof the other two were Pharises and Saduces) sayth: That the Esseans did neuer drinke wine. In an Epistle Saint Hierome reproued Priestes, that addicted themselues to drinke wine, telling them, That Saint Paul the Apostle did forbid it, and that in the ancient Law, such as serued in the Temple, did not drinke wine, or any other drinke that might procure drunkennesse.

Such as are tearmed good drinkers, vse to say, that good wine ought to haue foure properties, to answere foure sences or vnderstandings of the body: To the taste, by sauour: To the smell, by a perfect odour: To the sight, by a neate and cleare colour: And to the eare, by a good report of the Countrey where it was made. Of this good wine men vse to make vineger, which hath many good properties and inconueniences likewise: wherein I will be silent, because they are matters too vulgar and common.

Foure seuerall properties necessarily required to be in good wine.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of many dammages and daungers, which ensue by the immoderate drinking of wine. And how it hath beene held as a healthfull thing (by some Phisitions) to be drunke sometimes.

ALthough the liquor called Wine, be apt and wholesome for diuers infirmities: yet notwithstanding, so many harmes and annoyances do arise, from the excessiue immoderate taking thereof, that the euills doe superabound all the goods ensuing thereby. So that it appeareth, that it were better not to know it, but rather to content our selues with water, which God hath giuen vs for our drinke; because hee thought nothing meeter for vs, and all other creatures doe well content themselues therewith. Heereto also may be added, that wine hath beene the onely occasion, by which many haue become distracted in their sences; some haue lost their liues, and others not meanely endaungered the saluation of their soules.

All creatures but man onlie doe well satisfie themselues with the drinking of water.

Now, although the harmes ensuing to men (by Wine) are too apparently knowne: yet notwithstanding, they are so far from shunning & auoyding them, that they daily seeke after new occasions, and strange deuised appetites for drinking. And in our best French language, these new appetites are titled by some;

New deuises daily inuented to procure appetites for drinking.

A ſpur or prouocation to a cup of wine; by others, A ſhooing horne, to draw on a quart or two of good wine, ſo that a ſlice of a Gambone of Bacon, is held (in this caſe) for a precious relique, and few hours in the day or night doth paſſe ouer them, but the cup is kiſt with ſound deuotion in drinking; ſometimes taking fiue or ſixe cups more then are neceſſary. Pliny ſaieth, there are ſome men, who will drinke before they be thirſty, and wine onely (among all other drinkes) hath this property, to cauſe it ſelfe to be drunke, before a man haue any need of it. He ſaith moreouer, that ſome do drinke in ſuch ſort as they iuſtly deſerue; for it giues them (immediately) the due puniſhment to ſuch ſinne: for the vapour mounting vp into the braine, bereaueth them of all vnderſtanding, ſo that they remaine as mē ſenſeleſſe. And hauing plaid it off luſtily (as they vſe to tearme it) for ſome quantity of time: it plaieth with them as the Cat doth with the Mouſe, either kils them outright, or (at leaſt) engendereth ſo many harmes and infirmities, as are much worſe then death it ſelfe; as Gouts, Palſies in the head, hands and feete, imbrodering the eyes with a ſcarlet coulor, burning vp the Liuer, and fiering the face, beſide diuers other ſuch vndecent and ſcarſe-grace-full qualities, no way fit to be vſed among mē indeed.

The benefit of immoderate drinking

Cato ſaid, Drunkenneſſe is a voluntary folly. And Pliny ſaith, It confoundeth the memory, and procureth dreadfull dreames. Seneca, writing to Lucullus, ſaieth: Wine maketh the legges and armes impotent, and cauſeth men to become luxurious. Dyoniſius Areopagita, alleadging Plato to haue ſpoken the words, ſaith: Drunkenneſſe is a liuely and merry Minſtrill, and yet it makes our legges to faile vnder vs, giuing (as wee vſe to ſay in France) a trip to our heeles, and laying vs along on the ground. Saint Paul writing vnto the Epheſians, aduiſed them to ſhunne wine, becauſe therein is luxury. And Salomon in his Prouerbs, among the imperfections of wine, ſaith; It is a deceiuer, and whoſoeuer drinketh exceſſiuely thereof, cannot conceale a ſecret faithfully. Heereupon then aroſe the ancient Prouerbe; That wine walketh without any ſhooes; that is to ſay, It treadeth ſecretly, ſoftly, and without any noyſe, becauſe no one ſhould perceiue the power thereof, nor how it diſcouereth our ſecret and vicious qualities. To this purpoſe the Poet Æſchylus ſaide: A Glaſſe or Mirrour maketh knowne the geſtures of the body, and wine ſerueth as a Glaſſe to the ſoule & heart of a man. Plato likewiſe ſaid: Wine principally laieth open the manner and conditions of euery man. We haue example thereof in Noah and Lot, for Noah being drunk with wine, diſcouered his parts of ſhame, whereby he became mocked and ſcorned. And againſt Lot, Sodome could haue no power; but wine ouercame him, & made him to lye with his owne Daughters: theſe are the benefits enſuing by wine.

Ariſtotle in his Problems, yeeldeth a reaſon, why ſuch men as are ouer-much addicted to wine, are greatly diſabled in the begetting of children: and likewiſe, why ſome drunkards are very pleaſant in their drinke; and others terrible, ſome ſad and weeping, others iocond and dancing.

Ariſt. in Prob.

Neuertheleſſe, ſome Phyſitions (among whō are Auicene and Raſis) haue helde opinion, that it is a wholſome thing to be drunke ſometimes: but the reaſons which they giue in this caſe, doth not cōtent me any way, neyther doe I allow of their opinion. And yet I muſt needes confeſſe, that very great perſonages haue beene ſubiected to wine: whereas on the contrary, if they had ſtood cleare and free from it, their glory and renowne had bin farre greater.

Alexander the Great, was as greatly taxed with this vice, ſo that (as diuers good Hiſtorians do affirme) being ouercome with this fury; he ſlew one of his moſt intimate friends; and comming (afterward) to acknowledgement of his fault, he would haue ſlaine himſelfe. Beſide, it is further alledged, that the cheefeſt cauſe of his murders and ſlaughters, was onely this poyſon to all goodneſſe.

Marke

Marke Anthony, who was one of the three cheefe Commanders in Rome, and married with the Sister to Octauius the Emperour: being addicted to wine, and (consequently) to lasciuiousnesse, with Cleopatra Queene of Egypt; lost at length both his state and life, and was vanquished by Octauius, because hee suffered himselfe to be conquered by wine. The Emperour Tiberius was defectiue in many things; but in regard hee was a great drinker, it was the sole cause of all his other imperfections: and whereas his name was Tiberius, as a nick-name, they would often call him Biberius, and his ende was miserable.

Tiberius the great drinker called also Biberius.

Dionysius the younger.

Dionysius the younger, a Tyrant of Sicily, was so extremely affected to wine; that it did eate his eyes, and made him to become starke blinde. Cleomedes, King of the Spartanes, would needs pursue and imitate the Scythians, in excessiue drinking of wine: but in the end, he became a foole, quite insensed, and without iudgement. It is saide, that the Philosopher Archesilaus died in notorious drunkennesse.

The Poet Anacreon was a very great drinker, and as he was drinking, he strangled or choaked himselfe, with the stone of a Grape or Raisin, which entred into his throate vnaduisedly.

Anacreon the Poet.

Flauius the Bishop, an Historian of worthy credite, writeth, that the Emperor Bonosus was so addicted to wine, that Aurelianus said of him: Hee was not borne to liue, but to drinke. And heerein hee had an admirable quality, for notwithstanding the immeasurable quantity of wine, which he dranke daily, yet hee was neuer drunke. I guesse that this ensued, by his continuall auoydance of vrine, which went from him as fast, as hee tooke in his wine. Neuertheless, his ende was answerable to his deseruing, for beeing vanquished by the Emperour Probus, he was hanged or strangled. It is recorded, that King Antiochus, who was conquered by the Romanes, vsed to drink so much wine, that he slept the most part of his time. In regard whereof, he gaue the cheefest authority of his kingdomes gouernment, to two of his choysest fauourites, and because himselfe was addicted to banquets, and the amorous embracings of a young Gentlewoman: when he came to fight against the Romanes, his Army became broken, and vtterly vanquished. Atheneus writeth, that Aeschylus the Greeke Poet, would diuers times be drunk, whervpon Sophocles said vnto him. Aeschilus, those things which thou diuinest or writest, are done by chance, or at aduenture: and not by any knowledge remaining in thee, or that thou dost rightly vnderstand them.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Certaine aduises and enstructions, against such forward affection to Wine. And some reasons deliuered, why two things doe appeare to bee three, to such as bee drunke.

Some haue said (how certainely I know not) that there are diuers receits, wherby Wine, in how great a quantity soeuer it be taken and drunke, shall not procure those yrkesome effects, which are related in the former Chapter.

Pliny and Solinus do both of them affirme, that there is a blacke Stone, hauing Vermillion coullored veynes in it, and named Dionise, which hath such a property, as if it bee layde in water, it yeeldeth the perfect sauour and relliſh of wine; and whosoeuer drinketh of that water, euen so much as himselfe pleaseth, shall neuer be drunke therewith. Physitions say, that if a man will preuent drunkennesse; he must first eate Honye, or some other sweete things: And hee that is drunke, must be vrged to vomite, and then giue him a morsell of bread steeped in Honye, which will immediately recouer him, because Honye hindereth all vapours from ascending vppe into the Head.

admirable phyſick, to preſerue him from being drunke, albeit he daily drank more wine then any other one man of his time: for he could out-drinke all commers, yet neuer be drunke, or bereft of his iudgement. But in the ende it was knowne, that (vſually) before hee entred drinking, he would eate fiue or ſixe bitter almonds, whoſe power and naturall property was ſuch, as it impeached the wine from alienating his ſpirits. And experience thereof was afterward made, for when they abridged him from the meanes of eating bitter Almonds, and he vſing to drinke as formerly he did; he became as ſoon drunk as any other man. That theſe Almonds haue this peculiar property, Pliny affirmeth it, adding further; that eating a Raddiſh roote before hard drinking, auoideth drunkenneſſe. He ſaith alſo, that Colewortes eaten before hand, keepeth a man from being diſtempered with wine: and being eaten after drunkenneſſe, they remoue inſtantly the diſtemperature, as Saffron alſo hath the ſelfe-ſame power. Ther are many other remedies for this imperfection, wherein I will be ſilent; ſpeaking onely of one, recited by Pliny. He ſaith, that taking a quantity of wine, mingled with the egges of a Chough, and, beeing drunke two or three mornings together, he that drinketh it, will hate wine in ſuch ſort, as he will neuer after drinke thereof. Heere to he addeth, that a Swallow being taken and burned to aſhes, then beaten into powder and mingled with a little Myrrhe in the wine; whoſoeuer receyueth a draught of this potion, ſhall neuer be drunke, for this was experimented by Horus, King of Aſſyria.

Ariſtotle, in the third part of his Problems, and Auicenne, in his ſixt Booke of Beaſts, do yeeld a reaſon, why in drunkenneſſe, when a man looketh vpon any one thing, it appeares to him as if it were two, and albeit they doe both produce diuers reaſons, yet will I alledge but one from each of them. The firſt ſhall be Ariſtotles, who ſaith, that thorow exceſſiue heat of vapours in the wine, aſcending vp into the braine; the little nerues, called Optici nerui*, which go on directly to the eyes, do worke and mooue with ſuch power, that the viſiall vertue, and the ſpirits of ſight (altering in their motion) do cauſe whatſoeuer drunken men gaze on, to ſtirre very ſtrongly and quicke; becauſe the Organe of ſight moueth it ſelfe in that manner, and maketh the common ſenſe to receiue the Images of things, in a multiplyed quality to the eye. For ſuch kinde of motion, maketh ſingle things to ſeeme double, and becauſe this motion is ſo ſudden and inſenſible, it cauſeth two things to ſeeme as one to the ſight. As any man may eaſily make tryall of, by laying his finger vpon his eye-lid, and then remouing it thence, it will appeare to him, that it is the thing remoueth it ſelfe, which he beholdeth. Auicenne deliuereth another reaſon, ſaying: The vapours of wine, which aſcend vp into the head of him that is drunke, are moiſt, and becauſe the little nerues and muſcles which reach to the eyes, doe engroſſe or ſwell themſelues by this humidity; ſo much more the one (then the other) doe thereby mount themſelues, the one higher, and the other lower. From hence enſueth, that the viſible rayes do not equally diuide themſelues foorth-right from both the eyes, neither by a direct or right line: which is the cauſe, that the Images of things viſible, doe extend to eyther eye by themſelues. In this reſpect only, things ſimple and ſingle, appeare to be double, the commō ſenſe receyuing & apprehending two images for one: and for the maintenance of this opinion, Auicenne yeeldeth the ſelfeſame example, as Ariſtotle did.

required to be well apprehended. Neuertheleſſe, I am the more willing to ſpeake ſomewhat of the argument, onely for the delight and contentment of ſuch mindes, as are enclined to the Science whereof it diſcourſeth. Wherefore concetning our preſent purpoſe, it is needfull to preſuppoſe, the firſt and cheefe Elements of ſuch a Science: which becauſe they are common, ſhal require the leſſe labor to proue them. The firſt is that whereof wee are now treating, the greatneſſe of the earth, carrying with it both Land and Sea: becauſe God did diſpoſe them in ſuch manner, when he ſaid; Let the dry land appeare, for they both being vnited togither, made one body perfectly round. So likewiſe is it to bee vnderſtoode in all thoſe actions which are giuen to the earth, the Sea is alſo therein comprized: For, when a man ſayth, the earth hath ſo many degrees in roundneſſe, or it containeth ſo many degrees from one place to another; the ſea is therein as well vnderſtood as the land. So in like manner are conſidered the Ecclipſes, heights and breadths, to hold one and the ſame certitude: and yet notwithſtanding, Mountaines, and Valleyes are not comprehended in this roundure, nor Woodes or Forreſts likewiſe, which the earth contayneth in it ſelfe; becauſe ſuch things are not woorthie of any account, with the greatneſſe of this wonderful bodie.

This rotundity of Land and Water, is ſeated in the midſt of the circuite of Heauen, in ſuch manner, as the point & center of that round body, compoſed of Sea and Land, is likewiſe the center and number of the whole world, as well of heauen, as of the Elements. Ouer and beſide this definition, there is another, true and abſolute, to wit, that the land and water (in regard of the ſtarry heauen, which we call the Firmament) are ſo little; that all theſe two Elements ſerue thereto but for a center, and is euen but as a ſmall point, in reſpect of his circumference. So that in whatſoeuer part thereof a man beſt liketh to helpe himſelfe, by meanes of a Quadrant or an Aſtrolabe; his labour ſorteth to the like effect, as if hee made the ſame for the center of the earth. For in whatſoeuer place of the earth we are (prouided that it be not in any deepe or hollow bottome) we ſhall diſcouer the moity of heauen; which proceedeth by reaſon of the incomprehenſible diſtance, that is from hence beneath vp to the Firmament, with his incompareable greatneſſe. That this muſt needs be true, it is moſt euident, that the verie leaſt Starre which we diſcerne in heauen, is much more greater then the whole earth; and yet neuertheleſſe, it appeareth to vs but as a ſmall point, in regard of the heauens large ſpaciouſneſſe; by the leaſt of which things, a man may make proofe in ſufficient demonſtration, but it ſuffiſeth that experience hath apparantly ſhewne the ſame.

The leaſt Star is greater thẽ all the earth, by euident proofe.

This then being thus preſuppoſed, let vs imagine in our mindes, that the water and Land do make one round circkle, and that heauen is another, but much more great, as indeede it is; and that theſe two circles haue no other, but one common center within them. Which being ſo imagined, let vs lay two lines of equall greatneſſe, which may extend themſelues (in common) to the circumferences of al the two circles, according as Euclides enſtructeth, cutting and diuiding the two Circles by equall portions, each portion being iuſtly equalled, in regard of each one of them: that is to ſay, that if thoſe two lines paſſe on right in ſuch manner, they will make eight parts of a great circle, and ſo ſhall make as much of the leſſer, I vnderſtand and meane each eight part, in reſpect of each ones greatneſſe.

How this matter may bee eaſily imagined in the minde of man

Euclides in lib. 4. de Elsment.

Our elders in former times, in theyr manner of meaſuring the world, gaue aduice to diuide the heauen into three hundred and threeſcore equall partes, which we do now cal degrees, & by conſequent, the roundneſſe of the earth into as manie parts, by imaginations of lines, parting from the center, and making the diuiſion in ſuch manner, that the like quantitie which each one of the degrees hath, in reſpect of the whole heauen; the verie like ſhal be that of each one of the degrees for the earth, hauing regard to the roundure and circuite thereof. And as theſe portions or degrees, if you pleaſe ſo to terme them, them, are equal among themſelues, ſo that ſome one may appeare to contayne the ſcope of miles; the like may be eaſily gathered, by multiplying what diſtance is contained in all the reſt. To know then the nature of a degree, they made this obſeruation. The Pole is a fixed point in heauen, whereon the whole heauen maketh his mouing, yet it remaineth firme & ſtable. Therefore with an Aſtrolabe, or any other inſtrument proper therto, being in ſome apt vncouered place, they would take the height which the Pole contained aboue the Horizon, within the limite of the ſelfeſame ſight, and noting the place which appeared conuenable to the eleuation or height of the foreſaide Pole: they went directly on thereto, without wandering to the Meridian, vntill ſuch time (as with the ſelfeſame inſtrument) they found it in one degree more higher, then in the firſt place, and therby they knew, that they had gone one degree of the earth frō that place whence they firſt parted, iuſt to that ground where they were arriued, conſidering, that they had paced by the reſpect of heauen, in regarde of the fore-named rules of both the circles. Then they would meaſure that which this degree contayned, either by Stades, or thouſands of paces; and this being thus knowne by them, they would make their account after this manner. If one degree contained ſo many miles, the whole roundnes of the earth did containe as many: conſidering, that therein was to be obſerued three hundred and threeſcore degrees, ſuch and as great as the ſame were. This was the forme and manner by them obſerued, and it may wel bee continued to theſe times, for meaſuring of the whole earth, as being the moſt certaine and infallible.

The greatnes of eacn degree within it ſelf, howmuch it containeth.

And yet neuertheleſſe we are to know, what greatneſſe each degree of the earth containeth in it ſelfe, and ſo (by conſequent) how much it tendeth to in the rotundity, meaſuring it according vnto the whole greatneſſe; anſwerable to the experience of both ancient and modern men, skilfull, and well ſtudied therein. The moſt common opinion of all other, is; that each degree or portion of three hundred and threeſcore, containeth fiue hundred Stades of ground, and euery Stade is valewed to ſix ſcore and fiue paces by our Geometricians, and according to theyr Geometrical paces, each pace containing as much as two of our common paces. So that the degree containes ſixty two thouſand and an halfe, which amount to ſixtie two thouſand Geometricall paces. Ptolomy auoucheth the ſame; as the like doeth Martianus Capellus, and the moſt part of the wiſeſt ancient Coſmographers: beſide, this is the opinion in common, of the greater part of our moderne men.

The knowledge of a Stade by Geometrical paces.

Ptolem. in lib. 1 de Geograph. Mar Capellus, in lib. 1. cap. 7.

Orontius Phineus holdeth the ſame iudgment, and ſayeth, that this may eaſily bee experimented by trauailing from Paris to Tholouſe. Glareanus, & Anthony de Lebrix, being both of them learned men, and diligent ſearchers into theſe matters: they do both affirme, that they haue made the like experience, holding the ſame for moſt certaine. Albeit Eratoſthenes, and ſome other Græcians hold opinion, that all degrees had ſeauen hundred Stades: wheerin (it may ſeeme) they were abuſed, by meaſuring their places ouerſhort. I ſay then, that each of their degrees, conſiſting of three hundred and ſixty, far off from fiue hundred Stades: the whol three hundred and ſixty, wil containe togither, twenty two thouſand, and fiue hundred thouſand paces, which do make an hundred and eighty thouſand Stades. By the which account, the round compas of the whole earth, comprehending therein the whole machine of water, beeing reduced to a thouſand paces, will containe twentie two millions, and fiue hundred thouſand paces. And if you would know how many French leagues or miles the whole Earth containeth, we muſt then allow vnto each League, the length of two Italian miles. Then, if we diuide twenty two thouſand, fiue hundred paces in twaine, we ſhal find that the circuite of the earth, contayneth eleuen thouſand, two hundred and fiftie Leagues of France. And if we diuide thē by foure; all the enuironing of the Earth, will containe fiue thouſand, ſixe hundred, and twentie fiue miles of Germanie; for four Italian miles, do make but one Germaine mile. Thus haue we diſcourſed on the earths dimenſion, according vnto the moſt common opinion receiued among men.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the reason, why Snow (being couered with straw) doth preserue it selfe in his entire coldnesse, and warme water in his heate: considering, that two contrary effects are wrought by one and the selfesame thing: with some other secrets beside.

The works of Nature yeeld great benefite by their knowledge.

TO men of spirite, such as affect the contemplation of Natures workes, nothing can so lightly present it self, or appeare to bee of so slender esteeme; but some one notable matter or other may be found therein, to yeild contentment to their mindes, after they haue attained to the knowledge thereof. No doubt but there are many men, of whom if it were demanded, vppon vvhat occasion, Snow (beeing couered with straw) conserueth it selfe (for long time) in his true coldnesse, and without melting, they hardly knew how to make anie answer. Whereunto Alexander Aphrodiseus, that excellent Peripatetian, maketh this reply. Straw hath no manifest or known quality at all, for it is neither hot nor colde; therefore diuers haue reputed and termed it, to be a thing without any quality. For this cause, beeing a matter so singularly temperate and delicate, euen as reaching to such a degree, that it may well be saide to be neither hot nor colde; it easily conuerteth it selfe into the quality of anie such thing, as is thereto annexed. So that couering or laying Snow therein, which is colde, the straw apprehendeth the colde quality thereof, and by that means is holpen and assisted, in the true coldnesse of Snow: euen as a thing of one qualitie aydeth another, without yeelding any heate thereto, because it is not in it selfe. Therefore, snow being accompanied vvith his owne coldnesse, & defended against heat, which straw preserueth against the lest entrance; it is thus conserued in his entyre condition for long time, euen as if it were not couered with straw at all.

Snow couerd with Strawe, keepeth his naturall coldnesse.

Alex. Aphrodis. in lib. 1. cap. 5.

Straw a thing without any quality at all, yet apprehendeth the quality of any thing therewith conioyned.

By the selfesame reason, a contrarie effect happeneth in warme or hotte water; defending the ayre that it cannot coole it, for it being likewise couered with Strawe, the strawe immediately entertaineth the quality of the warme water; and being so sodainly heated, it helpeth & conserueth the water in his warmth, and keepeth the ayre off, that else would coole it. The same reason guides vs to vnderstand other doubts and difficulties, which some curious questionists may impose vpon vs, like vnto those before alledged. I am sure wee are not to learn, that ouer and beside our inward naturall heate, that which occasioneth our warmnesse in Summer time, is the ayre onely, which (in that season) is much more hot then in any other time of the yeare; so that the warmer the ayre is, so much the more are we sensible of heat. If it be so then, how commeth it to passe, that we feele more freshnesse and coolenesse, and lesse heate, when wee take the ayre in Sommer, and in mouing and walking to receiue it; considering, that (according to Aristotle) Motion, or mooving, causeth our heate to be the greater? For the ayre, by reason of this agitation, must needs cause the more warmnesse both in it selfe and vs, then if wee rested and sate in quiet.

A contrary effect wroght by the same means to hot water, keeping it in his entire heate.

The Ayre is more hote in Sommer, then all the yeare else beside.

Aristot. in lib. 2. de anim. cap. 7.

The reason ensueth thus: VVee haue then more warmth in our bodyes, then there is in the ayre: as wel in regard of our owne naturall heat, as also that which the ayre worketh in vs. For the ayre coming with a fresh and coole gale (I speake this because it is more temperate then we are) it maketh vs some-what the more temperate: but being still and neere vs, it warmeth it selfe in our heate. Euen in the like manner as we haue spoken of straw; for so it conserueth (yea augmenteth) our heate in vs; albeit, when it is stirred, and freshly mooued, in comming more temperately vpon vs, then we our selues are; that temperature and difference which wee then feele of lesser heate, doth in the like manner qualifie and moderate ours in vs. This is the answere of the fore-named Alexander, but especially of Aristotle, vnto this question.

More heat in our bodyes in Sommer time then is in the Ayre.

How the quality in straw is alluded to our bodies.

Neuertheless, it is to bee noted, that if we find an ayre more hot then that wherin we dwell; agitation or stirring in such an ayre will not prooue so good as our owne, because wee shall there feele farre greater heate, as in diuers places oftentimes we do. An argument in this case, may Difference of the Ayre in heat, & harme thereby ensuing.

may bee framed by hotte water, that if a man put his hand raſhly thereinto, he can hardly ſuffer or endure it. Notwithſtanding, let him hold it firmely therein, and it yeeldeth then leſſe cauſe of paſſion then if he mooued it vp and downe. In regard, that the leſſer part of the water enuironeth the coole hand, whereby it cauſeth ſome ſmall temperature round about it: but being plunged and mooued about the water, it reneweth freſh heate, and at each time appropriateth new power to it ſelfe; for the more potent, muſt needes worke nouelly vppon that which is much weaker.

Example of a mans hand in hot water, for heate or temperature.

It may be likewiſe demanded, for what cauſe it is more hot at the end of Iune, & all along the moneth of Iuly, the Sun being then the furtheſt off from vs, then it is at the beginning of Iune; conſidering we are then in the Solſtice of the Sunne, and more directly ſmitten with his beames? Heereunto anſwereth Ariſtotle, in his ſecond Booke of Meteors, and the ninth Chapter, that the heate of the Sunne is not the cauſe thereof, neyther is there any more heate felt by the Sunnes beeing neereſt to vs, then when hee hath longeſt time to abide ouer vs. For in the months of Iune and Iuly, hee hath a great length of time in approaching towards vs; as alſo in declining, hee cauſeth the greater heate, becauſe (in deſcending) he re-heateth that part and tract of the ayre, which hee formerly had well warmed in mounting aloft.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of ſodaine death hapning vnto diuers great Perſons, that haue thereto bene wiſhed or threatned, by ſuch as they haue vniuſtlie put to death before, and their deaths haue enſued to them in ſuch manner, & at ſuch times, as haue beene aſſigned vnto them: With the notable hiſtory of an Archbyſhop of Mentz or Magonce.

God neuer failed in the iuſt cauſe of wronged innocents, to lend his help, when al power in man hath fayled.

WHen all helpe in man hath ceaſed, concerning ſuch to whom great wrongs and iniuries haue bene done; yet the powerfull arme of God hath neuer failed them. And albeit it hath not enſued ſo ſpeedily, or elſe ſo viſibly as they could haue wiſhed; yet GOD, who knoweth both how and when to be auenged on them that are the oppreſſors of innocents, hath wrought ſo graciouſlie for his own glory; that trecheries haue come to light in due and meete times, & mens falſe iudgements haue felt his ſeuere condemnation, and publikely enough for other mens forewarning. In this caſe wee could alleadge many memorable examples; but beeing loth to trouble you with ouer many, theſe few commendable Collections ſhall ſerue for this time.

I read of a Knight amongeſt the Templers (of whome wee haue ſpoken in our former Volume) who beeing (in the opinion of many) ſentenced to death verie vniuſtly; as the Officers led him towardes the place of execution, hee eſpyed Pope Clement, the fift of that name (by vvhoſe meanes he was condemned to death) looking out at a window; and by him ſtoode Phillip le Bel, then King of France. The Knight being an Italian, borne at Naples, beholding the Pope with an vndaunted countenance, with a lowde voyce ſpake thus vnto him.

The hiſtory of a Knight Templer, put to death vniuſtly.

Moſt cruell Clement, ſeeing that there is no Iudge in this world, before whome a poore innocent man may call in queſtion the vniuſt ſentence which thou haſt giuen againſt mee. I appeale from thee, a moſt vniuſt Iudge, to the vprighteſt Iudge of all other, Ieſus Chriſt himſelfe, before whom I giue thee warning, and likewiſe King Phillip there by thee, to make your appearance, to anſwere the falſe iudgement of death which you haue giuen againſt me. This appearance of yours before the Tribunall ſeate of God, I do aſſigne to bee made within leſſe then a yeare, to do me right there, where I may ſafely haue my cauſe determined, without any auarice or paſſion at all, as here you both haue dealt with me. The poore Knights deſire ſorted with his wordes, for about the ſame limited time, the Pope being pained with a great greefe in his ſtomack, died; ſo did K. Philip: but howſoeuer it hapned, it was thought to proceed from the iuſt iudgement of God.

being no way to bee diſſwaded from this violent cruelty, either by teares, intreats, or earneſt ſolicitations; they (in very like manner) cited the King before the Tribunall of Ieſus Chriſt, and to make his appearance within thirty dayes. And it is credibly auouched, that on the laſt of thoſe thirty dayes, the King dyed.

Baptiſt. Fulgoſ. in lib. 2. cap 9. The hiſtorie of a Captaine belonging to the Geneweyes, who cruelly put to death another innocent Captaine.

The like lot alſo befell to a Captain of the Gallies, which belonged to the inhabitants of Geneway, whereof Baptiſta Fulgoſo maketh this report. This Captaine making a ſally forth vpon the Sea, tooke a Foyſt or ſmal Gally appertaining to them of Cathelogna; wherein there was another Captaine that neuer had done any iniurie to the Geneweyes. Notwithſtanding, in regard of the malice which the Geneweyes bare to the Cathelognians, hee gaue command, that this Captaine thus taken priſoner, ſhould forthwith be hanged. The Captaine, ſhedding many teares, humbly requeſted, that he might not ſo ſhamefully be put to death, conſidering that he had neuer offended him, or his Nation. But in the end, finding no fauour or mercy in him, he made his recourſe to the Diuine Iudge of al men, ſpeaking thus to the cruell Captaine; Seeing thou wilt needes execute on me this moſt vniuſt ſentence, I haue no other friend but God to appeale vnto, who is the iuſt auenger of iniuried innocents. And therefore I humbly deſire, that (this inſtant day) thy ſoule may appeare with mine before him, to yeeld an account for the wrong thou haſt done me. Not many houres, after the Geneway Captaine alſo dyed, and doubtleſſe went to render a reaſon for his moſt extreme cruelty.

I could alledge many examples more, aptly ſuted to this purpoſe; but for the ſtrangeſt of all, I will relate what hapned at Magonce or Mentz in Germany, which generally coſt moſt deare vnto the whole Citty, according as it is briefely reported by Gontier, that renowned Poet, who wrot the life and actions of the Emperour Fredericke, firſt of that name. Conradus alſo the Byſhop, declareth the ſame in his hiſtory, among many things hapning in the time of that Fredericke, and of Henrie the ſixt his ſonne; the Hiſtory enſueth in this manner.

Gontierus in lib de Vit. Fred. Imperat. Conrad. Epiſc. in Hiſt. de Reb. diuerſ.

The hiſtory of Henry arch biſhoppe of Mentz in Germanie.

In the Citty of Magonce or Mentz in Germany, in the yeare one thouſand, fiue hundred and fifty, little more or leſſe, ther liued an Arch Byſhop, named Henrie, a man ſingular in all vertues. This Archbyſhop, according to the duty and office of a faithfull Paſtor, as indeed hee was, did ſeuerely chaſtiſe publike ſinnes and offences, becauſe he was very iealous of Gods honour, and loue of one neighbour vnto another, the which made him to haue the greater care of his flocke. Heereuppon wicked and diſſolute perſons grewe hatefull againſt him, deuiſing many falſe and ſlanderous accuſations, where-with the Pope was plentifully informed, impoſing ſo many crimes and delicts vpon him, that he was reputed vnmeete for ſuch a dignity.

Vertue neuer wanted malicious enimies.

Theſe matters thus vnderſtoode by the Pope, who alwayes thought him to bee a iuſt and holy man; being no way able to deny audience to ſuch a crowde of accuſers as deſired iuſtice; at laſt he aduertiſed the Arch-byſhop of theſe foule accuſations. The good reuerend man, to make cleare his innocence, elected (among all his other friends) a man whom hee moſt affected, and on whom hee had beſtowed more eſpeciall fauours, then on any man elſe beſide. Hee was a Prieſt by profeſſion, named Arnolde, aduanced vnto many great dignities, as being a man of rich ſpirite, eloquence, and abounding in the wealth of the world beſide.

The Pope acquainteth the Archbyſhop with his accuſations.

Arnolde comming to Rome, beeing enſtructed and preſſed on by the diuell; concluded in his priuate thoughts, to depriue his Lord of ſo high a dignitie, and make application thereof to himſelfe. Which that he might the better compas, hauing brought great ſummes of money thether with him, he ſuborned two wicked Cardinals, who, in ſted of ſpeaking in his Lords fauour, ſhould enforce all matters more againſt him. For they affirmed, that they ſtoode more obliged to God and trueth, then to worldly reſpects or fauors of mē: and therefore maintained, that the Archbyſhop was apparantly culpable of all the crimes inferred againſt him, and thereby iuſtly deſerued depriuation. The Pope being thus abuſiuely perſwaded by theyr report, thought to haue ſent two Prieſtes thether, to acquaint him with this information confirmed againſt him: but (indeede) he ſent the two Cardinals confederated with Arnolde, to perfect the Proceſſe, by them concluded for preſent execution. They were no sooner arriued in Germany, but they summoned the Arch-Byshop to come before them, wher his hearing was admitted in such sort, that sentence was giuen against him, whereby he was depriued of his See and dignitie, and Arnolde aduanced into his place, who had sold his Master, euen as Iudas did our blessed Sauiour. In pronouncing the iudgement, the Arch-Byshop Henry then present, deliuered these wordes. God knoweth, that I am most vniustly condemned: neuertheless, I care not for making any appeale to the further censure of men: because I am assured, that lyes shall bee better beleeued among you, then trueth can be in mee. Therefore I receiue this sentence, as some iust punishment for my sinnes, and yet doe appeale from your indirect doome, to the eternall iust Iudge Iesus Christ: before whom I adiourne you three to appeare.

Theese words were no sooner heard by the Iudges, but they fell into extremity of laughter, saying; That if he pleased to go on thither before, they would follow him at their leysure. This sentence was giuen in the yeare one thousand, fiue hundred, fifty six, which the depriued Archbyshop endured with admirable patience; & being retired into his Monastery, he ther remained the rest of his life, yet without acception of the habite. To conclude, God would not permit this wickednes to passe vnpunished, to the end, that innocence might the better bee knowne: but about a yeare and an halfe after, this Henrie dyed in his Monastery in great holinesse, and doubtlesse attained the glorie long time desired.

The death of the wronged Henry.

Newes of his death being brought to Rome, the two Cardinals being very merrily met together, one of them, said: The Arch-Byshoppe Henry is gone, and must not we in hast follow him? Indeed (quoth the other) so wee made him promise; but let him tarry (wheresoeuer he is) till wee come to him. Not many dayes after, one of them, being sodainly smitten by one of his seruants vpon the shoulder, fel downe so greeuously afflicted with paine, that his bowels and entrailes issued out at his fundament, and instantly died. The other falling into phrensie and madnesse, did eate off his owne hands, and dyed very strãgely. Now as concerning false Arnolde, hee exercised such cruelties and seditions among the people, that he became so hated and despised of them all; as being one day besiedged in a Monastery, hee vvas there slayne, and afterward left lying naked in the cõmon ditch of the Cittie; where all the people, both men, women, and children, performed all cruelties vpon his body, that possibly could be deuised by them.

¶ Of the cruelty which Albouine, King of Lombardie, vsed to his Queene & wife Rosamond: And by what meanes she reuenged her selfe on him at length.

AMong those warlike people, which yssued out of Germany, and the Northerne partes, to descend into Italy; the Longobards are named, who for the space of two hundred yeares & more, seized all those Lands, which (til this day) is called Lombardie, and vntill such time as Charlemaigne expelled them thence, according as in the History is amply related, written by Paulus Diaconus, in the particular Booke which he made for that purpose. He saith, that when they left Hungary (where they had for somtime dwelt) to passe into Italy, they had one named Albouine their King: a man of great spirit, and verie valiant in actions of warre. For he conquered in battayle Cunimond, King of the Girpides, and afterwardes, causing his head to bee smitten off, made a drinking Cuppe thereof, wherein hee vsed to drinke, and in triumph of his conquest and victorie. At which time, he detained (as his prisoner) a verie beautifull daughter to the fore-named King, called Rosamond, whom he made his wife, and then afterwards hee went to subdue Italy, carrying his Queene along with him, in the yeare, eight hundred, sixty two.

The Longobardes now named Lombardes.

Cunimond K. of the Gyrpides conquered by Albouine, and his head made a drinking cup.

When he had conquered many towns and Cities, he came (at length) to the City of Pauia: where (since that time) the succeeding Kinges vsed to keepe their seate and continuall residing, as the very principall Citty of their Kingdome. Hauing reig-reigned three yeares and three moneths, and being then at Verona; he appoynted a solemne feast, where hee drunke to his Queene in the Cuppe made of her fathers head, and forced her to pledge him: whereat shee conceiued such griefe and displeasure, that the intire loue which shee had formerly borne him, was conuerted into deadly hatred, with an absolute resolue and conclusion to kill him, in iust reuenge of her fathers death, & cruelty extended to her. And to assist her in this determination, she conferred with a gentleman named Hermigilde: who presently tolde her, that to the execution of such an important busines, she should require the ayde of a valiant knight in the Court, called Paradine. Which instantly she did, but he would not yeeld thereto, because he tooke it to be too horride a treason. Finding her hope frustrated, and fearing lest hir intent would be discouered, yet desiring nothing more in the world, then to compasse the height and pitch of her enterprise: she set aside all care of honour and honesty, & being aduertised by Hermigilde, that Paradine earnestly affected one of her attending Ladies, she deuised therby to effect her purpose. Being acquainted with the secret resort where Paradine & his louer alwaies met together; she found some other emploiment for the Lady, & made vse of her place for the time, Paradine keeping her there company a long time, imagining no other, but that it was the mistresse of his affections.

The Queene, who had spent all this while in soft whispers and dalliance, not vsing any one word whereby shee might be discouered; perceiuing opportunity so aptly to fit her, spake thus vnto him. Knowest thou Paradine, who it is that keepeth thee company? Full well (quoth he) with my Mistresse, and then named her. Thou lyest (false traytour,) replyed the Queene, I am Rosamond thy Soueraignes wife, whom thou hast dared to abuse in this manner, and dye thou must by the iust wrath of Alboüine, except thou saue thy life by killing him: aduise thee therefore, whether his life or thine owne is deerest to thee. When Paradine considered his dangerous estate, without any meanes of helpe or escape; hee resolued to kill the King: and for his better furtherance therein, both hee, the Queene, and Hermigilde tooke counsell together, plotting the proiect in this manner.

The King vsed to sleepe in the heate of the day, and all else auoyded the chamber, the Queene onely excepted, and he being a king of courage and high resolue, euer slept like a Souldier, with his Sword girded about him: which at this intended time of treason, the Queene had tyed so fast in the scabbard, as hee could by no meanes helpe himselfe therewith. Paradine and Hermigilde waiting the houre, which was vppon the Queenes issuing foorth: they entred, and for all their soft treading, the King heard them, and started from his bed. VVhen he beheld two men armed with weapons, and at such a time of no suspition: fury, not feare made him take no knowlege of them, but sought to defend himselfe with his weapon. VVhich failing him, by the meanes of so false a Queene, and they with their weapons euery where wounding him: hee caught vp a stoole, and therewith made his defence so long as he could, till in the end they depriued him of life, yet neither noise heard, or any suspition of murther.

The king being thus dead, and all well carryed with a smoothe countenance: Hermigilde possessed himselfe of the Pallace, intending to make the Queene his wife, as immediately he did. But notwithstanding all their close packing; the Lombardes (not long after) came to the knowledge of their Kings death, and in what manner hee was murthered, which they purposed to reuenge with all possible speed. Wherein they were preuented, for Rosamond and her complices hauing packed vp most of her Iewells & treasure Royall, fled away thence, carrying with them Aluisinda Daughter to King Alboüine, by his first wife. And for their safer security, they went to Rauenna, where then gouerned a Lieutenant of the Empire, named Longiuus, who kept that place for Tiberius, Sonne to the Empeperour Constantine of Constantinople, by whom they were curteously entertained.

Not long after, Longiuus becomming enamored of Rosamond, & desirous to enioy her in mariage, whereto he found her very tractable; councelled her to procure the death of Hermigilde, & then he would marry her. She that had lost all loue and

CHAP. XXIX.

Of a pleaſant, witty, and honeſt deceit, which a famous and vertuous Queene vſed to her owne husband; whereby Iames, King of Arragon was begotten, with other remembrances both of his birth and death.

The Authors induction to the enſuing Hiſtory.

I VVell remember, that in reading the Chronicle of the Kings of Arragon; I finde, that Don Peter, Count of Barcelonna, who was the ſeauenth King of Arragon, had Madam Mary in marriage, daughter to the Earle of Mount Peſulin, Nephew to the Emperor of Conſtantinople, ſhe being a very beautifull and vertuous Lady. All which notwithſtanding, the King was much addicted vnto other women, and vſed ſuch ſlender teſtimony of loue towards his Queene, that hee refuſed to keepe her company, as (in the duty of an husband) he ſtood obliged to doe. This ſtrange behauiour in the King, did much afflict and greeue the Queene, becauſe they had no childe to ſucceed in the Kingdome, the greateſt miſery (of all other) that can happen to a well ſetled Eſtate. Heereupon, by aduice of one of the Kings Pages of his Chamber, who (it may be) had formerly done ſeruice in the like affaires; ſhee compaſſed the meanes (vnder title of ſome one of the Kings cheefeſt fauourites) to bee brought that night to lodge with the King. Such familiar entercourſes hauing paſſed betweene them, as in ſuch wanton ſeaſons are commonly required, the King perceiuing the day-light neere approching, in regard both of his owne honours ſafety and hers, made meanes to her for her ſpeedy departure, but ſhe taking hold of ſo good an occaſion, ſpake thus vnto him.

The words of the Queene to the King, before ſhe would depart from his bed.

My gracious Lord and husband, I am none ſuch as (perhaps) you take mee to be, but be well aſſured, that this night you haue ſlept with your true Queene and VVife. Vſe what violence you ſhall pleaſe to mee, for I purpoſe not to leaue your bed, vntill ſome man, well deſeruing faith and credite, may be witneſſe of my this nights keeping you company. To the ende, that if the fauour of heauen hath bin ſo gracious to me, that fruite (long deſired) may enſue by this aduenture; the world ſhal take true notice, that it is your owne. The King perceiuing this honeſt deceit of his Queene, appeared to bee well pleaſed therewith, and called two Gentlemen of his Chamber, to teſtifie the truth, according to her deſire, and as (indeed) ſtood beſt with his honour. It ſo pleaſed God, that at fit and conuenient time, the Queene hauing at that inſtant time conceiued with childe; at ſuch due ſeaſon as the cuſtome of women alloweth them for trauaile, ſhee was deliuered of a goodly Sonne, euen on the firſt day of February, in the yeare one thouſand, one hundred, ninety ſixe. Soone after it was borne, the Mother cauſed it to bee carried to the Church, and (which is a thing deſeruing memory) as they which carried the childe entred into the Church, the Prieſts began to ſing, Te Deum laudamus, Wee praiſe thee O God. Paſſing from thence vnto another Church, as they were entring likewiſe thereinto, the Prieſts began to ſing the Pſalme

The conception & birth of Iames, King of Arragon.

The carriage of the childe to two ſeuerall Churches.

Pſalme of Benedictus Dominus Deus Iſrael; Bleſſed be the Lord God of Iſrael; which gaue a great prognoſticating & vndoubted hope, of ſome excellent vertues to ſucceed in the childe.

A ſtrange manner of naming the Childe, by lighting of twelue Torches, tearmed the twelue Apoſtles.

The Father and Mother, not knowing what name to giue him, cauſed twelue Torches (of equall length and making) to be all lighted in one inſtant, the twelue Torches bearing the ſeueral names of the twelue Apoſtles. With this concluſion, that the name of the Torch which firſt fayled, or became extinguiſhed; the ſelfe-ſame name ſhould bee giuen to the childe, which happened to be that of S. Iames. Heereupon he was named Iames, becauſe it was the name, which the men of Arragon gaue to that Apoſtle. Hee proued to be an excellent Prince, and of admirable gouernement, both in peace and warre, for hee made a cruell inuaſion vpon the Moores, being euermore very liberall to his Souldiers. Among other moſt notable matters, hee leuied a great Army, which he conducted into the Iſle of Maiorica, that then was in the Moores poſſeſſion, where hee fought many ſtout battailes. But after he had a long while beſiedged the City, he won it in the ende, and likewiſe other neighbouring Iſlands beſide. Then comming into his kingdome of the Moores, eſpecially to the City of Carthage, hee proued ſtill the Conqueror, and neuer fayled in any of his attempts.

The vertuous qualities remaining in the Prince.

His winning the Iſle of Maiorica and the City of Carthage.

He had many children, as well ſonnes as daughters, on whom (during his life time) he beſtowed great gifts and goodly eſtates. Don Peter, that afterwad was King of Arragon, was his Sonne. Likewiſe Don Iames, King of Maiorica and Minorica. He had another that was Archbiſhop of Tolledo. Madame Yollant, who was Queene of Caſtile; and Madame Iſabell, that was Queene of France; and Madame Vrraqua, who was married to Don Emannell, Prince of Caſtile; and Don Peter, who eſpouſed the daughter vnto the King of Nauarre. He liued ſeuenty and two yeares, and dyed religiouſly, taking on him (before his death) the habite of a Monke. For he had a greeuous diſeaſe, which made him renounce his royall Scepter, with deliberate purpoſe, that if he might recouer his health againe, hee would imploy the reſt of his dayes in the ſeruice of God. But weakneſſe encreaſing more and more vpon him, he dyed in the City of Valencia, Anno 1266. and at the beginning of the Moneth of Auguſt.
